(d) A departure from evil.—Once more the fear of the Lord promotes a departure from evil, for in this case 'wisdom' and 'understanding' are almost identical terms. 'To fear God and to keep His commandments' is described as the whole duty of man. If we fear the Lord as Job did, we shall, like him, examine ourselves, our thoughts, our words, our deeds. Nor must the Christian precept be forgotten—'Let every one that nameth the Name of Christ depart from iniquity'.

MAN'S BEST WISDOM

'Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding.'—JOB XXVIII. 28.

Job in his calmer mood feels that he has attempted to deal with questions too high for him.

I. He forgets for a while his own pangs and sorrows; the pressure of God's heavy hand is withdrawn, and there rises before him a vision of that wisdom, which, as in the opening portion of the book of Proverbs, so here, and in later generations, as for instance in the age at which the 'Book of Wisdom' was written, embodied to the pious Jew the combination of the highest knowledge with the truest goodness.

II. And this, in his baffled and wearied, yet more tranquil frame, he feels to be beyond his reach. There is a touch at once of hopelessness and of cheering faith in his words. He dwells on the unapproachable, the inscrutable nature of true wisdom, in terms which the most enlightened Christian may in one sense fully echo.

III. 'We know that what we see forms but the outskirts of creation; that the power and the wisdom which rule this vast universe must lie beyond the reach, not only of our understanding, but also of our furthest speculation.' Yet we know also how much of God's nature, which was hidden from Job, has been revealed to us in Christ: that if we 'know in part' only yet in part we do know; and we may thankfully welcome and accept the vast revelations of that book of nature which we have received from the progress of human science.

IV. But when all this has been fully acknowledged, we still feel the force of Job's words, that there is something higher yet than any knowledge regarded as knowledge, whether it be scientific, or whether it be theological knowledge. The truest wisdom is 'to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with our God'.—G. G. BRADLEY, Lectures on the Book of Job, p. 238.

'Oh that I were as in the months of old, as in the days when God watched over me.'—JOB XXIX. 2.

At the close of his paper on Good-Nature (Spectator, No. 171), Addison quotes this chapter as one of 'several passages which I have always read with great delight in the book of Job. It is the Account which that Holy Man gives of his Behaviour in the Days of his Prosperity; and, if considered only as a human Composition, is a finer picture of a charitable and good-natured man than is to be met with in any other author.'

'PEOPLE do not dream when they are happy. For the last few days,' says Miss Thackeray of her heroine, Catherine, in The Village on the Cliff, 'she had remembered without bitterness. Life seemed to have grown suddenly bearable, and almost easy once more. If she had known how short a time her tranquillity was to last, she might have made more of it perhaps, and counted each minute as it passed. But she did not know, and she wasted many of them as she was doing now, as we all do, in unavailing hankering and regrets—precious little instants flying by only too quickly, and piping to us very sweetly, and we do not dance. Looking back, one laments not so much the unavoidable sorrows of life, as its wasted peace and happiness, and then more precious minutes pass in remorse for happiness wasted long ago.'

REFERENCES.—XXIX. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 51. XXIX. 2-4.—Ibid. vol. xvii. No. 1011.

'When my children were about me.'—JOB XXIX. 5.

'WHEN I get down to my home from this House,' said Bright in the House of Commons during the American Civil War, 'I find half a dozen little children playing upon my hearth. How many Members are there who can say with me, that the most innocent, the most pure, the most holy joy which in their past years they have felt, or in their future years they have hoped for, has not arisen from contact and association with our precious children?'

'When I went forth to the gate unto the city, the young men saw me and hid themselves, and the aged rose up and stood. The princes refrained talking. . . . When the ear heard me, then it blessed me; and when the eye saw me, it gave witness unto me: because I delivered the poor that cried, the fatherless also, that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me, and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.'—JOB XXIX. 7 f.

To Sir Alexander Ball exclusively the Maltese themselves attributed their emancipation; on him, too, they rested their hopes of the future. Whenever he appeared in Valetta, the passengers on each side, through the whole length of the street, stopped and remained uncovered till he passed, the very clamours of the market-place were hushed at his entrance, and then exchanged shouts for shouts of joy and welcome. Even after the lapse of years he never appeared in any one of their casals, which did not lie in the direct road between Valetta and St. Antonio, his summer residence, but the women and children, with such of the men who were not at labour in their fields, fell into ranks, and followed, or preceded him, singing the Maltese song which had been made in his honour, and which was scarcely less familiar to the inhabitants of Malta and Gozo than 'God save the King' to Britons. 'When he went to the gate through the city, the young men refrained talking; and the aged arose and stood up. When the ear heard, then it blessed him; and when the eye saw him, it gave witness to him: because he delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and those that had none to help them. The blessing of them that were ready to perish came upon him; and he caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.'—COLERIDGE in The Friend.

REFERENCE.—XXIX. 16.—J. Baldwin Brown, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xx. pp. 264, 280.

EARTHLY ANTICIPATIONS

'Then I said, I shall die in my nest; and I shall multiply my days as the sand.'—JOB XXIX. 18.

WE seem to learn from these anticipations of Job in the days of his former prosperity and comfort the delusions relative to things tending to their own good and to the glory of God, which may especially be imposed upon the godly in seasons of great and uninterrupted prosperity.

I. An overrated estimation of their own comfort, 'I shall die in my nest'. If your hearts are in heaven, you will find your conflicts upon earth, which will effectually hinder you from the making of nests in a world of sin and sorrow.

II. A forgetfulness of their character as strangers and pilgrims upon earth, 'I shall multiply my days as the sand'. Job manifested the presumption of long life, on which the rich man went, who is the subject of a parable in the gospel, 'Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, 'Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee, then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?'

III. A disposition to estimate their time upon earth, rather upon the score of its comfort, or its duration than of its usefulness. What is the value of all that comfort to a sinner in which God is not glorified? What is the value of multiplied days, if they do not speak to the praise of Jehovah?—W. BORROWS, Select Sermons, p. 216.

REFERENCE.—XXIX. 20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1649.

'I sat chief, and dwelt as a king in the army, as one that comforteth the mourners.'—JOB XXIX. 25.

How easy it is to shed human blood! How much in all ages have wounds and shrieks and tears been the cheap and vulgar resources of the rulers of mankind! How difficult and noble it is to govern in kindness, and to found an empire upon the everlasting basis of justice and affection! . . . The vigour I love consists in finding out wherein subjects are aggrieved, in relieving them, in the laborious, watchful, and difficult task of increasing public happiness by allaying each particular discontent.—SYDNEY SMITH, Peter Plymley's Letters (ix.).

'My welfare passeth away as a cloud . . . the days of affliction have taken hold upon me.'—JOB XXX. 15, 16.

THIS sickness brought him so near to the gates of death, and he saw the grave so ready to devour him, that he would often say, his recovery was supernatural. And then, being with his eldest daughter, Mrs. Harvey, at Abury Hatch in Essex, he there fell into a fever, which, with the help of his constant infirmity—vapours from the spleen—hastened him into so visible a consumption, that his beholders might say of him, as St. Paul of himself, 'I die daily,' and he might say with Job, 'My welfare passeth away as a cloud, the days of my affliction have taken hold of me'.—IZAACK WALTON, *Life of Dr. Donne

'Thou art turned to be cruel to me: with the might of thy hand thou persecutest me. Thou liftest me up to the wind, thou causest me to ride upon it; and thou dissolvest me in the storm.'—JOB xxx. 21, 22.

'THE blasphemy of great natures,' said Renan once, 'is more acceptable to God than the interested prayer of the common person; for, while the blasphemy denotes an imperfect view of things, it includes an element of just protest, whereas egoism has not a particle of truth at all.'

REFERENCE.—XXX. 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1922. XXX. 25.—Ibid. vol. viii. No. 479.

'I made a covenant with mine eyes; how then should I look upon a maid?'—JOB xxxi. 1.

'CHASTITY,' said Bishop Camus of Belley, 'is timid and sensitive, trembling at every shadow, quick at every sound, fearing every peril. It takes alarm at a glance—as a very Job, who had made a covenant with his eyes; the slightest word disconcerts it; it is suspicious of sweet scents; good food seems a snare, mirth a levity, society treacherous, light reading a danger. It moves along all eyes and ears, like one covered with jewels who crosses a forest, and starts at every step, fancying he hears robbers.'

CHASTITY is the flowering of man; and what are called Genius, Heroism, Holiness, and the like, are but various fruits which succeed it.—THOREAU, Walden ('Higher Laws').

REFERENCE.—XXXI. 14.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 130.

'Did not He that made me in the womb make him?'—JOB xxxi. 15.

THE races to whom we owe the Bible were cruel in war; they were revengeful; their veins were filled with blood, hot with lust; they knew no art, nor grace, nor dialectic, such as Greece knew, but one service they at least have rendered to the world. They have preserved in their prophets and poets this eternal verity—He that made me in the womb made him—and have proclaimed with Divine fury a Divine wrath upon all who may be seduced into forgetfulness of it.—MARK RUTHERFORD in The Deliverance.

WHEN Job had spoken of his duty to the lowly, he had given the sanction for it in the thought: Did not One fashion us? Jesus gives a higher sanction: Does not one Father love you all? In the presence of the Father the children are to lose their separateness.—ROYCE, Religious Aspect of Philosophy, p. 42.

'If I have withheld the poor from their desire . . . or have eaten my morsel alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof.'—JOB xxxi. 16, 17.

EUGENIUS prescribes to himself many particular days of fasting and abstinence, in order to increase his private bank of charity, and sets aside what would be the current expences of those times for the use of the poor. He often goes afoot when his business calls him, and at the end of his walk has given a shilling, which in his ordinary methods of expence would have gone for coach hire, to the first necessitous person that has fallen in his way. I have known him, when he has been going to a play or an opera, divert the money which was designed for that purpose upon an object of Charity whom he has met in the street.—ADDISON, Spectator (No. 177).

'If I have seen any perish for want of clothing, or any poor without covering.'—JOB xxxi. 19.

'It was one of Job's boasts that "he had seen none perish for want of clothing"; and that he had often "made the heart of the widow to rejoice". And doubtless Dr. Sanderson,' says Izaak Walton, 'might have made the same religious boast of this and very many like occasions. But, since he did not, I rejoice that I have this just occasion to do it for him.'

'If I have said to the fine gold, thou art my confidence.'—JOB xxxi. 24.

IF we command our wealth, we shall be rich and free; if our wealth command us, we are poor indeed.—BURKE, First Letter on a Regicide Peace.

'If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness; and my heart hath been secretly enticed, and my mouth hath kissed my hand.'—JOB xxxi. 26, 27.

'THE scholar of the sixteenth century,' says Ruskin in the third volume of The Stones of Venice, 'if he saw the lightning shining from the east to the west, thought forthwith of Jupiter, not of the Son of Man; if he saw the moon walking in brightness, he thought of Diana, not of the throne which was to be established for ever as a faithful witness in heaven; and though his heart was but secretly enticed, yet thus he denied the God that is above.'

'WERE I obliged to have a religion,' said Napoleon, 'I would worship the sun—the source of all life—the real God of the earth.'

'Then was kindled the wrath of Elihu against Job.'—JOB xxxii. 2.

Job's friends kindly argued with him, 'You are suffering, therefore you are guilty'. And the argument was bad, because they only saw an exceptional accident in the life of a good man; but if that eternal life had been passed in continual residence on this globe, if notorious bad fortune had pursued him through eternity in the nineteenth generation, his descendants might well have said, 'Oh, Job, there is something wrong in you, for you never come out right'.—BAGEHOT on The Ignorance of Man.

'Now Elihu had waited to speak unto Job, because they were elder than he.'—JOB xxxii. 4.

'I SPEAK not as claiming reverence for my own age and office,' says Mr. Lyon to Felix Holt (Felix Holt, chap. v.), 'not to shame you, but to warn you. It is good that you should use plainness of speech, and I am not of those who would enforce a submissive silence on the young, that they themselves, being elders, may be heard at large; for Elihu was the youngest of Job's friends, yet was there a wise rebuke in his words.'

'I said, Days should speak, and multitude of years should teach wisdom.'—JOB XXXII. 7.

If youth is the season of unrest, when change is welcomed for its own sake, and when orderly growth is despised, it is also the brooding-time of speculation, the maturing-time of adventure. Old men are probably best fitted for carrying on the mechanical and routine work of the world, but the artists, the poets, the explorers, the propagators of new ideas, are habitually to be found among the young. Of two great changes that have powerfully influenced modern society, it may probably be said that both the Reformation and the Revolution owed their impetus to the generation under forty.—C. H. PEARSON.

'There is a spirit in man, and the breath of the Almighty giveth him understanding.'—JOB XXXII. 8.

HERE it is that humanity culminates, or reveals the summit of its dignity; it is, in being, spirit, and, as such, open to the visitation and the indwelling power of God. This it is, and this only, that makes us properly religious beings. No created being can excel in order a soul so configured to God as to be inspirable by Him, able to receive His impulse, fall into His movement, rest in His ends, and be finally perfected in the eternity of His joys.—BUSHNELL.

WHAT the light of your mind, which is the direct inspiration of the Almighty pronounces incredible,—that, in God's name, leave uncredited; at your peril do not try believing that.—CARLYLE, Life of Sterling.

THY own God-created Soul; dost thou not call that a 'revelation'? Who made Thee? where didst thou come from? The voice of eternity, if thou be not a blasphemer, and poor asphyxiated mute, speak with that tongue of thine! Thou art the latest birth of Nature; it is 'the inspiration of the Almighty' that giveth thee understanding.—CARLYLE, Past and Present.

TRUE, nevertheless, forever it remains that Intellect is the real object of reverence, and of devout prayer, and zealous wish and pursuit among the sons of men; and even, well understood, the one object. It is the Inspiration of the Almighty that giveth men understanding. . . . Human Intellect, if you consider it well, is the exact summary of Human Worth.—CARLYLE, Latter-day Pamphlets (iii.).

CARLYLE, never tired of quoting this verse, recurs again to it in describing the Presbyterianism of Scotland (in the essay on Sir Walter Scott): 'A country where the entire people is, or even once has been, laid hold of, filled to the heart with an infinite religious idea, has "made a step from which it cannot retrograde". Thought, conscience, the sense that man is denizen of a Universe, Creature of an Eternity, has penetrated to the remotest cottage, to the simplest heart. Beautiful and awful, the feeling of a Heavenly Behest, of Duty God-commanded, over-canopies all life. There is an inspiration in such a people; one may say in a more special sense, "the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding".'

REFERENCE.—XXXII. 8.—J. E. VAUX, Sermon Notes (4th Series), p. 22.

'It is not the great who are wise, nor the aged that understand judgment.'—JOB XXXII. 9.

WE are idolaters of the old. We do not believe in the riches of the soul, in its proper eternity and omnipresence. We do not believe there is any force in to-day to rival or recreate that beautiful yesterday. We linger in the ruins of the old tent, where once we had bread and shelter and organs, nor believe that the spirit can feed, cover, and nerve us again. But we sit and weep in vain. The voice of the Almighty saith, 'up and onward for evermore'. We cannot stay among the ruins.—EMERSON.

IN these days, what of lordship or leadership is still to be done, the youth must do it, not the mature or aged man; the mature man, hardened into sceptical egoism, knows no monition but that of his own frigid cautions, avarices, mean timidities; and can lead nowhither towards an object that even seems noble.—CARLYLE, Latter-day Pamphlets (i.).

I KNOW nothing can conduce more to letters than to examine the writings of the ancients, and not to rest on their sole authority or take all upon trust from them. . . . For to all the observations of the ancients we have our own experience: which if we will use and apply, we have better means to pronounce. Let Aristotle and others have their dues; but if we can make further discoveries of truth and fitness than they, why are we envied?—BEN JONSON.

AN institution is healthy in proportion to its independence of its own past, to the confident freedom with which it alters itself to meet new conditions.—PROF. SEELEY.

'Great men are not always wise; neither do the aged understand judgment.'

THIS verse is put as the motto to the fifth chapter of Mr. Winston Churchill's biography of his father, which describes Lord Randolph's outburst in 1885 against 'the old men who crooned over the fires at the Carlton' and the older leaders of the Conservative Party.

AGE is no better, hardly so well, qualified for an instructor than youth, for it has not profited so much as it has lost. One may almost doubt if the wisest man has learned anything of absolute value by living. Practically, the old have no very important advice to give the young, their own experience has been so partial, and their lives have been such miserable failures, for private reasons, as they must believe. I have lived some thirty years on this planet, and I have yet to hear the first syllable of valuable or even earnest advice from my seniors. They have told me nothing, and probably cannot tell me anything to the purpose.—THOREAU, Walden ('Economy').

COMPARE the words of the Fool to Lear (Act i Scene 4): 'Thou hadst little wit in thy bald crown, when thou gavest thy golden one away'.

'Therefore I said, Harken to me; I also will shew mine opinion.'—JOB XXXII. 10.

'We once were lusty youths and tall: ' one by the younger men, 'we still are stout, come, try a fall'; and the third by the children, 'but we'll be stronger than you all'.—PLUTARCH (describing the Spartan festivals, at which three choruses were sung).

'The centuries are conspirators against the sanity and authority of the soul. . . . Man is timid and apologetic,—he is no longer upright; he dare not say, 'I think,' 'I am,' but quotes some saint or sage. He is ashamed before the blade of grass or the blowing rose. These roses under my window make no reference to former roses or to better ones; they are for what they are; they exist with God to-day.—EMERSON.

In The Pilgrimage of Pleasure Swinburne makes Youth cry as follows:—

'Away from me, thou Sapience, thou noddy, thou green fool! What ween ye I be as a little child in school? Ye are as an old crone that mooneth by a fire, a bob with a chestnut is all thine heart's desire.'

'Neither will I give flattering titles unto any man. For I know not to give flattering titles; else would my Maker soon take me away.'—JOB XXXII. 21, 22.

AMONG all the Diseases of the Mind, there is not one more epidemical or more pernicious than the love of flattery. . . . When there is not Vanity enough awake in a man to undo him, the flatterer stirs up that dormant weakness, and inspires him with Merit enough to be a Coxcomb.—STEELE in The Spectator (No. 238).

VILLARI, in the ninth chapter of his Savonarola, describes Lorenzo the Magnificent on his death-bed as unable to 'believe in his confessor's sincerity. Accustomed to see his slightest wish obeyed, and all the world bow to his will, he could not realize that anyone would dare to deny him absolution. Accordingly the blessing of the Church was powerless to lighten the weight burdening his conscience, and he was more and more cruelly tortured by remorse. No one has ever dared to refuse me anything—he thought to himself, and then the idea that had once been his pride became his worst torment.'

WHAT is it we heartily wish of each other? Is it to be pleased and flattered? No, but to be convicted and exposed, to be shamed out of our nonsense of all kinds, and made men of, instead of ghosts and phantoms.—EMERSON on New England Reformers.

REFERENCE.—XXXIII. 6-33.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2453.

'Job, I pray thee, hear my speech.'—JOB XXXIII. 1.

WHY is it that the just must endure such suffering on earth? The book of Job does not solve this perplexing question. On the contrary, this very book is the Song of Songs of scepticism, and in it the loathsome serpents of doubt writhe and hiss out their everlasting 'why?' How was it that, at the return from Babylon, the pious Commission of the Temple Archives, over which Ezra presided, admitted this book into the canon of the Holy Scriptures? I have often asked myself this question. My belief is that these Divinely enlightened persons did so, not from any lack of intelligence, but simply because, in their sublime wisdom, they saw that doubt was deeply rooted and grounded in human nature, and that it is not to be suppressed by any silly device, but must undergo its own appropriate cure. . . . This poison could not be spared from the Bible, the great medicine-chest for the family of mankind. Yes, just as man when he suffers must weep out his sufferings, so must he also think out his doubts when he feels that he is cruelly disappointed in his claims to earthly happiness.—HEINE.

REFERENCE.—XXXIII. 6-33.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2453.

'For God speaketh once, yea twice, though man regardeth it not. In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men.'—JOB XXXIII. 14, 15.

MUST not what is called 'Revelation' be simply either Anticipation, or Suggestion, or Confirmation? Some favoured and highly strung natures tell us that they have arrived at this confirmation by 'spiritual discernment,' and can feel not the shadow of a doubt about the matter. . . . The truth, they say, was revealed to them, 'borne in upon their souls,' vouchsafed to them in a sudden gleam of light, 'in a dream, in a vision of the night,' and so on; and the moment it thus flashed upon them, it wrote itself upon their mental frame-work by its own illumination. What is this phrasology but simply a more lofty and excited, or more poetical way of saying (as we often hear contemplative thinkers of soberer temperaments say) that the conception suddenly occurred to them, flashed upon them, and was instinctively recognized at once as the true solution of the problem which had exercised their minds so long? And what in reality is this instantaneous recognition—this εἴρηκα cry—but the proof that the mind was capable of the discovery, and had long been on the brink of it?—W. RATHBONE GREG, Miscellaneous Essays, pp. 264, 265.

REFERENCE.—XXXIII. 14-18.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2453.

'He keepeth back his soul from the pit, and his life from perishing by the sword. He is chastened also with pain upon his bed.'—JOB XXXIII. 18, 19.

IT would be a poor result of all our anguish and our wrestling if we won nothing but our old selves at the end of it—if we could return to the same blind loves, the same self-confident blame, the same light thoughts of human suffering, the same frivolous gossip on human lives, the same feeble sense of that Unknown towards which we have sent forth irrepressible cries in our loneliness.—GEORGE ELIOT, Adam Bede (chap. vii.).

THE MINISTRY OF INTERPRETATION

'An interpreter, one among a thousand.'—JOB XXXIII. 23.

WE shall always need a ministry of interpretation, a discriminating, highly intellectual, most penetrative ministry, that sees the little things as well as the great things, the coupling nexus, the filament, the plasm, the thing that is not yet a thing but will be a thing by and by in the out-throwing of all the purpose and issues of Divine providence. Nine hundred and ninety-nine of us therefore will do well to listen, to attend, to obey.

I. 'An interpreter,' that is emphatically what the Bible is. The Bible is the interpreter of God; the Bible has but one subject, all other subjects are cognate to it; they are, however, but collateral and minor; he only who keeps company with the Apostles, the minstrels, and the prophets can really interpret God.

The Bible shirks no great subject, it invites the soul to the discussion of the highest themes, it is not afraid to go into the cemetery and interpret the graves into resurrections; it is an infinite succour and a most tender strength.

II. Experience is the best commentator on the Bible. Salvation is not of grammar or of criticism. The great discussions do not turn upon points of etymology, syntax, or prosody. Every man is an interpreter of the Bible if he has rich and deep and varied experience; he can make the Bible prove itself. Never believe any man upon any subject who has not deep personal experience in relation to it. Mere intellectual expertness is becoming quite a nuisance; we want the voice of the heart, especially upon those subjects which concern the heart, and to other voices we cannot listen.

III. Jesus is the interpreter of God. He gathered us round His knee, so to say, and told us that God's real name was Father. We said, not like our father? Yes, was the gracious reply, like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that love Him. But not like some fathers? No, because some fathers are not fathers, they do despite to the genius of fatherhood; they are brutes, ruffians, cruel wicked persons, to whom the name father ought never to be given; but because there are these evil specimens of degenerate fatherhood the inner genius and spirit of fatherhood cannot be touched; that fatherhood means tenderness, love, law, sympathy, the large righteousness which melts into tears or burns into blossom. There is no interpreter of God equal to the Son of God.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. I. p. 180.

REFERENCES.—XXXIII. 23, 24.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 905. XXXIII. 24.—Ibid. vol. xliii. No. 2505. XXXIII. 27-29.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons, p. 303.

'Lo, all these things doth God work, twice, yea thrice, with a man, to bring back his soul from the pit, that he may be enlightened with the light of the living.'—JOB XXXIII. 29, 30.

TAKE courage, say the happy to those in sorrow and trouble; are there not many mansions even here? seasons in their course; harvests in their season, thanks be to the merciful ordinances that mete out sorrow and peace, and longing and fulfilment, and rest after the storm. Take courage—say the happy—the message of the sorrowful is harder to understand. The echoes come from afar, and reach beyond our ken. As the cry passes beyond us into the awful unknown, we feel that this is, perhaps, the voice in life that reaches beyond life itself. Not of harvests to come, nor of peaceful home hearts do they speak in their sorrow. Their fires are out, their hearths are in ashes, but see, it was the sunlight that extinguished the flame.—MISS THACKERAY in Old Kensington.

REFERENCE.—XXXIII. 29, 30.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1101. XXXIV.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 2670. XXXIV. 29.—Ibid. vol. xiii. No. 737. XXXIV. 31, 32.—Ibid. vol. xxii. No. 1274. XXXIV. 32.—J. Vaughan, Sermons (9th Series), p. 21. XXXIV. 33.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 2670. Ibid. vol. xlix. No. 2834.

'None saith, where is God my Maker, which giveth songs in the night?'—JOB XXXV. 10.

Do we not fail to accord to our nights their true value? We are ever giving our days the credit and blame of all we do and misdo, forgetting those silent, glimmering hours when plans—and sometimes plots—are laid; when resolutions are formed or changed; when heaven, and sometimes heaven's enemies, are invoked; when anger and evil thoughts are recalled, and sometimes hate made to inflame and fester; when problems are solved, riddles guessed, and things made apparent in the dark, which day refused to reveal. Our nights are the keys to our days. They explain them. They are also the day's correctors. Night's leisure untangles the mistakes of day's haste. We should not attempt to comprise our pasts in the phrase, 'in those days'; we should rather say, 'in those days and nights'.—G. W. CABLE, The Grandisimes (chap. xvii.).

Nothing astonishes me more, when a little sickness clogs the wheels of life, than the thoughtless career we run in the hour of health. 'None saith, where is God, my Maker, that giveth songs in the night, who teacheth us more knowledge than the beasts of the field, and more understanding than the fowls of the air?' Give me, my Maker, to remember Thee!—BURNS to Mrs. McLehose.

REFERENCES.—XXXV. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliv. No. 2558. XXXV. 10, 11.—Ibid. vol. xxvi. No. 1511. XXXVI. 2.—Ibid. vol. xxiv. No. 1403.

'I will fetch my knowledge from afar, and will ascribe righteousness to my Maker.'—JOB XXXVI. 3.

To gain a true view we must take into account all varied forms of contemporary experience, and all the experiences of different ages. He will best see the whole, and each part in relation to the whole most truly, who has the widest and best proportioned knowledge founded on the experience of others, and at the same time controls all by his own experience.—DR. HORT, Hulsean Lectures, pp. 172, 173.

'Behold, God is mighty, and He despiseth not any.'—JOB XXXVI. 5.

'It struck me,' says Carlyle, 'that Sterling's was not intrinsically, nor had ever been in the highest or chief degree, a devotional mind. Of course all excellence in man, and worship as the supreme excellence, was part of the inheritance of this gifted man: but if called to define him, I should say, artist not Saint was the real bent of his being. He had sudden admiration, but intrinsically rather a deficiency of reverence in comparison. Fear, with its corollaries, on the religious side, he appeared to have none, nor ever to have had any.' Earlier in the memoir, he makes a similar criticism. 'An eye to discern the divineness of the Heaven's splendours and lightnings, the insatiable wish to revel in their godlike radiances and brilliances; but no heart to front the scathing terrors of them, which is the first condition of your conquering an abiding place there.' Yet, at the close of the biography, Carlyle tells how, on his death-bed, Sterling was wont to murmur, 'God is great, God is great'.

WE may confidently trust that we have over us a Being thoroughly robust and grandly magnanimous, in distinction from the Infinite Invalid bred in the studies of sickly monomaniacs, who corresponds to a very common human type, but makes us blush for him when we contrast him with a truly noble man, such as most of us have had the privilege of knowing both in public and in private life.—O. W. HOLMES, The Poet at the Breakfast Table (x.).

STRONG Son of God, Immortal Love.—TENNYSON.

REFERENCE.—XXXVI. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiii. No. 1379.

'If they be bound in fetters, and be holden in cords of affliction, then He sheweth them their work, and their transgressions that they have exceeded.'—JOB XXXVI. 8, 9.

'It is a very melancholy Reflection,' Steele observes in The Spectator (No. 312), 'that Men are usually so weak, that it is absolutely necessary for them to know Sorrow and Pain to be in their right senses.'

'He openeth also their ear to discipline, and commandeth that they return from iniquity. If they obey and serve Him, they shall spend their days in prosperity, and their years in pleasure.'—JOB XXXVI. 10, 11.

THE weakness of the will begins, when the individual would be something of himself. All reform aims, in some one particular, to let the soul have its way through us; in other words, to engage us to obey.—EMERSON on The Oversoul.

'Remember that thou magnify His work, whereof men have sung. All men have looked thereon; man beholdeth it afar off. Behold, God is great, and we know Him not.'—JOB XXXVI. 24-26.

In his paper on 'Madame Sand and the New Apocalypse' in The Paris Sketch-Book, Thackeray bursts out with the indignant cry: 'O awful, awful name of God! Light unbearable! Mystery unfathomable! Vastness immeasurable!—Who are these who come forward to explain the mystery, and gaze unblinking into the depths of the light, and measure the immeasurable vastness to a hair? Oh name, that God's people of old did fear to utter! Oh light, that God's prophet would have perished had he seen! Who are these that are now so familiar with it?

Women, truly; for the most part weak women—weak in intellect, weak mayhap in spelling and grammar, but marvellously strong in faith: women, who step down to the people with stately step and voice of authority, and deliver their twopenny tablets as if there were some Divine authority for the wretched nonsense recorded there.'

REFERENCE.—XXXVII. 6.—H. W. Beecher, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxvii. p. 6.

'Hearken unto this, O Job: stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God. Dost thou know how God layeth His charge upon them?'—JOB XXXVII. 14, 15.

WHEN Hooker lay on his death-bed, he was asked what were his thoughts. 'To which,' says Izaak Walton, he replied: 'that he was meditating the number and nature of Angels, and their blessed obedience and order, without which peace could not be in heaven: and oh! that it might be so on earth'.

'Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds, the wondrous works of Him which is perfect in knowledge?'—JOB XXXVII. 16.

I RATHER believe that some of the mysteries of the clouds never will be understood by us at all. 'Knowest thou the balancings of the clouds?' Is the answer ever to be one of pride? 'The wondrous works of Him, Who is perfect in knowledge? Is our knowledge ever to be so? . . . For my own part, I enjoy the mystery, and perhaps the reader may. I think he ought. He should not be less grateful for summer rains, or see less beauty in the clouds of morning, because they come to prove him with hard questions.—RUSKIN, Frondees Agrestes, p. 24.

COMPENSATION

'Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds?'—JOB XXXVII. 16.

THESE words were spoken by Elihu—one of the five actors in the drama of the book of Job. Before he gave his opinion, two other opinions had been advanced as to the government of God. The first was that of Job's three critics—Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar. They represented God as very stern to the sinner. The second was that of Job. He said that the clouds of life were so unequally distributed as to lead to the conclusion that joy and pain were irrespective of goodness or badness. He thought that the clouds fell indiscriminately on the evil and the righteous. But Elihu steps forward with a third theory. He turns to Job and says: 'Admitting that the clouds fall equally on the evil and the righteous, how does that prove that the righteous suffer as much as the evil? Do you know the balancing of these clouds? Do you imagine that the same calamity falling on two men at the same time must mean the same amount of suffering? Do you not take into account the previous condition of the soul which meets it? Are you not aware that every calamity may be either aggravated or counterbalanced from within? Until you have learned this you are in no condition to measure the justice of God.' And of the three doctrines I agree with that of Elihu. Before I can judge of any calamity I must know whether there is anything to counterbalance it, to compensate it, to weigh against it. I have seen children playing in squalid lanes and wretched alleys, oblivious of the mean environment; they were blinded to the pain by their own buoyancy. I have seen the soldier unconscious of weary marches; he forgot fatigue in the ardour of his cause. I have seen the student pass hours without food and nights without repose; the inward fire burned up hunger and consumed the need of sleep. I have heard the martyr in the agonies of death cry to his fellow-sufferers, 'Be of good cheer: we shall kindle a torch that will never be extinguished!' In all these cases there was a counterbalancing of the cloud. Without the inward counterpoise the poverty would have repelled, the march exhausted, the abstinence killed, the martyrdom unmanned. But the cloud was balanced by a ray of glory.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 208.

'And now men see not the bright light which is in the clouds.'— JOB XXXVII. 21.

THINGS which, at some time, appeared to be dark—afflictions, losses, trials, wrongs, defeated prayers, and deeds of suffering patience yielding no fruit—are very apt, afterwards, to change colour and become visitations of mercy. And so where God was specially dark, He commonly brings out, in the end, some good or blessing in which the subject discovers that his Heavenly Father only understood his wants better than he did himself. God was dark in His way, only because His goodness was too deep in counsel, for him to follow it to its mark. It is with him as with Job, whose latter end, after he had been stripped of everything, was more blessed than his beginning.—
BUSHNELL.

ONE of the greatest of German teachers said some years ago: 'I see before my countrymen a deep abyss, but above it shines a bright light. Is it the dawn, or is it the evening twilight?' Shall we hesitate as to our answer now? The light has grown brighter since Neander put the question, and in that light may we work as it grows onward to the perfect day.—
WESTCOTT.

'MANY a political leader during the last two years,' says a writer in the Spectator (8 Sept. 1906) on the Russian 'Troubles,' 'has momentarily turned from his bright hopes and schemes to the painful contemplation of this black cloud on the horizon. For this danger there is a special word which is constantly in use and can be vaguely rendered as "despondency". The Speaker of the late Duma, speaking for others and not for himself, put the matter thus: "It is hard to work, when you never see your reward coming". It seems as though, when in the family of nations the sunshine of the world is divided up between the different children of hope, one child, Russia, is passed over at each distribution. At last comes the announcement, "and here is one sunbeam for Russia"; but the belated peasant only makes the bitterness more acute to the land which Gogol described as "the country forgotten by God". And thus, after a moment of hope, the darkness is again accepted almost as if it were the only thing natural.'

REFERENCE.—XXXVII. 21.—E. H. Bickersteth, Thoughts in Past Years, p. 201. XXXVII. 23.—J. Budgen, Parochial Sermons, vol. i. p. 133.

'Then the Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind.'—JOB
XXXVIII. 1.

'In the centre of the world-whirlwind,' says Carlyle in the first part of Past and Present (chap. II), 'verily now as in the oldest days, dwells and speaks a God. The great soul of the world is just. O brother, can it be needful now, at this late epoch of experience, after eighteen centuries of Christian preaching for one thing, to remind thee of such a fact.'

SANS-CULOTTISM will burn much; but what is incumbustible it will not burn. Fear not Sans-culottism; recognize it for what it is, the portentous, inevitable end of much, the miraculous beginning of much. One other thing thou mayest recognize of it: that it too came from God; for has it not been? From of old, as it is written, are His goings forth; in the great Deep of things; fearful and wonderful now as in the beginning: in the whirlwind also He speaks; and the wrath of man is made to praise Him.—
CARLYLE.

THE FIRST CHAPTER OF GENESIS

'Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare, if thou hast understanding.'—JOB XXXVIII. 4.

THE real object of the narrative in Genesis is not to teach scientific truth, but to teach religious truth.

I. One object of the narrative will be evident at once: it is to show, in opposition to the crude conceptions current in many parts of the ancient world, that the world is not self-originated; that it was called into existence, and brought gradually into its present state, at the will of a Spiritual Being, prior to it, independent of it, deliberately planning each stage of its development. The fact of a Creator is the fundamental teaching of the cosmogony of Genesis.

II. The first chapter of Genesis is not meant to teach authoritatively the actual past history of the earth. Its object is to afford a view true in conception, if not in detail, of the origin of the earth as we know it, and to embody this not in an abstract or confused form which may soon be forgotten, but in a series of representative pictures which may impress themselves upon the imagination, and in each one of which the truth is insisted on, that the stage which it represents is no product of chance, or of mere mechanical forces, but that it is an act of the Divine will.

III. A third point on which the record insists is the distinctive pre-eminence belonging to man. 'Let us make man in our image, after our likeness.' What, then, do we suppose to be meant when it is said that man was made in the 'image of God'? It is meant that he has been endowed with that highest and noblest of gifts, the gift of self-conscious reason.

IV. The cosmogony of Genesis teaches the absolute supremacy of the Creator in His work of Creation: it exhibits to us, in a series of representative pictures, how every stage of His work was dependent upon His will and realized His purpose: it emphasizes the distinctive pre-eminence belonging to man.—S. R. DRIVER, Sermons, p. 163.

'Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth?'—
JOB XXXVIII. 4.

Was man with his experience present at the creation, then, to see how it all went on? Have any scientific individuals yet dived down to the foundations of the universe, and gauged everything there? Did the Maker take them into His counsel; that they read His ground-plan of the incomprehensible All; and can say, 'This stands marked therein, and no more than this? Alas, not in anywise! These scientific individuals have been nowhere but where we also are; have seen some handbreadths deeper than we see into the Deep that is infinite, without bottom as without shore.—CARLYLE, Sartor Resartus (book III. chap. VIII.).

REFERENCES.—XXXVIII. 4.—A. Ainger, The Gospel and Human Life, p. 108. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 288.

'When the morning stars sang together, and all the Sons of God shouted for joy.'—JOB XXXVIII. 7.

EVERY time that analysis strips from nature the gilding that we prized, she is forging thereout a new picture more glorious than before, to be suddenly revealed by the advent of a new sense whereby we see it—a new creation, at sight of which the sons of God shall have cause to shout for joy.—PROF. W. K. CLIFFORD.

'NEITHER say,' Carlyle writes in the Sartor Resartus, chap. VII., 'that thou hast now no Symbol of the Godlike. Is not God's Universe a Symbol of the Godlike; is not Immensity a Temple; is not Man's History, and Men's History, a perpetual Evangel? Listen, and for organ-music thou wilt ever, as of old, hear the Morning-stars sing together.'

Does there not exist a perfected sense of Hearing—as of the morning-stars singing together—an understanding of the words that are spoken all through the universe, the hidden meaning of all things, the Word which is creation itself—a profound and far pervading sense, of which our ordinary sense of sound is only the first novitiate and initiation.—EDWARD CARPENTER, Civilization—Its Cause and Cure, p. 98.

THE office of the artist should be looked upon as a priest's service in the temple of Nature, where ampler graces are revealed to those that have eyes to see, just as ever gentler chords announce the fuller life to those that have ears to hear, while declared Law opens up wide regions unordered and anarchic, where selfish greed has yet to be tutored into wise rule. In the circle of the initiated, responsive beings recognize the elimination of immature design in creation to be a triumph of patient endeavour, and they join in the chorus of those who 'sang together for joy' on the attainment of the ideal of Heaven's Artist, who in overflowing bounty endowed the colourless world with prismatic radiance, prophesying of Titians yet to be, who should go forth to charm away scales from the eyes of the blind.—W. HOLMAN HUNT in the preface to his Pre-Raphaelitism.

'WERTHER,' Carlyle writes in his essay on Goethe's works, 'we called the voice of the world's despair: passionate, uncontrollable is this voice; not yet melodious and supreme,—as nevertheless we at length hear it in the wild apocalyptic Faust: like a death-song of departing worlds; no voice of joyful "morning-stars singing together" over a creation; but of red nigh-extinguished midnight stars, in spherul melody, proclaiming, It is ended.'

THE great advantage of this mean life is thereby to stand in a capacity of a better; for the colonies of heaven must be drawn from earth, and the sons of the first Adam are only heirs to the second. Thus Adam came into this world with the power also of another; not only to replenish the earth but the everlasting mansions of heaven. Where we were when the foundations of the earth were laid, when the morning-stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. He must answer who asked it.—SIR THOMAS BROWNE.

'Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further: and here shall thy proud waves be stayed.'—JOB XXXVIII. 11.

You have indeed winged ministers of vengeance, who carry your bolts to the remotest verge of the sea. But there a power steps in, that limits the arrogance of raging passions and furious elements, and says, 'So far shalt thou go and no further'. Who are you, that should fret and rage, and bite the chains of nature?—BURKE, Speech on Conciliation with America.

THE unavoidable aim of all corporate bodies of learning is not to grow wise, or teach others wisdom, but to prevent anyone else from being or seeming wiser than themselves; in other words, their infallible tendency is in the end to suppress inquiry and darken knowledge, by setting limits to the mind of man, and saying to his proud spirit, Hitherto shalt thou come, and no further!—HAZLITT, Table-Talk.

'It is always hard,' wrote Dr. Mandell Creighton to a young friend, 'to curb oneself within the possibilities of one's own particular life! How happiness consists in recognizing limits, and how hard it is to do so!' To his wife he wrote thus in 1871: 'Everybody obeys the doctrine of limits, not every one recognizes the fact and owns it; the last persons in the world to be lazy, to be indolent, or to be cowardly are those who can recognize limits as self-imposed; they are decidedly not under the power of circumstances, but rather are entire masters of them.'

In Old Mortality Scott makes young Morton soliloquize thus: 'Alas! what are we that our best and most praiseworthy feelings can be thus debased and depraved—that honourable pride can sink into haughty and desperate indifference for general opinion, and the sorrow of blighted affection inhabit the same bosom which licence, revenge, and rapine, have chosen for their citadel? But it is the same throughout; the liberal principles of one man sink into cold and unfeeling indifference, the religious zeal of another hurries him into frantic and savage enthusiasm. Our resolutions, our passions, are like the waves of the sea, and, without the aid of Him who formed the human breast, we cannot say to its tides, "Thus far shall ye come, and no further".

DESCRIBING, in the first volume of The Stones of Venice, the Alpine peak, Ruskin ejaculates: 'There was it set, for holy dominion, by Him who marked for the sun his journey, and bade the moon know her going down. It was built for its place in the far-off sky; approach it, and, as the sound of the voice of man dies away about its foundation, and the tide of human life, shattered upon the vast aerial shore, is at last met by the eternal "Here shall thy waves be stayed," the glory of its aspect fades into blanched fearfulness.'

LET anyone look on the long wall of Malamocco, which curbs the Adriatic, and pronounce between the sea and its master. Surely that Roman work (I mean Roman in conception and performance) which says to the ocean 'Thus far shalt thou come and no further,' and is obeyed, is not less sublime and poetical than the angry waves which vainly break beneath it.—BYRON.

COMPARE the closing paragraphs of Carlyle's essay on Taylor's Survey of German Poetry, especially the sentences on the rise of literature in the age. 'Higher and higher it rises round all the Edifices of Existence; they must all be molten into it, and anew bodied forth from it, or stand unconsumed among its fiery surges. Woe to him whose Edifice is not built of fine Asbest, and on the Everlasting Rock; but on the false sand, and of the driftwood of accident, and the paper and parchment of antiquated Habit! For the power, or powers, exist not on earth, that can say to that sea, Roll back, or bid its proud waters be still.'

REFERENCES.—XXXVIII. 11.—T. Spurgeon, Down to the Sea, p. 105. XXXVIII. 13.—D. Roberts, Christian World Pulpit, October 1, 1890. XXXVIII. 17.—H. Woodcock, Sermon Outlines, p. 104. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. li. No. 2017. XXXVIII. 22.—W. L. Watkinson, The Ashes of Roses, p. 5. XXXVIII. 25-27.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2583.

'Hath the rain a father?'—JOB XXXVIII. 28.

Two passages of God's speaking, one in the Old and one in the New Testament, possess, it seems to me, a different character from any of the rest, having been uttered, the one to effect the last necessary change in the mind of a man whose piety was in other respects perfect; and the other, as the first statement to all men of the principles of Christianity by Christ Himself—I mean the 38th to 41st chapters of the book of Job, and the Sermon on the Mount. Now the first of these passages is, from beginning to end, nothing else than a direction of the mind which was to be perfected to humble observance to the works of God in nature. And the other consists only in the inculcation of three things: 1st, right conduct; 2nd, looking for eternal life; 3rd, trusting God, through watchfulness of His dealings with His creation; and the entire contents of the book of Job, and of the Sermon on the Mount, will be found resolvable simply into these three requirements from all men—that they should act rightly, hope for heaven, and watch God's wonders and work in the earth; the right conduct being always summed up under the three heads of justice, mercy, and truth, and no mention of any doctrinal point whatsoever occurring in either piece of divine teaching.—RUSKIN.

REFERENCE.—XXXVIII. 28.—W. R. Inge, Faith and Knowledge, p. 29.

'Canst thou bind the cluster of the Pleiades? or loose the bands of Orion?'—JOB XXXVIII. 31.

So far as the Jewish prophets made use of such astronomy as they had, they used it altogether in the sense in which the modern agnostics use their heliocentric astronomy—to impress upon man his utter insignificance in creation. . . . When the author of the book of Job, in urging what another prophet calls 'the Lord's controversy,' wants to convince Job of his nothingness, what is his most impressive illustration?—'Canst thou bind the sweet influences of the Pleiades'—[or, as the Revised Version puts it, 'Canst thou bind the cluster of the Pleiades?']—'or loose the bands of Orion? Canst thou lead forth the signs of the Zodiac in their season, or canst thou guide the Bear with her train? Knowest thou the ordinances of the heavens? Canst thou establish the dominion thereof in the earth?'—language surely, if ever language could be used, which suggests that to control the heavenly bodies implies a force of far mightier scope and magnitude than any which is needed only for our little planet.—R. H. HURTON, Contemporary Thought and Thinkers, vol. i. p. 291.

REFERENCE.—XXXVIII. 31.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 818.

'Knowest thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth?'—JOB XXXIX. 1.

If the baffled inquirer drops out the search after God, as many do, and says—I will go down to nature and it shall, at least, be my comfort that nature is intelligible, and even a subject of definite science, he shortly discovers that science only changes the place of mystery and leaves it unresolved. . . . Asking what is matter, what is life, animal and vegetable, what is heat, light, attraction, affinity, he discovers that, as yet, we really comprehend nothing, and that nature is a realm as truly mysterious even as God. Not a living thing grows out of the earth, or walks upon it, or flies above it; not an inanimate object exists, in heaven, earth, or sea, which is not filled and circled about with mystery as truly as in the days of Adam or Job, and which is not really as much above the understanding of science, as the deepest things of God's eternity or of His secret life.—BUSHNELL.

'Will the wild-ox be content to serve thee? or will he abide by thy crib.'—JOB XXXIX. 9.

A COMMUNITY which has heard the voice of truth and experienced the pleasures of liberty, in which the merit of statesmen and systems are freely canvassed, in which obedience is paid, not to persons but to laws, in which magistrates are regarded, not as the lords but as the servants of the public, in which the excitement of a party is a necessary of life, in which political warfare is reduced to a system of tactics; such a community is not easily reduced to servitude. Beasts of burden may easily be managed by a new master. But will the wild ass submit to the bonds? Will the unicorn serve and abide by the crib? Will leviathan hold out his nostrils to the hook?—MACAULAY, Essay on Hallam's Constitutional History.

'Hast thou given the horse strength? Hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? Canst thou make him afraid as a grasshopper?'—JOB XXXIX. 19 f.

AFTER quoting this passage in his Literary Essays, Mr. R. H. Hutton observes: 'This deeper insight into the natural constitution and beauty of the universe, and complete disavowal of all power on the part of man to form any judgment upon it, is especially remarkable as compared with the bold justification of the spiritual participation of human nature in one of the attributes of God. It proves that the Hebrew poet had already distinguished between the direct knowledge of God's spirit which spiritual communion gives, and the indirect knowledge of His mysterious ways which can only be gained by a study of those ways. It shows that he had mastered the conviction, that to neglect the study of the natural mysteries of the universe leads to an arrogant and illicit intrusion of moral and spiritual assumptions into a different world—in a word, to the false inferences of Job's friends as to his guilt, and his own equally false inference as to the injustice of God.'

'He mocketh at fear, and is not dismayed; neither turneth he back from the sword.'—JOB XXXIX. 22.

CARLYLE finely applies this passage, in his essay on The Death of Irving: 'A giant force of activity was in the man; speculation was accident, not nature. Chivalry, adventurous field-life of the old Border, and a far nobler sort than that, ran in his blood. There was in him a courage, dauntless not pugnacious, hardly fierce, by no possibility ferocious; as of the generous war-horse, gentle in its strength, yet that laughs at the shaking of the spear.'

'Doth the hawk soar by thy wisdom, and stretch out her wings toward the south?'—JOB XXXIX. 26.

In the ninth chapter of The Revolution in Tanner's Lane, Mr. Hale White depicts Zachariah Coleman wandering about in Manchester, looking out for work. 'And it was curious that, as he paced those dismal Manchester pavements, all their gloom disappeared as he reargued the universal problem of which his case was an example. He admitted the unquestionable right of the Almighty to damn three parts of creation to eternal hell if so He willed; why not, then, one sinner like Zachariah Coleman to a weary pilgrimage for thirty or forty years? He rebuked himself when he found that he had all his life assented so easily to the doctrines of God's absolute authority in the election and disposal of the creatures He had made, yet that he revolted when God touched him, and awarded him a punishment which, in comparison with the eternal loss of His presence, was as nothing. At last—and here, through his religion, he came down to the only consolation possible for him—he said to himself, "Thus hath He decreed; it is foolish to struggle against His ordinances; we can but submit". "A poor gospel," says his critic. Poor!—yes, it may be; but it is the gospel according to Job, and any other is a mere mirage. "Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, and stretch her wings towards the South?" Confess ignorance and the pity of insurrection, and there is a chance that even the irremediable will be somewhat mitigated. Poor! yes; but it is genuine; and this at least must be said for Puritanism, that of all the theologies and philosophies it is the most honest in its recognition of the facts; the most real, if we penetrate to the heart of it, in the remedy which it offers.'

How dare he lift himself up against the Almighty's designs? The Almighty asked him the question eternally repeated to us, which He had asked thousands of years ago, 'Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? Declare, if thou hast understanding. . . . Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, and stretch her wings forward to the earth?' 'The hawk flies not by my wisdom,' murmured Michael to himself, 'nor doth the eagle at my command make her nest on high. Ah, it is by His wisdom and at His command; how should I dare to interfere? I see it—I see it all now.' After his fashion and through his religion he had said to himself the last word that can be uttered by man. He knelt down and prayed.—MARK RUTHERFORD, in Michael Trevanion.

REFERENCE.—XL 3, 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. II. No. 83.

'Behold, I am of small account; what shall I answer Thee? I lay mine hand upon my mouth.'—JOB XL. 4.

ALL through the book of Job the question, how this can be, is over and over again asked, and never answered; inadequate solutions are offered and repelled, but an adequate solution is never reached. The only solution reached is that of silence before the insoluble: 'I will lay my hand upon my mouth'.—MATTHEW ARNOLD.

'Pour forth the overflowings of thine anger: and look upon every one that is proud, and abase him. Look on every one that is proud, and bring him low; and tread down the wicked where they stand.'—JOB XL. 11, 12.

THIS, says Lucretius (v. 1231 f), is Nature's prerogative and function: 'So doth some hidden power trample ever on things human, seeming to tread under foot and mock at the fine forces and cruel axes of men.'

'Behold now behemoth, which I made with thee.'—JOB XL. 15.
 'HUMILITY,' says Ruskin in the third volume of Stones of Venice, 'is the principal lesson we are intended to be taught by the book of Job; for there God has thrown open to us the heart of a man most just and holy, and apparently perfect in all things possible to human nature except humility. For this he is tried, and we are shown that no suffering, no self-examination, however honest, however stern, no searching out of the heart by its own bitterness, is enough to convince man of his nothingness before God; but that the sight of God's creation will do it. For, when the Deity Himself has willed to end the temptation and to accomplish in Job that for which it was sent, He does not vouchsafe to reason with him, still less does He overwhelm him with terror, or confound him by laying open before his eyes the book of his iniquities. He opens before him only the arch of the dayspring, and the fountains of the deep; and amidst the covert of the reeds, and on the heaving waves, He bids him watch the kings of the children of pride—'Behold now behemoth, which I made with thee?' And the work is done.'

'Canst thou draw out leviathan with an hook? or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down?'—JOB XLI. 1.

For the sake of its literary interest, Charles Lamb's famous application of this verse in his essay on 'Shakespeare's Tragedies' may be cited: 'The play (i.e. King Lear) is beyond all art, as the tamperings with it show: it is too hard and stony; it must have love scenes and a happy ending. It is not enough that Cordelia is a daughter, she must shine as a lover too. Fate has put his hook in the nostrils of this leviathan, for Garrick and his followers, the showmen of the scene, to draw the mighty beast about more easily.'

REFERENCE.—XLII. 1-10.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Job, p. 63.

THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES

'I know that Thou canst do everything, and that no thought can be withholden from Thee.'—JOB XLII. 2.

THE meaning is that there is no purpose which the Almighty cannot carry out.

I. Though literally the words seem merely an acknowledgment of power they are also an admission of wisdom, the plans or purposes of which may be beyond the understanding of man.

II. Job does not, as might have been expected, acknowledge the Divine righteousness. His confession corresponds to the Almighty's address to him. That address did not insist on any one Divine attribute, but rather represented God in the whole circle of His attributes, power and wisdom but also goodness; and His omnipotence goes hand in hand with His moral rule.

III. The Divine nature is not a segment but a circle. Any one Divine attribute implies all others.

IV. Similarly Job's reply reflects the great general impression God now made on him. The exhibition of the Divine wisdom as it operates in nature has led him to feel that within his own history also there is a Divine 'thought' or 'counsel,' though he is unable to understand it.—A. B. DAVIDSON, The Book of Job, p. 286.

THE BOOK OF JOB

'I know that Thou canst do all things, and that no purpose of Thine can be restrained.'—JOB XLII. 2.

THE author of the book of Job is entirely unknown; guesses have, to be sure, been made as to his name, but they are unsupported by any evidence worthy of credit. It is tolerably certain that Luther was right in his opinion that the book of Job is a religious drama, in which, somewhat as in Goethe's 'Faust,' the experiences of a well-known figure in legendary history are made the vehicle for expressing the anxious questionings of men as to the deepest problems with which the mind of man can be engaged, and that the book was marked off as unlike other books, that it was counted worthy of a place in the Sacred Canon of the Old Testament, will not be thought surprising by anyone who is at the pains to think over its wonderful teaching, who observes the reverent and piercing insight with which this inspired poet has justified the ways of God to man.

I. This is the main subject of the book. Job is a man who has met with extraordinary misfortune. The devil uses them as a means by which he may shake Job's faith in God, his trust in an overruling Providence. But it is in vain. Still greater trials are in store. Well-meaning friends come to visit him. Throughout their long speeches they return again and again to this one principle, that suffering is always and invariably the consequence of sin. Sin is always punished by the Supreme, they say, and such misery as this of yours can spring from nothing else but some violation of God's law or neglect of His will, some proud boastfulness or secret indulgence in wrongdoing. Confident in his innocence Job dares to appeal from the judgment of man to the judgment of the All Righteous One Himself, who will surely deliver him in due time.

II. The next section of the book is taken up with the speeches of Elihu, who through respect for his elders has kept silent until now. The insignificance and the ignorance of man he speaks of; and he adds a thought which none of the older men had put forward, as to the educational value of pain in the formation of character. This mystery of sorrow may be part of the discipline by which man is trained to holiness.

III. Man's finitude and God's infinite wisdom and power are the topic of the concluding chapters, in which Jehovah is represented as answering Job out of the whirlwind and the storm. The littleness of man. The greatness of God. It is this thought of the unmeasured greatness of the Supreme, this thought of the infinite resourcefulness of the Divine Wisdom, that brought relief to the faith of the stout-hearted old saint. Man is ignorant, weak, and sinful. Aye, but God is wise and powerful and Holy; so wise, so good, so merciful that no complexity of circumstances is too difficult to disentangle, no life too insignificant to be guarded by His love, no sorrow too humble to be relieved by His compassion.—J. H. BERNARD, Via Domini, p. 21.

'I know Thou canst do all things, and that no purpose of Thine can be restrained. Who is this that hideth knowledge? Therefore have I uttered that which I understood not.'—JOB XLII. 2, 3.

THE God who is the antagonist of Prometheus has power, but he has not goodness: the God who is the antagonist of Job is perfect in goodness as in power. And so Prometheus, strong in conscious right and in foreknowledge of the future, remains unshaken by persuasions and threats. At the close of the drama, from out of elemental ruin—earthquake and lightning and tempest—he utters his last defiant words: 'Thou seest what unjust things I suffer'. Job, who in all his troubled questionings has never lost his central trust in the God whom he has upbraided, ends by a retraction: 'I know that Thou canst do all things, and that no purpose of Thine can be restrained. . . I have uttered that which I understood not, things too wonderful for me, which I knew not.' The infinite mysteries of creation, as they are flashed before him in a series of sublime descriptions, have subdued the heart as well as the intellect. Love, dormant throughout, is now fully awakened. Yet even for Job the bewildering problem remains unsolved. Jehovah's answer had merely shown him Nature's immensity and the nothingness of Man.—S. H. BUTCHER.

'I had heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth Thee, wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.'—JOB XLII. 5, 6.

God reminds us of His wisdom, of the mystery of things, and that man is not the measure of His creation. The world is immense, constructed on no plan or theory which the intellect of man can grasp. It is transcendent everywhere. This is the burden of every verse, and is the secret, if there be one, of the poem. Sufficient or insufficient, there is nothing more. Job is to hold fast to the law within; that is his candle which is to light his path; but God is infinite. Job, if he is not satisfied, submits. Henceforth he will be mute.—MARK RUTHERFORD.

JOB suffers and draws an inference from his suffering. Now, to suffer and draw an inference is to teach; sorrow logically leads to God. Job teaches. He is the first to show that sublime madness of wisdom which, two thousand years later, will be the foolishness of the cross. The dunghill of Job, transfigured, will become the Calvary of Jesus.—VICTOR HUGO.

WE are usually better persuaded by reasons which we have ourselves discovered, than by those which have come into the mind of others.—PASCAL.

JOB's friends discoursed on life as they thought it was; he, as he knew it and felt it. There is no philosophy of life but the experience of it; there is no knowledge of God, until, in some way, we come completely into His hands. Sin and need and sorrow may drive us there, but only life itself, in all its length and depth and vicissitude and final emptiness, can fully place us there.—T. T. MUNGER.

IN the fourth chapter of The Grammar of Assent Newman applies this passage to the sudden recognition, under pressure of some change or crisis, of truths hitherto accepted but not fully understood. 'To the devout and spiritual, the Divine Word speaks of things, not merely of notions. And, again, to the disconsolate, the tempted, the perplexed, the suffering, there comes, by means of their very trials, an enlargement of thought, which enables them to see in it what they never saw before. Henceforth there is to them a reality in its teachings, which they recognize as an argument, and the best of arguments, for its Divine origin. Hence the practice of meditation on the Sacred Text; so highly thought of by Catholics. Reading, as we do, the Gospels from our youth up, we are in danger of becoming so familiar with them as to be dead to their force, and to view them as a mere history. The purpose, then, of meditation is to realize them; to make the facts which they relate stand out before our minds as objects, such as may be appropriated by a faith as living as the imagination which apprehends them.

'It is obvious to refer to the unworthy use made of the more solemn parts of the Sacred Volume by the more popular preacher. His very mode of reading, whether warnings or prayers, is as if he thought them to be little more than fine writing, poetical in sense, musical in sound, and worthy of inspiration. The most awful truths are to him but sublime or beautiful conceptions, and are adduced and used by him, in season and out of season, for his own purposes, for embellishing his style or rounding his periods. But let his heart at length be ploughed by some keen grief or deep anxiety, and Scripture is a new book to him. This is the change which so often takes place in what is called religious conversion, and it is a change so far simply for the better, by whatever infirmity or error it is in the particular case accompanied, and it is strikingly suggested to us, to take a saintly example, in the confession of the patriarch Job, when he contrasts his apprehension of the Almighty before and after his affliction. He says he had indeed a true apprehension of the Divine attributes before as well as after; but with the trial came a great change in the character of that apprehension: "With the hearing of the ear," he says, "I have heard Thee, but now mine eye seeth Thee; therefore I reprehend myself and do penance in dust and ashes!"

'THE central feature of his experience was the conviction that God was addressing him, with a living voice, with the immediacy of a direct appeal. His previous state was really one of indifference, owing to his preoccupation with linguistic studies and philosophical speculations. His idea of the relation of God to the universe and to human souls, was that of a vast Superintendent, not that of a Divine Parent or a ceaselessly appealing Oracle.' Prof. Knight thus describes the state of Dr. John Duncan's mind, when the great change came over him, adding: 'But as the clouds parted above him, he discerned the light of the Omnipresent and heard the voice of the Revealer. His awakening was the discernment of a truth, to the reality of which he had been oblivious for years, and the response of his heart to the Divine appeal followed naturally.'

It seems to me that it has been the one purpose of all the Divine revelation or education of which we have any record, to waken us up out of this perpetually recurring tendency to fall back into ourselves.—R. H. HURTON.

REFERENCES.—XLII. 5.—W. Ross Taylor, Christian World Pulpit, 1891, p. 181. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. III. p. 434. XLII. 5, 6.—C. W. Furse, Lenten Sermons, p. 31. H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 2207. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2009.

'Ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right.'—JOB XLII. 7.

THERE is superstition in our prayers, often in our hearing of sermons, bitter contentions, invectives, persecutions, strange conceits, besides diversity of opinions, schisms, factions, etc. But as the Lord said to Eliphaz the Temanite, and his two friends, 'his wrath was kindled against them, for they had not spoken of him things that were right'; so we may say justly of these schismatics and heretics, how wise soever in their own conceits, non recte loquuntur de Deo, they speak not, they think not, they write not well of God, and as they ought.—BURTON'S Anatomy of Melancholy.

'And the Lord turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends.'—JOB XLII. 10.

At the outset, he prays for his family—a narrow circle; but when he has passed through his mighty lesson, he prays again—for his friends, so called, but no friends. They had come to him as such, but they proved themselves miserable comforters. . . . Job's feeling is the reflection of God's, whose wrath was kindled against these men; but it was a transient feeling, and passed away as he emerged from his trial. When he had come to see God with his eye, and had humbled himself in dust and ashes, there was no place left in him for wrath and reproach. God be thanked that a time comes to all when hatred dies out!—T. T. MUNGER.

'And the Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before.'

PROSPERITY, enjoyment, happiness, comfort, peace, whatever be the name by which we designate that state in which life is to our own selves pleasant and delightful, as long as they are sought or prized as things essential, so far have a tendency to disenoble our nature, and are a sign that we are still in servitude to selfishness. Only when they lie outside of us, as ornaments merely to be worn or laid aside as God pleases—only then may such things be possessed with impunity. Job's heart in early times had clung to them more than he knew, but now he was purged clean, and they were restored because he had ceased to need them.—FROUDE.

REFERENCES.—XLII. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1262. Ibid. vol. vii. No. 404.

'And he had also seven sons and three daughters.'—JOB XLII. 13.

'THIS Mother of George Herbert,' says Izaak Walton, 'was the happy mother of seven sons and three daughters, which she would often say was Job's number and Job's distribution; and as often bless God that they were neither defective in their shapes nor in their reason; and very often reprove them that did not praise God for so great a blessing.'

'And in all the land were no women found so fair as the daughters of Job.'—JOB XLII. 15.

'ARE you still heretic enough to think that only the manifestations of the devil are alluring? Has God then made nothing fair? Can He show nothing attractive? Is all the loveliness, and joy, and ecstasy in Babylon, and all the ugliness and desolation and pain in the kingdom of God?' 'Oh no; I never meant that. Don't we know that Job, after his trial, was blessed by the Lord, and was given, besides seven sons and an enormous amount of cattle, three daughters? "And in all the land," we are told, "were no women found so fair as the daughters of Job." In some creatures, therefore, beauty is clearly meant to be a blessing.'—JOHN OLIVER HOBBS, The School for Saints, chap. xxviii.

PSALMS

THE BOOK OF PSALMS

At the age of twenty-two Melancthon wrote a preface to Luther's commentary on the Psalms (1519). He dwelt on the help and consolation which the Psalms bring to the troubled conscience.

'For what doth it profit thee to know that the world was created by God, as Genesis tells us, if thou dost not adore the mercy and wisdom of the Creator? Again, how would it help thee to know that God is wise and merciful if thou couldst not take to thyself the thought that He is merciful for thee, just for thee, wise for thee? And that is what it means to have truly known God, but Philosophy has not attained that ultimate mode of Divine knowledge; it belongs to Christians alone. The spirit of the Psalms truly distils that sweetness into pious minds, and this is that celestial harmony which is attuned by the Spirit of God.'—Corpus Reformatorum, vol. 1. p. 73.

THE TREE AND THE CHAFF

'Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful.'—PSALM I. 1.

THERE is a law to obey which is life; there is a King, to serve Whom is blessedness, and rebellion against Whom is destruction.

I. Note first the picture of a fair and fruitful life. If you have not learned to shelter your positive goodness behind a barrier of negative abstinence, there will be little vitality and little fruit in the weakling plants that are trying to blossom in the undefended open, swept by every wind. But then note further how in this abstinence there is a certain progress: It is quite clear, I think, that there is an advance in the prominence of association with evil, expressed by the three attitudes, walking, standing, sitting.

II. Then we come to the next step here. Abstinence is useless unless it be for something. There is no virtue in not doing so-and-so unless there be a positive doing something a great deal better. And now to the second part of this picture—how it fares with lovers of God's law. Such a life will be rooted and steadfast, for the word here translated 'planted' is not that ordinarily employed to express that idea, but conveys mainly the notion of fixity and steadfastness. If you want your life to have a basis then you must consciously and intelligently feel and pierce down through all superficial fleeting things, until you get to the centre and wrap yourselves round that. Such a life shall be vigorous and fruitful. Such a life shall 'prosper'. Now turn to the other dark picture of the rootless, fruitless life. The light and the shadow, the blackness and the glory, are put right against one another and each is heightened by the juxtaposition.

III. There comes next the disappearance of such a life in the winnowing wind as a consequence of its essential nullity. Nothing lasts but obedience to the will of God. That which God knows lasts. That which He does not know perishes. There are two roads before us. The one steep, rough, narrow, hard, but always climbing steadily upwards, and sure to reach its goal; the other broad, easy, flowery, descending, and therefore easier than the first. One is the path of obedience for the love of Christ. In that path there is no death, and those who tread it shall come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads. The other is the path of self-will and self-pleasing, which fails to reach its unworthy goal and brings the man at last to the edge of a black precipice over the verge of which the impetus of his descent will carry his reluctant feet. 'The path of the just is as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. The way of the wicked is as darkness; they know not at what they stumble.'—ALEXANDER MACLAREN, The Freeman, 6 March, 1891, p. 147.

'Seat of the scornful.'—PSALM I. 1.

TENNYSON was very grand on contemptuousness. It was, he said, a sure sign of intellectual littleness. Simply to despise nearly always meant not to understand. Pride and contempt were specially characteristic of barbarians.—WILFRID WARD in The New Review (July, 1886).

CONTEMPT is murder committed by the intellect, as hatred is murder committed by the heart. Charity, having life in itself, is the opposite and destroyer of contempt as well as of hatred.—GEORGE MACDONALD, David Elginbrod (pt. ii. chap. ix.).

REFERENCES.—I. 1.—A. Mursell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxvi. p. 269. C. Bosanquet, Tender Grass for the Lambs, p. 61. The International Critical Commentary, p. 3. E. C. Wickham, Wellington College Sermons, p. 203. C. C. Bartholomew, Sermons Chiefly Practical, p. 245. I. 1, 2.—A. MacLaren, Sermons Preached in Manchester (3rd Series), p. 225. John Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 127. W. G. Pearce, Some Aspects of the Blessed Life, pp. 1, 17. E. C. Wickham, Wellington College Sermons, p. 200. I. 1-3.—M. R. Vincent, Gates Into the Psalm Country, p. 3. I. 1-4. John Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 127. I. 1-6.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons, p. 310.

A TREE PLANTED BY RIVERS OF WATER

'He shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.'—PSALM I. 3.

I. THE happy man of this Psalm is none other than the man who presents his body a living sacrifice unto God, and is not fashioned according to this world's pattern and device, but is transformed by the renewing of his mind through an earnest pondering of God's thoughts, and who thereby proves by a daily experience what is the good and acceptable and perfect will of God. Wherein, then, does his happiness consist? Blessed is this man, for 'he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water'. What is it that is contrasted with a tree in this Psalm? Chaff; and the contrast that is presented to us in this Psalm is this, as to whether our lives are to be like a tree or like the chaff. Now a tree viewed in contrast to the chaff provides a noble image of a rich, full, fruitful life. The special force of the image lies in this, that a tree perfectly portrays to us the connexion between thinking and working, between the roots of conduct and the fruits of conduct. A tree derives its nourishment from hidden roots, and all the fruit that grows amid sunshine grows out of the hidden roots that have struck down into the earth, and have been drinking there of the lower streams. And the answering fact in human life is this that the roots of our life and conduct are inward and downward. Strong characters are not uncaused things. Strong characters are produced by strong thinking, by strong teaching. Good deeds are the outgrowth of great thoughts. It is quite true that men sometimes fail to put their best thoughts into action, and why is it? Is it not because their thoughts are not allowed to take full possession of them and of their feelings and minds? And hence men who sometimes have very good thoughts have very bad lives. The remedy for that is to think more. Yes, even though it be painful to think more, to think.

II. Two words here deserve special notice. The word 'planted' is significant in the text. It is equal to our word 'transplanted'. Now of course, a literal tree never chooses its locality, but all emblems drawn from nature in Scripture fail to represent man's power of will and of choice. The tree cannot transplant itself. But that is not so with man. Where God has given the stream of His Word, where God's Word is known, men may choose to strike their roots into its fatness if they will. Then the word 'streams' or 'rivers' is specially significant. The Psalmist does not use the common word for a natural river here, a river which rises among the hills and flows down into the sea. He employs a term which represents those artificial channels which are so extensively used for the purpose of irrigation in the East. By diligence and by courage we are able to conquer barrenness in nature, so that the very wilderness rejoices and blossoms as the rose. In all such labour there is profit: and how foolish we are if our gardens are thirsting when the river of God is flowing down not far from any one of us, and we may make cuttings, we may open communications of God's will and truth to refresh our hearts and fertilize and nourish our lives.—T. VINCENT TYMMS, The British Weekly Pulpit, vol. II. p. 141.

CHRIST IN THE FIRST PSALM

'And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.'—PSALM I. 3.

EVERY delineation of the righteous is in the end a picture of the Lord Jesus Christ, and of Him alone. God has somewhat against all His saints, against their own righteousness. None of them is righteous completely except in the righteousness of the Redeemer. The application of this principle gives a new life and power and message to the book of the Psalms. We take for an example the first Psalm. It is true in its integrity of one soul at least, and of none but one. Multitudes through grace have come near it. It blessedly recalls them, but for its full meaning we must look at the Name that burns behind the porcelain sheath and see Jesus, and Jesus only.

I. In Christ there was no scorn, no contempt, no insolence, no taunting. He did not despise our world. He did not despise our nature. He did not despise the meanest of His creatures. Nor did He despair of any human soul.

II. His life was nourished on the law. His delight was in the law of the Lord, and on His law did He meditate day and night. It was of Him alone that it could be said that He was utterly obedient.

III. This life, the life of the righteous, was beautiful and fruitful, He lived that life of true peace which is not fugitive but everlasting. His was a life of fruit. Every righteous life must end in fruit. The greenness and the beauty are but a form of promise. The inexorable condition on which life is given is that it should reach forward to fruit-bearing. He bore His fruit—in due season God fixed, and He still fixes the season.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, The Garden of Nuts, p. 111.

REFERENCES.—I. 3.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons, p. 316. International Critical Commentary, p. 3. G. Orme, Christian World Pulpit, vol. IX. p. 334. E. Johnson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. XX. p. 347. G. Matheson, Moments on the Mount, pp. 79, 122. H. P. Liddon, Old Testament Outlines, p. 100. Homiletic Magazine, vol. VII. p. 73. I. 3, 4.—H. Macmillan, Two Worlds are Ours, p. 203. A. Blomfield, Sermons in Town and Country, p. 313. I. 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. IV. No. 280. John Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. III. p. 127. I. 4, 5.—A. G. Brown, Penny Pulpit, No. 767. I. 4, 6.—M. R. Vincent, Gates Into the Palm Country, p. 21.

MISSIONS: PROMISES AND PROPHECIES

'A vain thing.'—PSALM II.

DIOCLETIAN's medal is still existing, on which he had caused to be inscribed that the name of Christians had been extinguished. The Council of Constance in 1414 met to burn Huss, to lay a solemn curse on Wycliffe's memory, and to put an end to schism. James I., after the Hampton Court Conference, said of the Puritans: 'I shall make them conform themselves, or I will harry them out of this land, or else do worse'. Ranavalona I. undertook to blot out the Christian Church in Madagascar by the help of un-speaking horrors ending in death: but instead of being obliterated, the Church grew marvellously.

REFERENCES.—II. 1.—W. L. Watkinson, The Ashes of Roses, p. 9. II. 7, 9.—John Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 127.

THE WORLD FOR CHRIST

'Ask of Me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.'
—PSALM II. 8.

THIS brief Psalm is not, like most of the Psalms, a lyrical effusion, coming from the experience of an individual soul; but it is, if we may say so, dramatic in its form. In a few condensed sentences the whole history of the world is made to pass before us.

(1) First of all here are the heathen and the kings of the earth. The nations imagining a vain thing. They are met together in council, not as you might suppose, to ask how they can submit themselves to the eternal will of God, not to ask how they can make their government upon earth some slight shadowing of the government of God in heaven, but they are met together to take counsel how they can be rid of God, how they can cast off His restraints and defy His reign. (2) The spirit of this Psalm bids us lift up our eyes from the earth to the heavens, and to Him that sitteth there. (3) Once more the spirit turns our eyes from the heights of heaven down to the earth, to behold the king whom God hath chosen. A king though there is no proclamation of His reign, except the scornful writing over the felon's cross on which He died. This wonderful Psalm may be trusted to deliver its own message and to teach its own lesson to us all.

I. First that God does intend to bring the whole world, the whole rebel world into subjection to His holy will; that notwithstanding these marshalled empires and these conspiring forces of evil, He will not be baffled; they shall all bow before Him, and from this among other reasons—that in the last resort all thrones, dominations, principedoms, virtues, powers that remain unsubjected to His will, must be dashed to pieces under the care of the Divine triumphant power.

II. And the second point is that the mighty end is to be attained by that humble-seeming King, Christ Jesus; that it will be given to Him in answer to prayer; for the Father hath committed all judgment unto the Son, and the Son has come into the world, not to judge the world but to save it. The world shall be brought to God, and brought to God by Jesus Christ and in answer to prayer.—R. F. HORTON, The Sermon Year Book, 1891, p. 252.

'Ask of Me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance.'—PSALM II. 8.

ARCHBISHOP TAIT (when Bishop of London) took this as the text of his C.M.S. sermon in 1859, on the day following the national thanksgiving for the final restoration of peace and order in India after the Mutiny.

PSALM II. 10.

THIS verse was the remonstrance addressed to Henry VIII. at Smithfield by John Lambert, who was burned in 1538: 'Now, ye kings, understand O ye which judge the earth, be wise and learned. Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice in Him with trembling.'

Lambert's martyrdom was one of the most cruel of that time, and the often-quoted words came from him as he lifted his fingers flaming with fire, 'None but Christ, none but Christ'.—JOHN KER.

CHRISTIAN REVERENCE

'Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling.'—
PSALM II. 11.

IN heaven love will absorb fear, but in this world fear and love must go together. No one can love God aright without fearing Him, though many fear Him and yet do not love Him. Self-confident men, who do not know their own hearts, or the reasons they have for being dissatisfied with themselves, do not fear God, and they think this bold freedom is to love Him. Deliberate sinners fear but cannot love Him. But devotion to Him consists in love and fear, as we may understand from our ordinary attachment to each other. No one really loves another who does not feel a certain reverence towards him. When friends transgress this sobriety of affection, they may indeed continue associates for a time, but they have broken the bond of union. It is mutual respect which makes friendship lasting. So again, in the feelings of inferiors towards superiors. Fear must go before love. Till he who has authority shows he has it and can use it, his forbearance will not be valued duly; his kindness will look like weakness. We learn to condemn what we do not fear; and we cannot love what we condemn. So in religion also. We cannot understand Christ's mercies till we understand His power, His glory, His unspeakable holiness, and our demerits; that is, until we first fear Him.—J. H. NEWMAN.

'Kiss the Son.'—PSALM II. 12.

WE are thus told that Christ at His coming will greet us most lovingly. He will not come to destroy the human race, but to save all those who flee to Him, as He says, Come unto Me, all ye that labour. These words are a pleasant salutation and the sweetest kiss that He offers us. Christ does not enter Jerusalem, as Herod did, slaying the people, but offering salvation to all.—MELANCHTHON on the Psalms.

REFERENCES.—II. 12.—Expositor (3rd Series), vol. v. p. 305. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 133. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 260. I. Williams, The Psalms Interpreted of Christ, p. 86. S. Cox, Expositor (2nd Series), vol. iii. p. 13. F. W. Macdonald, Contemporary Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 81. S. Black, Contemporary Pulpit, vol. iv. p. 316. Parker, The Ark of God, p. 117. S. A. Brooke, The Spirit of the Christian Life, p. 96.

'But thou, O Lord, art a shield for me; my glory and the lifter up of my head. . . . I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people, that have set themselves against me round about.'—PSALM III. 3-6.

DR. JOHN KER reminds us that this was the text from which Bishop Bedell preached to his fellow-prisoners in the time of the Irish rebellion in 1642, when he and the Protestants of the district were shut up in hold and in danger of death at any moment. He was one of the best Bishops who ever lived in Ireland . . . learned the Irish language, had the Bible translated into it, was assiduous in Christian work, and filled with the spirit of meekness and self-sacrifice. The word bedel in Hebrew means tin, and so deep was his desire of an entire renewal that he took for his motto Isaiah I. 25: 'I will purely purge thy dross, and take away all thy bedel (tin)'. He lived from 1570 to 1642, and the Irish called him 'Ultimus Anglorum'.

PSALM III. was used by the French Protestants during persecution times as a signal for the stationing of sentinels to keep watch against sudden attack; when the danger was over and they could worship in safety, they sang Psalm CXXII.

PSALM IV.

AUGUSTINE quotes this Psalm as of special value, and worthy to be sung aloud before the whole world for an expression of Christian courage, and a testimony of the peace God can give in outward and inward trouble (Conf. ix. 4). 'I will both lay me down in peace, and sleep: for Thou, Lord, only makest me dwell in safety'.

James Melville quoted it, among others, when he was dying. 'This being done, he comforteth himself with sundrie speeches out of the Psalms, quihilk he rehearsit in Hebrew, as, namely, a speech out of Psalm 4th, "Lord, lift up the light of Thy countenance upon me". Psalm 27th, "The Lord is my light and my salvation, quhat can I fear?" Psalm 23rd, "Albeit I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, yet will I fear none evil, because God is with me". The candell being behind back, he desired that it should be brought before him, that he might see to die. By occasioun thereof, he remembered that Scripture, Psalm 18th, "The Lord will lighten my candell; He will enlighten my darkness".'—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—III.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 24. IV.—Ibid. pp. 24, 29. IV. 4.—R. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. i. p. 17. IV. 6.—Archdeacon Sinclair, Christ and Our Times, p. 1. R. Flint, Sermons and Addresses, p. 82.

SUN OF MY SOUL, THOU SAVIOUR DEAR

'I will both lay me down in peace, and sleep for Thou, Lord, only makest me dwell in safety.'—PSALM IV. 8.

I. To go to sleep is a thing of exceeding solemnity, because, when we close our eyes, we cannot be sure that our waking will be in this world. There is only a step between the present life, which in the daytime seems to be the only real life, and the life to come.

II. It is the height of meanness as well as of folly to lie down without contemplating the goodness of Him who neither slumbereth nor sleepeth, and to Whom alone we are indebted for the safety of our persons and dwellings. In this age of ours, which makes an idol of Action, and which clamours for rapidly gained results, Meditation—and especially that kind of meditation which passes into prayer—has practically become a lost faculty.

III. I can suggest no more effectual remedy for this spiritual atrophy than the reading or singing of an evening hymn before we close our eyes in sleep. I prescribe an evening hymn because there is no season that lends itself like the night to holding converse with the things belonging to the spirit.

There are three great evening hymns in our language, and without awarding the palm to any one of them, it may be observed that 'Sun of my Soul,' Keble's greatest hymn, is the work of the most original and the most popular of English sacred poets, and, according to Julian, 'one of the foremost hymns in the English language'.—W. TAYLOR, Twelve Favourite Hymns, p. 115.

REFERENCES.—IV. 8.—J. Keble, Sermons for Holy Week, p. 230. C. J. Vaughan, Voices of the Prophets, p. 75. S. A. Brooke, The Spirit of the Christian Life, p. 277. A. Maclaren, Life of David, p. 246. J. Parker, The Ark of God, p. 128. I. Williams, The Psalms Interpreted of Christ, p. 111. S. Cox, Expositor (2nd Series), vol. iii. p. 178. Preacher's Monthly, vol. iii. p. 356.

PSALM VI.

THIS Psalm might have a history to itself. It has a wail of pain and sorrow, deepening into anguish, running through it; but comfort dawns at the close, like an angel turning the key of the prison. It is the first of the seven Penitential Psalms, the others being the 32nd, 38th, 51st, 102nd, 130th, 143rd. One of the strangest things, though not the happiest, in its records is, that, along with Psalm cxlii., it was the choice of Catherine de Medici, the Jezebel and Athaliah of the French monarchy. She was irreligious and superstitious, profligate and devoured by ambition; and the fact that she had no children seemed likely to deprive her of the control which she hoped to gain in the counsels of the kingdom. The Psalm was the expression of mere worldly disappointment. She became at last the mother of Francis II. (the first husband of Mary Stuart) and of Charles IX., whose character she corrupted by ministering to his vices, and whom she urged to the massacre of St. Bartholomew. 'Her desire was realized,' says a French historian, 'for the misery of France; and that family, which then took pleasure in the Psalms, put to death thousands of the Reformed for singing them.'

It has a more pleasing association with another princess, allied to the French royal family. Elizabeth Charlotte was niece of Sophia, Electress of Hanover, and granddaughter of Elizabeth Stuart, after whom she was named. She had remarkable abilities, and was carefully educated by her aunt Sophia, under the eye of the great Leibnitz. Her father, the Elector Palatine, constrained her to a marriage with the Duke of Orleans, brother of Louis XIV., in the hope that the union might save his principality from the aggression of the French king. But it helped Louis to fresh claims; and, when her beautiful native land, beside the Rhine and Neckar, was wasted by the French armies, its towns laid in ashes, the Castle of Heidelberg, the home of her childhood, undermined and shattered, and the people she loved driven out in winter to die houseless and famishing, she could not sleep for the visions of havoc, and for the thought that she had been cruelly sacrificed to a vain policy. Her letters are deeply interesting for the light they throw on the time, and on the Court of France. Her heart went back to her early Protestant faith, and to the old Castle of Osnabruck, where she had spent her happiest days with her aunt. In a letter to her she relates an incident connected with this Psalm. She was walking one day in the orangery at Versailles, and was singing it in the translation of Clement Marot, as an expression of her feelings. A noted artist of the time, warmly attached in heart to the Reformed religion, was engaged in painting the roof, and heard her. 'Scarcely,' she writes, 'had I finished the first verse, when I saw M. Rousseau hasten down the ladder and fall at my feet. I thought he was mad, and said, "Rousseau, Rousseau, what is the matter?" He replied, "Is it possible, madam, that you still recollect our psalms and sing them? May God bless you, and keep you in this good mind." He had tears in his eyes.'

Another woman, of our own time, with trials in a different position, and yet like in kind to those of Elizabeth Charlotte, has put her heart into some of the words. The wife of Thomas Carlyle inserts verses 2-4 in her Journal, 1855, when in sore trouble of body and mind, amid weakness and weariness, sleepless nights, and wounded feelings. 'Oh, dear! I wish this Grange business were well over. It occupies me (the mere preparation for it) to the exclusion of all quiet thought and placid occupation. To have to care for my dress, this time of day, more than I ever did when young and pretty and happy (God bless me, to think I was once all that!), on penalty of being regarded as a blot on the Grange gold and azure, is really too bad. Ach Gott! if we had been left in the sphere of life we belong to, how much better it would have been for us in many ways! Ah, the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak as water. To-day I walked with effort one little mile, and thought it a great feat. Sleep has come to look to me the highest virtue and the greatest happiness; that is, good sleep, untroubled, beautiful, like a child's. Ah me! "Have mercy upon me, O Lord; for I am weak: O Lord, heal me; for my bones are vexed. My soul is also sore vexed: but Thou, O Lord, how long?"'

This same verse 3 was the common expression of Calvin when he was in trouble, 'Tu Domine usque quo?' 'Thou, O Lord, how long?' and parts of the Psalm, with the last verse of Psalm LXX., were among the dying words of Robert Rollock, the first Principal of the University of Edinburgh, a man remarkable for power of administration and deep piety.—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—VI. 10.—Bishop Alexander, The Great Questions, p. 106. VII. 8.—H. Bushnell, Christ and His Salvation, p. 157. VIII. 2.—A. P. Manley, Sermons for Children, p. 44.

CONSIDERING

'When I consider.'—PSALM VIII. 3.

'WHEN I consider'—I become a new man, much larger, nobler, saintlier. What does consider mean? It is two words, it is two Latin words; it is con or cum, with, together sider—what is there in the word sider? Nothing. Take care! Sider comes a long way up the track of language; it was born sidus. That is what you say when you write your married name; under it you put née, born—another name, your father's name, which you have relinquished in favour of another name. Sidus means star; it is the root of sidereal heavens, the starry heavens, the stellar universe, and the like. Con-sider-alize—when we star together—put the planets into syllables and words and paragraphs; when I consider-alize, make a lesson book of the stars; when I punctuate my discourse with millenniums, then I pray.

'When I consider' I find that things are not so roughly related and antagonized as at first they seemed to be. I was not looking from the right point of view, I did not get far enough away from my subject, I was in the thick of the battle, in the very midst of the storm of dust, I could not see things in their right relation and proportion; but when I climbed the stairway of the stars and looked down upon the earth and time and measurable space, I said, All things work together for good to them that love God.

I. Consideration, properly defined, is a religious duty. In 1 Samuel xii. 24 you have exactly what I mean: 'Consider how great things He hath done for you'. Job says the same thing in his own grand way: 'Stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God' (xxxvii. 14). Put things together; give God time. You are impatient because you are little poor fussy fools; give Him time. When God says from the throne what Christ said from the Cross, 'It is finished,' then let the jury return a verdict, but not until then.

II. Consideration is a great element in wisdom and practical prudence. Sometimes men cannot go to the stars, so God has made some little stars for them to look at. How kind He is and condescending! He says, in effect, 'The stars are too many for you, you feel a noise in your little heads, and it is not good for you to look at the Milky Way and the Great Bear and the gleaming Orion and the beautiful Venus; so I will make some starlets for you, little living stars, asteroids. Hear His voice through the medium of His prophet: "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider"—the same word, with all its stars and Milky Ways—"consider her ways, and be wise" (Prov. vi. 6). Wherever you are and whatever your circumstances may be, make an orrery of them, a star-scheme, a method of stellar revolution and interchange and relation; and be religious on a small capital if you cannot traverse the planets and pray in firmaments. You have your chance; be wise, take it, and gather wisdom from the flowers planted in the field of God.

III. Consideration is the only profitable use of history. We find, then, in Isaiah XLIII. 18, 'Remember ye not the former things, neither consider the things of old'. That is the reason why you are so poor, and why you are so easily driven about. You might be rich in history, you might be millionaires in retrospect; you might be wealthier than Dives in the gathered store of providences, deliverances, unexpected visions, touchings of the chain at night, which give you liberty and lead you out of prison into freedom.

IV. Consideration is the best use of nature. Consider the lilies how they grow: connect them with the stars, make them part of a great planetary system. Every daisy that grows in the mead requires the whole solar system for its nourishment. If you were to break up the solar system, and return nine-tenths of it, that daisy could not grow. God is one; hear, O Israel, the Lord your God is one.

V. And consideration is the greatest impulse to true piety, as we are taught in Hebrews XII. 3: 'Consider Him that endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself'. You see, we are driven out of our little selves into the greater self which is the star system, or the system of history or the system of example—the great inference-field. Take your little cross and lean it against the great Cross that held the woe of the Son of God, and you will be surprised what a little cross yours is when you set it beside the Cross of Him who was a Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. 1. p. 228.

THE HEAVENS AND MAN

'When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained; What is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him?'—PSALM VIII. 3, 4.

THE common thought of man is that when he is compared with the measureless heavens he shrinks to a point. The sense of the ever-growing vastness of the universe dwarfs man until the whole story of the Divine book almost ceases to be credible.

I. The Logic of Love.—In that world which is nearest to us, in which we live—in the kingdom of love—mere size does not count, the footrule is an impertinence. In reason's realm, in the realm of science, mere size does not count. Don't allow yourself to be robbed of your faith—in yourself, of that place in the universe that God made you to have. He has made you only a little less than the angels; and He keeps a place for you next to the angels, and if the physical universe seems to convey vastness, remember that in love's arithmetic, in the spiritual world, mere physical size does not count; but you may consider the heavens, the moon and the stars which He has ordained and yet you can say: I am more than they, higher than they, and nearer to God than they.

II. The Divine Artist.—Turn now to another text. It is the answer of the New Testament to the challenge of the Old. The New Testament text is Christ's word, 'Consider the lilies, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these'. Men tell you that God is so busy amongst His stars He cannot come to you or hear the child's cries. Why He comes below your feet; He comes even to the flower! God's signature is in every flower in your garden, and Christ asks you to stop and consider it. The whole system of matter beneath our feet is poetically wonderful. The wonders in the heights of the heavens are not so great as the wonders at your feet and in yourself. God works wonders in the world, but yet more splendid in man himself.

III. The Temple of the Earth.—This teaching adds point and force to two great lessons. (a) For one thing it makes sin an immeasurably more daring, shameful thing than we have ever dreamt of it. The common place of the earth is holy; it is full of God. How dare you take God's clear air, full of His omnipotence, and breathe into it a lie? The whole earth is full of His glory, and to sin in the holy place what a thing it is! (b) Surely the teaching of my sermon reinforces a trust in God as our Father. If God has such pains to make the flowers beautiful, will He grudge any pains to make our souls beautiful? Have faith in God and let the flowers whisper of Him, let the blades of grass be a revelation from Him; the stars that burn in the heavens, the flowers beneath our feet bear the testimony that God is near.—W. H. FITCHETT.

WHAT IS MAN?

'When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained; What is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him? for Thou hast made him a little lower than God, Thou crownest him with glory and honour.'—PSALM VIII. 3-5.

I. Man and the Universe.—The contrast between man and the natural world which he inhabits, and which consciously and apparently he transcends, appeals to the religious mind in every age, and certainly never more powerfully than in our own. I hardly need to point out that the paradox which perplexed the Psalmist bears upon the mind of modern thinkers with still more threatening urgency until it seems too strong for faith itself. In a great series of successive and advancing revelations, the sciences have, one after the other, enlarged the scale of the universe, and emphasized with pitiless insistence the relative pettiness of all things human.

II. The Human Intellect.—If, indeed, man be so petty and contemptible as his physical weakness and the brevity of his life suggest, why attach so much and such fatal importance to the science which he creates? There is, it seems to me, a fatal flaw in the argument which makes the greatness of the intellectual achievements of mankind the foundation for a depreciation, and even for a denial of his spiritual greatness.

III. The Moral and the Physical.—The progress of science does not involve any change in the deliberate judgment of mankind as to the intrinsic superiority of the moral over the physical. But it is this intrinsic superiority, universally admitted if too commonly forgotten, that forms the basis of all morality, and is the necessary assumption of religion. For what is the grand postulate of Christianity but this, that the most faithful expression of the Ultimate Author of the universe is not that which its vast scale, power, and unvarying law can offer, but that which is shown by man in the perfection of his manhood, sinless and spiritual.

IV. The Supremacy of Christ.—In Jesus Christ the paradox of the universe seemed to find illustration and to receive its explanation. He disdained the aids and recommendations of physical force; He stood simply and solely on His right to the moral allegiance of mankind. In the categories of history He has His place at the head of the exponents of moral force, the prophets, the religion founders, the martyrs. For what was more or less obscured and embarrassed in them was in Him apparent and absolute. Amid the appalling circumstances of secular ruin the Spirit of the Crucified rises sublimely, and utters itself in majestic words of faith and love, the undying echoes of which are the rallying cries of human virtue ever since. Take the Seven Words on which the penitent thought of the Church has pondered for nineteen centuries without sounding their depths of meaning, or wearying of their message, and acknowledge, as you must acknowledge, the supreme greatness of man as man is seen in Christ.—H. HENSLY HENSON.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 3-5. — A. W. Momerie, Defects of Modern Christianity and Other Sermons, p. 266. P. McAdam Muir, Modern Substitutes for Christianity, p. 93. J. B. Lightfoot, Cambridge Sermons, p. 229. C. Perren, Outline Sermons, p. 219. A. Chandler, A Lent in London, p. 193. B. Jowett, Sermons of Faith and Doctrine, p. 1. International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 61. VIII. 3-8.—B. Jowett, Sermons of Faith and Doctrine, p. 1.

GOD'S GREATNESS AND CONDESCENSION

'What is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him?'—PSALM VIII. 4.

How are we to learn whether the ancient faith of our race is an illusion or not? How are we to verify the hope that it is possible for man to have access to God?

I. The sense of our insignificance is strengthened by the permanence of God's material works. It is true, indeed, that the earth itself has had its changes. But yet how firm, how strong, how enduring the great forms of Nature appear when compared with ourselves. Nor, again, is it merely the vastness of the great objects of the material universe by which we are sunk into abysses of humiliation in which we begin to be incredible that God should care for us. The humiliation is deepened by the discovery that our own life is akin to the inferior forms of life around us. And still further, when we consider those imperial laws which govern with steadfast and relentless authority the whole range of material existence with which we are acquainted, what presumption there seems to be in supposing that He, from whom those laws derive all their authority, will think of us and care for us one by one. This is the gospel of science—a gospel harder, sterner, more appalling than the law which came from the thunders and lightnings of Sinai. Is it true, or is it false?

II. The whole world in which we live is a mere speck in the universe, and it is said to be incredible that God should have any special care for it, or for those who inhabit it. No doubt the world is very small, but it does not follow that it contains nothing for which the Great Father of us all can think it worth while to care. The second plea is, that the life of a man is brief and momentary compared with the ages during which the universe has existed. No doubt; but science itself suggests a reply to this argument. If the most recent and most fascinating theories of science are ultimately established, it will appear that all these ages have been necessary in order to render it possible for a creature like man to come into existence. The third plea is, that we are encompassed by laws which take no heed of the personal difference of men, of the varieties of their character, of the vicissitudes of their condition. These laws determine our outward destiny; they control our very frame. The whole history of mankind is the proof of man's consciousness of freedom.

III. Where did the Psalmist, where did the Jewish race discover that heaven is so near to earth, and that God has so keen an interest in the life of man? Whence these traditions came we do not know. But these thoughts concerning God and His relations to the universe and to man lay at the very root of the whole life of the Jewish race. The rest of the sacred story was in harmony with the august beginning. Of a creature having such an origin, God could not but be mindful.

IV. The Incarnation is the central truth of the Christian faith; and is the final answer of God to the natural fear of the human heart that God must be too great and high to have any close and permanent relations to our race.

V. The question at issue is, whether God is a God nigh at hand. The majesty of the Divine throne fills men with awe and dread, and they ask, Who are we that we should venture to draw near to God?

VI. If a Church relies for all moral and spiritual good on the reflex influence upon its moral and spiritual life of its own spiritual acts, it is a Church which has renounced its faith in the living God.—R. W. DALE, Fellowship with Christ, p. 116.

WHAT IS MAN?

'What is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him?'—PSALM VIII. 4.

It is easy to imagine the circumstances of the composition of this Psalm. In thought David was a lad again, keeping his flocks on the plains of Bethlehem. In solitude, face to face with Nature, he feels an overwhelming sense of remorseless power. But it was only for a moment that this feeling of helplessness lasted; he had a great counterbalancing thought—he was not really alone, for God was with him.

I. For him Nature was always full of God. His wonder before the powers of Nature gave way to his wonder at the power of God, to amazement at the insoluble problem of man. There stand out before him the vivid contrast—God so great, man so limited and puny as compared with God, and with the mighty forces round him; and yet God was mindful of him. He must have some secret value, some hidden preciousness.

II. Then we turn to ourselves and ask, 'What is man?' What am I? What is my true, my real self? Tell me, does not the great truth of the Christ come to my relief? I hear His voice proclaiming the order of man's complex nature. In Him I see the explanation why God is mindful of man. Was not the underlying, indwelling purpose of the life begun at Bethlehem to tell the world what God is and what man is. He was perpetually teaching, and always assuming, that man is a body, fearfully and wonderfully made, that he is a mind with extraordinary capacities stored in it, but that he is something more, something indestructible, unchangeable, something so essential as to explain the mystery of Bethlehem, the tragedy of Calvary, the ceaseless Intercession, the grace of the Sacraments, the very existence of the Church—there is only one explanation of all these, one key to the problem invaluable in each—man is indestructible, unchangeable, a living soul.

III. If God is mindful of His people, can the Church, dare the Church, be unmindful? Can she leave their souls—the real self in each—uncared for and untrained? What can she give in exchange for their souls? What claim can she put forward which can be compared to the duty of caring for and helping them? The Church must care for the people under any aspect of their many-sided lives, but the care finds its climax in that which concerns itself with the real, the highest self.—BISHOP F. E. RIDGEWAY, The Church Family Newspaper, vol. xv. p. 472.

THE REAL AND THE IDEAL MAN

'What is man, that Thou art mindful of him?'—PSALM VIII. 4.

I. Man as God Made Him and Meant Him to be—the Ideal Man.

(a) Man is made to hold fellowship with God. It was meant that the intercourse should be close, frequent, and familiar. This is the perfection of the reasonable soul made capable of its consciousness of communion with God, that its surface should be a clear reflection on which the light of God should evermore mirror itself.

(b) There naturally follows a series of comparisons between men and other orders of being, as his transient inferiority to the loftiest of spiritual beings. This inferiority lies only in the possession of these fleshly bodies which condition and limit the development of the spirit.

(c) Man is crowned with glory and honour. These are received from God, and are His own attributes.

(d) Man has dominion over all things.

II. This is not What Men Are.—What an awful contrast. Take human nature as we see it, as we feel it in ourselves. Can we lay our fingers upon one man and say—there, that is an embodied ideal of what God meant men to be? The crown has fallen from our heads, for we have sinned. What then? Is hope dead? Has one word of God's become of none effect?

III. This is What One Man is—Christ.—The historical realization has transcended the Psalmist's utterance.

IV. This is What Many Men have Become.—Christ's manhood is the pattern of His people's. Faith is the means by which they shall attain to His standard. So look at the ideal men as a prophecy of a heavenly state only. Then the dream shall be true.—ALEXANDER MACLAREN.

THE PROSPECT OF HUMANITY

'What is man, that Thou art mindful of him?'—PSALM VIII. 4.

HUMANITY is God's capital. The rest is mere machinery. This much have we learnt from the Gospel, and thus do some of us believe. Yet who does not, in certain of his moods, echo the question of the Psalmist?

I. God is mindful of us, and in a way that He is mindful of naught else. All we know concerning the planets is that on some far day before the dawn of time, the thought of God kindled into those swirling fire-balls we now know as stars. There is no evidence that they have ever needed adjustment or any other form of attention. But with man it has been otherwise. For example, you have only to see that this world seems to have been made as an ideal theatre for man's development. Or think again, and realize how by his accumulated skill, the lightning that once terrified him later becomes his errand boy.

II. Yet so is man formed that he does not recognize his climax in personalities that mark the temporary summits of his conquest of Nature. A Brunel, a Darwin, an Edison deserve and receive his admiration. But in them humanity is obviously ascending rather than ascended. These great men always seem to be preparing the way for some one greater still. It is only when men look upon Jesus Christ that they see a point at which a line of human development seems to be finished. Jesus Christ is not only the climax of humanity. He is also the satisfaction of the deepest needs of men. Science can make no response to the deeper needs of humanity. Let a woman grieving for her dead turn to Brunel and say: 'You built the Great Eastern, you raised the bridge that joins Devon to Cornwall. Can you build me a bark or make a bridge that will bear me to my beloved across the sullen stream of death? And Brunel is silent. But grief-stricken souls have turned with a similar request to Jesus Christ, and straightway has come the heartening answer, 'I am the Resurrection and the Life'.

III. Affinities are revelations. By our affinities Christ and we alike are classified. By all that He is to God Christ stands in time for what God the Father is in eternity. Let the world go on debating as to whether man is dust, devil, or deity. By the gleam of the inner light we know, by the witness of the Spirit, we recognize ourselves for what we are.—J. G. STEVENSON, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXIV. p. 251.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 4.—C. Perren, Outline Sermons, p. 219. J. Clarke, Christian World Pulpit, 1891, p. 261. A. Chandler, A Lent in London, p. 193. B. Jowett, Sermons of Faith and Doctrine, p. 1. R. Duckworth, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxvii. p. 193. International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 61. J. B. Lightfoot, Cambridge Sermons, p. 229. H. P. Liddon, Old Testament Outlines, p. 101. W. Lindsay Alexander, Christian Thought and Work, p. 123. J. S. Bartlett, Sermons, p. 1. J. Baldwin Brown, The Higher Life pp. 1, 387. R. W. Dale, Penny Pulpit, Nos. 992, 993. Homiletic Magazine, vol. vii. p. 193. VIII. 4, 5.—R. J. Campbell, City Temple Sermons, p. 13. Ibid. A Faith for To-day, p. 79. W. J. Knox-Little, Manchester Sermons, p. 41. S. A. Brooke, Christ in Modern Life, p. 365. J. R. Macduff, Communion Memories, p. 51.

BUT LITTLE LOWER THAN GOD

'Thou hast made him but little lower than God.'—PSALM VIII. 5.

THIS is the Bible doctrine of the origin of men, and it takes us to the heights. To be a member of the human race, the Psalmist declares, is to come of a great line. It is to have Jehovah for an hereditary ancestor.

I. We may not expect so startling a statement to go unchallenged. There are two facts whose challenge we may consider, inasmuch as the Bible itself considers them in connexion with the text. The first is the challenge of size. It confronted the Psalmist. It overwhelmed him in the very moment he was declaring that man was sprung from God. The doubt which rises in this challenge we all feel. It makes sceptics.

II. The second challenge is more serious still. It is the challenge of sin. It sires the doubt which comes, not as we look round, but as we look within. This is the awful cloud; this is the real tragedy; not what man was before Adam, but what he is after Adam. What has he achieved? What are his accomplishments?

III. Nature itself answers the challenge of size. That is, size is nothing to God. He is as much in the atom as in the universe. The sinner himself refutes the challenge of sin. After the worst has been said about him, there is something in man that refuses to be explained by a process of nature, something that no cell of protoplasm could ever evolve, and no course of discipline excite. The power of thought proves the text. The stars are wonderful, the atoms amazing; but more wonderful is mind that measures them and explains their process.—J. VANCE, The Homiletic Review, vol. LV. p. 142.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 5.—H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 2273. VIII. 6.—E. R. Coudar, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xix. p. 161. VIII. 6-8.—T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 149. VIII.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons for Country Churches, p. 148. A. Maclaren, Life of David, p. 28. P. Thomson, Expositor (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 173. C. Kingsley, Sermons for the Times, p. 148. IX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 68.

PSALM VIII.

MELANCHTHON describes this Psalm as both a thanksgiving and a prophecy of the deliverance and eternal glory of the Church which has been gathered out of all the human race. It is, in his view, an answer to the saying that the best is never born or perishes very quickly. 'That saying would be true, if man were destined only for this mortal life, which is so full of cares, for far sadder and more terrible evils befall man than any of the other animals.' Still man's lot is better than theirs, because God has revealed Himself to the human race by many great and noble signs, and desires that men should praise Him, and be crowned by Him with everlasting glory. For these benefits the Psalmist returns thanks, and at the same time he prophesies of that marvellous glory.

'Thou hast put all things under his feet.' The writer asks whether the spectators who saw St. John the Baptist put to death by Herod, or St. Paul killed by Nero, could have had any idea that these martyrs were crowned with glory and honour, and that all things were put under their feet. They thought the martyrs far more wretched than the lions whom they beheld in the amphitheatre.

In a later paragraph the writer says that although he interprets this Psalm as referring to the Church as a whole, still he does not disapprove of the exposition which attributes it to Christ, the Church's Head. 'For Christ put aside His glory for a little while, being made a curse for us. Afterwards He was again crowned with glory, and through his merits the Church receives righteousness and everlasting life.'

Readers who remember the strong fascination which astrological studies held through life for the 'Præceptor Germaniæ,' will look with curious interest for his comments on vv. 3, 4.

'When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained.'

He touches the passage very briefly and in the tone of a sentence which occurs in one of his letters, 'Christ rules all things, even the stars'.

'Videbo coclos tuos: that means, the eternal kingdom will be established; we shall see the everlasting heavens, in which we shall enjoy the company of God and shall no longer be subject to death and sin, as we are here upon earth.'

All the later verses of the Psalm are interpreted in a Messianic sense.

REFERENCES.—IX. 1.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 304. IX. 4.—J. P. Chown, Contemporary Pulpit, vol. ii. 63. IX. 6.—Bishop Magee, The Gospel and the Age, p. 33.

THE CHARACTER OF GOD

'They that know Thy Name will put their trust in Thee.'—

PSALM IX. 10.

THE name of God always means, in the Bible, the nature and character of God. Our religion in its very essence necessarily depends upon our conception of the nature and character of our God. Your idea of God, your belief about what He is in nature and character, is bound to colour all your relations to Him. I might, of course, say a great deal about the conception of God which is given to us in the Christian revelation, but for the many things that might be said I shall just now think about only three. I single them out, not because they are the only things, but because they happen to be things which intelligent people are thinking a great deal about just now, and about which there is apt to be an absence of clear apprehension and consistent idea.

I. God is a Personal Being.—That may seem to you so simple and so certain, perhaps, that it is quite needless to say anything about it. But it is not needless, because there are many people nowadays who are getting very hazy indeed about this cardinal truth of Christianity, the personality of God. The trend of a great deal of the so-called scientific thought of the day is to recognize a great, mysterious, primal force behind the forces of the universe; a great, mysterious life behind all the forms of life; we are led by these scientists to infer that that force is, what theologians have been accustomed to call God, and that that life is what theologians have been used hitherto to call God; but we are not by any means assured that that force is personal, or that that life is personal; rather the natural inference is that it is impersonal, that it has the nature almost of a vast automatic machine, that it is a vast neuter energy. When you come to ask, 'Has this force and this life the attributes of a person? does it, as a person does, think and will and purpose, and above all does it love?' why then the answer given is very hesitating, or there may be no answer at all. The cardinal, primal truth of Christianity is that God is person; you must not let that go whatever you do.

II. God is Immanent, or Indwelling in His Universe.—And here I think you get the truth of which the doctrine which I have just controverted is a perversion. God is omnipresent, and does pervade His universe; God does move and work in the forces of nature; the life which stirs in the most elementary seed or plant, or in the grown tree, or in the germ or microbe, or in the quadruped, or in the human creature, or in angels or archangels, comes from Him, and is in the deepest sense His life. There is a true sense in which it may be said that God is the soul of His universe, and that the universe is, as Origen called it, the Body of God. All force is His force; His is not only the initial power which first set all things going, but His is the sustaining power which keeps all things moving. His infinite and omnipotent mind and will are the spring and the force and energy which consciously, actively maintains the whole vast, complex, moving, living, growing fabric of the universe. If the life of God ceased for one fragment of a second to beat in the pulse of the universe, in that fragment of a second would the whole universe crumble into absolute nothingness. God is immanent in its creation, He is its soul, its life, its energy, is the present, immediate, instant, unceasing, sustaining cause of all its vitality and its development; in Him all things consist; in Him we (and all things) live and move and have our being; outside of Him, if outside of Him anything could be, is nothingness. But that is not Pantheism, for God is not identical with His universe, although He is immanent in it. God is vastly more than His universe; He transcends it; He could exist independently of it if He so willed; and if He is immanent in His universe it is not as a blind and neuter force, an impersonal energy, but rather as a loving, intelligent, knowing, thinking, planning, personal Being, directing and controlling all, working out a purpose; infinitely strong, infinitely wise, infinitely good; a being, a mind, a soul, a will, a heart.

III. God is Love.—The essence of the religion of Jesus lies here: God is Love. That little, simple sentence of three words of one syllable, is something that we have known all our lives. As an infant you were taught by your mother to repeat it with lisping lips to your father as your first text; God is Love. We have known it all our lives; yes, but do we understand it yet? Do we know the length and breadth and depth and height, the fullness of it? No, it will take all eternity to explore it, to know it, and even then we shall never get to the end of it, for it passeth knowledge; the finite heart of man can never wholly compass the infinite heart of the Divine eternal One. 'God only knows the love of God.'

REFERENCES.—IX. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 287. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Apocalypse, etc., p. 157. IX. 16.—Congregationalist, vol. vi. p. 536. IX. 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, No. 344. Preacher's Monthly, vol. iv. p. 250. G. Bainton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. x. p. 221. IX. 18.—Spurgeon, My Sermon Notes—Genesis to Proverbs, p. 144. IX.—I. Williams, The Psalms Interpreted of Christ, p. 189. X.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 68.

ATHEISM

'The ungodly is so proud that he careth not for God; neither is God in all his thoughts.'—PSALM X. 4.

'The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.'—PSALM XIV. 1.

THE Psalmist's view of the men whom he calls the 'Ungodly' is explained in those two verses.

I. He does not bring against the ungodly any charge of theoretical Atheism. He is dealing with practical as distinct from theoretical Atheism, and therefore it is that his words have an interest for ourselves. The practical Atheist is he who says not in his speech, not in look or pamphlet, but in his heart, 'There is no God,' one of whom may be said in other words of the Psalmist, 'Neither is God in his thoughts'. The great question for us is really not whether we confess the existence of a God or not, that may matter little to us, still less perhaps to God—but how far our belief in Him plays an active and practical part in our lives. Do we, as a practical creed in our present time, believe more in the power of God or the power of gold? Do we in our political relations believe more in the right cause or brutal force, or do we say—and this, remember, is the most atheistical thing we can say, far more atheistical than denying the creed—that ‘God is on the side of the big battalions?’

II. ‘The ungodly is so proud that he careth not for God, neither is God in all his thoughts.’ The ungodly is so proud. When Holy Scripture paints us the picture of an Atheist, it is not the picture of a person in his study inventing arguments against God’s existence but rather that of a severely practical person, with plenty of gods of his own, whose only real faith is in material force. We know how across the stage of history those tremendous and portentous figures—Napoleon’s and others—have stridden, setting at defiance all spiritual power; saying in their hearts ‘There is no God,’ but indeed this practical materialism is not confined to them. It is found in lowly places and among quite ordinary men.

III. And so the real question for us is just this—What is our real practical working religion? What do we believe in most? God or Mammon? fear most, poverty or wrong? What do we love most? Worldly power, comfort, success, or purity, righteousness, truth? It is in some such way as this that we shall find out whether we are Atheists or not.—H. R. GAMBLE, Christianity and Common Life Sermons, p. 146.

REFERENCES.—X. 4.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 68. Preacher’s Monthly, vol. iv. p. 57. X. 5.—C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 174. X. 13.—J. Bunting, Sermons, vol. i. p. 288. X. 16.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 118. X. 19, 20.—J. H. Newman, Sermons on Subjects of the Day, p. 256. X.—I. Williams, The Psalms Interpreted of Christ, p. 212. XI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 88.

THE LORD IN HIS TEMPLE

‘If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do? The Lord is in His holy temple.’—PSALM XI. 3, 4.

I. To the question ‘what can the righteous do?’ the old reply must be given: ‘The Lord is in His holy temple’. This is the great creed. It involves much that does not appear. The first thing that it involves is the personality of our God and Father; and that personality of our God and Father takes up into itself all the attributes that in Revelation are ascribed to Him. There is His omniscience, and therefore, there is nothing that man can discover that is unknown to God. There is His omnipotence; there is nothing that man can do that is outside the power of God. And there is His omnipresence. Wherever man goes the Lord is in His holy temple. He is with His believing child; He is with His struggling society; He is with the Catholicity of His Church; so that when dangers threaten, the cry of His people will be the cry of the Psalmist and the cry of one who knew how to expect deliverance from the mercy of His heavenly Father.

II. Anti-religious Philosophy.—I regard the greatest danger which religion has to face in our century as a non-religious philosophy. Call it naturalism, call it monism, call it agnosticism. Those who give us these ideas are in our own land and in other lands. They make short work of all that we hold vital and precious in the Christian faith. They give us instead grim negations of even the strongest and deepest instincts of every human soul. One says everything is by natural means. Another says nature is all-sufficient. A third says there can be no intervening influence from without or beyond nature.

III. The Denial of Personality.—But whether God be openly denied, or whether He be regarded as a stream or tendency or as an eternal energy, or whether His existence and sympathy are to be dismissed in the blank ignorance of the agnostic, ‘I do not know,’ this is clear; all agree in one thing, and that is, they banish from the world, and they would banish if they dared from the Church, the personality of God. The denial of the personality of God is the overthrow of the responsibility of man; and if you were to ask me, ‘what is the danger of England to-day,’ I answer, we are in great danger of being affected by an epidemic of irresponsibility. We are making for ourselves the character of a nation that cannot be serious, and this is because of the utter frivolity which is entering into and corroding our moral fibre and, in its best sense, our national virility.

IV. Athirst for God.—The prevailing irresponsibility is to me the outcome of the general apathy to, if not a denial of, the cardinal doctrine of the personality of God. The personality of God corresponds to the personality of the instinct for God. And not all the heaving waves of scepticism or of infidelity can ever hush the cry of the soul, ‘My soul is athirst for God. Yea, for the living God.’—W. LEFROY.

REFERENCES.—XI. 1.—J. Vaughan, Sermons (10th Series), p. 109. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 691. XI. 5.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 249. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 395. XI. 7.—R. Allen, The Words of Christ, p. 110.

PSALM XI.

DR. KER tells us that when John Welsh and his fellow-captives were summoned from their prison in Blackness, on the Firth of Forth, to appear before the court at Linlithgow, they sang this Psalm as they walked by night under guard to their trial. While they were lying in their dungeon, deep and dark, below the level of the sea, they received a letter from Lady Melville of Culross, bidding them be thankful that they were only ‘in the darkness of Blackness, and not in the blackness of darkness’.

They were at length banished ‘forth the kingdom,’ under the arbitrary government of James VI., who was bent upon the establishment of Episcopacy.

Calderwood says: 'Upon the 6th of Nov. 1606, about the evening, when they were ready to embark, Mr. John Welsh conceived a fervent prayer, on the shore of Leith, and they took good-night of their friends, wives, and acquaintances, and entered in the boat; and after they had waited a good space upon the skipper, because he was not ready, they returned by two hours in the morning, at which time many were present. After prayer, they entered in the boat, with singing the 23rd Psalm. The people were much moved, and prayed heartily for them.'

'For the oppression of the poor, for the sighing of the needy, now will I arise, saith the Lord; I will set him in safety from him that puffeth at him.'—PSALM XII. 5.

This verse was the text of a sermon preached by Dr. Fabricius before Gustavus Adolphus, when he took Augsburg after a severe fight, in which the honour of the day was given by the king to the Scottish Brigade under Colonel Hepburn. A solemn thanksgiving was held in the principal church, and religious liberty was proclaimed in the city of the famous Confession, while the ferocious Tilly, after his defeat, returned breathing out threatenings and slaughter.—JOHN KER.

REASONS FOR PRAISE

'I will sing unto the Lord, BECAUSE . . . '—PSALM XIII. 6.

THERE is a reason for singing. The singing that has no reason is really not singing. Why do we sing? what moves the tongue to utterance? Is it because it is time to sing? then the song will be poor and formal. Is it because we are expected to sing? then will the very pith of the song go out of it. Do we sing because we cannot help it? then there may be strong, tender, heaven-seeking music.

'I will sing unto the Lord, because. . . ' What a wonderful misconception there often is about singing! I must hear the words, or the song is lost upon me; I do not know enough about the seven notes and all their interminglings to be able to dispense with distinct articulation on the part of the singer. So to this singing man who comes to-day, who says, 'I will sing unto the Lord,' I say, Why? what are the words? we shall be delighted to hear your song if we understand your sentiment; what are the words? He gives us the words; we can follow this wondrous, sweet-singing man because he pronounces every word without slurring a single syllable. Now let us hear these words and say whether this is an old song, or a new one, or both.

I. 'How long wilt Thou forget me, O Lord?' This is a line of experience worth tracing; this song is true to experience—therefore we wrote it and sang it and own it. We own what we absorb, we own what we appreciate; be it landscape or evening star or the first day of spring, which according to the calendar we have already reached, the bitter east wind notwithstanding: it is still spring, and spring will conquer. Here is a sense of being forgotten. It is a very homely word, but full of tears; it is a black jewel.

Here is a man who has sorrow daily. 'How long shall I take counsel in my soul, having sorrow in my heart daily?' It is that perpetual getting up to sorrow, coming out of sleep to cry still deeper and bitterer rivers of tears. The morning is at hand, the bright vernal morning; rise, O slumberer! And out of the dream-sleep there comes a cry—O how sad!—'To awaken once more only to be reminded that I am God-forgotten and God-forsaken!' That takes the sunlight out of the sky, withers the flowers, and chokes what would have been a song. Yet all the while this man is turning his eyes in the direction of the hills where the great sanctuary is—and still looks up and still hopes.

We contrast the enemy with our weakness and not with God's strength. There are times when I have nothing to do with myself, but look away; remove the hills that I may see further; roll these intercepting mountains into dust and sand, and throw them into the sea, lest they interrupt my view of God. What can a man be or do when he is forgotten of God or imagines so? What can a man do when God's face is hidden? We are the creatures of environment and of circumstance to a very large extent, and a mighty man is he, a giant among the sons of God, who, when the environment is dead against him, can lift up his song or smite his harp with fingers that have music in their very blood.

II. Now the song will alter. The Psalmist says, 'But I have trusted . . . ; my heart shall rejoice'. 'Trust'—who can define that term? That is the life of faith; that is the life I want to live. I cannot explain the mysteries, I cannot understand the miracles, I am lost amid gathering clouds of difficulties and inexplicable problems; but one thing I know, that I love the Saviour, and I am waiting for Him; and the moment He comes He will lead and I will tremblingly follow.

III. Now these are the words—what is the ending? 'I will sing unto the Lord, because He hath dealt bountifully with me.' He has turned the darkness into light, mourning into joy, and He has opened the prison doors to my soul when it was bound. Thus we must come back again and again, back to the old grand line of experience. If you can say that all things are shaping themselves into a great temple built for God, you are not far from the Lord's kingdom.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 118.

THE UNBELIEF OF THE FOOL

'The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.'—PSALM XIV. 1.

I. THE fool of the Scripture is a man who has fallen away, little by little, degree by degree, until he is a degraded man. A fool is a vile man, morally degenerate. Here then is the full force of my text—the man who says with an air of laughing and self-satisfied triumph 'There is no God,' is a vile man; at his heart there is moral rottenness; he is a fool! Why does the vile man say 'there is no God'? Because that is what the vile man wished to believe. The wish was 'father to the thought'. The tendency of sin is to make for unbelief, and much presumptuous scepticism may be traced to the violation of the moral law of God.

II. I do not wish to say that the fool arrives at his savage unbelief in a day. There are intermediate stages in this path of moral and spiritual degradation. Have we ever sufficiently marked that suggestive conjunction in the book of Isaiah where the sins of Israel are named and deplored, and where, after their rebellious acts have been all declared, God says, 'And thou hast been weary of me, O Israel'? One followed as the consequence of the other. A man becomes possessed of this feeling of religious weariness. His prayers are just long yawns. Then he begins to sceptically inquire about the use of prayer. A decision is easily reached that for him at any rate there is no use in prayer. But he cannot stop there. He needs must justify himself, and he finds the amplest and most comfortable justification in the more general statement that all prayer is useless. A man who has lost all belief in prayer to God will speedily pass to the judgment that there is no God to pray to. The man begins by defying God; he ends by denying Him. Uncleanliness has worked to spiritual death.—J. H. JOWETT, Apostolic Optimism, p. 196.

PSALM XIV.

OF all the senseless babble I have ever had occasion to read, the demonstration of these philosophers who undertake to tell us all about the nature of God would be the worst, if they were not surpassed by the still greater absurdities of the philosophers who try to prove that there is no God.—HUXLEY.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 1.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 35. J. H. Hitchens, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxvi. p. 424. Canon Henley Henson, The Value of the Bible, p. 113. W. Brock, Midsummer Morning Sermons, p. 21. International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 103. XIV.—I. Williams, The Psalms Interpreted of Christ, p. 261. XV. 1.—A. P. Stanley, Canterbury Sermons, p. 30. E. C. Wickham, Wellington College Sermons, p. 116.

PSALM XV.

JOHN WILSON (Christopher North) chooses this Psalm to be sung at the 'elder's death-bed,' for 'it was a custom in Scotland that the ransomed of the Lord returned and came to Zion with songs'.—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—XV. 2.—T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 106. XV.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 69. International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 112. A. Maclaren, Life of David, p. 174. I. Williams, The Psalms Interpreted of Christ, p. 272.

ASSURANCE IN GOD

'Preserve me, O God,' etc.—PSALM XVI.

THE Psalmist lived in a period when belief in the reality of many gods was still strong, and when a man who would follow the one true God had to prefer to do so against the attractions of other deities, and against the convictions of a great number of his fellow-countrymen that these deities were living and powerful.

I. It is remarkable how, when a man really turns to God, he turns to God's people as well, and how he includes them in the loyalty and in the devotion which he feels toward his Redeemer. His confidence and the sensitiveness of his faith in and toward God become almost an equal confidence and an equal sensitiveness toward his fellow-believers. So it is throughout the Scriptures.

II. In these days such a duty is unfortunately more complicated than with the Psalmist. The line between God's Church and the world is not so clear as it was to him, and the Church is divided into many and often hostile factions. All the more it becomes the test of our religion if our hearts feel and rejoice in the fellowship of God's simpler and more needy and more devoted believers, however unattractive they may otherwise be. This Psalmist's chief and practical help to us men and women to-day is that he became sure of God not because of any miracle or supernatural sign, on his report of which we might be content indolently to rest our faith, but in God's own providence in his life and in God's quiet communion with him through the organs God Himself has created in every one of us. For all time, whether before or after Christ, these are the chief grounds and foundations of faith in God.

III. God's guidance of his life, first of all, produces in a man a great sense of stability. He who has found God so careful of him, he whom God hath regarded as worth speaking to and counselling and disciplining him, will be certain that he shall endure, provided that he is sure of his own loyalty. The life so loved of God, so provided for, and in such close communion with the Eternal is not, cannot be, the creature of the day, and this assurance stands firm in face of even death and the horrible corruption of the body. We are assured of the future life because we have known God, and as we have found Him to be true to us and proved ourselves true to Him.—GEORGE ADAM SMITH, Homiletic Review, 1906, vol. LII. p. 458.

PSALM XVI.

THIS Psalm was the last Scripture read by Hugh McKail the evening before his execution in the Grassmarket of Edinburgh. After reading it he said to his father, and those about him: 'If there were anything in this world sadly and unwillingly to be left, it were the reading of the Scriptures. I said: "I shall not see the Lord, even the Lord, in the land of the living". But this needs not make us sad; for where we go, the Lamb is the book of Scripture, and the light of that city, and where He is, there is life,—even the river of the water of life, and living springs.'—JOHN KER.

DEATH THE GATE OF LIFE

'Therefore my heart is glad,'—PSALM XVI. 9-11.

THE very sight of the tremendous and irresistible power of death draws one to think of its weakness and limitations. We have here a saint of old who had no such light as ours in the very act of rising by virtue of his religious experience to the loftiest elevation of triumphant confidence.

I. The Grounds of the Triumphant Confidence.—

The realization of Jehovah's presence at his right hand; the blessedness and stability which flowed therefrom; these are the facts which lead the singer to grasp the confidence that he will never die.

(a) The capacity to commune with God is surely an indication of something in humanity which is not born for death.

(b) The exercise of that capacity makes it for the man himself an absolute impossibility to conceive that such a thing as death should have power over it.

II. The Contents of the Triumphant Confidence.—

(a) In a very real sense we see here the religious life abolishing death even while it did not see the way in which its confidence was to be fulfilled.

(b) The whole course of the devout soul will be in the way of life in the deepest sense. Mors janua vitæ; the road to life leads through death. That thought was trembling on the Psalmist's lips.

III. The Fulfilment of the Confidence.—The Psalmist's hopes were not fully realized because his communion was not perfect. But Christ has conquered death for us all, and now with the light of His resurrection we can take the words of the text with deeper meaning.—ALEXANDER MACLAREN.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 8.—M. R. Vincent, God and Bread, p. 59. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1305. Homiletic Magazine, vol. xii. p. 18. W. F. Shaw, Sermon-Sketches, p. 37. XVI. 8-10.—Archbishop Thomson, Lincoln's Inn Sermons, p. 62. XVI. 8-11.—A. MacLaren, Sunday Magazine, 1881, p. 738. XVI. 9.—A. R. Ashwell, God in His Work and Nature, p. 1. XVI. 9, 10.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to Tracts for the Times, vol. ix. p. 120. XVI. 10.—J. Keble, Sermons for Easter to Ascension Day, pp. 74, 128. C. Stanford, From Calvary to Olivet, p. 24. Expositor (3rd Series), vol. v. p. 308. Ibid. (2nd Series), vol. vii. p. 40.

EMOTIONS OF A SAINT IN HEAVEN

'In Thy presence is fulness of joy.'—PSALM XVI. II.

HEAVEN is the Christian's goal.

I. He has been made the subject of a change that affects everything connected with him save his identity.

II. The unencumbered action of the spirit.

III. The friendships of heaven will be of a higher order than those of earth.

IV. He will stand in the presence of Christ.

This faint view of the joys of the redeemed inspires two reflections:—

(a) That excessive grief over the departed is unwarranted.

(b) That we should make sure of our inheritance with the saints in light.—A. S. GARDNER, Pulpit and Grave, p. 251.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 11.—H. Moffat, Church Sermons, vol. I. p. 49. XVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. I. p. 117. W. F. Shaw, Sermon-Sketches, p. 37. J. Hammond, Expositor (1st Series), vol. iv. p. 341. I. Williams, The Psalms Interpreted of Christ, p. 279. XVII. 3.—H. P. Liddon, Contemporary Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 193. XVII. 5.—Parker, City Temple, vol. i. p. 60. XVII. 7.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 141. XVII. 8.—F. W. Brown, Christian World

Pulpit, vol. i. p. 190. E. A. Bray, Sermons, vol. i. p. 114. G. Bainton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxi. p. 244. XVII. 13.—E. Thring, Uppingham Sermons, vol. ii. p. 128.

MEN OF THE WORLD

'Men of the world, which have their portion in this life.'—PSALM XVII. 14.

To every young man there comes, sooner or later, the brief but startling message which God addressed to Abraham when he was in Ur of the Chaldees—'Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee'. You cannot always abide in the home of your childhood.

I. Think of the portion which belongs to men of the world. There is not a greater mistake than to imagine that you will be heart-rich as soon as you become purse-rich. Riches do make happy; but it is not the riches of the pocket, but the riches of the mind and heart. The riches of taste, of culture, of affection, and, above all, the riches of God's grace, which impart capacities of deep and intense enjoyment, otherwise unknown. Although every age has had its philosophers and its moralists, proclaiming that money will not bring happiness, it is as little believed to-day as ever it was.

II. The contrast, as suggested by David's words in the next verse—'As for me, I will behold Thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness'.

(a) If you study the Bible, you will find that when reference is made to the 'face of God,' there is generally allusion to Jesus Christ, His Son. We are said to behold Him 'in the face of Jesus Christ'. The Psalmist means that he will fix his eye on God, as reconciled to him through the righteousness of the Redeemer. He will enjoy the light of His favour. He will bask in the sunshine of His smile. This, believe me, is the first secret of a happy life. If you want to know the joy of a heart at rest, the first thing you have to do is to get right with God.

(b) 'I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness.' Satisfied when? 'When I awake.' This is commonly interpreted as having reference to the morning of resurrection, when, aroused from the long slumber of the tomb, the perfected saint shall arise in the image of his Saviour. And, truly, the moment of resurrection will be the first moment in our history, when, in the fullest, amplest sense of the word, we shall be able to say, 'I am satisfied!' 'I have all that I can desire.'—J. THAIN DAVIDSON, The City Youth, p. 168.

REFERENCE.—XVII. 14.—Expositor (3rd Series), vol. v. p. 308.

THE TWO AWAKINGS

'I shall be satisfied, when I awake with Thy likeness.'—PSALM XVII. 15.

'As a dream when one awaketh; so, O Lord, when Thou awakest, Thou shalt despise their image.'—PSALM LXXIII. 20.

THE period to which both David and Asaph look in these two verses is the end of life. The words of both, taken in combination, open out a series of aspects of that period which carry weighty lessons, and to which we turn now.

I. The first of these is that to all men the end of life is an Awakening. The representation of death most widely diffused among all nations is that it is a sleep. The reason for that emblem is easily found. Men prefer not to name their God or their dread, but find roundabout phrases for the one, and coaxing, flattering titles for the other. But that emblem, true and sweet as it is, is but half the truth. We shall sleep, yes; but we shall wake too. To our true selves and to God we shall wake.

II. The second principle contained in our text is that death is to some men the awakening of God. For the long years of our stay here, God's seeking love lingers round every one of us, yearning over us, besetting us behind and before, courting us with kindness, lavishing on us its treasures, seeking to win our poor love. The judgment sleeps; the loving forbearance, the gracious aid wake. But remember that that predominating, merciful, and long-suffering character of God's present dealings affords no guarantee that there will not come a time when the slumbering judgment will stir to waking. The Bible which is our only source of knowledge on the subject tells us that men who have been compassed with the loving kindness of the Lord, and who die leaving worldly things and keeping worldly hearts, will have to confront 'the terror of the Lord'.

III. Death is the annihilation of the vain show of worldly life. Nothing that is without a man can make him rich or restful. That which we are makes us rich or poor, that which we own is a trifle. Let us see to it that not in utter nakedness do we go hence, but clothed with that immortal robe, and rich in those possessions that cannot be taken away from us, which they have who have lived on earth as heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ.

IV. Finally, death is for some men the annihilation of the vain shows in order to reveal the dread reality. We have here the blessed confidence that when all the baseless fabric of the dream of life has faded from our opening eyes we shall see the face of our ever-loving Lord God. And seeing God we shall be satisfied.—ALEXANDER MACLAREN.

'I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness.'—
PSALM XVII. 15.

THIS text, in its Latin rendering, Satiabor cum apparuerit gloria tua, was the passage chosen by Henri Perreye for his epitaph. 'He had put his whole soul,' says Père Gratry, 'into that cry of faith, hope, and love.'

THE mother of Susannah Wesley, passed away exclaiming: 'I will die praising Thee—I shall be satisfied when I awake with Thy likeness—satisfied! satisfied!'

MELANCHTHON says: 'The true Church is subjected in this life to the cross. But a word of comfort is spoken about the eternal life: Satiabor cum surget imago tua, that is to say, when Thou restorest Thy perfect likeness in the resurrection of the dead.'

'AS FOR ME—'

MR. PIKE of Yarmouth. On Sunday, 17 January, 1858, just after giving out his text, which was the last verse of the 17th Psalm, 'As for me, I will behold Thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness'; with the words 'as for me' upon his lips, he was smitten with death, and was buried in the chapel-yard on the 22nd of the month.

REFERENCES.—XVII. 15.—J. Vaughan, Sermons (7th Series), p. 127. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 25. Preacher's Monthly, vol. v. p. 180. T. Binney, Christian World Pulpit, vol. i. p. 120. G. Matheson, Moments on the Mount, p. 39. Homiletic Quarterly, vol. iii. p. 277. Homiletic Magazine, vol. xiv. p. 233. XVII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 127. I. Williams, The Psalms Interpreted of Christ, p. 296. XVIII. 1.—John Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 290. XVIII. 9.—J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (4th Series) p. 10. XVIII. 16.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1432.

PSALM XVIII. 17-19.

THESE words were sung upon the scaffold by four sons of the Huguenots:—

'He delivered me from my strong enemy, and from them which hated me: for they were too strong for me.

'They prevented me in the day of my calamity: but the Lord was my stay

'He brought me forth also into a large place; he delivered me because he delighted in me.'

They were sung by the last martyrs of the desert, Francis Rochette, and three brothers of the name of Grenier, who suffered as late as 1762, under the reign of Louis XV.—JOHN KER.

THE IRONY OF GOD

'Unto the froward Thou wilt show Thyself froward.'—
PSALM XVIII. 26.

'The pure thinks God is pure, the froward thinks God is froward.'

I. THE froward think that God is froward. Sinners think that God is altogether One such as themselves. Even in the hour of death the most abandoned sinners go to meet God without a tremor. There are others who, while they know that God is angry with them and their sins, yet do not feel that it is with a terrible and alarming anger. Now there are many facts in life which the most honest minds find hard to reconcile with God's holiness. Look at some of those facts. (a) How many opportunities for sin there are in the world. (b) Again, how often, when men begin to sin, they begin to succeed. (c) On the other hand, how often the moment men cease from sinning they begin to fail. (d) Again, some of the highest forces in the world are on the side of evil.

II. With the pure God shows Himself to be pure. They see that the froward is the victim of illusions, and, in spite of all appearances, that God is perfect in holiness. They see that all these untoward facts only mean that temptation is an element in life. Tempted purity is the purest, and the fire is intended not to consume, but to purify the gold.

III. But what is the reason of God's creation of this strange law, that what a man is shall determine his thought of God, so that with the froward He shows Himself perverse? The answer is, God uses irony in His dealings with men. One or two instances will illustrate this Divine use of irony. (a) Is it not an irony that the kingdom of good often comes in this world by the victory and not the defeat of the kingdom of evil. (b) Is it not an irony that men often sin to gain an end, and miss the very end they sin to gain? (c) And is not this an irony that men who reject God and His wisdom often in their calculations miss out the only things which are certain to happen?

IV. The reason of God's use of irony in his dealings with men. If we are not open to the conviction that we are sinners, He will convince us that we are fools. And nothing shows the proud their folly so effectually as irony. Behind the Divine laughter there is love. Behind the sarcasm there is yearning; the irony is the hunger of a heart seeking to save.—E. ALDOM FRENCH, God's Message through Modern Doubt, p. 15.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 25, 26.—J. Service, Salvation Here and Hereafter, p. 156. XVIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 137.

LEAD, KINDLY LIGHT

'Thou wilt light my candle: the Lord my God will enlighten my darkness.'—PSALM XVIII. 28.

THERE is in man something to which the Divine taper can be applied. The image and superscription of God imprinted upon him have not been completely effaced. And yet man can shine, as does the man with a light that is borrowed.

I. Only He Who in the beginning said, 'Let there be light,' Who 'is light,' and in Whom 'is no darkness at all,' can light the human lamp: and when a man's lamp is thus lit, he not only finds his own path bright, but, reflecting the Divine rays, he becomes a lamp to others who are groping their way amid the gloom and terror of the night.

II. There is perhaps no single word which is so expressive of everything that is good, and consequently so satisfying to man on every side of his nature as the word 'light'. Darkness is chiefly associated with what is bad, hurtful, dangerous. There are times when, on account of the darkness, we cannot see our way. And then we cry, 'Lead, kindly light'.—W. TAYLOR, Twelve Favourite Hymns, p. 63.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 28.—H. P. Liddon, Contemporary Pulpit, Extra No. 4, p. 92. XVIII. 30.—J. C. Miller, Penny Pulpit, No. 1035. XVIII. 35.—J. Vaughan, Sermons, 4th Series, p. 245. W. M. Taylor, Limitations of Life, and other

Sermons, p. 344. R. C. Trench, Sermons in Westminster Abbey, p. 339. C. J. Vaughan, Voices of the Prophets, p. 18. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 683. H. Bushnell, Christ and His Salvation, p. 18. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 683. Leach, Christian World Pulpit, vol. iv. p. 232. Bishop Woodford, Sermons on Subjects from the Old Testament, p. 105. XVIII. 50.—H. Bonar, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xv. p. 177. A. Maclaren, Life of David, p. 153.

PSALM XVIII. 39, 40.

CLOVIS, the founder of the French monarchy, whose name in the form of Louis has descended to so many kings, was marching southward from Paris, A.D. 507, to meet the formidable Visigoths in battle. Anxious to forecast the result, he sent messengers to consult the shrine of St. Martin of Tours, the oracle of Gaul. They were told to mark the words of the Psalm chanted, when they entered the church. These were verses 39, 40, and encouraged Clovis to the step which proved decisive in French history:—

'I have wounded them that they were not able to rise; they are fallen under my feet.

'For thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle; thou hast subdued under me those that rose up against me.'—JOHN KER.

THE HONEY OF GOD'S WORD

PSALM XIX.

IN the superbly sublime nineteenth Psalm David pronounces God's word to be sweeter than honey and the droppings of the honeycomb. In the same passage he declares that 'it is pure, enlightening the eyes'. Again the Psalmist says 'the entrance of Thy word giveth light'. It is not the careless reading or the listless hearing of the book, but its entrance into the soul which produces this inward illumination. The spiritual eyesight must be opened in order that the spiritual beauty and wisdom and glory of the Divine word may be discovered. The growing Christian never outgrows his Bible; in the exhaustless jewel-mine every stroke of the mattock reveals new nuggets of gold and fresh diamonds.

I. Even as a mental discipline there is no Book like God's Book. The humblest labourer who saturates his mind with this celestial schoolbook becomes a superior man to his comrades—not merely a purer man but a clearer-headed man. It was the feeding on this honey dropping from heaven which gave to the Puritans their wonderful sagacity as well as their unconquerable loyalty to the right.

II. As the sunlight was made for all eyes, so this Book was made for all hearts. It is more than light, for it is an enlightener. Not only does it reveal the grandest, the sublimest and most practical truths, but it improves and enlarges the vision. Who of us that have been sorely perplexed about questions of right and wrong, and puzzled as to our duty, have not caught new views and true views as soon as we dipped into this honeycomb? Poor Cowper, harassed and tormented, found in the twenty-fifth verse of the third chapter of Romans the honey which brought light to his over-clouded soul. There is many a one who can testify how precious honey from heaven brought light and joy to his eyes when dimmed with sorrow. The exceeding rich and infallible promises were not only sweet, they were illuminating. They lighted up the valley of the shadow of death; they showed how crosses can be turned into crowns, and how losses can brighten into glorious gains.

III. Nothing opens the sinner's eyes to see himself and to see the Saviour of sinners like the simple word. The Bible is a book to reveal iniquity in the secret parts. If the sceptic and the scoffer can be induced to taste some of that honey which Christ gave to Nicodemus, he may find hell a tremendous reality to be shunned, and heaven a glorious reality to be gained.—T. L. CUYLER.

REFERENCES.—XIX. 1.—E. A. Bray, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 16. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 195. XIX. 1-6.—R. S. Candlish, The Gospel of Forgiveness, p. 113. XIX. 1-7.—W. Alexander, Primary Convictions, p. 163. XIX. 2.—A. Mursell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xix. p. 147. XIX. 3.—Preacher's Monthly, vol. iv. p. 240. XIX. 3, 4.—V. W. Gregory, Expositor (3rd Series), vol. iii. p. 315. XIX. 4.—W. G. Horder, Christian World Pulpit, vol. vi. p. 398. XIX. 4-6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 1020. A. P. Stanley, Sermons in the East, p. 71. XIX. 5.—J. Keble, Sermons for Christmas and Epiphany, p. 12. XIX. 5, 6.—J. C. Hare, Sermons in Herstonceux Church, p. 227. XIX. 7.—Spurgeon, My Sermon Notes—Genesis to Proverbs, p. 147. 7, 8.—A. P. Stanley, Canterbury Sermons, p. 30. XIX. 7-9.—G. Matheson, Expositor (1st Series), vol. xii. p. 89. XIX. 8.—J. H. Hitchens, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xvii. p. 30. XIX. 11.—H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 2625. XIX. 12.—G. H. Morrison, The Scottish Review, vol. ii. p. 134. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 299. Ibid. vol. iii. No. 116. J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, vol. i. p. 41. H. Thompson, Conciliaria—Outlines for Parochial Use (1st Series), vol. i. p. 111. XIX. 12-14.—T. G. Selby, The Imperfect Angel, p. 88. R. S. Candlish, The Gospel of Forgiveness, p. 164.

THE SIN OF SELF-CONFIDENCE

'Keep back Thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me: then shall I be perfect, and I shall be clear from great transgression.'—PSALM XIX. 13.

Our purpose is to point out that life does not admit of negligence, self-confidence, and venturesomeness; and to urge a close and constant supervision of the soul.

I. To Treat Negligently Our Secret Faults is to become guilty of presumptuous sin. Immediately before our text we listen to the deprecation and appeal, 'Who can discern His errors? Clear Thou me from hidden faults.' Now, by these errors and secret faults we understand the Psalmist to indicate the thought, feeling, and bias which lie back of action, and eventually determine action. In the meditation of the heart, the chambers of the brain, the inclination of the will, action takes its rise and colour; and at this initial point, in the count of the sacred writer, we ought specially to be on our guard. Out of the heart are the issues of life; and this fountain ought to be kept under constant observation, as the inhabitants of volcanic areas watch the movement and colour of the water in the wells. According to the reasoning of the text and context, out of hidden faults spring presumptuous sins, out of presumptuous sins dominant sins, out of dominant sins the great transgression of final apostasy. Medical authority teaches that elephantiasis is sometimes occasioned by the bite of a mosquito; and the student of morals well knows that, as the most monstrous physical maladies arise in microscopic life, so the foulest sins originate in obscure errors of the mind, in distempered imaginations, in morbid feeling, in a bias of the will so faint as easily to escape notice. As St. James diagnoses the situation, each man is tempted when drawn away by his irregular desire, and enticed; then, the irregular desire having conceived, beareth sin; and sin, becoming full grown, brings forth death. The point of the Psalmist, then, is this—that so soon as we discern in thought, emotion, or conduct any thing irregular, false, unhealthy, we ought promptly to take ourselves to task.

II. To Despise the Beginnings of Habit is to become chargeable with presumptuous sin. The Psalmist has here in view the terrible power of evil habit. 'Let them not have dominion over me.' St. Paul refers to the same hateful domination: 'Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey the lusts thereof'. The ancients were only too familiar with tyranny, with its humiliations and cruelty; but they knew no despotism that was so terrible as that of a soul mastered by base desire: the tyranny that outrages reason, puts out the eyes of the heart, silences the conscience, fastens fetters on the will, and thrusts human nature in its inmost self into the bitterest bondage and degradation. To acquiesce in the lordship of lust, or to attempt in unavailing revolt to break its fetters, is the deepest depth of subjection and misery we may know. Let us not be guilty of presumptuous sin in yielding to the temerity which trifles with the beginnings of evil. The crease may be barely discernible, but there character will be rent; the scratch may be inappreciable, but here the soul will be shattered, and, perchance, cast with the rubbish to the void! Snap, then, the spider-thread ere it become a cord of vanity, a cart-rope to drag the tyrant's chariot and the executioner's tumbrel. Block the track ere the lawless thought establish a right of way. Quench the kindling spark ere you perish in the impure flame of an infernal martyrdom. 'Stand in awe, and sin not: commune with your own heart upon your bed, and be still.'

III. To Expose Ourselves Unnecessarily to Temptation is an egregious form of presumption. We have already spoken of those wanton persons who are never happy except when courting danger in some shape or other; and this folly finds its parallel in the spiritual life. Surely temptation enough arises out of natural, legitimate life, inevitable dangers stand thick through all the ground; and yet we madly multiply peril to the soul, as the hare-brained will graze the grave. How rashly we expose ourselves to sceptical influences! How heedlessly we take on worldly entanglements!

How apt we are to minimize the perils of passion, feeding without fear! To dabble with any forbidden thing in the moral life is inexcusable folly; for it does not, and it cannot, bring any advantage whatever. The wounds received in the service of sin carry no honour; the ventures made at the bidding of vicious caprice yield no profit; the forbidden precipices we climb with bleeding feet only render our folly the more conspicuous and our punishment the more complete. 'What fruit then had ye at that time in the things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death.'

IV. To Encounter the Inevitable Perils of Life Without Due Preparation is a sin of presumption. Nothing in nature is more remarkable than the way in which the creatures are fortified against their enemies; and it is noted that their defensive armour becomes more exquisite and complete as their assailants increase in power and efficiency. Cacti are preserved by formidable spines. Protective mechanics of a most complicated order are found in a number of plants. All kinds of ingenious weapons are developed by flower, insect, and animal; just the armour that best suits them, being finely adjusted to the severity of their environment. Thus God has not left His people without a 'whole armour'; it would be strangely unlike Him if He had. And that armour is found in the intensity and fullness of their spiritual life. The armour of the saint is not something exterior and artificial: it is the protection that springs from the reality, intensity, and healthiness of the life of the soul. It is in the grasp of the truth by the understanding, in the sensibility of the conscience to righteousness, in the warmth of the heart's love, in the clearness of the vision of the eternal, in the strength of our trust in God, and in the completeness of our consecration to Him. Here is the invulnerable panoply of the saints.—W. L. WATKINSON, The Fatal Barter, pp. 129-43.

REFERENCES.—XIX. 13.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 76. XIX. 13.—J. Keble, Sermons for Lent to Passiontide, p. 95.

PSALM XX.

THE famous physician, Sir James Y. Simpson, was one of a family which had the privilege of a pious mother. She was early left a widow, and had many a perplexing thought and sore struggle in providing bread for her household. When she was hard pressed with thinking and toiling, and could not see her way through, she used to sit down and repeat the 20th Psalm. She rose refreshed, and her children learned to call it 'mother's Psalm'.

Jehovah hear thee in the day
When trouble He doth send:
And let the name of Jacob's God
Thee from all ill defend.

O let Him help send from above,
Out of His sanctuary:
From Zion, His own holy hill,
Let Him give strength to thee.

—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—XX. 1.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Sunday Afternoon, p. 45. J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages from the Psalms, p. 9. XX. 1, 2.—Preacher's Monthly, vol. ii. p. 414. XX. 1-7.—J. Bowstead, Practical Sermons, vol. ii. p. 222.

'Remember all thy offerings and accept thy burnt sacrifice.'—PSALM XX. 3.

THIS text was quoted by Henri Perreyve in the letter he wrote to his friend Charles Perraud from Hyères on 18 December, 1857. Henri Perreyve was at that time a deacon, looking forward to priest's orders. Charles Perraud had just been ordained to the priesthood. The motto of the letter, repeated for each paragraph, is 'the sacramental greeting of the deacon,' 'The Lord be with you'. 'May He be with you in your griefs to comfort you! With you in your joys to sanctify them! With you in your longings to make them fruitful. Memor sit omnis sacrificii tui et holocaustum tuum pingue fiat.'

REFERENCES.—XX. 5.—D. Burns, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xiii. p. 81. J. Bunting, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 99. XX. 7.—H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 1593. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 177. XXI. 2.—M. G. Pearse, Sunday Magazine, 1884, p. 605.

PREVENIENT GRACE

'Thou hast given him his heart's desire, and hast not withholden the request of his life. For Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness.'—PSALM XXI. 2, 3.

THIS Psalm is a battle song, a thanksgiving after the battle. It is full of the glow of triumph, the exultation of victory.

I. There has been a change of meaning in the word prevent since our English translation; or rather, as so often happens in the history of words, the meaning has taken on a different colour. 'Prevent' means simply to go before, and in the sense of our text meant to go before in order to help, to clear the way of difficulties, to anticipate, and prepare for the person following. There is in theology a term, still used, prevenient grace, meaning the grace which acts on a sinner before repentance inducing him to repent, the grace by which he attains faith and receives power to will the good. But we must not limit God's prevenient grace to the act of repentance, to the steps which lead up to the consciousness of sonship with God. When we do awaken to that consciousness we will, like the Psalmist, look back and see how God has been in the past leading, guiding, guarding, shepherding us, preventing, going before us with the blessings of goodness. We can point to this place and to that in our life's history where we have been kept from wrong by being kept from the opportunity. What we in blindness called hindering has been really helping.

II. Faith is of a piece. It believes about the future what it believes about the past; for God to it is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. We cannot live by faith now, and look forward to the fruition of faith in the days to come, unless we also interpret the past by faith. God's dealings with us are consistent. There is no break in His providence. His grace is not intermittent. It is prevenient, as well as present. Our future may be obscure; we may not be able to see very far ahead a clear path for our feet; but we know already what it is to walk by faith when sight has failed us. Difficulties may even at this moment loom before us; but there have often been difficulties in our lives which when we went up to them vanished as if some one had gone before us and cleared the way, like the women who went on their loving errand to the sepulchre of their Master very early in the morning, with sinking hearts, saying in despair: 'Who shall roll away the stone from the door of the sepulchre? And when they looked they saw that the stone was rolled away.' We expected to be stopped, as the women did, by some insurmountable obstacle; but when we came up to it we saw our way past, and even when it seemed to block the way utterly we were enabled to make it a stepping-stone to higher things.

III. Even the valley of the shadow of death cannot bring evil. The love which illuminated all the day of life to us shall make our bed in dying, and in the eventide it shall also be light. Preventient grace will not cease at death. Our faith fails not even here, and tells us that God goes before us with the blessings of goodness. 'I go,' said the Master, 'to prepare a place for you.' The forethought of love can never be exhausted. Our place has ever been prepared for us, and ever shall be. He has prepared our place for us at His Table. The broken bread and the poured out wine are symbols of that love in its culmination, tokens of the deathless love of God in Christ Jesus.—HUGH BLACK, Christ's Service of Love, p. 209.

PREVENIENT GOODNESS

'Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness.'—

PSALM XXI. 3.

THE word 'prevent' here is used in a different sense from that which it now bears. It has no suggestion of hindering about it; it means to anticipate or go before. 'Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness'—thou goest on ahead—thou art in front. When the king reaches such and such an hour, he will discover that it has been prepared for. It is that assurance of a foreseeing power, of a footstep and a figure on ahead, which quieted and cheered the Psalmist's soul, and helped him to be brave against the morrow. The Psalmist knew that Jehovah was behind him, in the subtle interweavings of the past. He knew that God was with him in the present, invisible, yet nearer than his breathing. But he knew also, and there were times for him when the thought was inexpressibly refreshing, that the path he should have to tread to-morrow was being shaped by hands Divine to-day. God is not only with us as we journey. God is on before us as we journey. First, we shall look at the beginning of life; next, at the progress of life; and lastly, at the end of life.

I. Think, then, of the beginnings of life, and of the state of things which then awaited us.

1. And first remember how when we were born we came into a world that was prepared. 'Thou hast formed the world to be inhabited' is one of the deep sayings of the prophets. For whatever ends the world has been created, it has been fashioned upon the lines of man. It has been decked in beauty for the human eye; covered with sustenance for the human frame; stored with energies that would have slept unused, but for the large intelligence of man. Nature has been getting ready for millenniums, since she awoke from the primeval chaos; and in her depths, and on her hills of pasturage, has been preparing for this very hour.

2. Again, let us bear this in mind, that we were born into a society that was prepared. Life perishes without a right environment, and an environment contains a thousand yesterdays. Thou goest before us with the blessings of goodness. We are all aristocrats and born into a heritage. We struggle through broken efforts into speech, and the speech of a little child is always wonderful. And yet the Celt is in it, and the Saxon, and the pride and chivalry of Norman conquerors, and it has been shaping for a thousand years that it might be ready for the child to-day.

3. And more than that, is it not also true that we were born into a home that was prepared? God has not only been busy in the world; God has also been busy in the home. Sometimes there comes a visitor to see us of whose coming we had no anticipation. He has been long abroad and for years we have not seen him, until one day he is standing at our door. But it is not thus that into Christian homes there come the joy and mystery of childhood. The child is born in a prepared place, and love has been very busy with its welcome. Thou goest before us with the blessings of goodness. Thou touchest hearts to fatherhood and motherhood. Thou givest to the little helpless child the sign and seal of sacramental baptism. And the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ is there, and the memory of His love for little ones, and the cleansing of blood that was poured out in ransom, not yesterday, but long centuries ago.

II. In the second place, think of the progress of life as we advance in it from stage to stage. God is not only behind us in our memories, God is also before us in the way.

1. Think, for example, of the surprise of life—its unexpected and unlooked-for element. There is not a life so dull and commonplace but has had ample experience of that. Our joys surprise us like birds upon the wing, flashing upon us suddenly and strangely.

2. Or think again of the cravings of our life; those longings that beset us as we journey. Our life is measured not by what we win: our life is measured by the thing we strive for. As a man deepens so his longings deepen, till they reach to the infinite and the eternal. And the strange thing is, that as these cravings alter, and rise from the transient to the enduring, so God is ever there before us, with His prepared answer to our quest.

III. Does not this thought illuminate the close of life? Thou goest before us into the dark valley. 'I go to prepare a place for you,' said Christ. Whatever hell be, it is not man's environment. It was prepared for the devil and his angels. Whatever heaven be, it is man's native place, prepared for him from the foundation of the world. And then within that kingdom, all made ready, there is to be the individual touch—I go to prepare a place for you.—G. H. MORRISON, The Return of the Angels, p. 143.

THE PREVENIENT GOODNESS OF THE LORD

'Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness.'—
PSALM XXI. 3.

THE wonderful way in which God is beforehand with men always.

I. Let us remember how obvious it is with regard to our first appearance in this world at all. Before you put your tender cutting into the ground you are careful to prepare a fitting soil that it may take root readily. And before He plants His children in this world the Heavenly Husbandman is at singular pains to secure that the place they are to occupy be in rich readiness and favourable for their bearing the fruit he looks for from their lives.

(a) That at least among ourselves is the rule. It is true there are exceptions—or what must seem to us to be so. There are children born into the world for whom you would say little preparation had been made by any one. Is God beforehand with them with the blessings of goodness. One thing is certain; that He has the strangest ways of blending His mercy even with the most untoward environment.

(b) There can hardly, I should think, be any one here but will find upon reflection how wonderfully his place in the world was prepared for him before he came to occupy it. Who is it that says that if you are to give a child a good education you must begin a hundred years before he is born? All down the generations the lot we should in due time stand in has been growing more goodly and favourable. Richly significant as such preparation for their arrival here may be, its influence nevertheless must be largely lost on men but for a further preparation made in the sphere that lies closer about them still. To have first drawn breath then, in a truly Christian home is to have been born to an inheritance which not all the world's wealth could buy.

(c) All this prevenient loving-kindness of God was expressed towards us in our baptism. For baptism is the seal of our lineage, and signifies that we come of the elect stock.

II. All through life the same truth holds—how not merely at the beginning but from stage to stage thereafter God is beforehand with men. Take an illustration or two; for example:—

(a) The great joys of life. As a rule these are not of a man's own working. They arrive we know not whence or how. And what does this mean but just that the Divine loving-kindness had prepared for us such mercy, and then at the fitting moment laid it bare.

(b) The great sorrows and trials of life. If not at the time then later men and women become aware of the Divine purpose that was in their loss and pain. It is not given to all God's children while presently under discipline to recognize the meaning and the mercy of it; but when they have emerged it is.

(c) Or, once more, take temptation, that constant element in our lives. But with the temptation there is always a strength available for the bearing of it, which if we seize and are not overborne by it, nothing but good is the issue. It teaches faith. It teaches to pray.

III. Finally observe how the truth we are dealing with, and which is realized so unbrokenly through life, holds good to the end.

(a) Life of course does wear to a close, and not all men are able to ignore it. Some are even haunted by the thought. What those who though believers must lay to heart is that their dying also, as well as everything else in their history, has been long ago provided for.

(b) As for what they find upon the other side what shall we say of it? It is upon no barren shore that they step forth, but upon a better country, and one where they are looked for. Our Lord says a great word about it when He bids the faithful look to be bidden welcome to a kingdom 'prepared' for them 'from the foundations of the world'.

(c) It would seem that a more special provision of His mercy still is made for His children in the world to come, for He Who came from thence and went thither again has gone 'to prepare a place for them'—that is, surely, a place of His own for each. We may believe that whatever our appointed place hereafter may be, it will not be so strange and unfamiliar as we are apt to think.—A. MARTIN Winning the Soul, p. 199.

THE MINISTRY OF SURPRISE

'Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness.'—PSALM
XXI. 3.

THE element of surprise in the handiwork of God.

I. In nature. We talk of the uniformity of nature, and it is wonderful with what a steady march the days and seasons keep their appointed course: 'While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and heat and cold, and summer and winter, shall not fail'. Now you would think it would be a dull dead world where everything was so uniform as that. Well I believe it is that dread monotony that God averts by His strange and beautiful method of surprise. I may have watched the coming of a score of spring-times; but when the next spring comes, with its throat of music and its cloak of green, it is all so fresh and wonderful to me as if there had never been a spring before. The glad surprise of every dawn and May day, in the teeth of iron and inexorable law, speaks better than a hundred arguments, of the presence of an immanent Creator.

II. The element of surprise, too, is found in human character. In our most commonplace neighbour there is something that in a twinkling upsets our calculations. We thought we knew our neighbour perfectly. But suddenly he is forced by opportunity, or a staggering blow falls, or a great crisis comes, and there flash upon the man such gleams of heroism, such dauntless resource, such noble fortitude, that our old estimates go by the board at once. There were deeps in him that we had never dreamed of.

III. This feature of surprise, again, has a large place in God's providential dealings, so large that we all know the maxim of a shrewd observer: it is the unexpected that happens. We read about the call of David. We read of Samuel in the house of Jesse. And when Eliab came—big, brave, and handsome, Eliab the first-born, every inch a king—Samuel was certain this was Saul's successor. But God was as certain Eliab was not—His king was out on the hills with the sheep that morning. A minister gets home from his pulpit of a night, and sits down and says, 'I have done well to-day,' and in the judgment of heaven it may have all been failure. And another Sabbath his heart is sick: no one is listening: he failed; and souls will bless God to all eternity that they were touched and kindled by that message. It is God's surprise in providential dealing.

IV. But I think it is in the life of Jesus Christ that the method of surprise comes to its Crown. Is there no surprise that the cradle was a manger? Is it not surprising that the King of Life should have been slain by cruel hands upon the Cross? We do not feel the marvel of it, because it is all familiar in our ears as household words. Did it come new to us, and freshly as the dawn, and find us unsophisticated, child-like, we should begin to marvel at it more.—G. H. MORRISON, Flood-Tide, p. 252.

REFERENCES.—XXI. 3.—S. Martin, Westminster Chapel Pulpit (1st Series), No. 2. J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (4th Series), p. 62. Preacher's Monthly, vol. v. p. 15. XXI.—I. Williams, The Psalms Interpreted of Christ, p. 380. XXII. 1.—J. Pulsford, Our Deathless Hope, p. 92. Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 106. XXII. 1-5.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Holy Week, p. 373. XXII. 2.—S. Horne, The Soul's Awakening, p. 131. XXII. 6-13.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Holy Week, p. 380. XXII. 7.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 105. XXII. 9, 10.—J. Keble, Sermons for Christmas and Epiphany, p. 139. XXII. 11.—H. P. Liddon, Old Testament Outlines, p. 104. XXII. 14.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 103. XXII. 14-18.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Holy Week, p. 387. XXII. 15.—Preacher's Monthly, vol. vii. p. 378. XXII. 16.—C. G. Clark-Hunt, The Refuge of the Sacred Wounds, p. 35. XXII. 19.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Holy Week, p. 394. XXII. 21.—H. Windross, The Life Victorious, p. 45. XXII. 22, 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 799. XXII. 26.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1312. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 134.

THE FUTURE OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH

'All the ends of the world shall remember, and turn unto the Lord.'—PSALM XXII. 27.

WHAT is to be the future of the Church of Christ on earth? Is the kingdom of God advancing and still to advance? Often it seems to the faithful that they are in presence of a standstill, or even of a retrogression. They are tried, strained, surprised at the slow victories of faith. It seems as if the Gospel were slighted, put aside, failing of its full effect. Sometimes they have days of glorious triumph, but often the heart sinks before the continued and present power of evil. It is no wonder that this should be so, for the demands and expectations are greater than before, and the difficulties are not less. The work grows heavier, and it does not always seem to grow clearer and more hopeful. So we perplex ourselves. We say, Is the power of Christians at home as great as it used to be? Is that power increasing or diminishing in the vast realms of heathendom? Are we bringing in converts in numbers proportionate to the growth in population? It is not easy for us to judge the truth of things around us, and if we can read the future it can only be by the light of revelation. 'What are your prospects?' was the question put to an intrepid missionary. He answered, and he could never have bettered the reply, 'They are as bright as the promises of God'.

I. There are three theories of the future of Christianity which have been held by Christians.

1. There are those who say that we are never to look for a glorious future to the Church on earth. There is to be no such thing as a universal spread of the Gospel. The Church is not to wax, but wane. The kingdom of heaven has nothing to do with the world but to condemn it.

2. There is another view of which one hears very little in these days, though it was the doctrine of the early Church, and though it may ground itself much more securely on the words of the New Testament—both in the Gospels and in the Epistles. It is that the power of good and the power of evil will alike increase. 'Let both grow together until the harvest,' is the word of our Lord. St. Augustine taught that, however the leaven of the Gospel may spread, the power of evil and the malignity of evil will advance. It is all contained in one dread word seldom spoken now—the word antichrist. In that dark time the daily sacrifice would be taken away, words which were interpreted to mean the forcible cessation of all religious worship. St. Augustine doubted whether baptism would be administered during that period. Further, taking the words of our Lord, that the abomination that maketh desolate should be set up in the holy place, it was foretold that some terrible form of blasphemy with rites of devil-worship would be substituted for the service of Christ in the churches. The power seemingly victorious would work miracles, overwhelming the imagination with signs that might deceive the very elect. The spirit of antichrist has never been quite dormant in the world. The Emperor Julian was taken as in a degree typical of the antichrist who was to come. In the French Revolution there were many of the works of antichrist, and we may freely admit that there are powers existing, and not so very far away, which might yet find the work of antichrist congenial. So then, in the view of the early Church, the kingdom of Christ would grow steadily; the kingdom of Satan would also grow steadily. The two hostile powers would come into conflict in a battle in which the Church would seem to tremble and waver. Then Christ Himself would appear and consume the antichrist by the breath of His mouth, and destroy him by the brightness of His coming.

3. There is, thirdly, the theory of hope, the theory that in manifold ways, some apparent and some hidden, the kingdom of God keeps coming, and will come. There is the faith that the armies of the aliens, in spite of all we see, are being beaten back, and that in the end evil will gradually die out of the living world and be merged in the good. Not that the solemn warnings of Scripture and the stern facts of life are ignored. The words of our Lord, so plain, so unmistakable, are not to be forgotten. 'The enemy that soweth them is the devil.' Our fight is not with flesh and blood, but with principalities and powers, with Satanic hosts on which no impression is made by what is called civilization, or social reform, or intellectual enlightenment. But the promises look to the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom, to the flowing of all nations to the mountain of the Lord's House, to the day when they shall not hurt or destroy in all God's holy mountain, when the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea.

II. The promise is notable for its use of the word 'Remember'. 'All the ends of the world shall remember, and turn unto the Lord.' I wish you to linger upon that. One great subject of philosophers in these days is the subliminal consciousness, the vast store of ideas and impressions in the mind which are sleeping but not dead, which may spring to life at a touch or a call, which may even energize for themselves when we are ignorant of their action. What is lying dormant in the heart of heathendom? The ends of the world shall remember. It is in memory that all conversion begins. 'How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare!' said the prodigal, as he remembered his father's house. Will the nations one day remember the house of their Father? They tell us that there lingers in the races, however sunken and degraded, the memory of a golden time when God and man were friends. Max Müller tells us that the theory of a primitive revelation is found both among the lowest and among the most highly civilized races. It is a constant saying among African tribes that formerly heaven was nearer to earth than it is now, that the highest God, the Creator Himself, formerly gave lessons of wisdom to human beings, but that afterwards He withdrew Himself from them, and dwells now far from them in heaven. The Hindus say the same. They look back, as in the hymn of the sage Vasishtha: 'Where are those friendships of us two? Let us seek the harmony which we enjoyed of old. I have gone, O self-sustaining Varuna, to thy vast and spacious house with a thousand gates. He who was thy friend, intimate, thine own and beloved, has committed offences against thee.'

What they remember is the existence of one God.

Monotheism is the natural religion, and remains in the quiet background, however obscure or overlaid. This is the authentic saying of a Kaffir when the Gospel was first preached: 'We had this word, the name of God, long before the missionaries came; we had God long ago, for a man when dying would utter his last words saying, "I am going home, I am going up on high". For there is a word in a song which says:—

Guide me, O Hawk!
That I go heavenward,
To seek the one-hearted man,
Away from the double-hearted men
Who deal with blessing and cursing.'

Then there is the endless sense of sin, of ignorance, of the need of sacrifice. I have no time to adduce examples, but who can be blind to the unbroken witness of the human race, to the immeasurable and mysterious power of sacrifice, and to the truth that the gulf that has opened between God and His erring creatures can only be closed by sacrifice? How wonderful are the stories of Codrus offering himself to die for his people, of Decius volunteering for his army, of the Chinese Emperor 'Thang devoting himself as a victim for his famine-stricken subjects! 'Let this be my substitute, this my expiation,' is the word spoken over the sin-offering. Nay, the secret of the Cross was almost divined before it was uttered.

III. 'All the ends of the world shall remember, and turn to the Lord.' Mark that where Jesus is not preached as Lord, there are no Christian missions. We believe in the Church outside the Churches, in the spreading of the Christian spirit in many places where the name of Christ is denied. But it has been well said that in what may be called extramural Christianity, the Christianity of men like Carlyle and Huxley, there is no zeal even for the application of Christian principles to the heathen races. There are noble exceptions, but the record of Carlyle is among the blackest in this respect. Nor has there been a sustained and energetic propaganda of Christianity among those who take away God manifest in the flesh, and leave us a human example; those who take away a living Saviour and leave us an entombed body; who take away the power of God in human life, and leave us a law, a hero, and a Cross. This Christianity which leaves us a human Christ is a Christianity which is local and temporal. The true Christianity is as universal as the love of God. Christianity is not the climbing of men to heaven by a tower of Babel, but the descent of the new Jerusalem out of heaven from God.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, The Lamp of Sacrifice, p. 279.

REFERENCES.—XXII. 27.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xviii. No. 1047. XXII. 28.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, A Year's Plain Sermons, p. 151. XXII. 29.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1500. XXII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 188.

THE SHEPHERD-PSALM

PSALM XXIII.

It is with this Psalm in the light of Christian experience that I now wish to concern myself. The first impression which the reading of the Psalm produces upon the sympathetic soul is that of a wondrous soothing. If you ask, whence came this Psalm, I know of but one adequate reply. It came from a soul God filled; it came from the lips of a man to whom the cardinal reality of life was Jehovah. It presents two thoughts of God; in the first four verses Jehovah is Shepherd of His Sheep; in the last two He is King entertaining a highly favoured subject. About these two ideas we will group what we have to say.

I. 'The Lord is my Shepherd,' not merely a shepherd having a hundred sheep, with an interest only in the flock as a whole, but the Shepherd who cares for me, though I be the solitary wanderer, and His flock scarcely reduced by my absence. From the Divine Shepherd this member of His flock receives three priceless gifts—rest, restoration, guidance.

(a) Rest: the thought appeals to us all. Rest from the continuous battle with temptation, peace from the confusions of tempestuous trials, some cessation from the tiring monotony of the daily journey. All these, affirms the Psalmist, he finds in God.

(b) The Shepherd is the Restorer. Men forsake God, but they do not escape Him. They desert Him, but He refuses to abandon them. They act mercilessly to themselves; He cares for them with a wiser and stronger love. 'Restoreth;' yes with infinite grace and with infinite wisdom.

(c) Guidance is the other great benediction which the Psalmist recognizes as he meditates on his experience. We still lack wisdom, and the counsel and guidance of the Father are still freely available. 'He guideth me in the paths of righteousness.' He is my Teacher and Leader in goodness. Before I pass from the study of the Shepherd let me emphasize one outstanding word. It is 'for His name's sake,' that He guideth me in the paths of righteousness. 'For the sake of His name' God acts thus—that is for the sake of His character. Because He cannot be other than He is—'The Lord gracious and merciful, slow to anger, plenteous in mercy'—He acts as He does.

II. Consider the other picture presented in the closing verses. The singer has changed the figure. No longer does he behold Jehovah the Shepherd, but Jehovah the King. He is not now one of His flock, but one of His subjects, a servant who has striven to be faithful in spite of many enemies, and one to whom His Royal Master is showing singular favour. Even in the presence of jealous foes, helpless before the King, the banquet is set, and the servant honoured with every token of royal approval. How true a picture of Christian experience—triumph even in the presence of the foe. Not transference to new conditions. It is the presence of the enemies, the harassments and temptations, the doubts and hindrances, that makes goodness possible.—J. RUSHBROOKE, The Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII. p. 21.

REFERENCES.—XXIII.—T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 180. G. H. Hepworth, American Pulpit of To-day, vol. i. p. 23. T. Arnold, The Interpretation of Scripture, p. 101.

J. Burnet, Penny Pulpit, No. 1628, p. 73. C. and E. Briggs, International Critical Commentary, p. 207. A. Maclaren, Sermons Preached in Manchester, p. 341. A. Maclaren, Life of David, p. 37. M. R. Vincent, Gates Into the Psalm Country, p. 53. I. Williams, The Psalms Interpreted of Christ, p. 421. Preacher's Monthly, vol. ii. p. 419. XXIII. 1.—J. G. McFadyen, The City with Foundations, p. 201.

PSALM XXIII.

WHEN Edward Irving was on his death-bed, he repeated the 23rd Psalm in Hebrew. His last words were, 'In life and in death I am the Lord's'. He had the conviction for a time that he would certainly remain till the coming of Christ; but he realized at length the approach of death.

Ver. 4. 'Thy rod and Thy staff, they comfort me,' were the dying words of the great Scottish philosopher, Sir William Hamilton.

When Dr. Alexander Duff, the Indian missionary, was travelling in the Himalayas, he saw a native shepherd followed by his flock. The man frequently stopped and looked back. If he saw a sheep drawing too near the edge of the precipice, he would go back and apply his crook to one of the hind legs, and gently pull it back till the animal joined the rest. Going up to the shepherd, he noticed that he had a long rod, as tall as himself, and twisted round the lower half a thick bar of iron. The region was infested with wolves and other dangerous animals, which in the night-time prowled about the place where the sheep lay. With his long rod the shepherd could strike the animal such a blow as would make it flee. This brought to the remembrance of the traveller the expression of David the shepherd, 'Thy rod and Thy staff, they comfort me,' and saved it, as he thought, from the charge of tautology, the staff referring to God's hold of the sheep, the rod to his defence against enemies. When he himself lay dying, and apparently unconscious (Feb. 1878), his daughter repeated to him the 23rd Psalm, and he responded at the end of each verse.—JOHN KEE.

IN GREEN PASTURES

'He maketh me to lie down in green pastures.'—PSALM XXIII. 2.

It is only when the Spirit of God has given us spiritual eyesight, has led us to feel and confess our natural blindness, our inability to see light in God's light, has led us, like Bartimaeus, to Christ, the Healer of nations, to cry, 'Lord, that I may receive my sight'; it is only, in short, when we have been brought to, and made to lie down at, the foot of His Cross, that we may reach the new standpoint and can say, 'Thy mercy, O Lord, is' (like a rainbow) 'in the heavens'.

I. Take the words in their literal or natural sense; God has included temporal as well as spiritual blessings in His covenant with His people. The inheritance of His children is not all reserved for the after-life. Godliness has the promise of the life that now is, as well as that of the life to come. But let us 'take heed and beware of covetousness, for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth'. If we have received 'a hundredfold more' than we gave up 'in the present time,' it is only that we may dedicate to God a hundred-fold more than we have been doing in the interests of His kingdom, in the service of the poor, and in the cause of the Gospel at home and abroad.

II. Take the words in their figurative and symbolical meaning. The Eastern shepherd leads his sheep into green pastures, not only that they may find food there in greater abundance, but that also of the sweetest and pleasantest quality. And that had been David's experience from his youth upwards. Jehovah had been his Shepherd and had supplied all his need. Jehovah had been his Guide and had led him in the paths of righteousness.

III. Let us take the words in their spiritual significance. It was David's lot to begin his reign in revival times. This 23rd Psalm is a song of the spring-time; it is also a revival hymn of the Church. Nature was rejoicing over her awakening from winter sleep, and David and Israel were rejoicing over Jehovah's return as the Shepherd-King of His people. It was a happy synchronism: the spring-time of the year and the revival of the Church. David's cup was overflowing. The angels of his youth had returned to follow him, and his dwelling-place at last would be in God's House for ever. God had made him to lie down in green pastures.—R. BARGNIE, The Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXV. p. 36.

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 2.—S. HORN, The Soul's Awakening, p. 31. J. VAUGHAN, Sermons (10th Series), p. 29. Bishop THOROLD, The Presence of Christ, p. 39. M. G. PEARSE, Some Aspects of the Blessed Life, p. 213.

THE SOUL'S MASTER, LEADER, AND RESTORER

'He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul.'—PSALM XXIII. 2, 3.

CHRIST, by promising to be the Good Shepherd of our souls, has absorbed all the teaching of this shepherd-Psalms of David into himself, and when we think of David's shepherd we have a vision of Jesus Christ.

I. There is first of all a thought of mastery in our text, 'He maketh me to lie down in green pastures'. The sheep does not lie down where he pleases, but where the shepherd sees fit. The first supreme characteristic of Christianity is this recognition of Christ as the soul's Master. There are those who boast their independence even of Jesus, but it is a lonely and hazardous undertaking.

II. We have also a thought of leadership. 'He leadeth me beside the still waters.' Christ is the only Leader of the human soul who always leads to peace. Life is a tragedy always to a thoughtful man who looks at it without hope in Christ. There is no situation this side of perdition so terrible that a man or a woman under the leadership of Jesus Christ may not find in the midst of all the storms and dangers of life the still waters of heavenly peace.

III. There is a thought of restoration. 'He restoreth my soul.' David knew by personal experience what that meant. I think there must be some deep meaning in the order of our text. First the soul is mastered by the Divine love. Then it is surrendered to the heavenly leadership. Then comes restoration. Mastery, leadership, restoration, that is God's order. But it is only in Jesus Christ that the sinner finds any promise or hope of restoration. The man who closes the Bible has no hope for the sinner.—L. A. BANKS, Sermons Which Have Won Souls, p. 397.

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 2, 3.—G. MATHESON, Moments on the Mount, p. 67. G. BAINTON, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xii. p. 5.

GUIDED BY GOD

'He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake.'—PSALM XXIII. 3.

IN this world of dimness and disorder we are not wise enough to guide ourselves. The old pagans confessed as much when they watched the stars, if perchance they might spell out some secret of their own destiny, and knelt by the oracles to catch some whisper of Divine purpose which might shape their course.

I. People cling to the faith that there is a Guide. Our popular English Creed has for its chief article the reality of Providence—that power above us who hedges the paths and numbers the years of man. And all Christians believe in One who is in this very nature the Provider, the Father, the Shepherd—the Leader of faithful souls.

II. There are various methods and degrees of guidance. A rider guides his horse with bridle and whip and spur. A shepherd will guide his dog with his voice and his gestures. Signor Marconi can flash wireless messages of guidance to the captain of a ship hundreds of miles away on the sea. Yet when we consider the channels of communication between two personalities, we realize that there must be mutual sympathy between them, before one can effectively guide the other.

III. Clearly the highest guidance implies far more than an exercise of authority. Indeed the true use of human authority is to educate us until we can do without it, because we are become a law unto ourselves. How does a wise father desire to guide his child? At first it may be, perhaps it must be, by his definite directions and commands. But he is not content until these are superseded by the free choice of the child's own nature, which spontaneously reflects and expresses the father's character and will. Even so, God desires to make us not slaves, but sons.

IV. God's inward leaning is not independent of the guidance which comes of the use of our natural faculties. He has granted us all some amount of reason and experience and common sense. We recognize certain practical duties. And we dare not expect any direct illumination of spirit unless we use to the full whatever outward illumination has been vouchsafed to us. We dare not shut an eye, and expect God to keep us from falling into the ditch. The gift of the Holy Ghost comes to supplement, not to supersede, our ordinary, everyday way of learning God's will. These two are not contrary but co-ordinate.

V. Doubtless this doctrine of supernatural guidance involves subtle perils of its own. Some Christians grow intoxicated with the idea of a private and personal illumination. They lose sight of the New Testament and common sense, and the judgment of their fellow-Christians. They sometimes even imagine that the Divine Guide leads them into the paths of unrighteousness. They pay no heed to anything except inward feelings, which may be just their secret preferences distinguished and canonized. They mistake the murmurs of their own restless self-will for the voice of the authentic will of God. Nevertheless Divine guidance remains the corollary and consequence of Divine communion.—T. H. DARLOW, The Upward Calling, p. 73.

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 3. — J. Vaughan, Sermons (10th Series), p. 37. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1149. Bishop Thorold, The Presence of Christ, p. 83.

ROD AND STAFF

'And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Take the rod.'—NUMBERS XX. 8.

'Then he (Elisha) said to Gehazi . . . Take my staff.'—2 KINGS IV. 29.

'Thy rod and Thy staff,'—PSALM XXIII. 4.

WE have always associated the word 'rod' with chastisement. Herein we have deprived ourselves grievously of great comfort. Will the preachers collate the passages in which the word 'rod' occurs? they will find material there for a never-ending course of lectures, full of sap and encouragement and profitable gladness.

I. 'And the Lord said unto Moses, Take the rod.' Even Moses was nothing without the sign; Moses, greatest, strongest of lion-hearts, was only a layman when he had no rod in his hands. God always gives a sign; there is always a Divine mark; whatever it may be, it is of God's choice, and only when we hold that mantle or rod or staff are we mighty with omnipotence. The rod was in a sense the Lord Himself; the mantle was a token of the Divine presence and inspiration. The rod is done away, but the thing signified abides for ever. When Moses is called upon to-day to do any great work, the Lord always says to him, 'Take My Word, take the Bible, take the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of truth. So even we, the modern and latest descendants of Moses, have our rod, our sign of commission, our seal and pledge of being no laymen in the sense of not being initiated into the mystery of the heart of God. When the Lord calls a man from sheepfold or orchard or harvest-field, He does not send him empty-handed to do His work. He says, Take the rod. Lord, what is the rod? The Book. What book? My Book; the Book of inspiration, the Book that holds in it the germs, the beginnings, of that great tree which is to overshadow the whole earth and form a cathedral of singing delight.

II. 'And Elisha said unto Gehazi, Take my staff.' Could not the man walk without the staff? He could not; there is a sense in which the staff makes the man; there is another sense in which the staff tries the man, pulls his muscle to know if it is aught but gristle. Set a man with the Bible in front of him, and you change his whole relation, you change and you test the man himself. Take away the Bible and leave him to the riot of his own fancy, and he might say many beautiful and graphic things; put before him the Bible which he is called upon to interpret, and he cannot interpret a word of it unless the Spirit be in him, the inner light, that throws its blaze of splendour upon the outward and visible sign. Gehazi took the staff, what became of his doing so? Nothing; he could wake no child from the dead. Why? Because he was a bad man. The good staff in the bad hand means failure the world over.

III. 'And the Lord said unto Moses, Take the rod;' 'And Elisha said unto Gehazi, Take my staff'; and the greatest, sweetest of all the minstrels said, 'Thy rod and Thy staff,' I will take them both, they comfort me, and thus prove that they are the Divine rod and the Divine staff. Still you see the same idea penetrates the whole thought of this discourse—that we must have, so to say, something. You will find the rod and the staff of God everywhere if you look for them with the right eyes and the pure intent. Everything in all nature is the rod or the staff, comforting human souls, and bringing God quite near. Sometimes we cannot see God Himself, but we can see the rod, and we know it to be His rod; we can see the staff, and we know it to be His staff. Rod and staff are written all over with a cipher which the inspired and sanctified heart alone can interpret and apply.

IV. Thy rod, and Thy staff, and Thy promise. We have exceeding great and precious promises at our command; God has placed them at our disposal. There is nothing that can occur in your experience personally, domestically, or otherwise, that is not provided for in the Bible. The promises—you do not know how sweet they are until you need them. They are delightful companions; they take up no room, they make no noise, they never fret or vex the soul by calling attention to their claims. They are never out of the way, yet never in it; they are like the atmosphere, they are like the summer weather; the light fills all space and leaves plenty of room for every little child to sit down in.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 175.

THE TABLE PREPARED IN PRESENCE OF FOES

'Thou preparest a table before me in presence of mine enemies.'—PSALM XXIII. 5.

THERE are three points of resemblance between the provision made for David and the provision made for us. These are its Divine preparation, its abundance and suitableness, and its being made in the presence of our enemies.

I. The enemies in whose presence our table is prepared—human as well as natural. The harvest will not give us its blessing without a stern struggle with hostile elements.

II. The table prepared before us. This table is wisely adapted to our necessities as human beings.

And what a table is thus spread for us every year! What sacred memories gather round the table thus so richly furnished!

III. The preparation of the table. The harvest is the subject of a Divine covenant engagement. Never once has the pledge given five thousand years ago been violated.

IV. The fruits of the harvest should be used in the work and for the glory of God.—HUGH MACMILLAN, Harvest and Thanksgiving Services, p. 1.

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 4-6.—S. A. Brooke, Sermons, p. 71. J. Vaughan, Sermons (6th Series), p. 133. XXIII. 5.—H. Bell, Sermons on Holy Communion, p. 77. F. Corbett, The Preacher's Year, p. 164. XXIII. 6.—H. Woodcock, Sermon Outlines, p. 98. S. A. Tipple, Sunday Mornings at Norwood, p. 233. S. Martin, Comfort in Trouble, p. 70. H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 1848. Bishop Thorold, The Presence of Christ, p. 217.

THE UNEMPLOYED

'The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein.'—PSALM XXIV. 1.

THE fundamental law of a well-ordered State is the right of all citizens to earn a living, and unless that right is secured no rights are really valid, because there is some fundamental wrong at the bottom of the social system.

I. What can be done by statute? How can we profess to make the Bible our Book of religion and be blind to one of its most obvious teachings? This Book contains in its opening parts a land system. It gives the idea of what the law of the country should be, and what its relation should be to the people in a Theocracy, where God is ruling. The teaching of this Book is most remarkable. The point of it is that each man has his property, his piece of land, and that the land is inalienable. Every person has the right to the use of enough land to raise subsistence for himself and his family. That is a fundamental right of human beings, sanctioned by the Bible and obviously the result of common sense. Any arrangement, however legal it may be, which deprives a man of this right is not just, it demands revision.

II. Let us take the right which we concede to landlords in England. We give them the right to determine whether the people shall live on their land or not. We give them the right even to refuse the dwellings which the people need, born on the spot. We give them the right, therefore, to dismiss the people from the land to the city or to anywhere. The property belongs to the owner—yes, but before that it belongs to the country. The population must live upon this land, and when property is allowed it should be determined that the property is only owned subject to certain implicit conditions, and the chief condition is that every human being in this island retains a latent right to use enough land to earn his living, to earn his bread on; and when that latent principle is forgotten we produce the monstrous injustice of what are called the Land Laws in England, an injustice so incredible that we can only explain it by looking back into history and understanding how it came to be.

III. Now, in this difficulty of modern industry, there is only one thoroughly satisfactory way of dealing with the problem. It must be laid down as a fundamental principle of all our administrations of Poor Law or industrial law, of Land Law, that when people cannot get employment the means should be given them to earn their living on the land. We need the land to give the man his opportunity of work, to enable him to extract his living out of the soil in the periods of trade depression.—H. F. HORTON.

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 1.—Clergyman's Magazine, vol. xiv. p. 84. XXIV. 1, 2.—R. Flint, Sermons and Addresses, p. 56. XXIV. 3.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, The Master's Message, p. 104. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (6th Series), p. 233. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 396. XXIV. 3, 4.—J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (3rd Series), p. 100. H. Thompson, Concinnalia: Outlines for Parochial Use (2nd Series), p. 242. XXIV. 3-6.—A. Maclaren, Christian Commonwealth, 11 December, 1884. XXIV. 4.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 187. XXIV. 6.—Expositor (3rd Series), vol. v. p. 310. XXIV. 7.—A. Watson, Sermons for Sundays, etc. (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 255. XXIV. 7, 8.—R. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. i. p. 265. E. M. Goulburn, Sermons Preached in the Parish Church of Holywell, p. 353. XXIV. 7-10.—A. Maclaren, Christian Commonwealth, 18 December, 1884. J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (4th Series), p. 50. XXIV. 8.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 340. XXIV. 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiii. No. 750. XXIV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 212.

PSALM XXIV.

THE father of the celebrated Principal Carstares, the restorer of the Scottish Church at the Revolution, was a man of warm devotional character, and suffered severely in the time of the twenty-eight years' persecution. Woodrow (Analecta) tells of him: 'He was doing duty at the Sacrament for a brother minister at Calder. Upon the Sabbath he was wonderfully assisted in his first prayer, and had a strange gale through all the sermon, and there was a remarkable emotion among the hearers. He gave out for singing part of the 24th Psalm:

He from th' Eternal shall receive
The blessing him upon,
And righteousness, ev'n from the God
Of His salvation.

This is the generation
That after him enquire,
O Jacob, who do seek thy face,
With their whole heart's desire.'

While singing these and the following verses, the narrator says 'he came to the communion tables, and all in the assembly were marvellously affected, glory seeming to fill that house. He served the first table in a kind of rapture, and he called some ministers there to the next, but he was in such a frame that none of them ventured to come and take the work off his hands. He continued at the work with the greatest enlargement and melting, upon himself and all present, that could be, and served fourteen or sixteen tables. A Christian that had been at the table and obliged to come out of the church, pressing to be in again, stood without the door, and said he was rapt in the thought of the glory that was in that house for near half-an-hour, and got leave scarce to think upon any other thing.'—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 4, 5.—H. Woodcock, Sermon Outlines, p. 12. XXV. 5.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 191. XXV. 6-11.—F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 53. XXV. 6, 7.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 243.

'Remember not the sins of my youth.'—PSALM XXV. 7, etc.

PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA quotes this text in a letter to his nephew in which he advises him with regard to daily prayer. 'When I stir thee up to prayer,' he wrote, 'I stir thee not to the prayer that standeth in many words, but to that prayer which in the secret chamber of the mind, in the privy-closet of the soul, with very affect speaketh unto God, and in the most lightsome darkness of contemplation, not only presenteth the mind to the Father, but also uniteth it with Him by unspeakable ways, which only they know that have assayed. Nor I care not how long nor how short thy prayer be, but how effectual, how ardent. . . . Let no day pass, then, but thou once at the least-wise present thyself to God by prayer, and falling down before Him flat to the ground, with an humble affect of devout mind, not from the extremity of thy lips but out of the inwardness of Thine heart, cry these words of the prophet, "The offences of my youth and mine ignorances, remember not, good Lord, but after Thy goodness remember me".'

REFERENCES.—XXV. 7.—T. G. Selby, Comradeship and Character, p. 269. M. R. Vincent, Gates Into the Psalm Country, p. 75. XXV. 8, 9.—A. Maclaren, After the Resurrection, p. 203. XXV. 9.—E. Bernier, Sermons, vol. I. p. 237. Homiletic Magazine, vol. ix. p. 257.

MERCY AND TRUTH

'All the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth.'—PSALM XXV. 10.

So it lies for all time, the elementary law of theology. What does it mean?

I. It means of course, first of all that God's nature is mercy, and to this nature He is consistent, true to Himself; but it means also, and more especially, that in His merciful dealings with us He has respect to the truth of our nature. What this truth is we learn on the first page of Genesis: God said, 'Let us make man in our image', 'There is at once something more than mercy: there is an ideal set up, a standard, a type for the race. And if you will ponder the history of man since, as the great Hebrews have written it for us in the Bible, you will see that the whole history of its course is but, on the one hand the persistency with which the God of Truth has kept before men's eyes His original creative purpose, has refused to abate one jot of His lofty ideal for mankind.

(a) Look at the ideal Christ proposed to mankind. Is it not the old creative promise that man should be conformed to God's image? Christ is Himself the express image of God, and nothing short of that image will satisfy Him in us.

(b) Contemplate the miracles of mercy. Merciful indeed He is, but there is a note about Him that seems more than mere compassion. What is this faith He requires? How often were the miracles of healing at the same time miracles of conversion. Here, too, then in the miracles we see that the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ is plainly Divine grace, is mercy and truth, is that love of God which is bent upon creating His own image in us.

(c) But again you will recollect that it was this very forgiveness of sins which to the righteous of the time seemed to argue insensibility, as though our Lord were being falsely merciful—ministering mercy at the expense of morality. And the charge is sometimes repeated still. How can we test Christ's mercy to men's souls to see if it be true mercy which considers the next? We must try it by its effect on character. The story of Zaccheus will suffice.

(d) Similarly we might make our appeal to Christ's teaching, to His simple parable, or His paradoxical epigrams, and show how their glorious web is woven of the same two strands. For the occasion let that one word suffice in which more than any other He summed up for us His revelation of the Creator—I mean the word Father. No word will so well bring home to us the essential nature of the Divine mercy and truth.

II. It is of supreme importance to the reality of our Christian life that we should refuse to separate between these Divine attributes of Mercy and Truth, that we should not say simply 'God loves us,' without drawing out the implicit truth 'and wishes us to be like Himself'. The true test of our theology is worship.

III. Not only have we to acknowledge God's mercy and truth, we have to display it in relation to our fellows.

(a) Consider, for example, those great typical Christian actions of forgiveness and judgment. If we forgive anything, or if we condemn anything, it can only be 'in the person of Christ,' by sharing both His hatred of sin and His love for the sinner.

(b) Consider the question of veracity and compliment which, slight as it may appear, fills our social lines. If we are apt to give our criticisms without mercy let us take to heart St. Paul's maxim 'Speaking the truth in love'. If on the other hand we find it only too easy to be gracious, let us remember that other great word of his: 'Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt'.

(c) If our mercy to the poor is the true mercy it must never be separated from a consideration of their high welfare.

(d) We must bring under the same Divine law our conduct to ourselves.—H. C. BEECHING, Inns of Court Sermons, p. 22.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 11.—Preacher's Monthly, vol. iii. p. 145. XXV. 13.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Christian Year, p. 343. Ibid. Sermons for Ascension Day to Trinity Sunday, p. 343.

THE SECRET OF THE LORD

'The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him, and He will shew them His covenant.'—PSALM XXV. 14.

I. THE secret of the Lord, that is, His fellowship or friendship, His secret operations on the soul, which waken, comfort and support the believer, are hidden from all others, and are understood only by those who depend upon the influence of the Holy Spirit. Our Lord Himself said, when His disciples asked Him for an explanation of a parable, 'Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the Kingdom of God, but to them that are without all these things are done in parables, that seeing they may see and not perceive, and hearing they may hear and not understand'.

II. These ways of God are not hidden from any of His true people.

(a) When a soul is agitated with deep convictions, these convictions being the fruit of the spirit, God will eventually show to such an one His covenant whereby pardon and grace, through Christ, are secured to the self-convicted sinner.

(b) Or see that same man in a more advanced state of religious impression, see him softened with godly sorrow and saving repentance. The secret of the Lord is with him.

(c) Or if we view the soul of such an one as he advances in grace, and is enabled to estimate with something of a proper value the efficacy of Christ's redeeming sacrifice, he can say to any former companions in sin and folly, as Jesus said to His disciples, 'I have meat to eat that ye know not of'.

III. The secret of the Lord is not only with His people individually but among them that fear Him. This is the ground of that communion of saints, that mutual fellowship of sorrows and joys which binds all true believers together in one, that is in Christ Jesus. And the secret of the Lord is among them collectively, they experience the same feelings, the same trials, the same victories. This communion has never been interrupted, never can be destroyed, but is maintained amidst all the jarring elements of the world, a world which comprehends it not, and whose enmity can neither destroy nor weaken it.—E. J. BREWSTER, The Shield of Faith, p. 56.

'My sins and faults of youth
Do Thou, O Lord, forget:
After Thy mercy think on me,
And for Thy goodness great.'—PSALM XXV.

TOUCHING words in themselves, and surely never more so than when they began the dying-song of Margaret Wilson, while the sea was rising round her at the mouth of the water of Blednoch, by Wigtown. She was twenty years of age, blameless and gentle, but had been in the habit of attending field and house conventicles, and refused to take the test. For these things she was condemned to be drowned along with an elderly woman, named Margaret Lachlan, accused of the same offences. They were tied to stakes within the tide-mark, where the waters of the Solway come up swift and strong into the channel of the Blednoch. The older woman was placed farther from the bank that the sight of her struggles might terrify the younger, and cause her to give way. But she was faithful to the death.—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 14.—G. W. Brameld, Practical Sermons (2nd Series), p. 122. C. J. Vaughan, Memorials of Harrow Sundays, p. 263. J. J. West, Penny Pulpit, No. 1678, p. 463. W. A. Essery, Christian World Pulpit, vol. i. p. 182. XXV. 18.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiii. No. 741. Ibid. Evening by Evening, p. 102. XXV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 219. XXVI. 2.—H. Bushnell, Sermons on Living Subjects, p. 224. XXVI. 3.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 956. XXVI. 6.—C. G. Finney, Penny Pulpit, No. 1668, p. 383. XXVI. 6, 7.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 253. XXVI. 8.—A. C. Tait, Christian World Pulpit, vol. iv. p. 33. J. Baldwin Brown, The Sunday Afternoon, pp. 133, 141, 150. XXVI. 9.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons, p. 299. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ix. No. 524. W. T. Hamilton, American Pulpit, p. 193. XXVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 229. XXVII. 1.—E. B. Pusey, Sermons Preached Before the University of Oxford, p. 52. H. P. Liddon, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxviii. p. 24. J. Baldwin Brown, The Higher Life, p. 114. Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 168.

PSALM XXVII.

INDIA was still heaving with the ground-swell of the terrible Mutiny of 1857, when the wife of Sir John Lawrence was called home to her children in England, and had to leave her husband, who could not quit his post, surrounded by the smouldering embers which might, at any moment, rekindle into flame, and worn to exhaustion with the anxiety and labour which did so much for the preservation of the Indian Empire.

She thus writes: 'When the last morning of separation, Jan. 6, 1858, arrived, we had our usual Bible reading, and I can never think of the 27th Psalm, which was the portion we then read together, without recalling that sad time'.—JOHN KER.

MORAL EFFECTS OF COMMUNION WITH GOD

'One thing have I desired of the Lord, which I will require; even that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life to behold the fair beauty of the Lord, and to visit His Temple.'—PSALM XXVII. 4.

IF, as it would seem, we must choose between the two, surely the world's friendship may be better parted with than our fellowship with our Lord and Saviour. What indeed have we to do with courting men, whose faces are turned towards God? We know how men feel and act when they come to die; they discharge their worldly affairs from their minds, and try to realize the unseen state. Then this world is nothing to them. It may praise, it may blame; but they feel it not. They are leaving their goods, their deeds, their sayings, their writings, their names, behind them; and they care not for it, for they wait for Christ. To one thing alone they are alive, His coming; they watch against it, if so be they may then be found without shame. Such is the conduct of dying men; and what all but the very hardened do at the last, if their senses fail not and their powers hold, that does the true Christian all life long. He is ever dying while he lives; he is on his bier, and the prayers for the sick are saying over him. He has no work but that of making his peace with God, and preparing for the judgment. He has no aim but that of being found worthy to escape the things that shall come to pass and to stand before the Son of Man. And therefore day by day he unlearns the love of this world, and the desire of its praise; he can bear to belong to the nameless family of God and to seem to the world strange in it and out of place, for so he is.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCE.—XXVII. 14.—J. H. Jowett, From Strength to Strength, p. 67.

WAR FOR THE SAKE OF PEACE

'The Lord shall give strength unto His people: the Lord shall give His people the blessing of peace.'—PSALM XXIX. 11.

I. THERE are many kinds of suffering and trial and effort that men may have to undergo, and war is only one of them. Now, when instead of fancying war as we guess it might be, we have seen war as it is brought almost under our eyes, we learn a truer notion of what it is. We have seen that victory is not to be won only by daring, by readiness to do some great thing, and strength of purpose in the action of a moment or an hour; it is patience, endurance, long-sightedness, that secures the final victory.

II. Thus when we say that the Christian's life is a life of warfare, we do not contradict what may also be said, that it is a life of patience, a life of trouble. If we ask what the difference is, and why the Christian life is likened so much oftener in the Bible to the dangers and trials of war than to the dangers and trials of a pestilence or a storm (though these figures are used there once or twice), the best answer seems to be this: In a war we have a personal Enemy to deal with; we suffer not from causes that could not be helped, but from his acts and his deliberate intent to hurt us.

III. Thus we understand one part of our warfare: we are soldiers in the war of God against the devil. That the devil is trying to lead us into sin, trying in the same way that we are trying to resist him, viz. by the acts of his will, by deliberate choice seeking to accomplish the desires of his heart—that is intelligible enough. But what do we mean by saying that we are to fight against the world and the flesh? The devil tries to lead us to rebel against God: we try to keep up the faith in God in spite of him. But how is it true that the world, the people we see around us, many of them more or less good Christians, try to lead us to sin, and that we have to resist their influence as we would the devil's? And how is it even possible to say that we ourselves are trying to lead ourselves into sin, and that we must resist ourselves as we would resist the devil? The last difficulty is in seeming the greatest; but it is the easiest to answer, because we can know our own hearts better than we know other people's. There is a desire in the soul—in the regenerate soul—to obey God, or at least to love God; there is also a real desire in the soul to rebel against God; and the soul that will serve God truly must be on its guard against itself, and overcome itself. It is the man himself who is on the devil's side; what is on Christ's side is not the man, but Christ in him. So likewise with the world without. We have to beware of the worldly influences of the good quite as much as of the solicitations of the wicked to what we know is sin. Thus we are at war with the world, the flesh and the devil; and it is good for us so to be. For what is war for? For Peace.—W. H. SIMCOX, The Cessation of Prophecy, p. 37.

REFERENCES.—XXIX. 10.—R. Scott, Contemporary Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 303. C. F. Aked, The Courage of the Coward, p. 83. XXIX. 11.—Parker, Pulpit Analyst, vol. ii. p. 121. W. M. Punshon, Sermons, p. 219. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 96. H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 1755. XXIX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 251. XXX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 257. XXX. 5.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, p. 547. Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 134. R. Winterbotham, Sermons, p. 214. J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (1st Series), p. 60. XXX. 5, 6.—C. W. Furse, Lenten Sermons, p. 44. XXX. 6.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 70. XXX. 6-8.—T. Arnold, Sermons, vol. v. p. 250. Archbishop Thomson, Lincoln's Inn Sermons, p. 310. T. Arnold, Sermons, vol. iii. p. 250. XXX. 9-12.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (1st Series), vol. i. p. 289.

PSALM XXX.

BISHOP HANNINGTON's last entry in his Journal contains the words: 'I can hear no news, but was held up by the 30th Psalm, which came with great power. A hyena howled near me last night. Smelling a sick man, but I hope it is not to have me yet.'

REFERENCES.—XXXI. 5.—C. F. Aked, The Courage of the Coward, p. 83. Parker, City Temple, vol. ii. p. 14. Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 242. XXXI. 7.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons, vol. vi. p. 221.

THE LARGE ROOM

'Thou hast set my feet in a large room.'—PSALM XXXI. 8.

To many people these seem strange words to come from the lips of age and experience. It is youth and inexperience that find the world a large room.

The writer of those words had left his childhood far behind him. He had entered into manhood's inheritance of duty and responsibility. He had been many a time over-caught in the coil of adverse circumstance; he had sorrowed and suffered and sinned; he had faced temptation and found bitter proof of his own weakness; he had faced the many-sided and intricate problem of existence; he knew something of the inevitable and the unalterable,—and yet, calmly mindful of all this, his verdict upon existence was this: 'Thou hast set my feet in a large room'.

I. After having seen the sordidness and meanness and littleness of things, David still held that life is a grand, free, glorious gift—that it is liberty and opportunity and hope. What was the secret of his wide and worthy view of life? How had he escaped these narrower and meaner thoughts that crowd into men's minds and belittle their lives? He had laid hold upon God. He looked at life through the Divine purpose. He found the high and noble meaning of the dusty parable that men call the day's work. When he talks of life as a large room, it is really his way of saying, 'Thy service is perfect freedom'. If life is lived to God, then it is wider than any man can measure.

II. 'Thou hast set my feet in a large room.' Sin, more than anything else, seems to take the meaning out of these words. There is the inherited weakness and the encircling contagion. Within us, the evil tendency; without us, the unhallowed opportunity. Sometimes a man accepts the pressing solicitation of evil, or yields to the hot-handed grip of the world's desire; and then with a demeaned dignity and lowered self-respect, he measures life and finds he has but a few square feet in which to stand and call himself a fool.

III. 'Thou hast set my feet in a large room.' Those are the words of a man who has felt the force of his own immortality. He has found that on one side of this room of life there is no wall to limit and fold us. Life goes out into God's eternity. That is where God has fashioned it to go.—P. AINSWORTH, The Pilgrim Church, p. 201.

REFERENCES.—XXXI. 15.—Bishop M. Simpson, Sermons, p. 39. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Bible Object Lessons, p. 71. XXXI. 19.—M. R. Vincent, Gates Into the Psalm Country, p. 91. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiii. No. 773.

THE CONSUMMATION OF LOVE AND PEACE

'Thou shalt hide them in the secret of Thy presence.'—PSALM XXXI. 20.

THE 'they' of the golden oracle are all those who fear Him, all those who trust in Him.

I. The Christian life is on the one hand meant to know no rest nor holiday from obedience to the law of duty, from hourly serving our generation in the will of God; yet, on the other hand, at the very heart of this life there is always to be this mysterious stillness, this secret place of peace. There is a peace of God, able indeed to keep, to safeguard, the weakest and the most treacherous heart. There is a Presence that makes at life's centre a stillness, pregnant with positive and active blessing. The Christian is needed to be ever seeking, ever aspiring upward, 'not as though he had already attained'. He is to avoid as his most deadly poison that subtle spiritual Pharisaism which plumes itself upon a supposed advanced experience, and presumes to compare itself with others, and hesitates, if but for a moment, to prostrate itself in confession and penitence before the awful, the blessed, holiness of God. But none the less the Christian is called to a great rest as well as to a great aspiration.

II. Conditions there are indeed to that great peace; so we have remembered. But they are conditions, each of them in its nature a heavenly blessing. There is the condition of godly fear. There is the condition of humble trust. There is the condition of trusting thus 'before the sons of men'; let not that be forgotten. There is the condition of coming direct to Jesus Christ, to take the yoke of His word and will. There is the condition of looking unto Him. There is the condition of watching and of prayer. But are these things a complicated and grievous burthen, a bundle of arbitrary exactions? They are only so many forms of that one great condition to our finding what is laid up in our Lord: the condition of coming into directest contact with Himself, and there abiding.—H. C. G. MOULE, Cambridge Sermons, p. 132.

Illustration.—It is a wonderful thing to be permitted to watch a life which you have reason to know is hid in the Secret of the Presence of the Lord. Some few years ago I met a good man, humble and gentle, a missionary to Eastern Africa. He abode in the Presence; I could not but see it. I heard him tell, with the eloquence of entire simplicity, how in the tropical wilderness, in the deep night, he had waited for and shot the raging lion which had long been the unresisted terror of a village clan. It could not be the will of God, he reasoned, that this beast should lord it over men; and so, as it were in the way of Christian business, he went forth and put it to death. And then I watched that man, a guest in my own house, under the very different test of the inconvenience of disappointed plans; and the Secret of the Presence was as surely with him then as when he had lain quietly down to sleep in his tent on the lonely field, to be roused only by the sound of the lion's paw, as it rent the earth at the open door.—H. C. G. MOULE.

PSALM XXXI.

ON 6 July, 1415, the anniversary of his birth, John Huss was burned to death in a field near the ancient city of Constance. He had come there from Bohemia, under a warrant of safety from the hand of the Emperor Sigismund, for the violation of which the Pope granted absolution, pressing it on the reluctant monarch. . . . A brass tablet let into the floor of the cathedral marks the spot where Huss stood, while seven bishops removed his priestly dress piece by piece, and placed on his head a paper crown painted with demons. They addressed him, 'We deliver thy soul to Satan'. 'But I,' he said, 'commend it into Thy hands, Lord Jesus Christ, Who hast redeemed me.' When taken to the place of execution he fell on his knees, and repeated in prayer some of the Psalms, especially the 51st and 53rd. He was heard to repeat frequently the words, 'Into Thy hands I commit my spirit: Thou hast redeemed me, Lord God of truth'. When he arose, he said, 'Lord Jesus Christ, stand by me, that, by Thy and Thy Father's help, I may endure this painful and shameful death which I suffer for Thy word'. When the fire was kindled he cried three times, 'Jesus, Thou Son of God, have mercy on me'. At the third time his voice was stifled by the smoke, but they saw his lips still moving.—JOHN KEE.

REFERENCES.—XXXI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 263. XXXI. 20.—J. T. Stannard, The Divine Humanity, p. 141. P. Brooks, Sermons, p. 78. XXXI. 22.—J. M. Neale, Passages of the Psalms, p. 67. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1146. XXXI. 23.—J. Bowstead, Practical Sermons, vol. ii. p. 1. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 325. J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (3rd Series) p. 38. XXXII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 276. XXXII. 1.—J. Keble, Sermons from Lent to Passiontide, p. 280. XXXII. 1, 2.—R. S. Candlish, The Gospel of Forgiveness, p. 132. XXXII. 1-7.—C. Kingsley, Town and Country Sermons, No. 29.

'For, while I held my tongue my bones consumed away through my daily complaining. For Thy hand is heavy upon me day and night; and my moisture is like the drought in summer.'—PSALM XXXII. 3, 4.

WE all of us know that repentance of our sins is necessary for us, if we hope to be saved in the next world. True repentance is the path, the only path, of forgiveness, of restoration to God's favour, of becoming good and holy. But—

I. What is Repentance? It is the breaking off with our sins. It is not merely being sorry for them; not merely looking them in the face, and admitting the truth, when conscience convinces us that we have done wrong. All this is very necessary; confession of sin is part of repentance, it is the beginning, and without it there can be no true repentance; but it is not the whole; sorrow and self-reproach, the broken and humbled heart, is a part of repentance, but it may stop short of repentance itself. Only when we break off from our sin is repentance fulfilled in earnest. There are several points which we might consider in connexion with repentance; there is the benefit of repentance; its necessity. Here we will consider only—

II. Its comfort. Besides all the other good things there are in repentance, there is great and solid comfort. There is a comfort in the feeling sorry for our sins, however deep and sharp the pain may be which goes with it; but this sort of comfort by itself is not abiding, and will not profit us much. There is a better and truer comfort, in being able honestly to confess our sins. As long as the Psalmist tried to hide from himself that he was doing wrong he was miserable; as long as he tried to shelter himself under vain excuses, as long as he was too proud to own his sin, there was a load on his heart. 'For while I held my tongue my bones consumed away through my daily complaining. For Thy hand is heavy upon me day and night: and my moisture is like the drought in summer.' Then he resolved to be bold and honest to own his sin: 'I will acknowledge my sin unto Thee, and mine unrighteousness have I not hid. I said, I will confess my sins unto the Lord.' And then came comfort, the comfortable sense of being at peace with the Father, Who forgives the sins of His children when they own their sin, 'And so Thou forgavest the wickedness of my sin'; the comfort of feeling that there was no longer a war between him and the mercy and righteousness of God; that, having confessed all, he had nothing more to make him ashamed, and he could venture to think of God's nearness and power. 'For this shall every one that is godly make his prayer unto Thee in a time when Thou mayest be found; but in the great water-floods they shall not come nigh Him.' Then did comfort come to the sinner, who without flinching and making excuses, dared to look his sins in the face, gave up hiding them, and laid them before the eyes of God. But this comfort is not to be depended upon, and will not last unless something more follow. People can confess their wrongdoings, and yet make no real attempt to put an end to them. If we rest on the comfort of confession alone, it may become a very dangerous delusion. Seeing, feeling, owning, confessing, all this will not of itself mend our condition or relieve our conscience. There is only one way—breaking off for good what is wrong. Repentance is, after we have seen and felt and confessed and bewailed our misdeeds, really giving them up. This will not only bring us safety, forgiveness, the favour of God, the hope of everlasting rest; it will bring us, besides this, comfort. We can bear much when we are at peace within. Repentance, with its trials, its sacrifices, its self-denials, has also comfort, which outweighs them all—the comfort of being at peace not only with God, but with our own hearts. That which gives a sting to our difficulties, and makes trouble so dreadful and hard to bear, is the secret knowledge that we are unfaithful to our duty and to Christ, that we have not yet made our honest choice between right and wrong, that we are attempting a double service. Let us break the yoke. Let us not only be sorry for our sin, but seek God's grace to have done with it for ever. Let us turn our backs on it, not looking behind, but with undivided heart giving it up for ever. The wrench, however painful, will soon be forgotten. The sacrifice, whatever it may be, will soon be made up for an hundred-fold. But the consolation will come and go on increasing for ever to the end. The beginning of repentance may be with clouds and storms, with perplexity and distress of heart; but let it be in earnest, the honest breaking off from what is evil, and the clouds will soon give way to calm and sunshine, and it will be to us the path leading us, through peace and contentment here, to the rest of glory in God's kingdom in heaven.

REFERENCE.—XXXII. 6.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 174.

SINS OF SCRIPTURE SAINTS

'I acknowledge my sin unto Thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and Thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin.'—PSALM XXXII. 5.

DAVID was far from being a character of spotless purity. So greatly indeed was his life disgraced by bloodshed and by sin, that the same God who chose him to reign over Israel, refused to receive from his hands the dedication of his intended Temple.

I. It is not our duty to attempt to excuse or palliate crimes like those of David, or of any other person mentioned in Holy Writ. We should confess that there is scarcely a Scripture character without a stain—nor need we be at any pains to excuse this fact. We should, indeed, give the same justice to them that we do to others, but there is nothing in the Bible requiring us to regard sin differently or as less aggravated—whether seen in a Prophet, Minister, Christian, or Infidel.

II. Suppose that the believers mentioned in Scripture had all been represented as faultless, would the Bible have been any more credible? Here in the world we see, as a rule, good men overcoming their sins. At times, however, they may have been overcome by them—and if we turn to the Bible we find just such characters drawn there. Every one must feel that the Scriptures are, therefore, much more credible when they describe believers as but imperfectly sanctified, than they would have been had they represented them as perfect.

III. Admitting the guilt of those Scripture Saints, we should observe the severity of God's justice against them. In the ordinary course of things their crimes would have been in a great measure concealed had not God displayed them. Does not this show God's confidence in truth? Nor let it be supposed that those sins were passed over without punishment. So far was it otherwise that, in David's case, even when the pardon of his soul was pronounced, yet heavy were the inflictions laid upon him. Let none then make the example of illustrious men of old, as mentioned in Scripture, encouragements or excuses to sin, when we see, as in David's case, how severely these sins were punished.—E. J. BREWSTER, Scripture Characters, p. 193.

REFERENCES.—XXXII. 8.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Sunday Afternoon, p. 278. C. Kingsley, The Good News of God, p. 137.—XXXII. 9, 10.—F. J. Hort, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 194.—XXXII. 10.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 178.—A. Watson, Sermons for Sundays, etc. (1st Series), p. 53.

PSALM XXXII.

'BLESSED is the man whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered.' This was the favourite Psalm of Augustine. With reference to it he says, Intellegentia prima est ut te nôris peccatorem. 'The beginning of understanding is to know thyself a sinner.'

When Luther was asked which were the best Psalms, he replied, Psalmi Paulini, 'The Pauline Psalms'; and being asked to name them, he gave the 32nd, 51st, 130th, and 143rd. These all belong, it will be observed, to the penitential Psalms.

Verse 2 contains the spiritual ideal which quaint old Izaak Walton set up for the model of his life. In closing his biography of Bishop Sanderson, he says: 'Tis now too late to wish that my life may be like his, for I am in the eighty-fifth year of my age; but I humbly beseech Almighty God that my death may be, and I earnestly beg of every reader to say, Amen. 'Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile.'

This Psalm was also a favourite with Alexander Peden. One little incident of his life in connexion with this Psalm helps us to come close to him. 'On one occasion,' says the narrative, 'when the service was ended, he and others that were with him lay down in the sheep-house and got some sleep. He rose early, and went up by the burnside and stayed long. When he came in to them, he did sing the 32nd Psalm from the 7th verse to the end.

Thou art my hiding-place, thou shalt
From trouble keep me free :
Thou with songs of deliverance
About shalt compass me.

Ye righteous, in the Lord be glad,
In him do ye rejoice :
All ye that upright are in heart,
For joy lift up your voice.'

When he had ended, he repeated the 7th verse again, and said, 'These and what follow are sweet lines which I got at the burnside this morning, and I will get more to-morrow, and so we shall have daily provision.'—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—XXXIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 284. XXXIII. 1.—Preacher's Monthly, vol. iii. p. 355. XXXIII. 2, 3.—J. M. Neale, Occasional Sermons, p. 108. XXXIII. 5.—G. Bainton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xviii. p. 378. XXXIII. 6.—J. Keble, Sermons from Ascension Day to Trinity, p. 384.

GOD'S BOUNTY

'He gathereth the waters of the sea together as an heap: He layeth up the deeps in storehouses.'—PSALM XXXIII. 7 (R.V.).

I. WHEN we speak of the harvest, we are accustomed to think only of the corn harvest; but the word has a far wider significance. Our granaries contain not a tithe of His gifts. Nor is the Creator's bounty limited to the products of each passing year. The cycle of God's harvests is measured by ages rather than by seasons.

II. The lesson of trust. In days of a youthful and somewhat arrogant science, in our fancied knowledge of second causes, it is possible for our trust in God to be shaken. There is truth in the old Bible promise, that 'while the earth remains' our harvests shall not fail. We may yet believe that Christ is the King of all the earth, and not substitute for our creed the bare negations of a cold and cheerless agnosticism.

III. The lesson of contentment. The great struggle between labour and capital, industrial and agricultural depression, God punishing us for our distrust and ingratitude.

IV. Liberality. In all our varied gains, whether from an influx of better trade, or a rise in the share market, we should remember that the first-fruits belong to God, and the gleanings to the poor.—VIVIAN R. LENNARD, Harvest-tide, p. 3.

REFERENCE.—XXXIII. 13.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 272.

THE COMFORT OF PHYSICAL INFERIORITY

'There is no King saved by the multitude of an host; a mighty man is not delivered by much strength.'—PSALM XXXIII. 16.

I. THE doctrine of modern life is the survival of the fittest. Is the Psalmist in opposition to this view?

No. He is quite willing to admit that the fittest survive; what he says is that their fitness does not lie in the physical. He says that even where the physical strength exists it is not the deepest ground of success. And is he not right? Take the simile in his own mind—the sway of a kingdom. 'The greatest kingdoms of this world have been swayed by spiritual forces. Look at the Papacy of early days. It was the rule of one frail man—without arms, without territories, without embattled walls, without military followers, without a right to draw the sword. What was the secret of the Pope's power? Why did kings hold his stirrup and emperors court his favour and armies melt at his command and rude barbarians bow to his desire? It was because men believed in his holiness—because they held him to possess the Spirit of God. Or, take our own Indian Empire, that to me is the miracle of history—a small army holding in leash the millions of a conquered land. What is the power by which a little island has bound a chain round an enormous continent? Is it holiness? Alas, no, but it is none the less a power of the spirit. These millions could overwhelm us if they were mentally strong. Theirs is the homage of matter to mind. Is it not written of the forces of animal nature, 'A little child shall lead them'.

II. In the presence of the great forest of India, Britain is physically but a child; yet the myriad denizens of the forest bend beneath her sway. They could crush her at a blow; to what do they bend? To that which as yet is to them a mystery—the power of mind. The gigantic river has been arrested by one pebble; the sweep of the blast has been diverted by the single leaf of a tree. There is no power on earth so secularly strong as that which sleeps within a human soul. Remember this, thou mother with the delicate babe. Remember this, when thou bendest with sorrow over that cradle which seems to enshrine a physical failure. Eve christened her son by the name of Abel—a vapour. The child seemed so fragile as to be but a breath; and the mother viewed his future with dismay. Was she right? No; that little pigmy in the primitive cradle was the most surviving man of all the race—he yet speaketh'. Remember that, when thou lookest upon the physical feebleness of thy babe. It may survive its strong brother Cain in the work of the world. The cry may be faint; but its cry is not its crown. O thou that holdest in thine arms a feeble form, remember that the frail casket may enclose a King.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 252.

REFERENCES.—XXXIII. 20.—W. L. Alexander, Christian Thought and Work, p. 155. XXXIII. 21.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 184. XXXIII. 22.—J. Keble, Sermons from Septuagesima to Ash Wednesday, p. 432. XXXIV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 294. XXXIV. 1.—J. M. Neale, Passages of the Psalms, p. 77. XXXIV. 1-8.—W. H. Aitken, Mission Sermons (1st Series), p. 310.

DAILY PRAYER

PSALM XXXIV. 1-22.

'As it is the special work of a shoemaker to make shoes,' said Luther, 'and of a tailor to make coats, so it is the special work of a Christian to pray.' The true artist is an artist everywhere. His work in his studio is only a part of his artist life. So must the pious soul be devoted to prayer; his prayers will be only a part of his praying life. The servants of Madame de Chantal used to say of their mistress: 'Madame's first Director made her pray three times a day, and everybody was upset. The new Director makes her pray all day, and nobody suffers for it.'

REFERENCE.—XXXIV. 3-8.—A. Mursell, Lights and Landmarks, p. 165.

'They looked unto Him and were lightened; and their faces were not ashamed.'—PSALM XXXIV. 5.

I. THE meaning of the Look. There is many a metaphor which is more instructive than a treatise, and this one is worth cart-loads of metaphysical analysis. What is meant by it? No man hath seen God at any time, and yet there is an action of the spirit which is fitly paralleled as sight. We are accustomed to say seeing is believing; the converse is quite as true. Believing is seeing. The Spirit has its eye as the body—that inward eye which is the bliss and the glory of man. In briefest words—the look that enlightens is the look of faith. The main elements are plain enough. (a) There is what I may call the intellectual, the occupation of the understanding with the thought of God. (b) There is desire in the look, wistful, longing. (c) There is sense of need. (d) There is confident expectancy.

II. The power of the Look. Note how the enlightenment is set forth as immediate and certain. There will be no appreciable interval of time, but at once when a man turns his face to God his face will blaze. In this highest region of life to ask is to receive, to wish is to possess, to turn to the light is to be flooded, bathed, in the light, and that at once and without a doubt.

III. The Look has, properly speaking, no power at all, i.e., it is the blaze of the sunlight which makes the face glow. It is the objective faith, God's own face which makes the brightness and so the true limits of the worth of faith. Not the act of belief but the thing believed—not the faith but the Gospel—not very faith as a more refined form of work but my faith as the mere inlet through which His grace enters.

(a) Put in its fullest power—and it is this—the look is the medium of healing or Salvation. This is the true enlightening—the real deliverance from the power of darkness. To entertain the belief and this great love in Christ is to pass into the light.

(b) The look works joy. The outward deliverance is implied, but even where that does not come we may have the joy of His face, and plain evermore is that the look, i.e. occupation of mind and heart with the thought of God, is sure to make a man glad.

Go and stand in the sunshine. That is what we all need to have said to us over and over again. That is the secret of all light, of knowledge, purity, and blessedness.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCES.—XXXIV. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 195. XXXIV. 6.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 225.

THE MINISTRY OF ANGELS

'The Angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them.'—PSALM XXXIV. 7.

I. THERE is something, I think, very touching in the first recorded message of an Angel of God, and to our ears it may sound strangely. When Hagar fled from the face of Sarai, the Angel of the Lord found her in the wilderness and said 'Return to thy mistress, and subdue thyself under her hands': Patience and self-control, such are the earliest precepts which the messenger of heaven brings to a suffering woman; but with them is combined a blessing, for He said, 'I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude'. From this beginning the record of Divine providence flows on with even current through the age of patriarchs. At Sodom, at Moriah, at Hebron, at Mahanaim, at Bethel, and in Egypt, the patriarchs acknowledged the personal care of their God in the service of His messengers.

II. The history of the family was a prelude to the history of the nation. In times of rebellion and division, in times of despair and oppression, in times of sinful confidence and of trustful self-abasement, the Angel of the Lord wrought among Israel the issues of repentance and faith, of chastisement and victory, in the field of Bochim, and by the brook Kishon, appearing to Gideon as he threshed wheat by stealth, and to the wife of Manoah in her loneliness, stretching the destroying sword over the city of David and sweeping with a pestilence through the camp of the Assyrians. Meanwhile the prophets were unfolding wider views of the ancient faith. The God of Israel appeared under the more glorious title of the Lord of Hosts. The scene of His Majesty was transferred, as it were, from earth to heaven. The angels were seen ministering to His glory or declaring His perfections. The way was prepared for a spiritual kingdom; and Daniel was allowed to record the ministry of spiritual power in Persia and Greece that all the nations of the world might work together for the final establishment of the reign of Christ.

III. The age of prophets passed away, and with it the outward miracles of the first dispensation. A people tried by prosperity and purified by suffering was left to trace in the chequered course of life the Divine Presence which was before sensibly revealed to them. In part they were strengthened to deeds of heroic valour by the remembrance of past deliverance; in part they defaced the simplicity of the Scriptural teaching by the admixture of Eastern superstition; but the belief still lived, and in the fullness of time an angel announced to men the advent of the Saviour. Angels foretold the birth of his forerunner. Angels proclaimed the nativity to the shepherds. Angels were sent to minister to the Infant Jesus. And when the work of Christ began angels still attended Him. At His Temptation, at His Agony, at His Resurrection, at His Ascension, angels ministered to Him.

IV. I have said enough to show that the doctrine of a secondary spiritual agency is inwrought into the whole fabric of our faith; that it is not only consistent with the Omnipresence of God, but in some degree explanatory of it; that it was active when the creation was first completed; that it shall be active when Christ comes again to judgment; that it extends to the great mysteries of the Gospel and the passing needs of the least of Christ's little ones.—B. F. WESTCOTT, Village Sermons, p. 240.

REFERENCES.—XXXIV. 7.—A. Maclaren, Weekday Evening Addresses, p. 29. H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 2901. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, The Children's Bread, p. 126. J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (4th Series), p. 94. XXXIV. 8.—J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, vol. vii. p. 192. J. Vaughan, Children's Sermons, 1875, p. 57. S. Cox, Expositor (2nd Series), vol. iv. p. 411. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 115. XXXIV. 8, 9.—T. Arnold, Christian Life: Its Hopes, p. 163. XXXIV. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ii. No. 65. XXXIV. 11-15.—J. Pulsford, Our Deathless Hope, p. 50. XXXIV. 15, 16.—G. Moberley, Sermons in Winchester College (2nd Series), p. 1. XXXIV. 16.—J. Baldwin Brown, Christian World Pulpit, vol. ix. p. 200.

'The young lions do lack, and suffer hunger: but they that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing.'—PSALM XXXIV.

THESE were the last words written by Columba after he had spent a long life of incessant Christian labour. He died in Iona on 9 June, A.D. 597.

The narrative Adamnan gives of his closing hours, of his farewell words with his sorrow-stricken disciples, of his parting with his faithful old horse, which put its head on its master's breast as if aware of the event, reveals the deep tenderness and humanity of his nature.

When the biographer has lingered lovingly on the little incidents that preceded the death, he continues: 'After these words he descended the hill, and, having returned to the monastery, sat in his hut transcribing the Psalter; and coming to that verse of the 34th Psalm, where it is written, "They that seek the Lord shall want no manner of thing that is good," "Here," said he, "at the end of the page I must stop, and what follows let Baithen write". The last verse he had written was very applicable to the saint who was about to depart, and to whom eternal good shall never be wanting; while the one that followeth is equally applicable to the father who succeeded him, the instructor of his spiritual children, "Come, ye children, and hearken unto me: I will teach you the fear of the Lord".—JOHN KER.

THE MYSTERY OF SUFFERING

(For Holy Week)

'Thy judgments are a great deep.'—PSALM XXXVI. 6.

I HAVE thought that it may lead up to that climax of all endurance—which we shall soon be called upon to measure—if, on the days of this Holy Week, we consider 'Suffering' under five aspects: 'The Mystery of Suffering,' 'The Consecration of Suffering,' 'The Uses of Suffering,' 'The Joy of Suffering,' and 'The Dignity of Suffering'.

I. Mystery is:—

(a) A necessity. So long as the finite has to do with the Infinite, there must be mystery.

(b) A boon. It cultivates the two high graces of patience and faith.

(c) Joy in everything. Half the happiness of the world would be gone if we had not always to do with something beyond it.

II. What a Mystery the Present State of our World is.

(a) Take a walk through the hospitals.

(b) See some poor creature, in her wretched hovel, ill and without a friend.

(c) See that man ready for heaven, yet left there, apparently useless, lying in his agony for years at the gate, before God lets him cross the threshold!

III. But Let us Take the Matter out of its Generalities and Deal with it more Personally.

(a) There is not one who has not known, or who probably does not know at this moment, some dreadful trouble; or, if he has not any, he knows that he shall have some.

(b) Now, when suffering of mind or body comes, perhaps the first cry of nature is—'Why? Why all this for me? Am I worse than others?'

(c) Mystery answers mystery. It is mystery, in great part, for this very end, that you may say—'Why?' and have no answer, no answer but—'Sovereignty! God's own absolute, rightful sovereignty!' 'What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter.'

IV. In all your Home-suffering, Leave and Love the Mystery which gives you concord with Jesus, and all His saints. Do not wish to see all. Do not wish to explain all. It will not be half so useful, nor half so good for you, if you ask questions. Take it in the simplicity of its own magnificence. It is so grand to see only God—to be lost in God!

GOD'S GOODNESS TO MAN*(A Harvest Sermon)*

'How excellent is Thy loving kindness, O God! Therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of Thy wings.'—PSALM XXXVI. 7.

WE are here to celebrate our Harvest Festival.

I. First, let us think of the propriety of a Harvest Thanksgiving. Can it be that there are some who need to be reminded that these fruits of the earth, around us, of whatever kind, are emblems of the love and might of God; that they tell of God's loving provision for the children of men? These things speak to us of the mysteries of growth. They tell us of the wonders of rain and sunshine, and air and soil. They testify to God's majesty and beneficence.

II. Let us see what God's Word says as to the celebration of a Harvest Thanksgiving. In plain and unmistakable terms we find there God's direct command for keeping the Feast of Harvest. Not the least interesting fact in connexion with this feast is the fact that our Lord Himself we find present upon one occasion at the celebration as it was carried on in His day. The Bible plainly shows us, at all events, that Harvest rejoicings and the duty of giving thanks to God for the earth's produce are as old as man's sojourn in the world.

III. And what should be the tone of our rejoicings? If we present ourselves at services such as this in the same spirit as that in which we might attend a secular concert, or a secular show, merely to be interested and entertained, it is time that we left the Harvest Festival alone altogether. But if the effect is to lift our hearts in real thankfulness to God for His beneficence, or if the Festival is a true expression of our thanks, then we do well to be present.

IV. The harvest and the field offer an immense sphere for the preacher. There is not a phase of life which they, one or other of them, cannot be taken to illustrate. Our Lord frequently and plentifully drew lessons from both, and, as we have seen, drew out from the harvest rejoicings, two of the mightiest object-lessons that ever the world has listened to. All creation speaks of God's goodness. If we receive God's mercies and His bounty in the right spirit, we shall look to Him with loving thankfulness, and a rich sense of safety and security.

THE UNLIGHTED LUSTRE

'In Thy light shall we see light.'—PSALM XXXVI. 9.

IN the life of Sir Walter Scott by Lockhart, there occurs a remark made by Sir Walter that has often come back to me in quiet moments. A reverend gentleman—a Principal from St. Andrews—was lamenting that he had never seen Byron, and Scott fell to talk on the beauty of Byron's face. 'Doctor,' he said, 'the prints give you no idea of it; the lustre is there, but it is not lighted up.' I confess that I have been haunted by that sentence, 'The lustre is there, but it is not lighted up.'

I. Think to begin with of this world we dwell in, with all its beauty of hill and stream and sea. From the lights and shadows of the highland moor down to the droop of the birch-tree at the door, there is such a lustre of glory on the world that to some hearts it is a joy for ever. But for centuries men had no eyes for that, the ancient world had little feeling for it all. Again I think of the Bible. It is the same book in every hand and home. Yet to one man the Bible is the Bible, a book of infinite comfort and power and healing, and to another it is just so many printed pages within two covers that are rarely opened. The lustre is there, but it is not lighted up.

II. So much then for the unlighted lustre, and now a few words on how the lustre is kindled; and here I shall confine myself to human life, for that practically embraces all the rest. (a) First then, that is one great gain of responsibility; it is one of God's ways of lighting up the lustre. Responsibility develops a man's power, and rouses him into the enthusiasm of activity; it is like the sunlight falling on the seed and making it quicken into leaf and flower. There is a great deal more in you than you give yourself credit for, and this is God's way of lighting up the lustre. (b) Then again this is one of the chief offices of love. A love that is base may set a man afire, but a love that is heavenly sets a man ashining. Dante tells us that but for his love of Beatrice, and the illuminating of his whole nature which it brought him, he would never have been moved to write these poems which are the wonder and the warning of the ages. That then, is one of the great offices of love. It comes like a torch to light the lustre up. (c) And then this is one of the meanings of conversion—that old and noble mismanaged word. Conversion is the lighting up of our lustre with the spark of God's Holy Spirit out of heaven.—G. II. MORRISON, The Unlighted Lustre, p. 30.

REFERENCES.—XXXVI. 9.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (10th Series), p. 28. P. Brooks, Sermons Preached in an English Church, p. 89. Archbishop Benson, Boy Life, p. 32. Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, pp. 292, 311. S. Macnaughton, Real Religion and Real Life, p. 97. XXXVII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 322. XXXVII. 1.—Bishop Temple, Rugby Sermons (2nd Series), p. 267. XXXVII. 1, 2.—H. Windross, The Life Victorious, p. 255. Parker, The Cavenish Pulpit, p. 193. XXXVII. 3.—J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 257. J. Baldwin Brown, The Sunday Afternoon, p. 344. H. Alford, Sermons, p. 213. XXXVII. 3-8.—H. W. Beecher, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxvii. p. 93.

REMEDIES FOR DESPONDENCY

'Trust in the Lord, and do good: dwell in the land, and follow after faithfulness.—PSALM XXXVII. 3 (R.V.).

ONE of the many dangers that we have to guard against in the spiritual life is the danger of despondency. We look out into the world around us and it would seem that those people who live their lives without any thought of God are getting on just as well as, and perhaps better than, we ourselves. This depression of soul is no new thing in the history of man. We find it in Holy Scripture. In this 37th Psalm the Psalmist tells us that he himself has seen the ungodly in great power, and moreover flourishing like a green bay-tree. And you will remember that even so strong a character as the prophet Elijah, just because he was threatened by an angry woman, throws himself down under a juniper-tree and requests that he may die. To the devout Jew this problem of the prosperity of the ungodly was one of the unsolved difficulties of life, and of course the problem was all the more difficult for him because there was no revelation of a future state of rewards and punishments. But for us the future life is no longer a dream. We know that God will in His own good time, if not here, at any rate hereafter, see that all wrongs are righted and all injustices redressed.

I. Faith.—Surely we can 'trust in the Lord'. In the old Catechism, which most of us probably learnt once and may have forgotten since, we are reminded that our duty towards God is to put our whole trust in Him. That surely means to stake everything upon Him; not merely to trust Him when all our life seems to be bathed in sunshine, not to trust Him merely when everything we do seems to turn out successfully, but also in those dark and gloomy days when the horizon becomes clouded and the sky is black with failure or sorrow.

II. Patience.—And this means that great demands will be made upon our patience. Because we cannot do what we want to do at once, we give up through impatience. We sympathize with the servants in the parable who wanted to pull up the tares at once. We are all too apt to lose sight of the fact that evil has a place in this world and in some mysterious way a work to do.

III. Works.—But not only does the Psalmist tell us that we are to trust in the Lord, but he says also that we are to do good. Go out into the pathway of duty and do that which lies right to thy hand—and do it with all thy might. Surely it is exactly what God told Elijah to do. 'Return on thy way'—it is no use hiding under a juniper-tree and bemoaning your failure. Is it not true that many of us regard our religion as something almost entirely negative? We think that if we can abstain from the grosser forms of sin we are doing all that can be expected of us. We are content if we can go through the world without, as we say, 'doing any harm'. But we are not put in this world simply not to do harm. We are put into this world to do good. Is anyone in this world a little better for our having been here? It is very interesting to know that our Lord summed up all the commandments in a form no longer negative, but strictly positive—'Thou shalt love'.

IV. Leave Results to God.—Then to come to the closing words of the text. God is not asking from us anything in the nature of success; only faithfulness. 'Be ye faithful unto death, not 'be successful'. God in His great mercy is asking from His children something that is within grasp of all. Do not let us get into the habit of thinking that God is a hard taskmaster. He is just asking of us that each in his position in life will do his best. There is nothing that appeals to us like success, but that is not what God wants. God looks deeper than that. He looks into the heart. He does not trouble Himself about the outward result; He scrutinizes the motives. He marks the efforts, even though they are crowned with failure again and again. Is there any text more full of comfort, more stimulating to effort, than this, spoken of a poor simple woman at whom the world pointed the finger of scorn, 'Let her alone; she hath done what she could'? If you and I do what we can, never mind the failure; we can leave results in God's hands.

No sermons, nor books, nor arguments can strengthen the doubting heart so deeply as just to come into touch with a soul that is founded upon a rock, and has proved the truth of that plain religion whose highest philosophy is 'Trust in the Lord, and do good?'—HENRY VAN DYKE, Little Rivers, p. 107.

THE SECRET OF TRANQUILLITY

'Delight thyself also in the Lord; and He shall give thee the desire of thine heart. Commit thy way unto the Lord. Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for Him.'—PSALM XXXVII. 4, 5, 7.

I. HERE is the secret of tranquillity in freedom from eager, earthly desire—'Delight thyself in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desire of thine heart'.

The great reason why life is troubled and restless lies not without, but within. It is not our changing circumstances, but our unregulated desires, that rob us of peace. Unbridled and varying wishes are the worst enemies of our repose. And still further they destroy tranquillity by putting us at the mercy of externals. Whatsoever we make necessary for contentment, we make lord of our happiness. By our eager desires we give perishable things supreme power over us, and so intertwine our being with theirs that the blow which destroys them lets out our life-blood. If then our desires are, in their very exercise, a disturbance, and in their very fruition prophesy disappointment, and if their certain disappointment is irrevocable and crushing when it comes, what shall we do for rest? There is but one answer—'Delight thyself in the Lord'. This glad longing for God is the cure for all the feverish unrest of desires unfulfilled, as well as for the ague of fear, of loss and sorrow.

II. But this is not all, the secret of tranquillity is found, secondly, in freedom from the perplexity of choosing our path. What does it prescribe? First the subordination—not the extinction—of our own inclinations. Our will is to be master of our passions, and desires, and whims, and habits, but to be the servant of God. Then the counsel of our text prescribes the submission of our judgment to God, in the confidence that His wisdom will guide us: The law is: you do your best to find out your duty; you suppress inclinations, and desire to do God's will, and He will certainly tell you what it is. Only let the eye be fixed on Him, and He will guide us in the way.

III. One more step. The secret of tranquillity is found, thirdly, in freedom from the anxiety of an unknown future. 'Rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him.' Such an addition to these previous is needful, if all the sources of our disquiet are to be dealt with. We are sure that in the future are losses, and sorrows, and death; thank God we are sure, too, that He is in it. That certainty alone, and what comes of it, makes it possible for a thoughtful man to face to-morrow without fear or tumult. The only rest from apprehensions which are but too reasonable is 'rest in the Lord'. If we are sure that He will be there, and if we delight in Him, then we can afford to say, 'As for all the rest, let it be as He wills, it will be well'.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCE.—XXXVII. 5.—J. E. VAUX, Sermon Notes (1st Series), p. 18.

PSALM XXXVII. 5.

THIS verse was the frequent promise with which David Livingstone, the African missionary and traveller, encouraged himself in the midst of his wanderings and perils.

PSALM XXXVII.

THIS Psalm was the basis of the hymn of Paul Gerhardt, Befiehl du deine Wege, which has taken national rank in Germany, next to Luther's Ein feste Burg. It has become well known in the English language through John Wesley's translation:—

Commit thou all thy griefs
And ways into His hands,
To His sure truth and tender care,
Who heaven and earth commands.

The story told of its origin is well known. When Paul Gerhardt was banished from Berlin by the Elector of Brandenburg, because he conscientiously refused some conditions attached to his ministry, he turned in with wife and children to a small wayside hostelry, not knowing where to betake himself. Seeing his wife deeply depressed, he quoted to her Psalm xxxvii. 5: 'Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in Him, and He shall bring it to pass'; and then went out into the garden. There, sitting under an apple-tree, he composed the hymn, and read it to his wife for her comfort. That same evening two messengers arrived from Duke Christian of Merseburg to offer him an honourable place in his dominions. When the first Lutheran Church was opened in Philadelphia in 1743 it was with Gerhardt's song.—JOHN KER.

'BE STILL, MY SOUL'

'Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for Him.'—PSALM XXXVII. 7.

A FAVOURITE subject with the Psalmist is the seeming injustice of God's dealings with men as witnessed in the frequent prosperity of the wicked, and the as frequent adversity of the righteous.

I. The assurance that all is not in reality well with the wicked is valuable in so far as it saves us from unbelief and despair. Sorrow in some shape or other, in greater or less measure, is the common lot; danger is the common lot; and death comes at last to all. There is no exemption in favour of youth, or beauty, or blood.

II. God often delays, and for this reason, that He is eternal. It is oftentimes more difficult patiently to wait than to be actively engaged in some enterprise. And yet God rewards us for the fidelity with which we serve Him, and for that alone.

III. 'For Him.' The addition of these two words makes the nature of true resignation quite clear. Our Heavenly Father demands more of us than mere passive submission to His will. We must hope on, unfaltering in faith, unswerving in purpose, faithful to God even unto death.

IV. The sweet and invigorating consolation which flows from patiently awaiting God's time is the subject of Catharina von Schlegel's fine hymn, familiar to us all in Jane Borthwick's admirable translation, 'Be still, my soul: the Lord is on thy side'.—W. TAYLOR, Twelve Favourite Hymns, p. 153.

REFERENCES.—XXXVII. 7.—J. VAUGHAN, Fifty Sermons (10th Series), p. 174. D. MOORE, Penny Pulpit, No. 2998. A. W. MOMERIE, Defects of Modern Christianity, p. 242. E. S. GAUGE, Penny Pulpit, No. 1009. M. R. VINCENT, Gates Into the Psalm Country, p. 127. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiii. No. 1333. S. Wilberforce, Sermons, p. 225. J. Martineau, Hours of Thought, vol. i. p. 329. XXXVII. 11.—H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 2257. XXXVII. 21.—J. M. Neale, Passages of the Psalms, p. 89. XXXVII. 23, 24.—M. R. Vincent, God and Bread, p. 97. XXXVII. 25.—J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 247.

OBEDIENCE THE REMEDY FOR RELIGIOUS PERPLEXITY

'Wait on the Lord, and keep His way, and He shall exalt thee to inherit the land.'—PSALM XXXVII. 34.

LET every beginner make up his mind to suffer disquiet and perplexity. He cannot complain that it should be so; and though he should be deeply ashamed of himself that it is so (for had he followed God from a child, his condition would have been far different, though even then perhaps, not without some perplexities), still he has no cause to be surprised or discouraged. The more he makes up his mind manfully to bear doubt, struggle against it, and meekly to do God's will all through it, the sooner this unsettled state of mind will cease, and order will rise out of confusion. 'Wait on the Lord,' this is the rule; 'keep His way,' this is the manner of waiting. Go about your duty; mind little things as well as great. Do not pause, and say, 'I am as I was; day after day passes, and still no light'; go on.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—XXXVII. 34.—J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, vol. i. p. 228. XXXVII. 37.—G. W. Brameld, Practical Sermons, p. 414. J. Baldwin Brown, Aids to the Development of the Divine Life, vol. i. p. 111. XXXVII. 38.—C. J. Vaughan, Harrow Sermons (2nd Series), p. 384. XXXVII. 39.—Spurgeon, My Sermon Notes, p. 151. XXXVIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 335. XXXVIII. 1.—J. J. Blunt, Plain Sermons, p. i. XXXVIII. 2.—Bishop Goodwin, Parish Sermons (4th Series), p. 162. XXXVIII. 9.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Sunday Afternoon, p. 114. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvi. No. 1564.

REPENTANCE

'I will declare mine iniquity; I will be sorry for my sin.'—PSALM XXXVIII. 18.

THERE can be no real repentance, and, therefore, no blessed forgiveness, unless we attain to two things: a knowledge of what sin is—how serious, how full of peril, how displeasing to God, how exceeding sinful; and a knowledge of what we are ourselves—a recognition in the full light of consciousness of our own lives and our own deeds. But a yet further step is necessary, which is to weld together these two convictions, and to see that our own lives, our deeds, our thoughts, make us sinners before God, without subterfuge and without excuse. It is true of millions—may it not be true of us?—that, while we hate sin in the abstract, while we confess, in a vague collective way, that 'we have offended against God's holy laws,' yet we do not condemn ourselves (see Rom. ii. 17-24).

I. How is it, then, that men do not connect together their intimate knowledge of themselves and their theoretical hatred of sin? There are various ways in which men try to escape their own detection. There is:—

(a) The sorcery of words. Men call sins, which they see others commit, by their true names; they call their own sins by false and simple names. What is pride in others is in themselves proper spirit; what is slander in others is in themselves moral indignation; what is cheating in others is in themselves legitimate profit; what is in others an immoral acquiescence is in themselves a practical common sense; what is in others licence is in themselves Christian liberty.

(b) Men will hardly ever look at their own actual deeds in connexion with their own true motives. They live two lives. One is their habitual round of conduct, which is often base, mean, and unworthy. The other is their traditional homage to righteousness, which is upright and respectable. That imaginative life they choose to take for their true life. Their lives are like a stately temple front, its entablature enriched with a pious inscription. Alas! Enter beyond the vestibule, and in some inmost shrine, there, as they sit shrouded, and almost incognito, each man to himself, there, in dark, secret chambers, all the bad, impure, and dishonourable work of their lives is done!

(c) The freely condemning every other sin but the one to which they are themselves addicted. A man may be a libertine in heart and life, and yet, corrupt as he is or has been, he walks with head erect, and is very proud of himself, because he is such 'a man of honour'. Or, it may be, a man is earning his living as a professional liar, and living in an envenomed atmosphere of gossip; and yet he may go regularly to church, and take himself for a Christian, because, perhaps, he feels a contempt for avarice. Or he may be earning his bread by means dishonest and immoral; by trades that ruin men, body and soul; by houses in which the poor are huddled together like swine; and yet he may speak of sensuality with the fiercest denunciation. It is thus a matter of primary importance, by self-examination, to see that there are no personal sins for which we make an exception; no Commandments which, for ourselves only, we strike out of the Decalogue.

II. What should be our protection against these specious thoughts of our own hearts and our own counsel? God has not left you unshielded. He has assigned the soul of man to the special guardianship of those two pure and strong Archangels of our being: Duty, that angel so stern and yet so beautiful, and Conscience, that aboriginal vicar of Christ, with a voice now like the blast of a trumpet, now thrilling, and still, and small. A man who, from his youth upward, has, by the grace of God, committed himself to the care of these two, such a man is safe.

III. If we should receive the grace of Christ, we must come as true penitents; if otherwise, we shall not be forgiven. We must not only see that sin is hateful; we must not only confess, 'Thus and thus have I done,' but we must see that we individually and specifically are sinners, and that without excuse. It is only to the helpless who feel themselves to be helpless that Christ comes. To the blind, who say,

'We see'; to the lepers, who cry, 'We are clean'; to the sinners, who say, 'We have no sin' (and therefore their sin remaineth), Christ comes not.

PSALM XXXIX. 9.

DURING the suffering of his last illness Calvin was heard repeating the words of Hezekiah: 'I did mourn as a dove; mine eyes fail with looking upward,' followed by those of this Psalm; 'I was dumb; I opened not my mouth, because Thou didst it.'—JOHN KER.

PSALM XXXIX. 13.

THERE is no mistaking the reality which prayer, in the sense of communion with God, was to him. When he heard of his appointment as Master he was staying in a friend's house. 'He leant his head against the mantelpiece and prayed aloud, "Oh spare me a little that I may recover my strength, before I go hence and be no more seen".—LIFE OF BENJAMIN JOWETT.

REFERENCES.—XXXIX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 344. XXXIX. 1.—R. C. Trench, Sermons in Westminster Abbey, p. 114. XXXIX. 1, 2.—C. Vince, The Unchanging Saviour, p. 21. J. B. Mozley, University Sermons, p. 223. XXXIX. 4.—J. Budgen, Parochial Sermons, vol. i. p. 157. XXXIX. 4, 5.—Bishop Bethell, Sermons, vol. i. p. 154. XXXIX. 12.—J. Budgen, Parochial Sermons, vol. i. p. 166. XL.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 350. XL. 3.—J. Stalker, The New Song, p. 9. XL. 5.—W. L. Alexander, Sermons, p. 191. XL. 7.—H. Scott Holland, Logic and Life, p. 110. XL. 7, 8.—Bishop Bethell, Sermons, vol. i. p. 478.

THE MESSIANIC WATCHWORD

'I delight to do Thy will. O my God: yea, Thy law is within my heart.'—PSALM XL. 8.

THESE words are quoted by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews as a Messianic prophecy; and are used at the same time to indicate the supreme element of value in the sacrifice which redeems mankind. The words were indited in some sweet thrilling spring-time of the singer's history, possibly at his anointing for the kingship, or when the Lord had given him rest from his enemies; but he fell short, and generations afterwards the ideal was fulfilled by another. A superficial glance at this Psalm may perhaps suggest to us that the writer, whether David or some other inspired man, was thinking of himself from beginning to end, and not consciously speaking in the name of a descendant. But we must not unduly narrow our views. Two or three considerations may serve to show how, without doing violence to the thought of the man who first used the words, they may pass into a watchword of the Messianic work and mission.

I. A vague Messianic hope was widely diffused among men from the beginnings of history; and this hope tended to centre itself in the kings of primitive peoples, perhaps because of the priestly functions they exercised. In the days of the first Kings of Israel, men were looking for the fulfilment of the Divine promises in the person of a providential ruler. Notwithstanding the separation of a special family to the work of the priesthood, the king still represented his people before God, and often performed the act of sacrifices. The promise made to Abraham and renewed from time to time to his descendants was put in trust with the house of David, and the believing expectation concentrated itself in his line. Such hopes contained the germinating forces of genuine Messianic prophecy. The joyful unspotted career of righteousness and piety after which David longed when he came to the throne and by which he hoped to establish the kingdom of God upon earth was, alas! imperfectly realized. The Messianic dream failed once more, and failed through the moral incompetence of the dreamer. The failure of David was redeemed in his matchless descendant. The fulfilment came in One who adopted the watchword, and after a life in which there was no need to confess a shortcoming, died upon the Cross with the shout 'It is finished'. The new programme of sacrifice—the sacrifice of ungrudging, spontaneous, all-comprehending obedience which was dawning in the mind of the Psalmist—became the prophecy of a new dispensation.

II. There is a sense in which the outlook towards lofty and unselfish progress has in it a diffused and unfocussed light of prophecy. Whenever we see perfection from afar, and set our hearts upon it, we join hands with Moses, David, Isaiah, and all the righteous men who waited for redemption in Israel. This ideal of joyful obedience to the redeeming counsels of the Most High corresponds with a new view of the Divine character which was dawning on the horizon of the Jewish thought. We speak of a God, who whilst still zealous for the righteousness which has been the staple of past revelations, wishes to be known by a love which accepts only the service of congenial minds. In his prevision of a joyful and perfect obedience, rendered to an inscrutable law of spiritual sacrifice, the Psalmist anticipates in faint outline that revelation of the Divine character which the work of Jesus Christ put into intense light. He who sent His Son into the world to be man's atoning Mediator and example, must needs be served in tasks of supreme difficulty and pain, with cheerful and uncomplaining loyalty. Jesus, Who knew all the depths of the Divine heart, fulfilled the will of the Father in its most mysterious and distressing demands, with complete consecration of spirit, and an invincible sense of blessedness in His high vocation. The spirit of our Lord's surrender to the Divine will foreshadowed the free obedience He hoped to create in His redeemed people. The setting up of the Cross was a call to the future ages for a moral and spiritual service, free and winsome as the genius of life itself. It was the beginning of a new heaven and earth, the abodes of inward righteousness.—T. G. SELBY, The Strenuous Gospel, p. 78.

REFERENCES.—XL. 8.—W. G. Blaikie, Glimpses of the Inner Life of our Lord, p. 29. XL. 8, 9.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 100. XL. 9, 10.—E. B. Pusey, Sermons Preached Before the University of Oxford, p. 437. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 977. XL. 10.—Cannon

Beeching, Inns of Court Sermons, p. 22. H. Bushnell, The New Life, p. 361. Alexander Maclaren, After the Resurrection, p. 258.

PSALM XL. 17.

Deus meus, ne tardaveris, 'Make no tarrying, O my God,'—words which were repeatedly in the mouth of Robert Rollock, the first Principal of the University of Edinburgh, during his last illness. Under long and painful suffering he had interviews with friends, colleagues, ministers, and magistrates of the city, exhorting them to faithfulness in their duty. His biographer says that, as he came near his end, he kept silence during the night till the Sabbath dawn, when he broke out with the words, 'Come, Lord, make no delay; come, Lord Jesus, tarry not. I am wearied with my loathing of day and night. Come, Lord Jesus, that I may come to Thee.' It was early spring, 1599, when he died; and at his funeral a tempest of rain and wind was sweeping the streets of Edinburgh; but multitudes of every class followed him to his grave, and made great lamentation over him.

REFERENCES.—XL. 17.—W. L. Alexander, Sermons, p. 191. XLI. 1.—F. W. Farrar, Contemporary Pulpit, Extra No. 2, 1887. J. Baldwin Brown, The Sunday Afternoon, p. 304. XLI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 360. XLII. 1.—R. J. Campbell, A Faith for To-day, p. 3. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 822. G. Matheson, Moments on the Mount, p. 151. XLII. 1, 2.—F. J. A. Hort, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 109. XLII. 1-3.—Bishop Temple, Rugby Sermons, p. 254. Bishop Harvey Goodwin, Christian World Pulpit, vol. i. p. 117.

THE THIRST FOR THE LIVING GOD

'My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God.'—PSALM XLII. 2. THERE is scarcely a phase of philosophy about us, or a really profound experience which we observe, which does not illustrate the increasing thirst of the human soul for the living God.

I. Take, in the first place, the philosophy of the time, and consider the outcome of those forms of philosophy which, to the religious mind, are most unpromising and repelling. For the last twenty years philosophical unbelief has been taking shape among English-speaking people under two types. One we call positivism, the other agnosticism. Now, whatever these two types of thought had to debate about, they seemed to have this one point of agreement—that each of them expressly withheld the thoughts of men from any sense of a living God. Yet, strangely enough, nothing which the history of the times presents seems to illustrate so strongly as do these very schools of thought the increasing thirst of philosophy for a genuine religious life.

II. This ferment of the philosophers is but a suggestion of the spiritual restlessness which possesses multitudes about us, whether they study philosophy or not. It is this eager, receptive, waiting mood, found in every community, which gives the chief human impulse to the life of a modern minister. It fills the preacher's work with a new exhilaration, for he is not dealing with a controversy against other forms of faith, but with a positively constructive work. It does not much matter for this end precisely wherein the confidence of his faith may lie. Let him believe anything concerning the ways of God supremely and announce his faith rationally and he is satisfying the thirst of many souls.

III. This is the natural basis of the authority of Jesus. To come in the course of one's experiences upon one towering personality to whom the sense of God is meat and drink, and in whom duty becomes grace through this illuminating of his way, to be taken out of one's solitude and feel this life touching one's own through all its experiences, yet sustained and disciplined throughout by this transfiguring faith—that is a recognition of authority which is healthful and scientific and invigorating and humbling all at once. The more one is set free from false and external authority the more he needs the authority of a master soul. The more the problem of the time is seen to be the preaching of a living God, the more unlikely shall we be to outgrow the mediating force of Christian loyalty.—FRANCIS G. PEABODY, Homiletic Review, 1906, vol. LII. p. 301.

REFERENCES.—XLII. 2.—Bishop Maclagan, Penny Pulpit, No. 731. F. D. Maurice, Sermons, vol. iii. p. 129. W. J. Knox-Little, Anglican Pulpit of To-day, p. 267. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 36. A. Maclaren, Sermons Preached in Manchester, p. 135. S. Micaughton, Real Religion and Real Life, p. 13. XLII. 4.—W. M. Punshon, Sermons, p. 101.

TO THE DISHEARTENED

'Why art thou cast down, O my soul?'—PSALM XLII. 5.

I. THE common causes for disheartening.

(a) The long and monotonous stretches of our life. It is a dreary business walking in the country when the dusty road without a turn or a bend stretches ahead of you for miles. It is the sameness that disheartens us.

(b) Bitter disappointment.

(c) The apparent uselessness of all we do. It is the partial failure, it is the lack of progress, it is the fact that I strive and never seem to attain, that lies at the root of spiritual despondency. I am disheartened because I am something better than a beast, and have been made to crave, to strive, to yearn, to hope, unsatisfied, till the day break and the shadows flee away.

II. Counsels against disheartenment.

(a) Disheartenment can often be dispelled by action.

(b) Remember what others have to suffer. When you are quite despondent, says Mr. Keble, 'the best way is to go out and do something kind to somebody'.

(c) In your hours of disheartening just ask if there was ever a man on earth who had such cause to be disheartened as our Lord.—G. H. MORRISON, Flood-Tide, p. 43.

PSALM XLII. 5.

WHY art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted in me? The narrative of the death of the Bohemian martyrs, who suffered at Prague in 1621, says, 'John Schultis was the next, who on the scaffold said, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise Him." "Thy righteous seem in the eyes of men to die, but indeed they go to their rest." Then kneeling down, he said, "Come, come, Lord Jesus, and do not tarry"; and so he was beheaded.—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—XLII. 5.—H. P. Wright, Preacher's Magazine, vol. xix. p. 515. A. Rowland, Sermons by Welshmen, p. 135. XLII. 6.—R. Roberts, My Jewels, p. 22. J. Baldwin Brown, The Sunday Afternoon, p. 287.

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF THE DEEPS

'Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of Thy waterspouts.'—
PSALM XLII. 7.

It is very probable that this Psalm was written by some one who was with David when he fled from Absalom. The title says it was for the sons of Korah: it would be better to read it, by the sons of Korah. These sons of Korah were doorkeepers of the sanctuary; they had also some charge of sanctuary music; and when David fled from his rebellious son, these loyal servants would accompany him. It was one of these, I think, who wrote this Psalm, with its passionate yearning for the house of God. It is filled with the imagery of that mountain region where the king had gone in peril of his life. And the writer, true poet that he was, finds in the scenery the picture of his mood; reads in the face of universal nature the anguish that was gnawing at his heart. Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of Thy waterspouts. He could hear the cataracts as he lay sleepless. Now they were thunderous, now they were faint, as the breeze rose and fell among the hills. And as he listened to them in their varying tones, now loud and clamorous, now dying away again, it seemed to him as if the mountain torrents were calling to one another through the night. Had the man been a Celt he would have said, 'It is the spirit of the waters that is crying'. Being a Jew, those echoings and answerings were the broken syllables of the one God. But being a poet, whether Celt or Jew, this reached him as the message of that midnight, that between deep and solemn and majestic voices there is a certain call and correspondence. On that then shall we dwell for a few moments?—on the call and correspondence of deep things? I shall run rapidly over some tracts of life, and use this text for their illumination.

I. I find a suggestion here of the influence of scenery on character. That is a thought which has been largely worked at in late years, how nations are moulded by the scenes among which they dwell.

II. Our text helps us to understand what I might call the appeal of personality. You can never explain on any shallow grounds the way in which the deepest ties are formed. The ways of God are not the ways of man, and friendships, like marriages, are made in heaven, and we flash into recognition of each other just because deep is calling unto deep. I do believe with the American poet that the friends I seek are seeking me. I do believe they are always drawing nearer, led by a hand that knows the way we take. Out of the depths I cried to God. Yes, that is true, and we have found it so. But it seems to me that this is also true: out of the depths I cried—unto my friend.

III. Then once again I think our text applies to the responses that we make to our great hours. It applies to those times of national awaking when peril is imminent and all is dark. You can never tell what a nation can achieve till it is faced by one of these decisive seasons. You can never judge the fibre of a people when things are easy and prosperous and peaceful. It takes a time of danger to show that; a time when our blood-bought freedom is in peril; just as it takes the onset of the storm to show the finest features of the ship. There are always people in a time of peace who will tell you that Britain is going to the dogs. They bewail the dying out of heroism; the love of pleasure; the lack of high ideal. God knows it is all true enough, if you take the average of any great community, but I say that a man is a traitor to his country if he really believes that that is all. Let another Napoleon show himself in France, and you shall have another Wellington in England. There is always a Lord Nelson getting ready for the great hour that calls for a Lord Nelson. Not only so, but let the day arrive when the charter of our freedom is imperilled, and you shall have such a spirit in the people as will recall the joy of the heroic time. That is the meaning of the fine enthusiasm which kindles a people in the day of trial. That is the secret of the swift response which follows the appeal to the heroic. There is much that is slumbering in the nation's heart, and so long as the sunshine lasts it will not stir; but it will waken, with triumph in its eyes, when deep is calling unto deep.—G. H. MORRISON, The Return of the Angels, p. 56.

REFERENCES.—XLII. 7.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Sunday Afternoon, p. 252. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 805.

THE SONG AND THE PRAYER

'Yet the Lord will command His lovingkindness in the daytime, and in the night His song shall be with me, and my prayer unto the God of my life.'—PSALM XLII. 8.

I. To each soul its own prayer. First of all, let me say that every soul has its own prayer—'My prayer unto the God of my life'. No man can ever take the place of my soul, and feel its sins, and its sorrows, and its wants. And as he can never breathe my prayer no man can ever drink my cup, or taste either its sweetness or its bitterness; I must drink it myself. No man can see my visions. They may be poor, they may be limited, circumscribed and never peer where the vision of others has gone; but no man can see my vision, no man can see your vision—no man can breathe your prayer any more than he can breathe mine. Prayer springs from different causes; it is uttered in different circumstances and conditions; it is expressed in different words—and must be. The learned and refined man will express his prayer to God in refined and beautiful language. But the unlearned, as Paul calls them, and the unrefined men will express their prayer in quite another way. But the one man can never express the prayer of the other man, whether it be learned or unlearned.

II. Every true prayer is to 'The God of my life'. He is the God of all the mysteries as well as of all the things that are palpable. The things that you and I cannot explain, for which we find no reason, He is still 'The God of my life'. Some people seem to revel in mysteries, and to breathe the atmosphere of mysteries. But to me here are the mysteries of life, and with those I am familiar. Why that poor mother, just when her children most needed her love, why 'The God of my life,' should call her to lie down and die? Why that father, who is the breadwinner for a wife and several children, at the most critical time in the family's life should be smitten down to death? That is a mystery to me. There is no answer that I know of, but 'He is the God of my life'. He is the God of an infinite love, of an infinite salvation, that streams from the precious blood of Jesus Christ, and comes to bless us in every change through which we pass.—W. CURR.

REFERENCES.—XLII. 8.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 204. J. Ker, Sermons, p. 213. XLII. 10.—W. Page-Roberts, Law and God, p. 1. XLII. 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. p. 1226. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (4th Series), p. 21.

LIGHT AND TRUTH (Suitable for Missions)

'O send out Thy light and Thy truth: let them lead me.'—
PSALM XLIII. 3.

WE all need a guide. No one would question this. Very often we choose a wrong guide, and one that leads us astray. Light and truth are two great factors in our everyday life. Without either or both of them, we should drag on a most miserable existence. Light is the world's first and greatest necessity, hence it was first created before the inhabitants of the earth. We cannot do without light which brings life. It promotes healthy growth, it produces happiness.

As there is need for light in the natural world, so there is need of light in the spiritual world. 'The whole world,' said St. John, 'lieth in wickedness,' and consequently it needs light and truth. The Word of God was given to supply this great need of man, for it is light and truth. 'Thy Word,' says the Psalmist, 'is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path.'

And our Lord Jesus Christ, in that remarkable prayer of His on behalf of His loved ones, says 'Sanctify them through Thy truth: Thy Word is truth'. These two passages show clearly that God's Word is light and truth, so that we may well regard our text as a command to those who have received the Word to pass it on to others.

I. Responsibility.—When our Lord stood on the Mount He said to His disciples, 'Ye are the light of the world'. That is a responsibility. It means that every one who has received the light of the Gospel from Him Who is the light of the World, is responsible for taking an active part in the work of disseminating that light, and spreading it to others. We are morally bound to spread far and wide the Word of light and truth which we have received. It is a great risk to any nation or any individual to neglect this.

II. England's Responsibility.—Of all peoples who have received the light and truth of God's Word, we have received the fullest measure, and have been granted the greatest facilities and possibilities of transmitting it to others. God has placed in our hands perfect freedom as to the use of His Word, as to the free discussion and defence of truth, as to devising ways and means by which that truth may be disseminated and communicated. We are a nation highly favoured beyond others with breadth of empire. We have connexion with and free access to the uttermost parts of the earth. We have wealth at our disposal to send out the light and truth.

III. Individual Responsibility.—Have you ever realized your responsibility as a steward? Yours is a strict and solemn account, which you must stand one day and give at the bar of Jesus, Who is no respecter of persons, when every opportunity of good given to us will be called in question as to how we have disposed of it. God expects from you that you should shine out in the darkness of the world, which as yet knows Him not, by sending out the light and truth by your liberality and generosity, or even by going out yourselves to the foreign field. Remember there is no happiness like the happiness of giving, more especially when we give something we value. God has given His most precious possession, His only dear Son. Jesus Christ gave us His own life, for we are redeemed by His most precious blood. We need to give the utmost we are able in order to carry the tidings of His love to others. Go forward and tell this good news.

ASPIRATIONS

'O send out Thy light and Thy truth, that they may lead me; and bring me unto Thy holy hill and to Thy dwelling.'—
PSALM XLIII. 3.

THIS 43rd Psalm, and the Psalm that goes before it, were composed by David under circumstances of great trouble. Taken together, they give us an insight into the very heart of the Psalmist. David there appears as the man whose affections were set upon God, and in all the changes and chances and dangers of a chequered life looked upward.

I. We need to have this teaching, and this example in this life of weary toil, we need to have our spirits lifted up, not to be always earthward bound.

II. Observe how entirely Christian the prayer is. We ask for God's light, and for His truth—and what is this but to ask for Christ to dwell in our hearts?

III. We live in times when aspirations are sadly damped and discouraged. If a man look upward he is told that he is neglecting closer duties, that his work lies at his feet. Hold fast the blessed hope of a life to come promised and open to all who have faith in Jesus Christ.

IV. God is present in all places, at all times—but is present according to His true promise, wheresoever two or three are gathered together in His name.—R. D. B. RAWNSLEY, Village Sermons (3rd Series), p. 158.

PSALM XLIII. 3.

AFTER the ministers and elders of the Free Church of Scotland, at the Disruption, had reached Tanfield Hall in their first step of emancipation, 18 May, 1843, Dr. Chalmers took the chair as Moderator, and rose to give out the opening Psalm. Dr. Buchanan, the historian of the Ten Years' Conflict, says: 'A heavy thunder-cloud had for some time darkened the heavens, and, as the eye ranged at that particular moment over the dense mass of human beings who covered the immense area of the low-roofed hall, individual forms had almost ceased to be distinguishable through the sombre shade. The Psalm which Dr. Chalmers had chosen was the 43rd. He began at that touching and beautiful line—and as the words sounded through the hall, the sun, escaping from behind his cloudy covering, and darting his brilliant beams through the windows which pierced the roof, turned on the instant the preceding darkness into day. It was one of those incidents which only superstition could misunderstand, but which, at the same time, is entitled to its own place among the traits of the picturesque which belonged to the scenes we are describing.'—JOHN KER.

O send Thy light forth and Thy truth,

REFERENCES.—XLIII. 3.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, pp. 162, 170. XLIII. 3, 4. Ibid. pp. 103, 120. XLIII. 4.—H. Scott Holland, Logic and Life, p. 99. E. Paxton Hood, Dark Sayings on a Harp, p. 101. J. P. Gladstone, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxvi. p. 364.

THE PSALMIST'S REMONSTRANCE WITH HIS SOUL

'Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope in God: for I shall yet praise Him, the health of my countenance, and my God.'—PSALM XLIII. 5.

THREE times does the Psalmist take himself to task and question himself as to the reasonableness of the emotions that are surging in his soul, and checks these by higher considerations.

I. Moods and emotions should be examined and governed by a higher self. It is necessary to keep a very tight hand upon all our feelings, whether they be the natural desires of the sensuous part of our nature, or whether they be the sentiments of sadness and doubt, or anxiety or perplexity which are the natural results of outward circumstances of trial; or whether, on the contrary they be the bright and buoyant ones which come, like angels, along with prosperous hours.

II. There are two ways of looking at causes of dejection and disquiet. 'My soul' has been talking two whole Psalms to explain why it is cast down. After all these have been said again and again the Psalmist says to himself, 'Come now, let us hear it all once more, Why art thou cast down?' There is a court of appeal in each man which tests and tries his reasons for his moods; and these which look very sufficient to the flesh, turn out to be very insufficient when investigated and tested by the higher spirit or self. We should 'appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober'.

III. No reasons for being cast down are so strong as those for elation and calm hope. 'Try to realize what God is to yourselves—'My God,' and 'the health of my countenance'. That will stimulate sluggish feeling; that will calm disturbed emotion.

IV. The effort to lay hold on the truth which calms is to be repeated in spite of failures. A moment of tranquillity interrupts the agitation of the Psalmist's soul, but is soon followed by the recurrence of 'the horrible storm' that 'begins afresh'. But the guiding self keeps the hand firm on the tiller, notwithstanding the wash of the water and the rolling of the ship, and the dominant will conquers at last.—A. MACLAREN, Christ's Musts, p. 210.

REFERENCE.—XLIII. 5.—H. P. Liddon, Old Testament Outlines, p. 111.

PSALM XLIII.

THIS Psalm was chanted in the church at Milan, A.D. 387, when Augustine was baptized by Ambrose.—JOHN KER.

GOD'S DOINGS IN THE TIME OF OLD

'We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, what Thou hast done in the time of old.'—PSALM XLIV. 1.

WHAT God has been to us men we know from history. We know then from history what He will be to us. Now to apply this there are three departments of human life in which this recurrence to the past is of great religious value.

I. First there is the family, resting on God's own ordinance, springing out of the most intimate and sacred ties that can unite human beings. Every family has its traditions of the past—has its encouragements and its warnings, its splendid memories of devotion and virtue, and too often its skeletons in the cupboard, and all this is part of the providential teaching intended for each member of the family.

II. And then there is our country. And here we have to remember what we too often forget, that God shapes the destinies of every nation just as truly as he did that of Judah and Israel. The Hebrews felt God's presence in their history much more vividly than we do. They saw and adored His power, where we fix our gaze exclusively on the history and material agencies which He employs. Nevertheless, history is not less in England than in Palestine a revelation of the ways of God; there have been times in our English history when this has been felt, in the agony of hope or of fear which a great national danger will produce. Such a time was the threatened invasion of the Spanish Armada. Such, again, was the crisis of the struggle with the first Napoleon which preceded Trafalgar. We who live in these quiet times can scarcely understand how our forefathers were then thrown back in very deed upon the protecting arm of God—how they felt that, if any was to save them, He must, and how this belief in His presence and aid nerved them at the crisis of the struggle against faintheartedness and indecision and bound their hearts together with a sacred strength in love to their country and to Him, their God. It should be part of every young Englishman's education to trace God's hand in the annals of his country—to see, amid its dangers and its triumphs, in its temporary failures, in its consistent advance, in the gradual development of its institutions, and the extensions of equal rights and advantages to all classes of people, without the revolutionary shocks which have desolated other lands, His hand who of old led His people through the wilderness like a flock, and brought them out safely that they should not fear, and overwhelmed their enemies at sea.

III. And then there is the great and sacred home of souls—the Church of Jesus Christ. Church history is a vast treasure-house of sacred experience, well fitted to encourage the desponding, to determine the wavering, to put down with a firm hand the suggestions of selfish doubt, to kindle up in many a soul great enthusiasms for truth and goodness. They lose much who know little or nothing of it—who know not what it is to stand in spirit at the side of martyrs like Ignatius and Polycarp—to follow the mental anguish of Augustine which preceded his conversion, to do justice to the sanctified intellect, to the dauntless courage, of Athanasius when he is struggling with an apostatizing world. We catch from these great souls something of their devotion to our adorable Master—something of their fervour, of their grace, as we exclaim, with deep reverence, 'O God, we have heard with our ears, and our fathers have told us, what thou hast done in the time of old'.—H. P. LIDDON, The Penny Pulpit, vol. xiii. p. 189.

REFERENCES.—XLIV. 1.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 263. H. M. Butler, Harrow School Sermon (2nd Series), p. 157. Parker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxiii. p. 216. J. W. Burgon, Ninety-one Short Sermons, No. 90. XLIV. 3.—S. Martin, Westminster Chapel Pulpit (3rd Series), No. 13. XLIV. 21.—R. C. Trench, Sermons in Westminster Abbey, p. 261. XLIV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 374. XLV. 5.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 173. S. Martin, Westminster Chapel Pulpit (4th Series), No. 12. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 80.

THE PATTERN OF HUMAN GLADNESS

'Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity. God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows. —PSALM XLV. 7.

WE are not accustomed to think of Christ as the pattern of human gladness, but He was so.

I. The earthly life of Christ, even in its sorrows, was a life of unparalleled joy. What were the leading characteristics of the life of our Lord in their bearing in this connexion?

(a) The consciousness of constant Divine communion. Communion with God is gladness.

(b) Obedience to the will of God is joy. The habit of recognizing the Divine will in all things has a power to make us glad.

(c) Purity is joy. Freedom from an accusing conscience, freedom from unbridled desires is happiness.

(d) Love is joy. The oblivion of self, the act of self-sacrifice is joy.

II. The heavenly life is a life of joy, perfected by sorrows past. The gladness of the heavenly manhood of the Lord lies in the continuous extension of the benefits of His death, and in all the glory and triumph which His human soul there possesses.

III. The joy of the Lord on earth and in heaven is granted through His sorrow to sorrowing men. For earth we may receive communion with God, forgiveness, and holiness; for heaven the share in His triumph. Our earthly life can never be pure and uninterrupted gladness, but its gladness may be most real and deep.—A. MACLAREN.

REFERENCES.—XLV. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1273. XLV. 8.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 46. XLV. 9.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 129. XLV. 11.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 55. XLV. 13.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 140. XLV. 13-15.—J. A. Aston, Early Witness to Gospel Truth, pp. 76, 94.

FATHERS AND CHILDREN

'Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth.'—PSALM XLV. 16.

I. THE message contains a very obvious, but sometimes overlooked fact, viz. that within the compass of a few brief years our places as parents, as citizens, as business men, will be occupied by others. For us the struggle and discipline and activity will be over; we shall have played our part for good or ill on the stage of human action. There will be a new County Council, a new Parliament, a new England; new merchants, manufacturers, tradesmen, labourers; new missionaries, pastors, teachers, church officers; a new set of men and women for God to rule and Christ to save. Those of us who are now over thirty and live fifty years longer will see all this.

II. And the part of that fact which is supremely important to us is, that the men and women of the future are with us. They are not going to swoop down upon us from some other clime, and drive us out when we are feeble and old. We have them now under our influence in our homes and schools; we are handling and shaping to-day the material for the future.

III. This, however, is only on the surface, and the next important lesson conveyed by the text is its assurance of an unbroken line of godly men and women. The workers of yesterday are gone; they grew weary, and God gathered them into His rest. The workers of to-day will follow them, but there will be workers to-morrow—a new strong race, vigorous in piety, clear in faith, eager in philanthropy, wise in method, spiritual in temper and aim. God lives, and He is still making men in His own image and likeness, and still calling them with an effectual calling to Himself.

IV. The coming generations of Christian people will be more than equal to the present or past generation. God will not only have a people of His own in the days to come, but a people more truly His own, nobler, purer, more like Himself than any preceding generation has ever been.

It is recorded in classic story that once when the Spartans were defeated, and the king demanded fifty of their children as hostages, they replied, 'We would rather give you one hundred of our most distinguished men.' It was an answer that indicated their unbounded faith in the future generation. They had been defeated, but they looked to their children to conquer. They had done their best, but they believed their children would do better. They had such profound faith in the future that it seemed to them that fifty children were of more value than a hundred fathers. It seems perhaps a strange preference, but do you not think it is true to the universal instincts of men? are we not always looking to, and building upon, the coming generation?—C. BROWN, Light and Life, p. 121.

REFERENCES.—XLV. 16.—J. Edmond, Christian World Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 161. XLV. 17.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 149. XLV. 19.—G. H. Morrison, The Scottish Review, vol. i. p. 338. XLV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 383.

GOD A REFUGE

'God is our refuge and strength.'—PSALM XLVI. 1.

THE Psalmist who wrote these words knew the happiness of their meaning, for the life into which God does not enter cannot be, in the deepest sense, happy. Yet the very name of religion has grown distasteful to many. Why is this?

'If I were to become what is called religious,' say some, 'I should be expected to give up my innocent enjoyments, to subscribe much out of my limited means which I cannot afford, to surrender to some extent my masculine freedom of action and my individual liberty of thought, to attend continually at services or meetings where what is said has but little real bearing on my actual daily life, and for which I have not the time, or if I have, I am too tired to wish for anything but rest. I look round on many of the churches, and I find that while claim is made of interest in my spiritual welfare, few show any desire to sacrifice the slightest personal comfort in order to help me in little things. I want less of the moralist and more of the man, less of theology and more true, broad-minded sympathy, less of the claim that religion is ancient, and more evidence that religion is modern, worth its salt to-day, and in living touch with present needs. Most of my daily experience has shown me that some who profess to be religious can be selfish, self-satisfied, fault-finding, and disagreeable. No, to speak plainly, if to be religious involves all this, I would much rather not be so.'

I. Here it is that the mistake is made. To think thus is like judging a noble portrait by a caricature. Do not let us look at the poor, human faulty copies, let us turn away from man to God. Open the New Testament, read there in those pages of the Gospels the life of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. There you will see for yourself what true religion is, in that wonderful, perfect life of the Master. He went about doing good. True religion is not a mere profession, an assent or feeling. It is a love. True religion is to do the Will of God, to believe Him, and to follow Jesus Christ, to be tender-hearted, kind, forgiving, gentle, easy to be entreated, in thought to put ourselves in others' places, and to treat them as we ourselves would be treated. We are not asked to attempt the impracticable, or what the conditions of our life make impossible. True religion does not lay an additional burden on lives already taxed to the full. True religion only asks us to give up what is bad, bad in itself, bad in making us unhappy. There is intemperance. Yes, it must be given up; if not, there must be ruined health, lost peace, misery to others, and a premature grave. There is bad language. This, too, must go. Put down that in principle, once for all, and rein yourself in when the old habit crops up again and tries to be too strong. Betting and gambling, again, always in the end ruin those who follow them. Where in fighting such foes as these shall we find help but in God, in the personal experience of the sweet, strong words, 'God is our refuge and strength?'

II. Our Refuge. Probably the experience of some is in union with those who are surrounded by lack of sympathy and lack of appreciation. It is a blessed thing to know Jesus Christ, the Friend who sticketh closer than a brother. God is our refuge from isolation and from human misunderstanding. Again, it is a hard, but it is a Divine, lesson to be calm and restrained under wrongful blame, a difficult, but a splendid victory. God is our refuge from provocation. Again, everything around us changes. The world itself is but for a time. We ourselves grow old and change, but Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and to-day, yea, and for ever, and he that doeth the Will of God abideth for ever. God is our refuge from change. Then there is that terrible thing called sin, the remembrance of good left undone and of evil done. Christ died, that, believing on Him, sin might be put away. The forgiveness of sins is offered to us in Jesus Christ our Saviour. God is our refuge from sin. And when sickness comes, when the wife or the child is taken, when work is slack and expenses go on and the income is but small, if we can but look up to the face of our Father, without Whom not a sparrow falls to the ground, and say, 'Thou, O God, art my Refuge in the day of trouble,' God is then our refuge from sorrow. And God is our refuge from uncertainty. The agnostic and the materialist may excel in what is called destructive criticism, in declaring what is not; but when pressed to say what is, they are generally silent. By looking in the wrong way, the wise have never found, and, what is more, they never will find out God, because He reveals Himself to the childlike in heart, and His revelation addresses itself to the whole of our nature and not to one part, to the warm, loving heart, as well as to the cold, scoffing intellect. To the Greeks and Romans, as to the modern sceptic, everything was uncertain; but to the humblest believer light is sprung up in the darkness, for God is our refuge from doubt and from uncertainty.

REFERENCES.—XLVI. 1.—J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 94. C. Kingsley, All Saints' Day and other Sermons, p. 200. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, A Year's Plain Sermons, p. 406. Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 124. XLVI. 1, 2.—H. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxv. p. 314. C. Kingsley, The Water of Life, p. 228.

THE RIVER OF GOD

'There is a river, the streams whereof make glad the city of God.'—PSALM XLVI. 4.

THE River and the City hold such a place in Scripture that they cannot pass as mere casual illustrations. We read how in Paradise the streams of a river watered the garden. But what shall we specially associate with this river? We may be helped to find our way here if we take along with us a figure used to set forth the position and character of the children of God. They are compared to trees, trees from which fruit was expected and was found.

I. It is to be feared that some of us have no faith practically in the doctrine of the river. There is no true spiritual life that does not include a thirst for living water; there is no true faith that does not include an earnest belief that the river flows full of quickening and comfort; there is no true Christian progress that is not progress in understanding that there is a river, and that the streams of it make glad the city of God.

II. Some may be discouraged because they know so little of this blessing, because they seem to fail in any actual enjoyment of it. And you would not help them much by suggesting that they themselves may be to blame for wilfulness or unwatchfulness which have undone their peace. Think of the blessedness which this is designed to carry into the hearts and lives of men, which should be yours if you could, as it were, reach it, and then lay hold of this, that 'there is a river' and in that faith wait on God from Whom it flows.

III. If this river of God flows for us why should we be so weak as many of us are? How we fail to believe in earnest what we do in some sense believe. When He sets before our eyes more distinctly sins that must be mortified, duties that must be faced, and when we feel something in the heart stir, as commonly it will, to resist that call—we say to ourselves 'this is not pleasant, this is not like the river of God, this promises toil and the dust of battle'—whereas, indeed, that to which God calls us is the only road to the fuller experience of what the river of God can be, and can do for us.

REFERENCES.—XLVI. 4.—T. Sadler, Sunday Thoughts, p. 65. D. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xviii. p. 278. XLVI.—A. Maclaren, Sermons Preached at Manchester (3rd Series), p. 45. XLVI. 6.—F. W. Farrar, Silence and the Voices of God, p. 51. XLVI. 8, 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 190. XLVI. 10.—J. Keble, Miscellaneous Sermons, p. 363. J. Owen, Christian World Pulpit, 1891, p. 285. F. D. Maurice, Sermons, vol. iii. p. 239. J. C. M. Bellow, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 362. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (7th Series), p. 46. R. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. i. p. 17.

THE LORD OF HOSTS, THE GOD OF JACOB

'The Lord of Hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge.'—PSALM XLVI. 11.

THERE is in these words a significant duplication of idea, both in regard of the names which are given to God, and of that which He is conceived as being to us; and I desire now simply to try to bring out the force of the consolation and strength which lie in these two epithets of His and in the double wonder of His relation to us men.

I. First, then, look at the twin thoughts of God that are here. 'The Lord of Hosts'—'The God of Jacob'. What 'hosts' are they of which God is the Lord? I think that by that title the prophets and Psalmists meant to express the universal dominion of God over the whole universe in all its battalions and sections, which they conceived of as one ranked army, obedient to the voice of the great General and Ruler of them all. Next we turn from the wide sweep of that mighty name to the other 'The God of Jacob'. Whilst the one speaks to us of infinite power, of absolute supremacy, the other speaks to us of gentle and loving specific care, and holds out the hope that between man and God there may be a bond of friendship and a mutual possession so sweet and sacred that nothing else can compare with it.

II. Note, secondly, the double wonder of our relation to the great God. 'The Lord of Hosts is with us.' What does that say? It proclaims that wondrous truth that no gulf between the mighty Ruler of all and us has any power of separating us from Him. Through all the ages Christ Himself is with every soul that loves Him; and He will dwell beside us and bless us and keep us. And then the second wonder that is here set forth in regard to our relations to Him is, 'The God of Jacob is our Refuge'. The story of the past is the prophecy of the future. What God has been to any man He will be to every man, if the man will let Him. He will not suffer sin upon us; He will pass us through the fire and the water; and do anything with us short of destroying us in order to destroy the sin that is in us. He smites with judgment and sends us sorrows for our profit that we should be partakers of His holiness. We may write this as the explanation over most of our griefs—'The God of Jacob is our Refuge' and He is disciplining us.—A. MACLAREN, The God of the Amen, p. 226.

REFERENCE.—XLVI. 11.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (7th Series), p. 129.

PSALM XLVI.

BEFORE the battle of Leipsic, 17 September, 1631, Gustavus Adolphus asked his whole army to sing Luther's hymn, and after the victory he thanked God that the word was made good, 'The field He will maintain it'.

HEINE called Luther's hymn the Marseillaise of the Reformation.

REFERENCES.—XLVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 393. XLVII. 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 33. E. Paxton Hood, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxiii. p.

849. XLVII. 7.—H. M. Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 142. W. G. Horder, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxvi. p. 309. XLVII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 397. XLVIII. 3.—W. Arnot, The Anchor of the Soul, p. 138. XLVIII. 8.—J. Keble, Sermons from Ascension Day to Trinity, p. 161.

THE SUBJECT OF MEDITATION

(A Communion Sermon)

'We have thought on Thy loving-kindness, O God, in the midst of Thy Temple.'—PSALM XLVIII. 9.

THIS Psalm is a song of triumph, when Jerusalem was saved from some impending danger. The theme is that God is the safety of Zion, the impregnable city, made such by the loving care of God.

I. Into the temple the joyful people surge to give vent to their feelings of gratitude and triumph. Where else can they go with such fitness but to the sanctuary which stands to them as the very heart of their religion? And what is more fitting than that they should before all else give thanks to God? Such deliverance drives the pious heart to God, to think sweetly of His loving-kindness. They go up to the temple to think of it, lovingly, gratefully, humbly, prayerfully. Shallow souls let even great events pass without real thought, without notice, without making them an occasion for going deeper into life, deeper into the mystery and wonder of God's providence, and deeper into their own hearts. They do not consider the true inward significance of what yet strikes them as marvellous.

II. Here in this Psalm, after the great deliverance, the Psalmist feels that the first thing to do, the first thing to think, is praise, grateful thanksgiving. And what fitter theme could there be for us as we come to take in our hands the symbols of God's love in Christ Jesus? Let us make our Communion season one grateful meditation on this grandest of all themes. There can be no better preparation beforehand, and no more appropriate frame of mind during the act than this. We come to meditate on God's loving kindness. That sums up everything, all we would like to do, all we would like to feel. In the light of the deathless love which shines through the simple form of this memorial rite, should not complete trust fill our hearts now and confidence for the future illumine our path?

III. Whether we look back or forward, within or without, is not thanksgiving our appropriate state? What can we think of in the presence of the tokens of love but of Him and His loving-kindness? Let the breaking of the bread and the pouring out of the wine stand to us as they should for all that Christ has brought us, the forgiveness of sins, peace with God, reconciliation, hope of glory, all the rich and glorious elements of Divine love. When we come to the table, we will think of Thy loving-kindness, O God, in the midst of Thy temple. From the burning heart of love, shown to us there, we see love everywhere. We see that life is surrounded by God, that we are engirded, enswathed, encompassed by the love of God, beset behind and before. On that love we will meditate: on it we will feed: we will seek to get from it comfort and peace and hope and strength for new obedience. We have but one thought, in the midst of the temple, amid the sacred mysteries of the temple: namely, His loving-kindness.—HUGH BLACK, Christ's Service of Love, p. 254.

TOWERS OF ZION

'Walk about Zion, and go round about her: tell the towers thereof.'—PSALM XLVIII. 12.

THIS is a Psalm full of the most joyful spirit and expressed in the very best way. We do not know what great deliverance was thus splendidly celebrated; it may have been the deliverance in the days of Jehoshaphat, which was very signal and very marked; it may have been that in the days of Hezekiah, which was more signal and more marked still. The two points are that God is a sure refuge to His people when they seek His grace and power; and that it is more distinctly connected with Jerusalem, the central city of the kingdom and the people.

'Let Mount Zion rejoice,' sings the Psalmist, 'let the daughters of Judah be glad, because of Thy judgments'. And so, he continues, 'let us walk about Zion, let us go round about her, let us tell the towers thereof'.

But to come to our own times. What are the towers of our own Zion, of our own Church? What are the bulwarks of our religion? There is a great deal, of course, that is common to the whole Church of God throughout the world.

I. There is the Presence of God Himself.—The Lord is there. It is His presence which makes it His Church; it is His presence which makes it His holy Church.

II. There is the Faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, clearly understood and fully grasped and held. A very important matter. It may not always be expressed in exactly the same words, but it has the same life, the same power, and the same salvation.

III. There are the Holy Scriptures.—Whatever may be said now of the form and manner in which they were delivered and have come down to us, they are the fount of knowledge of God. It is from these words, blessed and illumined by the Holy Spirit, that we gain the further knowledge of salvation and grace and hope. There are parts of the Holy Scriptures of which we may read verse after verse which seem to convey very little to us, and then suddenly there is one illumined with the grace and power of God, which seems to strike the very inward conscience and experience of the heart.

IV. There are the Means of Grace.—How very important it is to us that we should really use them not merely as Christian duties to be performed, but that we should use them as an approach unto the very presence of God, from which we are to learn and by which we are to be strengthened.

V. There are the Examples of Christian People.—How very delightful they are. We see what men and women may be who are of like passions with ourselves; we see their self-denial, their devotion, their unworldliness, their unselfishness; we see their readiness to think and plan what shall be for the best advantage of others, and what shall most conduce to the glory of God. How delightful it is that we have this long stream of saints and Christians behind us, not merely painted in windows or standing before us as statues, as memorials of the past, but those whom we ourselves know, perhaps in the ordinary and humble walks of life. There is no walk of life in which the grace of God is more clearly seen than when persons of little education and little position are truly inspired with the love and the grace of our Blessed Lord; it makes them often shame those who have more privileges and who perhaps have a clearer understanding of the theories and the facts of redemption.

LISTENING TO GOD

'I will incline my ear to a parable.'—PSALM XLIX. 4.

IN this Psalm the subject is the great and dark problem of Divine providence. The Psalmist tells us in his introduction that he will open the dark saying, the riddle on the harp. He pierces through the surface of things to declare the utter vanity of life without God. He tells us frankly that it is not by argument he arrives at this certitude but by inspiration. He has listened to the wisdom that is from above, and so has truth to declare. This is the attitude of a true Teacher, that he is a Learner: opens his ear morning by morning to receive the right impressions. A great preacher used to say that in preaching the thing of least importance was the sermon. I suppose what he meant was that it is not what he says but himself that counts most—the spiritual atmosphere he creates, the indefinable impression of earnestness and seriousness and conviction. In all prophetic speech there is a subtle spirit which communicates itself to disciples, and which the teacher himself will lose if he forgets his true attitude. It is not what we say, but the spirit of our saying it, and this is true in the final judgment not only of speech but of all life.

I. In the higher reaches of all truth a moment of insight is of more worth than a year of laborious learning. Certainly in religion no door is opened except to those who bend, who wait, who incline their ear. That is why the child is the type of the kingdom of heaven, the mind that is open to the daily lesson, that morning by morning receives its portion, that sweetly accepts the teaching of the Master. The secret of wisdom and power and knowledge is humility. The secret of influence is simplicity. We learn to speak the high language of the soul as a child learns.

II. There is a moment which came to the prophets and to men called to exceptional work, a moment when the world has dissolved, when the earth has faded, and heaven has opened and reveals the eternal, a moment when in all the universe there seems nothing but God and the human soul. That moment altered the perspective of everything afterwards:

they read everything in the light of that moment, and when in the future they were brought up against seemingly impassable difficulties and things that seemed irreconcilable with their faith they simply fell back on God. It is the old story, you say; a plea for faith. Yes, a plea for faith. But be sure you know what faith is before you dismiss it contemptuously. It is to have the ear of a learner, the heart of a child, to listen to the Father's voice.

III. The highest truths are not reached by analysis. The deepest appeal is not made to logic but to imagination; not to intellect, but to heart. This is true not only in religion, but in everything. To know and love flowers is a simpler and higher thing than to understand the botany of flowers. And to know and love Christ is a simpler and higher thing than to understand Christology. Let us not kill the poet in us for the lack of listening and looking; the poet that dies so young in most of us. We do not find the deep truths of life, they find us. This is how the contemplative life breeds in men a richer wisdom, mellowed, sweeter than all worldly activities however varied can achieve. Surrender is the first word and the last word in this process. That surrender is faith.—HUGH BLACK.

REFERENCES.—XLIX. 4.—E. Paxton Hood, Dark Sayings on a Harp, p. 1. XLIX. 7.—T. K. Cheyne, Expositor (3rd Series), vol. ii. p. 400. XLIX. 8.—Bishop Bickersteth, Sermons, p. 1. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 22. XLIX. 11, 12.—Bishop Bethell, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 102. XLIX. 17.—R. C. Trench, Sermons in Westminster Abbey, p. 364.

SUCCESS

'For while he lived he counted himself a happy man: and so long as thou doest well unto thyself, men will speak good of thee.'—PSALM XLIX. 18.

'NOTHING succeeds like success' is a proverb invented by a famous man of the world, and the truth of it from the world's point of view there is no denying. It seems indeed to find something of sanction in some words of our Lord, applied not only to the secular but to the spiritual life, when He said, 'To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath'. The truth of this saying our Lord vindicated, as we know, by His parable of the talents, in which we are reminded that one who makes use of his gifts, spiritually or mentally, develops in exact ratio to the merits of that use; whereas one who spurns them eventually forfeits them. This is the Divine law of failure and success, and it rests on a just sequence of cause and effect. The world does not trouble about just sequences of cause and effect, it simply looks at results, and usually it does not trouble to inquire too closely into the honesty of those results. And so we see, as a matter of fact, how essentially different is Christ's saying, 'To him that hath shall be given'.

I. The Uncertainty of Success.—In our text we have first the fact and secondly the motive of that success which is of the earth earthy. Its motive is selfishness, doing well to oneself, looking after one's own interests, and making them the supreme consideration. Then again its nature is to be satisfied with present temporal conditions, not to trouble about any higher life than that of the time and sense. The most striking feature about this 49th Psalm is the author's firm conviction that in a future state the scale of fortune will be readjusted. Nowhere else do we find the Jewish writer contentedly permitting the final issue of the adjustment of the things of this world to the life beyond the grave. What we find asserted here so strongly is the unreality of the success which is not achieved on the eternal principles of righteousness. How true to life and experience is that expression, 'He counted himself a happy man'. How it brings out the situation of contented enjoyment, which is assumed in place of the genuine thing; the affectation of interest for the sake of mere appearance; the hypocritical sentiments mouthed out in order that the world may exclaim, 'What a noble fellow is here!' And yet there is always the haunting, ever-present consciousness of secret failure, the knowledge that nothing is quite what it seems.

II. The Intrinsic Worth of Success.—We can only say, then, that failure and success in this world are too often but uncertain and capricious things. The all-important question for each is that which concerns the intrinsic worth of success in life. 'For while he lived he counted himself a happy man.' The inference is, I suppose, that when he died he found out his mistake. The answer that follows is full of irony: 'So long as thou doest well unto thyself, men will speak good of thee'; of course they will. All the world cares about is that you should keep up appearances. Look at the ideal man on the Exchange! He just took care of himself and feathered his own nest. Or again the ideal of society! Is he a man of honour and moral worth? Is he a pure and chivalrous gentleman? not a bit. He may be a toady who toadies openly but tactfully: his sole merit is that he knows how to make the most of himself, that he can persuade people to take him at his own valuation—he can flatter people so successfully that they suspect nothing. It is his success that compels their homage. And the same vaunting world is not slow to extend its appreciation to success achieved by its own methods even in the very presence of Christ. There is the religious partisan who prays for every one but himself, and to whom no conscience is sacred but his own. The world rewards him with its votes.

III. The Right Side to Success.—Nevertheless there is a right and wholesome side to the world's worship of success, for surely we were not sent here to court failure. There is a depreciation of success that is nothing but unreasoning affectation. It boasts of the so-called failure of the Cross, forgetting that our Lord's ministry on earth ended not with the Cross but with the resurrection and the ascension. Christ never speaks of failure, but looks forward to the restoration of all things. What the Christian should deprecate is not success, but sham, false success—the success which does not last, that which is of the earth earthy. We know that the ancient Laodiceans had this in common with modern England, that they were given over to those temporal pleasures of which we have been speaking. Yet what does the Spirit say to the Church and to us: 'Be zealous therefore, and repent. Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man hear My voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with Me.'

REFERENCES.—XLIX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 405. L. 3.—T. J. Madden, Addresses to All Sorts and Conditions of Men, p. 58. L. 5.—J. Keble, Village Sermons on the Baptismal Service, p. 135. L. 11.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Children's Bread, p. 95. L. 12.—D. G. Watt, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxvii. p. 292. L. 14, 15.—J. L. Richardson, Sermons for Harvest, p. 62. L. 15.—C. Bradley, The Christian Life, p. 113. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxv. No. 1505 and vol. xxxi. No. 1876. L. 21.—T. J. Madden, Addresses to All Sorts and Conditions of Men, p. 58. C. J. Vaughan, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 321. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 137. J. C. Miller, Penny Pulpit, No. 771.

THE SACRIFICE OF THANKSGIVING

'Whoso offereth the sacrifice of thanksgiving glorifieth Me: and to him that ordereth his conversation aright I will shew the salvation of God.'—PSALM L. 23.

I. 'WHAT is it to glorify God?' 'When and how do we glorify God?' This question is constantly rising before us, for we know this is our business as disciples of Jesus Christ. 'Whoso offereth praise, whoso offereth thanksgiving, glorifies God.' That is the Divine answer. Then we ask, What is the sacrifice of praise? Praise has a thousand voices. The songful lip expresses itself in myriad ways; but the essence of every sacrifice is the adoring, grateful, and joyous offering of ourselves on the altar of God, our exceeding joy in glad acceptance of all His holy will; it is a joyful welcome to that will, not a hesitating submission to it, as right in itself and as carrying all who receive it towards righteousness and thus towards blessedness.

II. The Religion of the whole Psalter. Look at these songs. They are sacrifices of thanksgiving. The tremendous burden of living is never ignored, the attacks of bitter enemies are admitted, but there is over all and through all a glad recognition of God's sovereignty of life, and a deep delight in His redeeming sway. The religion of the Psalms is the religion of thanksgiving of triumphant joy in God; and the book itself is, excepting one, the best commentary upon the words, 'Whoso offereth praise glorifieth God'. That other and better exposition is the New Testament. It takes the songs of the prophet poets and sets them in a new key. It is the fruit, no doubt, of the principles which Christianity takes up out of the Old Testament; but it is expressed with greater clearness and force in the concrete example of Jesus Christ Himself, and demonstrated in a great series of historic facts of which He is the centre and the source. Gauge the severity of the persecutions which they had to endure, and which Paul himself admitted were such as almost to 'unnerve them,' yet to them he said, 'Be always joyful'. 'In everything give thanks, for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you.'

III. The Gospel brings Life to Light. There are four principles in Christianity, which, being recognized, make it possible, I will not say easy, for us to take this attitude, for nothing that is worth having is obtained with ease.

(a) 'The Gospel brings Light to Life,' shows it as it really is, and what it is meant for; even our spiritual emancipation, education, perfection, and that all the things that go to make it are intended for the refining of our character and fashioning it after the pattern which is given to us in Christ Jesus.

(b) The second thing that Christianity tells us is that God is in this life right through it; that His redemptive purpose on Calvary underlies it, runs through it, mounts to the top of it; that the whole significance of life is redemptive, that God is getting rid of the sin and the evil of the world.

(c) Thirdly, Christianity inspires a man to make the fullest use of his life. Life according to Christ is opportunity for service, a chance of being and doing something that shall issue in the advancement of mankind.

(d) Still further does it go. It sustains in bearing life's burdens, in carrying life's crosses, and in fighting life's battles. It gives us the true perspective, places us where we can best learn the supreme truths that count, and construct the true interpretation of facts. —J. CLIFFORD, Baptist Times and Freeman, 1905, p. 351.

REFERENCES.—L. 23.—H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 1495, p. 97. S. Cox, Expositions (3rd Series), p. 152. L. International Critical Commentary, vol. i. p. 414. LI. 1.—G. Forbes, The Voice of God in the Psalms, p. 173.

THE NATURE AND POSSIBILITY OF FORGIVENESS

'Have mercy upon me, O God, after Thy great goodness: according to the multitude of Thy mercies do away mine offences. Wash me thoroughly from my wickedness: and cleanse me from my sin.'—PSALM LI. 1, 2.

I. THE Forgiveness of Sins is an article of the Creed. It has its place in the short summary of great truths in which we profess as Christians to believe. Note the significance of this fact. We do not express our belief in what is obvious: the things we believe are truths which God has made known to us, that men did not and could not find out for themselves.

II. Now this consideration does not at all fit in, you will recognize, with the way in which a great many people speak and think about the Forgiveness of Sins. This they regard as the most obvious thing in the world, it is to their mind perfectly natural and easy, something to be taken for granted rather than treated as a subject of Christian revelation and belief.

What we call moral evil may after all only be a step, in many cases a necessary step, upward to goodness. We must have some experience of evil before we can choose goodness, so they argue.

III. Now against any such light view of sin as this, however plausibly it may be urged, a healthy conscience protests as fallacious. We recognize sin to be something more than a mistake in the sphere of morals. A mistake indeed it is, egregious folly, missing the true end of our life, supposing that to be valuable which is really worthless or hurtful, but it is a mistake for which we are, in part at least, responsible. It is by our own great fault that we have sinned.

IV. It is well worth while to note that there is a great deal in modern thought to confirm these protests of conscience, a great deal that is utterly opposed to the popular and easy regard of sin. Note two points:—

(a) We are learning to recognize increasingly the reign of law. Things are as they are, not by chance, but as the expression of unfailing laws. This applies to the sphere of morals as well as to the material universe. God's commandments are not arbitrarily laid down.

(b) There is the law of habit as well as the law of retribution. There are those who would say, any restoration is impossible. Heredity, environment, and habit are too strong.

V. Here comes in the Christian religion declaring that these things are possible, however difficult. And the Christian Church points to instances of men and women, individuals and communities in whose experience this promise has been realized. The forgiveness of sins, then, though difficult, has been made possible.

VI. From what has been said you will recognize that

(a) While forgiveness is not the easy thing that popular religion often represents it,

(b) It is at the same time something far grander, much more worthy of God to bestow, of man to seek. Forgiveness contains two elements. It is no mere letting off of punishments or remitting of debt. It is restoration as well as acquittal.

REFERENCES.—LI. 1, 2.—A. Maclaren, Sermons Preached in Manchester (2nd Series), p. 95. LI. 3.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (2nd Series), p. 310. J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (1st Series), p. 42. Bishop Alexander, Bampton Lectures, 1876, p. 71. A. C. Tait, Lessons for School Life, p. 249. LI. 3, etc.—A. B. Davidson, Waiting Upon God, p. 55. LI. 3.—J. H. Jellott, The Elder Son, p. 254. J. Keble, Sermons for Sundays after Trinity, part I. p. 188.

SIN AGAINST GOD

'Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned, and done that which is evil in Thy sight, that Thou mayest be justified when Thou speakest, and be clear when Thou judgest.'—PSALM LI. 4.

This fifty-first Psalm reveals a human soul in its agony, convicted of sin, and flinging itself on the eternal mercy of God. It belongs to all the centuries, and as long as men struggle with temptation and fall beneath the burden of sin will it voice their need of pardon and their hope in God.

I. The truth on which this Psalmist laid hold was the fact that sin is a breach of the Divine order, a transgression of the Divine law, and that whatever may be said or thought about its effects in the sphere of human relations, it is essentially rebellion against that holy will which rules over all. We sin against God in every act of evil, because it is His law we break and His will we oppose.

II. This truth that sin is against God does not move us as it ought to do, largely, I think, for two reasons.

(a) We feel the insignificance of our lives compared to the life of God. When we think of God we are overwhelmed by his infinitude. And though perhaps we dare not give expression to the thought, we feel in our hearts that our sin cannot be of much importance to one so great. And sometimes there comes the half-suppressed thought that He Who cannot fall, and who knows nothing of weakness or sin, ought not to judge mortals like ourselves.

(b) We do feel that our sins, if they hurt anyone, injure ourselves and our fellows. We feel and many say that in the past men have said too much about sin against God, and have overlooked the fact that it is man who is hurt.

III. We are no longer moved by the thought of 'Moral Governor of the universe' as men were once. We do not deny that God is that. But for the reasons I have given it does not exert the same influence on us as in the past. And, after all, it is not the deepest truth about God. We must come to the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ before we can say from our hearts, knowing and realizing to the full, all the social consequences of our wrongdoing. The cross of Jesus means many things, but it means this above all, that God is in the world, and that our sin touches Him, that it wounds Him and that He suffers.

THE PSALM OF THE PENITENT

'Against Thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight.'—PSALM LI. 4.

THERE is nothing surprising about David's sin: there is something very wonderful in his penitence.

I. 'There is the simple confession, 'I have sinned'. It is comparatively seldom that a man makes this confession without qualification or reserve. It is a great day for a man when, for a moment, seeing himself in the light of God, seeing his own imperfections, his own sinfulness, whatever it may be, he can cast aside the vain excuses by which he has tried, like Adam, to hide himself among the trees of the garden, and, in deep self-abasement, can make the open confession, 'I will arise and go unto My Father,' and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned before Heaven and against Thee, and am no more worthy to be called Thy son'. It is a rough path, which must be trodden with bleeding feet, but the way is homewards, Godwards, and the end is peace.

II. But let us notice the peculiar nature of the sin which the Psalmist confesses. It is an offence, so it would seem, not so much against God as his fellow-men, and yet his words are emphatic. 'Against Thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight.' We are accustomed to the service of man being set in opposition or contrast to the service of God. The Psalmist looks deeper. He has learnt the great truth that he can only honour man by honouring the Divine element in him, that in injuring man he has injured Him who is the only source of man's greatness. This is the truth which the Incarnation has brought, or ought to have brought, much nearer to us than it was to David, 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto these, ye did it unto Me.'—H. R. GAMBLE, Christianity and Common Life, p. 85.

REFERENCES.—LI. 4.—E. B. Pusey, Cambridge Lent Sermons, 1864, p. 163. J. J. Blunt, Plain Sermons, p. 72. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ii. No. 86. LI. 5.—Bishop Magee, Sermons at the Octagon Chapel, Bath, p. 1.

INWARD TRUTH

'Behold, Thou desirest truth in the inward parts.'—PSALM LI. 6.

WE in this country profess a great love of truth in the shape of integrity, verbal trustworthiness, and so on; our standard is not very exacting, but we could not get on at all without it. One has to confess that the standard of the world—though, thank God, it is better than it once was—is still very low. You cannot measure a man's motives by what he says; he may take the name of God upon his lips though in his heart he is not true.

I. The issue lies deeper than a mere question, for instance, of discount on a bill. We say after long acquaintance with an individual 'So and so is a true man; I have proved him'. Why do you use the word true? Because you know something about that man though it might not be considered proof in a court of law. You have been down to the depths of your friend's being, and you know he rings true, because more than once he has been willing to suffer for truth, the world not knowing. On the other hand, we know men who we feel are false though we cannot always say why; and here again our evidence in a court of law would be nonsuited. There are men whom you would not trust any further than you can see them; you know somehow by instinct of honest judgment, that these men would fail you in a crisis; they could be depended on just as far as it suited their interest and no further. A man who is as faithful in the shadow as in the light, as faithful when it does not pay to be faithful at the time as when it does—that is the man to whom to commit your trust; he was right with God ere he was right with you; and if it came to be a question whether he should sacrifice you or truth—truth as Spurgeon understood it—it would be God he would choose, not you.

II. I would just indicate wherein really consists the greatest value in all estimates of moral character. It is not merely a question of dealing between man and man. If we had nothing to preach about except iniquity, our pulpit message would be a poor one; I mean unequity, by which a man does not deal straight with his fellows. It is sin with which we have to do—this is a man's transgressions against God, the thing that hides God from him. When you are dealing with iniquity you are really dealing at the same time with another factor deeper than any of the relations which a man holds with his fellows, and that is his relationship with God. It is with God, when we come to real dealings with truth, that you and I hold relation.

III. One word of application. If I address a man of double life, a man with something evil huddled out of sight, I would like to speak to him, not a word of threatening denunciation, but of pity and of pleading. If your life is a lie it would pay you better—I announce no penalty—to get right with the truth, however much it may scorch you, than to persist in the lie that seems to screen you. The truth and the truth only will make a man at peace with himself. You may stifle the voice of conscience, but the voice of God will speak again in time or in eternity—'Thou art the man'.—R. J. CAMPBELL, Sermons Addressed to Individuals, p. 315.

SINCERITY

'Thou desirest truth in the inward parts.'—PSALM LI. 6.

God's insistence on sincerity.

I. A Threefold Cause of Insincerity.

(a) It is always a hard thing to be sincere. One cause of this is the fierce struggle for existence now. For one soul that has a passion for sincerity there are a hundred that have a passion for success.

(b) It is harder to be sincere because of the increasing power of common standards. There never was a time when the thought of the many was so quickly voiced and registered. In the tremendous pressure of a general opinion it is harder for a man to be himself.

(c) But perhaps the deepest cause of insincerity is this, that we are living in a transition time. Here in one pew a father and son are sitting; and though the father may never dream of it there is the space of centuries between the two.

II. A Threefold Curse of Insincerity.

(a) It takes all the dignity out of the heart of life, and makes this world a very mean place.

(b) But insincerity carries another curse. I hardly think that there is any sin that mars and distorts the character like this.

(c) And the third curse is this. No sin so surely saps and undermines our influence. Once let man feel that I am insincere and all my influence for good, and all my influence for God is gone.

III. The Path to a Renewed Sincerity.

(a) We must win a deeper reverence for ourselves. We must believe in individual possibilities. We must remember that there are no nobodies with God.

(b) Then we must win a profounder faith in God. I defy any man to be consciously insincere who lives under those eyes that are a flame of fire.

(c) We must gain a closer fellowship with Christ. There is a lack of sincerity to-day. But do not let that blind us to the fact that sincerity is not the only virtue. I am not necessarily good. I am not necessarily right. I am not necessarily saved because I am sincere. There is a call for new sincerity in every heart, yet that sincerity is but a stepping-stone. Sincerity without humility is but a bastard virtue. It is the obstinacy out of which fools are made.—G. H. MORRISON, Flood-Tide, p. 22.

* REFERENCES.—LI. 6.—J. Keble, Village Sermons on the Baptismal Service, p. 125. LI.—J. Knox, Little Manchester Sermons, p. 125. F. W. FARRAR, In the Days of Thy Youth, p. 358. F. D. MAURICE, Sermons in Country Churches, p. 190.

PSALM LI. 7.

PROBABLY the northernmost grave on the surface of the earth is one made for a member of the expedition of Sir George Nares to the Arctic Sea, in the ship Alert. It is near Cape Beechy, on the brow of a hill covered with snow, and commanding a view of crowded masses of ice which stretch away into the mysterious Northern Ocean, where, hung like a lamp over the door of the unknown, shines the polar star. A large stone covers the dead, and, on a copper tablet at the head, the words are engraved, 'Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow'.

Verse 18. The first presbytery of the Irish Presbyterian Church was constituted by immigrants from Scotland, in Carrickfergus, 10 June, 1642. There were five ministers and as many elders. The sermon was from Psalm LI. 18, 'Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion; build thou the walls of Jerusalem'. Two hundred years afterwards, in 1842, every minister of the Church preached from this same text. There were then about five hundred.—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—LI. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1937. Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 421. LI. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 861. C. W. Furse, Sermons at Richmond, p. 154. LI. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ix. No. 490. J. Vaughan, Children's Sermons, 1875, p. 229. E. B. Pusey, Parochial Sermons, vol. ii. p. 181. LI. 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 954. LI. 12.—C. Bradley, The Christian Life, p. 30. J. Baldwin Brown, Aids to the Development of the Divine Life, No. 5. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (2nd Series), p. 159. LI. 13.—J. Duncan, The Pulpit and Communion Table, p. 310. LI. 14.—C. J. Ridgeway, The King and His Kingdom, p. 159. LI. 16, 17.—F. D. Maurice, The Doctrine of Sacrifice, p. 86. J. A. Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 539.

'A broken and a contrite heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise.'—PSALM LI. 17.

DR. WHYTE, in his small book on St. Teresa, mentions that this text was her continual cry—till she died with these words on her lips, 'A broken and a contrite heart 'Thou wilt not despise'. And thus, with the most penitential of David's penitential Psalms in her mouth, and with the holy candle of her Church in her hand, Teresa of Jesus went forth from her banishment to meet her bridegroom.

REFERENCES.—LI. 17.—F. J. A. Hort, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 120. A. G. Brown, Penny Pulpit, No. 1056. Bishop Temple, Rugby Sermons (3rd Series), p. 99. J. Keble, Sermons for Christmas and Epiphany, p. 357.

'Build Thou the walls of Jerusalem.'—PSALM LI. 18.

HENRY PERREYVE wrote to a friend who was about to visit Jerusalem:—

'Ah, my friend, help me and let us sing together; let us pray for the coming of that fair day when, the bonds of the earthly city being broken, she will soar like the eagle towards the regions of heaven. She will move onwards like a ship, towards the haven of her rest and of her glory. Let us plead that God may work: "Lord, do good in Thy good pleasure unto Zion, build Thou the walls of the holy Jerusalem. There wilt Thou accept from our hands the burnt-offering of the eternal sacrifice—O Jerusalem, sing unto thy Lord, Zion, praise thy God." That means, O my soul, O soul of my friend, sing unto Thy Lord, praise Thy God. All the Psalms, all the vows of Holy Scripture crowd into my heart. I can say no more, friend. But you have understood me. I repeat, kiss for me the soil of that holy land, and repeat to her those transports of love which the mere echo of her name still awakens in the hearts of her children.'—Lettres de l'Abbé Henri Perreyve, pp. 69, 70.

REFERENCES.—LI. 18.—H. L. Thompson, The Church of St. Mary the Virgin, p. 98. W. M. Sinclair, Difficulties of our Day, p. 169. LI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 3.

PSALM LI.

In the Middle Ages, and after the Reformation, this was the Miserere, the last cry for mercy, sung, or heard, by those who were about to step into the presence of the judgment-seat. When it was read to Henry V. of England on his deathbed, the closing words, 'Build Thou the walls of Jerusalem,' seemed to fall on the ear of the dying man as a reproach, for he had cherished a vow, and he murmured, 'If I had finished the war in France, and established peace, I would have gone to Palestine to rescue the Holy City from the Saracens.' It was read to Lady Jane Grey and her husband, Guildford Dudley, when they were executed together, 22 August, 1553, read to her in Latin, and repeated by her in English. It was read also at Norfolk's execution a few years later. It was the last prayer of Ocolampadius, who had his sickness aggravated and his death hastened by the untimely end of his friend Zwingli in 1531. He called the ministers of the churches round him, exhorted them to fidelity and purity of doctrine, prayed earnestly in the words of David in the 51st Psalm, and soon after died.—JOHN KER.

PSALM LI.

EDWARD BICKERSTETH, one of the home saints and heroes of C.M.S. history, wrote at the close of his life in his Journal: 'O that the Lord should ever condescend to use one so sinful and unworthy. The 51st Psalm is the Scriptural prayer that most suits me.'

REFERENCES.—LII. 3.—J. N. Norton, The King's Ferry Boat, p. 161. LII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 12. LIII. 2.—Bishop Harvey Goodwin, Parish Sermons (2nd Series), p. 165. LIII. 6.—W. N. Punshon, Sermons, p. 118. LIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 16. LIV. A. Maclaren, Life of David, p. 100. LV. 4.—J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (1st Series), p. 53. LV. 5.—W. M. Statham, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xv. p. 248. LV. 6.—E. R. Conder, Drops and Rocks, p. 120. G. Dawson, Sermons on Daily Life and Duty, p. 1.

THE SECURITY OF INSECURITY

'Because they have no changes, therefore they fear not God.'—PSALM LV. 19.

DID you ever know so remarkable a reason assigned for irreligion? Here is the peril of a settled life. Here is the security of insecurity.

The idea of the word 'changes' is, as Poole the Puritan indicates, 'destructive changes'. They have no unpleasant, painful, changes. They live securely. All is always well with them. And this smooth, unruffled life is the ruin of their souls: 'They fear not God'. The Revised Version simply renders it as a fact without asserting the reason: 'The men who have no changes, and who fear not God'. The idea is evidently the same. Their settled life is the secret of their practical atheism. Earthly tranquillity is infinite spiritual impoverishment.

'Because they have no changes, therefore they fear not God.'

I. The Fact that 'they have no Changes'.—

1. They have no regenerative changes.
2. They have no changes of circumstance.
3. Some have no intellectual changes.
4. It is possible to have no emotional changes.
5. I have known Christians who hoped to have no experimental changes. It is a vain, delusive hope. The right use of changes is a wonderful instrument of sanctification. Tribulations give permanence to the fear of God. In the lack of a continuing city here we seek a city out of sight.

II. The Consequent Fact that 'they fear not God'.

- I. 'Because they have no changes, therefore they fear not God.' It all but inevitably follows. There is an influence in changes which tends to the fear of God. Changes cast us upon God.
2. Changes make us pray.
3. Changes evoke praises.
4. Changes make us sympathetic.
5. Changes inspire hope in God.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Gospel of the Left Hand, p. 123.

THE DISCIPLINE OF CHANGE

'Because they have no changes, therefore they fear not God.'—PSALM LV. 19.

It is strange that this discipline of change should be such an important factor, for we almost feel it to be unnatural.

I. There is no real rest in the world for body or mind or heart or soul. We must admit also, if we are honest with ourselves, that we need the stimulus of constant change if life is to attain its best results. Changelessness would only lull the senses and the faculties to sleep. In the stress and strain of life character is formed. If all went smoothly and softly, if life knew no dread menace, if every wind were tempered for us, and an easy path ever prepared for the feet, would we be better men and women? If there were no changes would we fear God?

II. As a matter of fact, degeneracy has always set in with both nations and men when prosperity has been unalloyed. Science is the daughter of wonder, and wonder is the fruit of all the changes and movements of the world. Religion even has her secure empire in the hearts of men through the needs of men's hearts, the need for which they crave of a changeless centre in the midst of change. Moral degeneracy creeps upon the man or the nation that sits at ease, as the stagnant pool breeds malaria. The cloudless sky is a mockery if it speak not to us of God.

III. The discipline of change is meant to drive us out beyond the changing hour to the thought of eternity, out from the restless things of sense to find rest in God. What failure is like that of those who have been chastened and yet never softened, who have gone through the fire without learning the lesson, who have tasted the sorrow without the sympathy, who have borne the cross without the love? If it be failure to have missed the fear of God, even though fortune has smiled its fairest, what failure is that which has been broken by chains, and come through all its discipline and yet is deaf to the lesson? Blessed are they who learn the Divine meaning of life's limitations.—HUGH BLACK, Homiletic Review, 1904, vol. XLVIII. p. 211.

REFERENCES.—LV. 19.—J. Martineau, Hours of Thought, vol. i. p. 127. Preacher's Monthly, vol. iv. p. 249.

THE RELIGIOUS GROUND OF LIGHT-HEARTEDNESS

'Cast thy burden upon the Lord.'—PSALM LV. 22.

I. THERE has always been in the world a great admiration for carelessness. A young man has a great pride in saying 'I don't care'. When a command is imposed on him by a higher authority, he often resists it; but his main motive in the resistance is to show the absence of care. When the advice of a friend arrests him in a downward path, he frequently brushes it aside; but he is not so much actuated by love of the downward path as by the wish to appear reckless and free. Recklessness is to him the synonym of manliness. Now, what is it that in our young days makes this spirit to us so attractive? It is its apparent resemblance to something which is really its contrary—the religious life.

II. There is such a thing as Christian absence of care—a freedom from weight, anxiety, depression. But it is an absence of care, not an annulling of it. The social epicurean tells his comrade to cast away his burden; the Christian tells his comrade, not to cast it away, but to lay it somewhere else: 'Cast thy burden on the Lord'. There is a very great difference between the two commands. It is the difference between throwing your money into the sea, and putting it in a bank beyond the possible risk of failure. A Christian's care is always to him his money—his treasure. He does not want to lose it; he would place it nowhere except in hands where it had no chance of being neglected. Let us say, for example, that you are anxious about the future of your child. The social epicurean will tell you: 'Live for the day; do not look forward; enjoy the present hour and let to-morrow shift for itself'. But the Christian will say: 'You will best live for the present by making to-morrow sure. If you want to enjoy the hour you need not become cold to your child's future—you need not even think less about it. You have only to put to-morrow in other hands—in safer hands—in God's hands.'

III. It is not forgetfulness you need; it is mindfulness without mourning. It is not the trampling of care under your feet, but the transference of care to another bosom. Destroy it not, ignore it not, bury it not, escape it not; but take it up tenderly, fold it up cautiously, and lay it on the heart of the Lord.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 145.

REFERENCES.—LV. 22.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (8th Series), p. 147. Preacher's Monthly, vol. ii. p. 30. LV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 19. LVI.—3, 4.—A. Maclaren, Weekday Evening Addresses, p. 103.

PSALM LVI.

VERSE 8. 'Thou tellest my wanderings; put thou my tears into thy bottle: are they not in thy book?' a verse frequently in the mouth of Archbishop Usher, one of the best and most learned men of his time—born in Dublin, 1580, driven to and fro through England and Ireland amid the troubles in Church and State, during one of the most troublous times in our history, and at length finding the rest he often sighed for at Reigate in England, 1655, after he had preached the Gospel for fifty-five years.—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—LVI. 8.—J. Ker, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 290. E. M. Goulburn, Christian World Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 104. J. Vaughan, Sermons (9th Series), p. 69. LVI. 9.—C. J. Vaughan, Voices of the Prophets, p. 94. LVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 29. LVII.—A. Maclaren, Life of David, p. 119. International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 37. C. Kingsley, Westminster Sermons, p. 302. LVIII. 1.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons, 1874, p. 123. LVIII. 4.—J. N. Norton, The King's Ferry Boat, p. 126. LVIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 42. A. Maclaren, Weekday Evening Addresses, p. 112.

'Who will bring me into the strong city?'—PSALM LX. 9.

THE Jesuit missionary, Valignani, as he looked towards the long-closed Empire of China on his way to Japan cried: 'O Rock, Rock, when wilt thou open? O mighty fortress, when shall these impenetrable gates of thine be broken through?'

PERMANENT ELEMENTS OF RELIGION

'Hear my cry, O God; attend unto my prayer. From the end of the earth will I cry unto Thee, when my heart is overwhelmed; lead me to the Rock that is higher than I.'—PSALM LXI.

As it is with many other Psalms so it is with this. If we are to find in the Bible narratives a situation suitable for it we may allow ourselves to conjecture that it was written by David after Absalom's defeat, and before David's return to Jerusalem. The Psalm expresses the feelings of one who is a king in circumstances of great sorrow, who has experienced deliverance, and prays with confident expectation for restoration and long life. It falls into two divisions, each expressing two main thoughts; the second taking up the note with which the first closed. We have in the first anguish of heart leading to prayer, then recollection, from which springs hope. In the second we have hope based on recollection, and faith issuing in thanksgiving.

I. There are two elements in the Psalmist's anguish. 'My heart is overwhelmed,' he says. It faints within him. There is no strength or spirit left in him. The second element is more special to himself. He felt himself at the end of the earth, an exile from God's presence. He called to God as across a great distance. There are times when we too feel far from Him. The very intensity of our need of God may obscure from us the fact of His nearness.

II. In the midst of trouble the Psalmist remembers experiences that give him ground for hope. We see how in his deliverance David was quick to perceive the beginnings of the fulfilment of his prayers; that from being a dispossessed and exiled king he might be restored to his kingdom and throne. God's deeds of deliverance are promises and earnestings. To the insight and foresight of faith they mean more than they are.

III. Finally the Psalmist rises into confidence for the future. He expects that his life will be prolonged and his throne established in the presence and favour of God. If we noted God's deliverances, if we daily called to mind and made mention of His goodness, what resources of hope we should have for darker times.—P. G. MACLAGAN, The Gospel View of Things, p. 84.

REFERENCES.—LXI. 2.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 268. J. C. M. Belieu, Christ in Life; Life in Christ, p. 120. J. Bolton, Selected Sermons (2nd Series), p. 46. LXI. 3.—Bishop Woodford, Sermons on Subjects from the Old Testament, p. 129. LXI. 7.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 43. LXI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 65. LXII. 1, 5.—A. Maclaren, Weekday Evening Addresses, p. 151. LXII. 8.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 247. LXII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 68.

THE CRY OF THE HEART FOR GOD

'O God, Thou art my God.'—PSALM LXIII. 1.

WHEN I saw his hands wandering over the counterpane, and he picked at the threads, and his features were drawn as sharp as a needle, I knew there was only one way for him; and then he cried out suddenly: 'God! God! God!' Now I, to comfort the gentleman, told him I hoped there was no need to think of God just then; and so he died.

Probably many of you recognize these words. They are put into the mouth of a bad woman by Shakespeare—a bad woman who saw a bad man die. Mistress Quickly describes the death of Falstaff. I suppose what gives Shakespeare his place in the estimation of men is this—that outside the pages of the Bible, which is truer to man than any other book, probably he comes next. His characters are undying. Why? Because they are true to nature. He has taken in this particular instance the most unlikely man of all the men that he has drawn, and he has shown us that there is something in that man. He refers—we should not expect it—to God; and we feel it is true. We get at this—that to man, to every man, to every member of the human race who can think, God is the inevitable, God is the ultimate thought.

I. Wherever man is found he builds two things—he builds a hearth, the centre of his social and individual life, and he builds an altar, the symbol of that tendency in him which directs his thoughts and his heart towards God. Wherever you touch the history of mankind in any age you find that man is social and he is religious. He has a home and he has a temple. He advanced much in the cultivation of his social life; in the cultivation of his spiritual and moral life, he advanced but little until Jesus Christ came. Until God gave a revelation to the world more than half the world was enslaved, and hopelessly enslaved, and the ultimate appeal was always either to pure force or to pure passion. But in his spiritual things, in religion, he could get no further than this—the altar he builds must be dedicated 'to the Unknown God'. And with the Unknown God how many pretended known ones? He must worship, and he must find an object of worship, and yet he feels in his quest he is never satisfied, because he has never reached the truth.

II. Now there is one religion that stands alone in the world. There is one religion that differs from every system that has come from man, and it claims for the cause of that difference that it is not from man at all—that its origin is with God.

And this religion, that differs from all other religions, pronounces as the first thing the foundation upon which all else must rest—that God is the Creator of all that is not God, and that His creation is separate from Himself. There is only one other creed in the world, all the religions that ever have been you can sum up in one term—they are all alike in essence, they are the same, of the same origin, they are what is called pantheism. They are idolatrous; the man who worships money, the man who worships himself (a vast portion of the whole race have no other worship than that), they are all pantheistic—that is, they make a creature of some sort into God.

Now here, at the very first page of our religion and our religious book, in the very first utterance of that religious body which has lasted now 2000 years, and has, with all that can be said against it, blessed the world as it was never blessed before, the first utterance of our creed is this—God is on one side, and all else is at the other; and the relation between the two is this—He brought out of nothingness all else that is. Now apply that to yourself. I am God's creature. He found a prompting which bade Him call to the abyss of nothingness, and He produced me. I was called out of nothingness by God. That means that I belong to Him in a sense in which nothing can ever belong to me. I can manufacture. Given a certain amount of education, of skill, and given the material, I can fashion it for my purpose; but creation is not that. Creation is calling out of nothingness into being. Are we not justified in putting that at the very beginning? Is it not right that this should be written in the first sentence of our Bibles? Is not the Church's instinct true when summing up the things that belong to our peace, that we must accept if we will be saved, she puts creation first? 'I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and earth.'

III. But there is something more. If God has called me out of nothingness into being, He also sustains me from passing altogether into the nothingness from which He called me. This creative act of God, if I may so express it, is continuous. He sustains us. 'In Him,' says St. Paul, 'we live, and move, and have our being.' Now what He does He does for a purpose. He called me into being and gave me liberty; He gave me this head of mine and this heart of mine in order that I might do three things—that I might know Him, love Him, and fulfil His Will; and I am sinning against the primary truth that is written in my nature when at any time in my life I give myself up to other things than those for which I was created—to know Him, to love Him, and to do His Will.

REFERENCES.—LXIII. 1.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages from the Psalms, p. 154. R. Allen, The Words of Christ, p. 162. H. P. Liddon, University Sermons, p. 1.

THE SPIRIT OF WORSHIP

'O God, Thou art my God; early will I seek for Thee: my soul thirsteth for Thee, my flesh longeth for Thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is, to see Thy power and Thy glory, so as I have seen Thee in the sanctuary.'—PSALM LXIII. 1, 2.

This passage expresses the pleasure which one who is piously disposed has in the ordinances of public Christian worship.

I. (a) Though the Lord is nigh unto all such as call upon Him, yet is He nigh to those especially who call upon Him faithfully—that is, in the spirit which He approves, and after the manner which He has prescribed, and in the place which He has chosen to set His name.

(b) Your aim should be to feel that you are daily approaching nearer to Him and He to you.

II. The source of that sacred delight which we should have in public worship would be:—

(a) The joy of spiritual repose.

(b) Its bringing more distinctly before us the realities of the happiness of the life to come.—E. J. BREWSTER, The Sword of the Spirit, p. 43.

REFERENCES.—LXIII. 1, 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1427. D. Moore, Penny Pulpit, No. 3166.

THE SOUL'S THIRST AND SATISFACTION

'My soul thirsteth for Thee. . . My soul shall be satisfied. . . My soul followeth hard after Thee.'—PSALM LXIII. 1, 5, 8.

THE experiences of a soul in communion with God.

I. The soul thirsting for God. The Psalmist is a poet, and has a poet's sensitiveness to the external aspects of nature. He feels the pangs of bodily weariness and thirst, and these seem to him to be but feeble symbols of the deeper-seated pains of desire which touch his soul. 'The unrest, the deep yearnings, the longing and desires of our natures—what are they all except cries for the living God, tendrils which are put forth, seeking after the great prop which alone is fit to lift us from the mud of this lower world? But the misery is that we do not know what we want, that we misinterpret the meaning of our own desires, that we go to the wrong sources for our need. Shipwrecked sailors drink salt water in their wild thirst, and it makes them mad. Let us see to it, too, that since we believe, or say we believe, that God is our chiefest good, the intensity of the longing bear some proportion to the worth of the thing desired. Can there be anything more preposterous, anything in the strictest sense of the word more utterly irrational than tepid wishes for the greatest good? What would you think of a man that had some feeble wish after health or life? Cold wishes for God are as flagrant an absurdity as cold sunshine. Religion is nothing if it is not fervour.

II. The seeking soul satisfied. The lips that were parted to say, 'My soul thirsteth' had scarcely uttered it when again they opened to say 'My soul is satisfied'. It is no wonder. God's gifts are never delayed in the highest of all regions. Not only does this second text of ours give us that thought of the simultaneity, in regard to the highest of all gifts, of wish and enjoyment, but it also tells us that the soul thus answered will be satisfied. If it be true, as we have been trying to say, that God is the real object of all human desire, then the contact of the seeking soul with that perfect aim of all its seeking will bring rest to every appetite, its desired food to every wish, strength for every weakness, fullness for all emptiness.

III. The satisfied soul presses closer to God. The soul that is satisfied will and ought to adhere with tenacity to the source that satisfies it. We, if we have made experience, as we may, of God and His sweet sufficiency, and sufficient sweetness, should be delivered from temptation to go further and fare worse. And then this clinging, resulting from satisfaction, is accompanied with earnest seeking after still more of the infinite God. When we turn ourselves to God and seek for all that we need there, there can be no satiety in us. So the two opposing blessednesses, the blessedness of search that is sure of finding, and the blessedness of finding which is calm repose, are united in the Christian experience.—A. MACLAREN, Christ's Musts, p. 98.

REFERENCES.—LXIII. 3.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, pp. 162, 170. H. J. Bevis, Sermons, p. 144. LXIII. 6.—J. Martineau, Endeavour after the Christian Life, p. 84. LXIII. 7.—J. Armstrong, Parochial Sermons, p. 76.

THE PURSUING SOUL

'My soul followeth hard after Thee: Thy right hand upholdeth me.'—PSALM LXIII. 8.

In this Psalm we are brought into contact with the highest reach of Old Testament religion and the deepest spirit of the Psalter itself.

I. The heart of all spiritual religion is communion, and the aim of all high faith is communion; and nowhere does communion find such classic expression. When the author rises to the ecstatic state where his soul seems joined to God, few of us can follow him. Yet, as we look forward to communion, it is good for us to see what communion may mean to a man, good for us to hold out the ideal before our eyes of a soul following hard after God and cleaving fast to Him, upheld by His right hand. The subject of the Psalm is the heart's longing for God and the heart's joy in His fellowship—the need for communion and the joy of communion.

II. The human need for God to which this Psalmist gave voice demands a similar expression from us. Men may say that man cannot know God, can have no personal relations with the great First Cause. But they cannot say that man has no need of God, that man has no desire towards God, no instincts and cravings and spiritual wants. All history throbs with the passion of human longing. Without God life is a dry and weary land where no water is. But exceeding all that dim and dumb desire, that sense of incompleteness which men feel is the desire of the man who has known God that he might enter into full communion and that interrupted fellowship might be renewed. The Psalmist's situation corresponds somewhat; for he is absent from the sanctuary where alone he could realize to the full his loving worship. He comforts himself by happy memory when in times past he had seen God's power and glory revealed in the sanctuary. Spiritually he dwells in the House of the Lord, and feels that the Divine love follows him.

III. The Hebrew division of human nature was a twofold division into soul and flesh or body. When the Psalmist speaks of his soul thirsting and his flesh longing, he means that his whole being desires God. However dark and dreary, he is never lonely—he puts out his hand and feels that he is near, he rests in the presence of his gracious Companion. He has proved and tested his faith, and found it fit to live by. Nay, God's loving-kindness is better than life. Without it there would be nothing to live for. We have pledges of that love more precious than this pious heart could ever dream of. The symbols of communion speak to us with a power and a pathos that would have put new music into the Psalmist's song and a new wonder into his heart. If we hunger and thirst and long for God, will not we too be satisfied with His mercy? If God is our desire, God will be our portion. The pursuing soul reaches at last his goal and is satisfied. God is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him.—HUGH BLACK, Christ's Service of Love, p. 92.

REFERENCES.—LXIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 72. A. Maclaren, Life of David, p. 250. LXIV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 76. LXV. 1.—A. Horne, The Soul's Awakening, p. 275.

PSALM LXIII.

THIS Psalm was chanted by Savonarola and his brother Dominicans, A.D. 1497, as they marched to the grand Piazza of Florence to meet the trial of fire to which they had been summoned by their enemies. RICHARD BAXTER says of this Psalm: 'I can sing it, because though I have not a soul like David, I desire to have it. I have a heart to the heart.'—JOHN KER.

THE MYSTERY OF PRAYER

'O Thou that hearest prayer, unto Thee shall all flesh come.'—PSALM LXV. 2.

INSTRUCTIVE as we feel our prayers to be, when we try to think quietly what they mean, what they involve, we are often haunted by misgivings and difficulties.

I. Problems of Prayer.—Prayer in the sense of communion between the Divine and the human Spirit we can understand, but prayer in the sense of definite petitions—can I seriously hope that God will change the vast complicated order of things in answer to a momentary request from a single one of His creatures? And so the native hue of our resolution, of our instinct to pray is 'sicklied o'er by the pale cast of thought'. Now our sense of the worth—of validity—of prayer will depend upon our conception of God. We have had a wrong conception before our minds which we have seen to be responsible for much unsettlement of thought and indifference of life—a conception, I mean, of God as the Almighty dwelling in some vast and distant region, and beholding from afar this universe which He has called into being and over which He has inexorable laws. Now if belief in prayer means that we are to suppose that in response to our petitions this Being descends upon His universe and arbitrarily interferes with its course and breaks its laws on our behalf, then in our minds, filled as they must be with the truth of the unity of nature, there is no possible place for such a belief in prayer. But let us turn from this wrong conception to the true conception, and have God before our minds as One who is ever present, not only in the whole of His universe but in each single part of it, so that its ceaseless energy is His will, its law the expression of His thought; in all its myriad movements it is held together by the unity of His infinite Mind and Will. Then we shall find that within His unity of Nature there is a place, a real and necessary place, for prayer.

II. Unity of Nature.—(a) What do we mean by this unity of Nature? The Unity of Nature is, let us remember, the rational order in which the universe and each part of it is held together by one indwelling Spirit. (b) Now secondly, what do we mean by 'the laws of Nature'? They are simply the expression to us of the ways in which this indwelling Spirit of God works; whenever we see the same effects following from the same causes, we say we discern a law of Nature, that is, a method by which God chooses to work in His world. (c) Thirdly, what do we mean by the power of Nature? We can only mean by the power of Nature the energy by which the Will of this Infinite Spirit works itself out in the universe; and power acts, and must act in a rational universe according to purpose. We may then, without difficulty, believe that the indwelling Spirit of God is everywhere so arranging, so adapting the forces of Nature in which He dwells that it shall minister to the spirit of man, by working upon his prayer and giving an answer to it as He sees best. Prayer therefore finds its place, its rightful place, we may even say its necessary place, in the unity of Nature. This does not mean that the answer to prayer can ever interfere with the course or break the laws of Nature. We merely mean that God can so arrange and order the laws of Nature as seems to Him best for a sufficient purpose.—ARCHBISHOP LANG, The Church Family Newspaper, 1907, p. 512.

A SERMON TO SEAMEN

*By terrible things in righteousness wilt Thou answer us, O God of our salvation; who art the confidence of all the ends of the earth, and of them that are afar off upon the sea.'—PSALM LXV. 5.

I. WHAT is the Lord to us? He is the God of our salvation. And this implies that we all need salvation. You have not attained to right ideas of yourself and right ideas of God unless when you think of God you think also of your need of being saved from sin and of Him as the Lord and giver of that salvation. Salvation is of the Lord alone. It begins in His everlasting purpose, in His sacred covenant, in His Divine choice of His people, and is carried out by the gift of His dear Son, by His life and by His death. Now it is a curious thing that, in this salvation there is a curious mixture of the terrible and the gracious. We see in salvation a God so terrible, so angry against sin, that even to save the man he loves He will not put up the sword of His justice. And how terrible a thing it is to view Jesus Christ coming into the sinner's place and bearing the wrath of God on account of sin!

II. I have set forth what God is to us—The God of our salvation. Now what will God do for us? He will answer us. This shows that we must all pray. There is not a believing man in the world but what must pray, and we shall never get into such a state of grace that we have not need to pray. What do we pray for? Well, according to the Psalm, one of the most important things is to pray against sin. Do your sins hold you captive? can you not keep away from them? Are they too many for you? Cry to the Lord to drive them all away. A word from Him can chase those demons from you and leave you at perfect peace. But remember, if we pray to be delivered from sin and to be brought nearer to God, He may answer us by terrible things in righteousness. God often sends us ingots of gold in rumbling wagons drawn by black horses. Our trials and troubles and crosses are among the best things we have. The more tender the love of God, the more likely are we to get chastening.

III. The third point is this. What the Lord is to the ends of the earth. He is the confidence of all the ends of the earth. I am going to spiritualize that—who are the ends of the earth? All that live at the extremes of heat or cold, we may liken them to the ends of the earth. And God is worthy to be the confidence of those who are farthest off from His Church, from Himself, from the Gospel, from hope, from anything that is good. The ends of the earth might mean also those that are least known. There are some that are the ends of the earth, of whom nobody thinks. Do I speak to one who has been thinking 'No one cares for my soul'? Do they quite pass you by? Well, come and put your trust in the Lord for He is the confidence of all the ends of the earth, and you resting in Him shall find a helper in Him.

IV. The last point is this. What is God to seafaring men, what should He be to them? He is 'the confidence of all them that are afar off upon the sea'. I have often likened the life of a seafaring man to what the life of a Christian should be. We take our bearings by the heavenly bodies. We are guided by the Word of God which is our chart, by the movements of the blessed Spirit within which is our compass. Trusting in Him we shall come to our desired haven without fear of shipwreck, for He that taught us to sail the spiritual sea will guide us safely over every inch of it.—C. H. SPURGEON, The British Weekly Pulpit, vol. II. p. 69.

THE RIVER OF GOD

'The river of God is full of water.'—PSALM LXV. 9.

THERE is no scarcity in God. The whole testimony of the Bible runs immediately and urgently in this direction: If we are straitened we are straitened in ourselves, we are not straitened in God; if we have not, it is because we ask not, or because we ask amiss; if any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God which giveth unto all men liberally—wisdom upon wisdom—and upbraideth not; giving does not impoverish Him, withholding does not enrich Him; the river of God is full of water—always full. If we die of thirst the responsibility is our own.

I. Here is a wonderful river, rolling past our very dwelling-places, rolling through the whole area of our life and our experience. The whole Psalm is a kind of festival song. God is so abundant, so hospitable, so gracious, so plentiful; the whole tone of His sanctuary is plenteousness, abundance, more and more, to infinity. This Psalmist has a wondrous gift of utterance. I do not see how he can end this Psalm but with dancing and tumult and uproar of joy; and I cannot see how a man can be so thrilled with joy himself without making the valleys sing, and the thick standing corn lift up its voice in praise, and all the fields clap their hands, and all the mountains shout for joy. He has committed himself to a great task, and nothing but a special doxology can be the proper climax of a Psalm so exultant, so buoyant, so infinite in its desire to express its sense of the Divine bounty.

Here is a river unlike all other rivers. It is 'the river of God'. It is not a common stream; the Ganges and the Tiber thrown together could but poorly typify or symbolize this greater river that flows from the fount of the Divine heart. It is the river of God: it is not man-made, it is not man-directed, it is not man-owned, it is not man-patronized; it is God's, and we have only a freehold in it as God may grant us a lot and an inheritance in this ever-rolling and infinite river of life.

II. What of the responsibility of having such a river rolling through our whole life? God's abundance is greater than our necessity, God's answer makes our prayer look small; when we have said all we have to say, and think we have piled our supplications and desires heaven-high, and that we shall tax the resources of the Eternal to meet our demands, lo, one whispered breath of answer from God's heart dissolves the mountain we have piled, and we forget the littleness of our prayer in the infinitude of God's answer. Why will we build up ourselves against God? Who shall carry his own little manufactured vessel and catch the whole cloud of heaven within its small and contemptible capacity? Who can number the drops of rain? who can count the multitudes that dance upon the ridges of the earth and make them green with verdures and glad with joy?

III. What a wonderful revelation this is of the estimate which God puts upon human capacity! He has prepared for every man as if every man were a multitude of guests. Where does God pinch and scrape? Where does He so economize that He has barely leaves enough to cover the nakedness of the plantation? If God had made a little place for us at a little table, and if He had ever said to us, Dear little one, I give you welcome, but you will observe that the whole economy of this house is administered upon principles of bareness and stint and almost grudging, and I want you to respect the spirit of poverty by which my house is governed—there is no such passage, there is no justification for such a suspicion; the whole idea is plenteousness, abundance, fatness, multitudes, millions, the ends of the earth, and all flesh.

IV. 'The river of God is full of water.' You can satisfy your thirst there. All nations can satisfy their thirst there. All the passions, holy and beautiful and Divine, which constitute the charter of human nature, can be refreshed and satisfied at the river of God. 'There is a river the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God. There is a river of which it is said, Whithersoever the river cometh there shall be life; everything lived when the river came.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. i. p. 30.

PSALM LXV.

THIS beautiful Psalm, first of grace, then of nature, inverting the order of Psalm xix., seems to have taken early possession of the heart of the Christian Church. There is a prayer which has come down to us from the Church of Alexandria, alluded to by Origen, first half of the third century, in which its language is largely used, and applied to the land of Egypt: 'Send rain out of Thy treasures upon those places which stand in need of it. Renew and make glad the face of the earth by its descent that it may bring forth and rejoice in the rain-drops. Raise the waters of the river to their just height; renew and make glad the face of the earth by its ascent; water the furrows and increase their produce. Bless, O Lord, and crown the year with the riches of Thy goodness, for the sake of the poor, the widow, the fatherless, and the stranger.'—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—LXV. 9.—H. Macmillan, Bible Teachings in Nature, p. 90. J. Clarke, Christian World Pulpit, 1891, p. 201. LXV. 10.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 180. LXV. 11.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 292. A. Tucker, Preacher's Magazine, vol. xix. p. 460. LXV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 80.

NOTHING BUT MIRACLES

'They went through the flood on foot.'—PSALM LXVI. 6.

THAT is really all I can say; if I were to add anything to that I would be adding prose to poetry, and poor, bald, rough paint to the finest colours used by finest artists. When will people believe that the text is the sermon? In this case we have sermon and text in one most surely. 'They went through the flood on foot.' Believe it, and you are a Christian; deny it, and you leave the Church, turn your back on the so-called sanctuary, and become your own altar and idol.

I. The miracles of Jesus Christ ought to be common-places to us. Let us place ourselves in imaginative relation to the whole conception. Christ never said, 'Gentlemen, miracles, if you please! Stand up for miracles!' Never; He grows the daisy without a word, He brings in the summer in silence fit for her queenliness, He makes no jarring, creaking noise as He rolls up the gates of the morning. But we begin where we please, and therefore God disappoints us. We begin at unaccustomed places, and say, 'There are many mysteries. We make the mysteries, and we must suffer for them. The Bible can only deliver its own letters sealed, and on the seal there is written, Not to be opened until the thirtieth century—century 150. The leaves that are already opened you may read, mark, and inwardly digest; they are food for your soul. These other letters are all sealed, each a legend of its own: To be read when the earth is seventy thousand years of age; when society has been on earth five hundred millenniums, then you may open this seal. But there is a rascally desire to open the seals before the time, because man is naturally, under-naturally, a thief. All men are thieves.

II. Miracles fill our human life. Some people do not understand them by the name miracles, but we understand them all by the name Providence—providences, Divine arrangements, the holy, sweet, beneficent promises of God.

We have lived this text; we ourselves are living miracles. How do you happen to be where you are? 'Ah,' you reply, 'many a time I have thought of that. If my poor old mother could see me in this office in the City of London, she would be quite sure I had stolen something, she would be very anxious to get out of the way until she could speak to me privately, and inquire however I had come to have an office so large and so fine, and boys working in connexion with me, and men working under me; why, I should have to fortify the sweet old creature considerably before she would believe that her boy that used to bring in the kine in the gloaming away out on the grey hills could have come to this position.' And God has sometimes said to a man in the City, 'See, you know how you began; you used to tend the sheep'. Ah, I had forgotten that! Yes, but that is a fact; you used to call in and number the cattle night by night. Who brought you out of all that obscurity and set you in bright Jerusalem, David? Speak thy benefactor's name; is this the doing of the Son of Jesse, or is it the doing of the Trinity? Forms have changed, and forms always will change, but the mystery still prevails and abounds. Life is always a mystery; it is often a mystery of darkness, but it can by the grace of God be turned into a mystery of light. Even now they are taking a sunbeam to pieces and trying to find out exactly what it is composed of, putting all the elements back again and so forth. And they cannot tell what life is. No man can define light, no man can define love, no man can define life, no man can define God.

III. What we want is personal testimony. 'They went through the flood on foot.' I want the Church to rise up in all its memberships and each member to say, 'So did I: I have been in floods that threatened to overwhelm me, and just as my faith was giving way the flood disappeared, and I walked through on dry land. I have done it. I was dead—yes; I am alive—true.' How so? 'A great movement for which there is no name.' So many people are geographers, and so few are astronomers. There are people who even believe in geology, but they cannot rise to astronomy. Now it is the astronomic that rules the whole.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vi. p. 126.

THE CONTRADICTIONS OF LIFE

'We went through fire and through water: but Thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place.'—PSALM LXVI. 12.

THERE are many lessons in that verse. They are filled up with the truth of the leadership of God. But I want to take one simple thought and send it out. It is the apparent contradictions of our life. For fire and water: are they not very opposite. Life, then, has need of opposites, and life advances through its contradictions.

I. Think of life's common experiences first. I take it there is no one here but has known the music and the light of joy. And then come sorrow and suffering and loss, and gloom for the sunshine and weeping for the laughter. And here is the flat opposite of joy. And if God was in that, how can He be in this, unless our Leader contradicts Himself? But the strange thing about Jesus Christ is this, that He has saved us by being a man of sorrow, yet He was always speaking of His joy. And the strange thing about the Christian Gospel is, that joy is its keynote, joy is its glad refrain; and yet it comes to me, to you, and whispers, My son, My daughter, take up thy cross and bear it. Is the Gospel in opposition to the Gospel? Nay friend, not that: a house divided against itself is doomed. But it is through the strange antagonisms of the heart, and all the teaching of a diverse guidance that we are brought at last to our wealthy place.

II. But passing from these common experiences of life, I note that we cannot open our New Testament but the same element of contradiction meets us. I think, for example, of that great word of Jesus, 'Come unto Me, and I will give you rest'. Now what is the very opposite of rest? The very opposite of rest is struggle. And yet I cannot open my New Testament but I find that the follower of Christ is called to war. 'Fight the good fight of faith,' says the Apostle. I cannot explain these contradictions, but I live through them and they bear me on. For somehow I have never peace except I struggle, and I cannot struggle if I am not at peace.

III. Now come a little deeper into the realm of thought. There is one truth that is a little in abeyance nowadays: I mean the truth of the sovereignty of God. We dwell so lovingly upon God's fatherhood that we are almost in danger of forgetting His sovereignty. Now tell me in absolute opposition to that foreordained will—what stands? You answer in a moment—the free will of man. If I am free to will as I believe, and not the helpless creature of necessity, what comes of the pre-determining will of God? Am I to give up my moral freedom? Heaven guard me, never! And am I to cast the sovereignty of God to be swirled and scattered by the winds of heaven? Nay, God forbid, life were a poor thing then. But I am to remember that I am going through fire and water, that God may bring me to a wealthy place.—G. H. MORRISON, Flood-Tide, p. 159.

REFERENCES.—LXVI. 12.—H. L. Thompson, The Church of St. Mary the Virgin, p. 121. LXVI. 16.—C. J. Vaughan, Harrow Sermons (1st Series), p. 388. LXVI. 18.—E. J. Boyce, Parochial Sermons, p. 18. LXVI. 20.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 145. LXVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 86.

THE CONNEXION BETWEEN SANCTITY AND SALUBRITY

'God be merciful unto us, and bless us; and cause His face to shine upon us; that Thy saving health may be known among all nations.'—PSALM LXVII. 1, 2.

I. THERE is strong connexion between health and happiness—between the shining of the heart and the soundness of the body. The connexion is more seen in the prevention than in the cure of disease. When an illness has actually mastered us it is usually vain to say, 'Keep up your spirits'. The tendency of illness is to keep down the spirits. This is suggested in the book of Job. Why does the Satan of the drama, after overwhelming Job by poverty and bereavement, ask leave to afflict him with ill-health. It is because, while poverty and bereavement make us prostrate, ill-health keeps us prostrate, prevents us from seeing the actual sunbeams which remain.

II. But it is as a safeguard from sickness rather than a cure of sickness that the study of sunbeams is valuable. When the body is laid low, all the light and music in the world may fail to raise it; but a very little light and music might have prevented its prostration. It is where the salt of life has lost its savour that the body is trodden down; but where the savour of life is enjoyed there is a body-guard.

III. Now, the Psalmist says that religion has a medical value. He says that everywhere—'Among all nations'—it tends to preserve health. It does so because it furnishes a sunbeam to the heart. It gives a promise of good fortune to come. A promise of coming good fortune brings a flood of mental energy, and that is converted into bodily energy. The worries that make us physically weak are almost entirely occupied with the future, whether of this world or other worlds. The sting of poverty is the thought of to-morrow. The sting of bereavement is the cloud beyond death. The sting of conscience is the doubt of our qualification for heaven. And if our worries are generally about the future, they can have no panacea like religion. Religion alone can make a heart confident about the future. Human effort may in a measure redeem the past; human toil may provide much for the present; but only the sense of God can gild my future. It is no mere metaphor when the Bible calls God 'The health of my countenance,' for the cares that ruffle the body are not the troubles of to-day but the troubles of to-morrow, and nothing can alleviate the troubles of to-morrow but the shining face of God.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 101.

REFERENCE.—LXVII. 1, 2.—J. Edmunds, Sermons in a Village Church, p. 144.

UNTO ALL NATIONS

'That Thy way may be known upon earth, Thy saving health unto all nations.'—PSALM LXVII. 2.

A CHURCH which is in no sense a Missionary Church is really dead.

I. The spiritual prosperity of the Church at home becomes a fountain to feed missions abroad. The Gospel in its essence is remedial. It claims to be the one means of healing for the common malady of human nature. We may say that all missions are medical missions. The Gospel contemplates the whole world as one vast hospital full of sick souls and wounded hearts, and warped and diseased wills.

II. And therefore this Catholic evangel claims all nations and kindreds and people and tongues for its inheritance. Too often indeed, we hamper its energies and retard its conquests because we assume that pure Christianity necessarily involves any of the external features of our own civilization. Yet surely Asiatics and Africans can find 'saving health' in the New Testament, without being inoculated with the restless fever which we call 'progress'.

III. Those who look forward in faith to the fulfilment of God's missionary promises and the victory of Christ's Cross, anticipate a Church of the future which will certainly be no mere copy of the Church of the present. It is a strange and marvellous thing that Christianity has for so long a period been confined mainly to the white people, but its mission is to mankind, and mankind is not in any large proportion white. And surely there are great neglected Christian ideas, ignored and forgotten truths and graces which will be recovered and come to their own in the fullness of time, when Hindu theologies and Chinese mystics and negro saints bring their own characteristic gifts to the Church's common treasury.—T. H. DARLOW, The Upward Calling, p. 321.

REFERENCES.—LXVII. 3.—H. Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. i. p. 334. LXVII. 5, 6.—G. A. Sowter, Sowing and Reaping, p. 49. LXVII. 6.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 118. LXVII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 92.

THE BOOK OF RUTH

'God setteth the solitary in families.'—PSALM LXVIII. 6.

THESE words express in the shortest possible compass the main lesson of the book of Ruth. It is rather a matter for rejoicing that the lovely pastoral, in which Ruth the Moabitess is the principal figure, forms no part of the record of that anarchic and sanguinary era, so that we take it up as an independent whole, complete in itself. Coming to it, indeed, after the violence and disorder of which the book of Judges is full, is like passing from scenes of battle and carnage to a quiet and peaceful landscape with its homely cottages and waving cornfields. How pathetic, for example, are the unstudied phrases that paint for us the desolation of the childless Naomi!

I. Yet the story of Ruth is not altogether a sad one. The closing scene comes as a cheerful contrast to the pathetic beginning; while, quite apart from this, we get a glimpse of the deeper compensations that enable us in some degree to justify the ways of God to man. Take, for example, the doctrine of a Divine Providence bringing good out of evil, and guiding human lives to unforeseen issues. I do not mean to say that this doctrine is clearly set forth in the book of Ruth; it teaches us, as life itself does, indirectly, by signs and tokens that are clear enough to all who have eyes to see and ears to hear. And the lesson taught in this

III. If Europe is to learn that manifold service is the true condition of unity, that order is the one foundation of progress, England must be the teacher. No one can recognize more gladly than I do the priceless benefits which the great nations of the Continent have conferred upon mankind at large and upon ourselves. But now they in turn are looking to us. They want what we have been trained to offer, if we have not wasted the heritage of our fathers, in the example of an energetic, a multiform, a harmonious national life. We have our own dangers great and terrible, but we shall meet them most effectively by striving as best we can to keep the charge which God has been pleased to give us for others. And for this reason the citizen soldier offers in his free-will service the image of the character which God now requires us to foster. He shows to us by the arms which he carries, and by the uniform which he wears, that there is something worth living for more precious than life itself; that the softness of luxury is a poorer thing in every way than patient effort. Endurance, obedience, self-sacrifice, these three express the teachings of his work; and those who love England best, and trust her future most boldly, will know whether it is not these three which must be with us if the nation is to fulfil its appointed task.—B. F. WESTCOTT, Peterborough Sermons, p. 361.

REFERENCES.—LXVIII. 28.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 322. J. M. Neale, Readings for the Ages (3rd Series), p. 248. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. ii. p. 342. LXVIII. 28, 29.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 190.

A SAINT OF GOD

‘Thou art wonderful in thy saints.’—PSALM LXVIII. 35.

THE idea contained in the statement of the Psalmist is the wonderful ways of God in all that He does, in His dealings with the holy places of the unseen world or in those places most holy of all, in His saints.

I. Consider what a revelation of God’s wonderful way is to be found in that great saint, St. John the Baptist. God was wonderful in his birth, St. John was born contrary to the usual Divine arrangements of nature. God was wonderful not only in the birth and commission of His servant but in the formation of his character. The height of that character was—indomitable courage, a courage of the highest kind, to teach the truth whether men liked it or no. John tore away the cover that even the most plausible and exalted had made for themselves and showed them themselves.

II. St. John’s highest call was that fearless loyalty to truth, to bury his own miserable self in the thought of his great commission and the marvellous vision of God that had been opened out before him. It was because of this wonderful courage and unselfish loyalty and strong conviction that there has been about all the saints as there was about St. John a strange fascination. And then there is one more point that perhaps may help us to see how wonderful God was in this saint. He was wonderful in allowing his apparent failure. And yet he had fulfilled his mission, he had prepared for Christ and for the Gospel of universal truth.

What appeared to us so tragic a close to so promising a beginning of the great saint was really part of the Divine work to complete a magnificent character that He had formed to prepare for the coming of the Master.

III. How shall we allow ourselves to think and to feel about such things? Shall we not, indeed, think of life with its joys, its brightness, its happy days, kind friends, dear relations, its unselfishness, or its clouds, perplexities, weariness, distresses, shall we not think of it as God’s guidance for the best? We shall not sit down with our hands folded. We shall strive to retrieve in the world any failure by our courage: we shall remember that God calls us to work, not necessarily to success. We see something of God’s mysterious wonderfulness in the image that He places before us in His saints.—W. J. KNOX-LITTLE, Homiletic Review, 1906, vol. LII. p. 292.

REFERENCES.—LXVIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 94. LXIX. 10.—J. Keble, Sermons for Holy Week, p. 77.

LOOKING AND NOT FINDING

‘I looked . . . for comforters, but I found none.’—PSALM LXIX. 20.

READ the whole verse; it is like the falling of a great thunder-shower of tears. ‘Reproach hath broken my heart; and I am full of heaviness: and I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none.’ Say you that man wrote three thousand years ago? He wrote this morning, he is with us now, he is in our hearts. A man takes his sorrow with him more surely than he takes his shadow.

I. ‘I looked for some to take pity.’ What a chance they lost! Why, we have all lost our brightest chances. They often occur, on the streets, in hidden places, in habitations shut against the spirit of charity. When we cannot really effect deliverance we might say a kind word. Do you know the effect of a really sincerely kindly word upon a soul that is orphaned, desolate, broken-hearted, that does not think it worth while to live? People do not always want mere money; money is sometimes the very least of the gifts that we can confer. Sometimes all that is wanted is a tone, a little anthem in one little sigh. Life in its most tragic and sensitive moods receives all the ministries, and is glad to be renewed and freshened and cheered by some gentle, fraternal, Divine tone.

II. Then the deliverance is carried beyond the point of pity and comes up to that kind of ministry which is denoted by this word ‘comforters,’ the whole text reading, ‘and for comforters, but I found none’. What is it to comfort? We have explained this a hundred times, and a hundred times have forgotten it. To comfort is to give strength, to increase the power of endurance. Paul said, ‘I besought the Lord thrice to take away this thorn in the flesh,’ and He said, ‘My grace is sufficient for thee’ and for any number of thorns—let the thorns alone. Did He comfort Paul? Certainly: 'My grace is sufficient for thee'. It is exactly what thou dost most require. The Lord does not always remove the burden. He strengthens the back. That is comfort — with, strength. You can comfort a man so that you will give him courage; he may say, 'I will try again, this man has put things in a new light; I like his way of looking at things; he is a downright sensible man; other men have confounded me by many polysyllables, but this man has told me that if I just get beyond that corner I will see the green fields and hear birds singing in the blue air; I feel as if I could do it.' That is comforting, to tell a man that there is more in him than he suspects. That is comforting, to awaken the latent ability and say, 'Come, arise, the sun is shining broadly in the heavens now, and you are losing your chance; come, stand up; take up thy bed and walk'. That is how Christ comforted people. He said, 'What are you lying there for? rise, and go'. You say, 'Well, if that is possible, I will try'—and to try is to succeed. Faith is the great miracle-worker.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 232.

THE BUILDING GOD

'God . . . will build.'—PSALM LXIX. 35.

It is like Him, from all that we can gather concerning Him from His holy Word. God will put things together, God will give them shape and meaning; God will turn prose into poetry, and earth into heaven. He who built all things is God. But man builds? Yes, in a secondary and remote and very temporary manner. Against all man's building there lies this great testimony, Except the Lord build the house their labour is lost that build it. Distinguish between the outside and the inside of these edifications. Do not be content with the outside, the mechanical and architectural; these ought to be only signs and symbols of great temples and unmeasured heavens. What a lesson is this for the little human builder and the little human architect! He builds his cathedral, and at the top there is just room enough for the birds to halt upon it. It is a poor roof. Yet how many mistake a roof for the sky—the true roof, the firmament blue, starful, abiding. How many people are there who really know the difference between a ceiling and the sky? Even in brick-building and stone-building it is perfectly true, religiously and metaphysically true, that except the Lord build the wall it will fall and crumble back into the dust that was handled atheistically. Nature is on the side of her God. God is architect, and God is builder, and He is building all things on a plan. That is the difference between the building of ignorance and the building of omniscience; between the last and abiding building, and that which is but momentary in its uses. Recall the ideal.

I. Let us hear this colloquy. 'Thou shalt build an altar unto the Lord' (Deut. xxvii. 5). That is the human side. 'The Lord doth build up Jerusalem'

(Ps. cxlvii. 2). Thus saith man, thus God; and when the man speaks only as the agent of God it is as if God Himself were speaking, then the building is sure to be good, secure, and immovable. Many have taken to altar-building who were not called from God.

'The Lord doth build up Jerusalem,' and that is what He is doing all the time; it is Jerusalem He is building, the city of peace, the city of loveliness, the earthly metropolis that symbolizes a heavenly city. He is a long time about it; even God cannot be fast, rapid; He must work according to something that is in Himself, and would if it were possible be before Himself.

II. 'My son,' said one in the old days, 'build the house of the Lord thy God' (1 Chron. xxii. 11).

God takes notice of our building. Sometimes He may, speaking after the manner of men, smile at some of our brick-pile, bricks we have bought, wooden bricks that we shape into little things on the parlour table; and sometimes He burns to see them. He says, 'They shall build, but I will throw down' (Mal. i. 4). There are some winds too high for building in; the very winds seem to come and throw down our scaffolding and the shell of our temple. I wonder what such winds are. Where do all the winds come from? How quiet nature can be!—how tempestuous! It is the same nature; what if it be the same God, and that be the reason of it!

III. Building that has no meaning must be a great disappointment to the builder. 'Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together' (Ps. cxxxii. 3)—built as a city that has meaning, built as a city that represents an ideal, built as a co-operative city, one part co-operating with another, answering another, supplementing another. No harum-scarum Jerusalem can God build. He made man, and He made him in His own image. He is still making man. Do not think that man-making work is done. Man advances a little century by century, so little we have no compasses fine enough to measure the progress.

IV. Only those who are right can build. Remember, that this is the Christian position. You can alter it if you please, and take all the consequences. 'Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid.' Think of man excelling God, finding a better foundation, quarrying the earth until he has found a nobler stone for holding the edifice of humanity. 'Built up in our most holy faith.' The Christian education is a process of building; the process is called by the significant name 'edification'.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 271.

REFERENCES.—LXIX. 35.—J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 271. LXIX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 113. LXX. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 1018. LXX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 124. LXXI. 9.—J. Baldwin Brown, Old Testament Outlines, p. 121. LXXI. 15.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 198.

GOING IN THE STRENGTH OF THE LORD

'I will go in the strength of the Lord.'—PSALM LXXI. 16.

THIS is one of the longest texts in the Bible. In its application it covers an indefinite period of time. The way to write this text is to put a few asterisks after the first three words, 'I will go'. Asterisks, as you know, are used in books to signify a lapse of time. They denote that there is a space of time—days, or it may be years—between the story that comes before them and the story that follows them. So, I say, we need asterisks in this text. There is sometimes a long stretch of years between 'I will go' and 'in the strength of the Lord'. There is often a lapse of time ere the first and last of this verse meet, 'I' and 'the Lord'. Divinity is not always the first resource of humanity. Often it is its last resource. Men do not learn all at once to take God into their reckonings when they make their plans and forecast their endeavours. Some never learn that. And however the world may judge them, however it may congratulate them and envy them, whatever the fashion of their earthly fortunes, they are the failures—the real and final failures; and the day comes when they know that this is so.

I. 'I will go.' That is often the whole text in lips of inexperience. Oh the wild strong will of youth! Oh the omnipotence of those early determinations! Oh the finality of those early decisions! 'I will go in mine own strength. It is enough, and it will never fail me.' But oh, how tired the feet grow! and how far away the blue mountains ever are; and the journey grows greater and the pilgrim's strength less every day. And it may be there comes a day when the traveller can go no farther, all the strength of love and hope and enthusiasm expended. And there is nothing for it but despair or divinity. The soul finds God or it finds nothing. Life becomes a tragic failure or a triumph of faith.

II. But supposing that instead of thinking about the way itself, we begin to think about the end of the way. Instead of thinking about the difficulty of life, let us think about the destiny of life. 'I will go in mine own strength.' Yes, but where will you go? What is to be your destination? You may have health and skill to work, and the brain to think, and the heart to make many friends; and if the end of life were just to become a skilled workman, a clever student, or a social success—why you might do that 'on your own'.

But when you come to understand that you are here in the world to make a saint, to find some of the meaning of the immortal ideas of beauty, truth, goodness, sacrifice, and to develop and cherish in your heart that love that loves for love's sake, unrepelled by ugliness, unchilled by indifference, undaunted by malice—why, then, I say, you are face to face with something that strikes through your self-confidence and drives home into your soul a sense of your insufficiency for life as it was meant to be lived. 'I will go.' Say no more than that if you are only going to the market to make the best of a few bargains, and to the social circle to get the good word of a few friends. But that is not life. That is not finding your destination; that is missing the way, and any one with neither genius nor industry can do that.

III. Look at the things that give meaning and value and immortality to life. People sometimes say to youth, 'The world is at your feet'. But that is not true unless heaven is in your heart. Look out beyond the brief ambitions, the trivial honours, the cheap victories, and the spurious gains of earth, and behold—oh, so far beyond them all!—the stainless light shining from the towers and pinnacles of the city of God. And know that if ever you are to come to the gates of that city, it must be by winning a victory compared with which every temporal achievement is but child's play.—P. AINSWORTH, The Pilgrim Church, p. 210.

REFERENCES.—LXXI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii, p. 124. LXXII. 2.—Archbishop Alexander, Royalty and Loyalty, No. iv. LXXII. 3.—W. L. Watkinson, The Ashes of Roses, p. 118. C. D. Bell, Hills that Bring Peace, p. 3. LXXII. 6.—H. J. Bevis, Sermons, p. 243. J. Keble, Sermons for Christmas and Epiphany, p. 268. LXXII. 10, 11.—G. Huntington, Sermons for Holy Seasons, p. 43. LXXII. 12-14.—J. Monro-Gibson, A Strong City, p. 213. LXXII. 16.—M. G. Pearse, Sermons to Children, p. 67. LXXII. 17.—A. Miller, American Pulpit of To-day, p. 55. J. Bannerman, Sermons, p. 236. LXXII. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii, No. 129. LXXII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii, p. 131.

MISSIONS: GROWTH OF THE KINGDOM

PSALM LXXII.

THE outlook seems dubious when we see (1) but a 'handful' of corn, (2) and that 'in the earth'—one handful for a whole world, (3) and some on the top of the mountains. But it is reassuring when we know (1) that it is corn—God's good wheat, (2) that even on the top of the mountains its fruit shakes like Lebanon. What will it be in the richer valleys? What were the words of Jesus but a handful of corn, and that upon the top of the mountains? But it is the only seed that can produce its harvest in every land, in every corner of the world.

UNTIL I WENT INTO THE SANCTUARY

'Then thought I to understand this: but it was too hard for me, until I went into the sanctuary of God: then understood I the end of these men.'—PSALM LXXIII. 15, 16 (P.B.).

THE difficulty of the writer of the Psalm is a very old difficulty, and yet it seems to us to be perpetually new. Think what it was that troubled him. What was his difficulty? 'I was envious when I saw the ungodly in such prosperity. They come in no misfortune like other men, neither are they plagued like other folk.' At what period of the world's history, in what spot of the universe, are the echoes of that question not still heard? The inequality of things. Up starts the question before us, the problem of suffering, the mystery of evil, the strange impossibility of reconciling the two sides of life—here is the difficulty which perplexed him. I venture to think that there is no thoughtful person but, if he ever thinks at all about human life, this strange, tangled medley will sometimes say, and say it almost in despair, 'I thought to understand this; but it was too hard for me'.

And what is the solution? Is there any solution? The solution is this: 'It was too hard for me until I went into the sanctuary of God'. What does he mean? How did it help him, and how may it help us?

I. In the sanctuary there came to him the thought of God. The whole place was full of it. How did that help him in the perplexities that troubled him? Think for a moment what the real difficulty was. It was not a difficulty of his mind; it was a difficulty of his conscience. It was not an intellectual difficulty; it was a moral difficulty. 'Until I went into the sanctuary.' Of course, in the simplest sense, he meant he went into the place where they were accustomed to go to lay down the burdens of their lives, that which made churchgoing to those old Jews such a beautiful reality, so different from much of the formal conventional churchgoing to-day. He went into the sanctuary. It was the natural place to go to. But, I think, it meant something more than that. It was not merely the place, but that to which the whole place witnessed. It was the thought of God, the consciousness of God, and the consciousness of God meant the consciousness of purpose. Could it be otherwise? To believe in God is surely of necessity to believe in His purpose. To say the opening words of the Creed, 'I believe in God,' is to believe that there is no tangle, no puzzle, no labyrinth. It is only that we have not yet discovered the clue, God has not yet placed it in our hands. We can afford to wait if there is something to wait for.

II. In the sanctuary he discovered himself. I suppose there is no thoughtful person but has often and often echoed that question, What am I? What is that thing I call myself? What does it denote, and what does it involve? What am I? My body—is that myself? At first sight there seems to be so much to be said for it because my body is so intertwined with my soul, that if I am tired I cannot pray; if I am in pain I can hardly think. At first sight my body seems to be myself. But somebody says, 'No, your self is the changeless part of you, and your body changes'. The body of to-day is a very different thing from the body of twenty years ago. My mind, then—is that myself? And again the answer comes, 'No. Your thoughts, your feelings, your opinions, they are not what they were ten years ago.' But your self remains unchanged. In the sanctuary of God I discovered myself. Why? Because the whole of the sanctuary, and the worship of the sanctuary, and every detail of the worship is based upon the assumption that I am more than body and more than mind, that I am a deathless spirit, and that I cannot live by bread alone.

III. 'Until I went into the sanctuary.' Because, in the sanctuary, he discovered something else. He discovered the influence of worship. There is a strange reflex influence in all acts of devotion. When the Lord Jesus prayed, He was transfigured; so when a man prays, he is bringing a strange influence, morally and spiritually, upon his being, and he rises up from the act of prayer as the Lord rose from His prayer, a stronger, calmer, braver man. And so it is also with the influence of worship. In days like these, when life is so anxious, more especially to men; when business is so exacting; when a right judgment is so important; when a prompt, almost instantaneous, decision is so frequently demanded, it is pathetically sad that some of the very men who want the power most should cut themselves off from the calming influences of the House of God, where for aught they know they might be able to say as Asaph said: 'It was too hard for me, life was too anxious, business was too exacting, disappointments were too overwhelming, until I went into the sanctuary of God'.

IV. And lastly. 'Until I went into the sanctuary; then understood I.' Because, in the sanctuary, he discovered another truth. In the sanctuary of God he found the truth of the consecration of himself to God. The whole place spoke of consecration separated for the worship of God; every holy vessel set apart; the priest consecrated to God's service. The whole place was full of the consecration of things and of life to God. Is there a more tremendously important truth than that for us to try and write upon our hearts?

GOD THE SOLE DELIGHT OF THE ELECT

'Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none on earth that I desire beside Thee.'—PSALM LXXIII. 24.

THIS Psalm gives the embodiment of the deepest, innermost, and most primary life of the soul; where thought is not, but the life is reduced to the ultimate facts of spiritual consciousness, the certain premises of spiritual thought, the knowledge of self and the knowledge of God.

I. The soul that aspires to contemplate the ways of Providence is met by a difficulty at the outset. God's ways are not as our ways, His gifts to men are not proportioned, as we should have proportioned them, to their deserts, and this difficulty, which is stated at the beginning of the Psalm, is not solved, in a final and universal way, in any part of it; it is solved only to the satisfaction of the Psalmist himself, with just the hint at the intellectual solution that God's judgment in the world to come will remedy what now seems to be defects.

II. When the question of God's just government has once been satisfactorily explained, the soul cares no more for the details of the explanation; she only desires to prostrate herself before Him and confess her weakness and His surpassing glory. In communion with Him, even such unequal communion as she feels to be the best she deserves, she is strengthened and ennobled, and rests and is comforted.

III. 'Nevertheless I am always by Thee; for Thou hast holden me by my right hand.' In this sublime selfishness, if we are to call it so, he is content to stay; he forgets all others. He can do without the glory until God's own time shall come for giving it; the guidance of God's counsel may last as long as He shall please, so that only it be not taken away. And now we shall see in what sense his religion is selfish, and in what sense not. It is selfish so far, and so far only, as all love may be said to be selfish. It seeks its own delight, but a delight that is not found in self, or in its own prize or possessions, but only in loving and being loved by Another.

IV. I am afraid that this ardent all-absorbing personal love for their Lord is not, as a matter of fact, the prevailing feeling and the keenest desire of Christians in their thoughts of the other world. What is it that people of our time most fondly think of, and exult in most, when they think that God has given them a right to expect admission into heaven? Is it not generally, not union with God, but reunion with their earthly friends, or with God's servants whom they have revered that have gone before them? And sometimes people's thoughts of heaven take a yet lower form—lower, more selfish in the evil sense; they look forward to a blessedness that consists not in realized love for another, but in mere personal enjoyment and possession; and fancy heaven only a more perfect earth, with all earth's enjoyments that are not plainly sinful or casual.

Now until we are able to have nothing and desire nothing but God, we are not fit for heaven. If we would have the happiness that we seek, we must receive it in God's form, and seek it in His way, by disinterested love for Him and our brethren, not schemes for our own personal exaltation even in things spiritual. What we have to do is to go out of ourselves, not out into the world, but into God; to leave a self-centred selfish desire for happiness, and seek His will and His kingdom; only by that the truest happiness will be found.—W. H. SIMCOX, The Cessation of Prophecy, p. 178.

PSALM LXXIII.

AFTER the defeat of Montcontour, as they were carrying Coligny off the field, nearly suffocated by the blood of three wounds pouring into his closed visor, an old friend, who was being carried wounded beside him, repeated the first verse of this Psalm—

Si est ce que Dieu est très doux.

'Truly God is good to Israel.' The historian adds: 'That great captain confessed afterwards that this short word refreshed him, and put him in the way of good thoughts and firm resolutions for the future'. If the whole Psalm is read, it will be seen to be singularly suited to such an emergency; and so well were the Psalms then known, that the first verse called up the whole.—JOHN KER.

THE CUP IN THE HAND OF THE LORD

'In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full mixed, and He poureth out of the same.'—PSALM LXXV. 8.

WHAT is the cup of the Lord in my text? What is the cup of salvation in another Psalm? What is the cup of blessing in St. Paul? Are there two different cups? Are we to distinguish between the cup which Christ drained and the cup which He blessed? Are we to divide the Passion from the Eucharist? Good Friday from Maundy Thursday? no, we are not to divide them. The two are one. The Eucharist is the communion of the Passion. The power of the Passion is the power of the Eucharist.

I. Those who enter into the devout communicant life have found the secret of joy, for they have the life of Christ. But they are also self-consecrated to suffering; for the life of Christ is a dying life; His joy is wrung out of the heart of sorrow. They are dedicated to fellowship in His sufferings, that their fellowship in His glory may be real. This is the dominant conception of the Passion-narrative in St. John. We are not to look upon Good Friday simply as a defeat followed by a victory. The victory was won in and through suffering; it did not simply come after it. All this is in the cup which our Saviour drained, and which He gives us to drink. The red wine with which the cup of the Lord is full mixed, and which He poureth out for us, is His blood. Blood—the symbol of life, not of death; but of life poured out, consecrated by dying.

II. What does this challenge mean to us, dropping metaphor and mysticism? 'Can ye drink of the cup that I shall drink of?' We know that we must answer, We can, unless we prefer to say that we have neither part nor lot in the life and death of Jesus Christ. But what is involved in our acceptance of the challenge? We are able, at anyrate we wish to try—to do what? Surely the cup is the burden of human sorrow and human sin—the accumulated results of all the errors and vices and crimes that poor humanity commits every day. A bitter draught it is; 'Thou hast given us a drink of deadly wine' we might say when it is put before us. Jesus Christ was willing to drain it—as an act of love, and as an act of obedience. He took up the burden of frail humanity. He let it crush Him and by so doing He conquered it. That is the claim, the challenge, that Christ makes to us. We cannot tell what He will require of us, it may be much or it may be little; but have we the spirit of love and the spirit of obedience, in which as I have said, Christ Himself lived and died for man? If we have we may answer humbly but confidently, 'We are able'; for our great Captain will set us no impossible tasks.

III. You will see now why the cup which our blessed Lord drained and the cup which He blessed are one and the same cup. It is the cup of communion, of brotherhood; the cup of kindness which pledges us to bear each other's burdens instead of shifting our own; and it is the cup of the red wine poured out, the precious life-blood freely given, the living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God.—W. R. INGE, All Saints' Sermons, p. 153.

REFERENCE.—LXXV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 160.

THE OLD TESTAMENT A HISTORY OF THE JEWS

'In Jewry is God known : His name is great in Israel.'—
PSALM LXXVI. 1.

WE call the Jews a people. What does this mean? It generally means a number of persons bound together by three things: by having one blood, one language, one land. Other bonds may usually come in, such as one set of customs, one law, one government, one religion. But the three I have mentioned are the most constant.

I. First one blood. The Jews mixed wonderfully little with other people till quite late in history, and the family feeling was part of their religion. One of the names by which they are called is 'The Children of Israel'. Generation after generation was thus taught to look back to the first beginnings of the people. It lifted them out of base and earthly things. It carried them half-way to God. For God Himself was likewise known to them in the same form. Declaring Himself as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, He brought Himself near to them through their recollections of their forefathers.

II. Secondly, a people is held together by speaking one language. This bond of language the Jews possessed. Almost from the first it became intermixed with their thoughts about God. First the memory of His Commandments as written on the Tables of stone or spoken by the lips of Moses, then the possession of holy books, the short beginnings of a Bible, led them to feel that their common speech was not merely the necessary means of conversing with each other on the things of everyday life, but also supplied the outward form in which God spoke to their fathers and to them.

III. Again, men are made one people by dwelling in one land. And such was Judea or Jewry, the land of Israel to the Jews, the children of Israel. The affection which they bore it was one of the most powerful ties which helped them to feel that they were indeed one at times when other causes were tearing them asunder. God saw fit that for their sins they should be carried away prisoners into a strange land, and there they seemed ready to be scattered away and leave no traces on the face of the earth, till in due time part of them obtained leave to return to their own country, and then once more the people rose out of the dust. Their entrance into it was marked by wonderful signs of God's presence and favour, and He taught them to look on continuance upon its sacred soil as the highest earthly blessing, the best reward for those who obeyed His laws.

IV. We have now considered the three chief signs which mark a people in the proper sense of the word, and which the Bible shows to have marked the ancient people of God, the Jews. So far they were in a great measure like other peoples, old and new. The difference was that God made Himself known to no other people. That is what renders their history a treasure of the highest and best instruction to us; not a mere subject of curiosity for those who have time and opportunity to busy themselves about things that happened so very long ago, but a possession meant for the use of every one of us.—J. F. A. HOET, Sermons on the Books of the Bible, p. 13.

REFERENCES.—LXXVI. 3.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 791. LXXVI. 5.—S. Baring-Gould, The Preacher's Pocket, p. 119.

'Thou art of more honour and might than the hills of the robbers.'—PSALM LXXVI. 4 (Prayer Book Version).

CHARLES KINGSLEY had a special love for this Psalm. When sailing up the Rhine, and looking on the ruined strongholds of the old freebooters, he writes: 'How strange that my favourite Psalm about the hills of the robbers (hills of prey) should have come in course the very day I went up the Rhine!'—JOHN KER.

THE DIVINE COERCION OF EVIL

'Surely the wrath of man shall praise Thee : the remainder of wrath shalt Thou restrain.'—PSALM LXXVI. 10.

LET us note for our consolation and encouragement the two precious truths expressed by the text—the Divine restraint of evil, and the Divine compulsion of evil to issues of good and blessing. For, whatever the variations in the interpretation of the original by the great scholars, this is substantially the significance of the passage before us.

I. The Divine Restraint of Evil.—'The remainder of wrath shalt Thou restrain.' The mighty army of Sennacherib, splendidly equipped, full of fury and confidence, suddenly and mysteriously melted away under the power of Jehovah, leaving Jerusalem intact and joyful; and the permanent significance of this event is, that no weapon formed against the kingdom of God shall finally prosper, that every conspiracy in a critical hour shall be brought to nought.

1. In nature we see abounding examples of the fact that limits are fixed to the destructive forces, limits they may not transgress. There is a benign law, a delicately poised balance, a sovereign virtue, an antiseptic quality, in the very constitution of things, which keeps the destructive elements within bounds, and preserves the world a theatre of life, sweetness, health, and beauty. And as the snake is in the grass, the hawk in the sky, the poison-plant in the woods, so the octopus, alligator, and shark infest the waters; yet the protective law operates there also, sheltering whatsoever passeth through the depths of the seas.

Evil is full of boasting; it is insolent, mocking, rampant, apparently irresistible; it threatens to occupy the whole sphere—annihilating all that is good, soiling whatever is beautiful, quenching in darkness whatever is joyous; yet somehow it breaks off unaccountably where and when we did not expect it to break off, not having wrought nearly the mischief that seemed inevitable. 'Fear ye not Me? saith the Lord : will ye not tremble at My presence which have placed the sand for the bound of the sea by a perpetual decree, that it cannot pass it; and, though the waves thereof toss themselves, yet can they not prevail; though they roar, yet can they not pass over it?'

2. If in nature these gracious limits are imposed on the genius of destruction, let us be assured that stern circumscriptions restrain moral evil and render impossible its triumph.

II. The Divine Compulsion of Evil.—'Surely the wrath of man shall praise Thee.' Not merely restrained, but coerced to most desirable issues. Not only is Zion saved from evil, she is served by it. The peoples of the earth, the estranged heathen peoples, through their defeats and humiliations, are to attain to true insight and reverence. The most furious and the most enraged are to come to the thankful acknowledgment of God. Such is the significance of the closing strophe of this Psalm. The rage of kings and peoples is overruled to the glory of the Church of God and to the ultimate salvation of the revolters.

Let us, however, be clear as to what is exactly meant by evil working good. We must remember that evil is evil, not good in the making, not undeveloped good. Essential evil is the deliberate contradiction of the Divine will, the positive violation of the Divine law, programme, design, the clash of God's will and the creature's. And, secondly, that good is never brought out of evil—that is impossible. When it is affirmed that evil works for good, we mean that God so antagonizes wicked men, vile institutions, and malign movements, that in the final result they develop the good they threaten to destroy. The selfishness, pride, and licence of the world are made to work its purification.

Let us not be overpowered by the vision of the power of evil. Whatever is done against us in our personal life by the injustice of men or the maliciousness of demons shall, whilst we remain faithful, work for our final gain. What is the moral of the book of Job but the subordination of alien wrath to the profit of the saint? From a great fight of unmerited affliction we see the patriarch emerge more rich and powerful than when the storm burst upon him, and with a deepened experience that must have given to his restored prosperity tenfold interest and satisfaction. The government of God extorted from the malice of hell splendid spoils in which Job was arrayed. So now with every loyal child of God. 'All things work together for good to them that love God.'—W. L. WATKINSON, The Fatal Barter, pp. 62-76.

REFERENCES.—LXXVI. 11.—Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. i. p. 218. W. G. Bryan, Seven Sermons on the Sacrament, p. 54. LXXVI. 17.—H. Woodcock, Sermon Outlines, p. 72. LXXVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 165. LXXVII. 5.—W. R. Inge, Faith and Knowledge, p. 211.

THE PORTAL OF A NEW PERIOD: A NEW YEAR'S SERMON

'I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High.'—PSALM LXXVII. 10.

THE New Year admonishes with a triple exhortation. It bids us think of three tenses and of a threefold progression. We are bidden to reflect on the good old time, to give thanks for the new and better time, and to work for the future time, the best of all.

I. Think of the days of old and of the wonders of the Most High. Gratitude demands such meditation. But such thankfulness for the mercies of the past does not involve discouragement of the conditions of the present. Where should we be to-day if the philosophy of the old pessimists were true? Noble souls of the older times were ever apt to work mournfully on the world of their own day. Bernard of Clairvaux looks back wistfully to the olden time 'when the Apostles cast their nets to catch men, not as we do, to gain gold and silver'. And all sections have thus looked back aspiring to regain the purity of the old days of Christendom.

II. Think devoutly on all the goodness of the grace of God manifested from the days of the Apostles down to the days of your youth, but give thanks for the new, better time which God accords to us. In many an aspect is this indeed the better time. To-day men have begun to realize that Christianity, rightly understood, is the noblest socialism, that is to say, it is the fellowship of love. Men now begin at last to comprehend that humanity is a whole, a corporate unity, a body, and that the unruly, the destitute, yea, even the criminals are members—sick and sad members indeed, but nevertheless members needing care and protection.

III. Thank God for the better, brought about by the grace of Christ, but let us lift up our eyes and our hearts to greet the better time that is still to come. The past, that panorama in which progress and retrogression are alike portrayed, reveals that as the doctrines and teachings of the Divine Man have spread so mankind has been the better, the brighter, the purer, the more humane and thoughtful. It is the sign of the times—it is the happy portent for the future. Work for the future, the best time! It still remains for us to struggle towards that best and to conquer it for our successors, for this better present age is deformed by blots that are dark and saddening. Truly something better than present conditions must be achieved, and let each of us resolve, by word and example, to bring about the desired confirmation. For each individual life great tasks are in prospect.—PAUL VON ZIMMERMAN, Homiletic Review, 1909, vol. LXII. p. 64.

REFERENCE.—LXXVII. 10.—S. Cox, Expositions (3rd Series), p. 152.

THE SPELL OF CHRIST

'I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High. I will remember the works of the Lord.'—PSALM LXXVII. 10, 11.

THE Gospels in their narrative simplicity do not as a rule pause to analyse motives, still less to debate and comment upon the fascinations and qualities of Him whom they present. The simple but vivid brevity of the notices will compel from us the thought necessary to interpret them: and in pressing past the excited and thronging multitudes to see how hearts were truly won, we shall be saved from fancying that the main and central strength of the Gospel then lay in anything but what it lies in now.

I. Among the causes of that strength we shall be both right and reverent if we assign a chief place to what, in other cases, we call personal influence, or the ascendancy of character. At the outset there is record of it usually expressed: 'Jesus increased in favour with man'. With His ministry this became a more definite attraction. The bidding to John and James, to Andrew and Peter, to Philip, to Matthew, to leave all and follow Him implies for its success a strong spell of personal influence, to which the eager, impulsive offers to follow Him whithersoever He went bear a voluntary witness.

II. From the personal influence of a preacher we turn naturally to the influence of His message. In Him the word and the character were not only harmonious: they were one in their effect. Surely nothing was more unique alike in Christ and His teaching than the truth, adequacy, and tenderness of His treatment of sin. In every epistle of the Apostles, in every word of their preaching, and in the convictions of the believers, there appears that intense and vivid conception of the contrast between good and evil, which almost invented for itself a new vocabulary in such words as 'sin' and 'holiness'.

III. It is sometimes alleged that the prominence thus given to sin is an artificial and conventional thing. To such a challenge Christian teaching can, I think, give no answer but a direct contradiction, and an appeal to fact, as such fact, inward and moral, can be interpreted by the sincere and humble-hearted, and by them alone. The motto of the school of Christ is written by the Master Himself across its portal: 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear'.—BISHOP TALBOT, Oxford University Sermons, p. 16.

THE SANCTUARY OF GOD

'Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary.'—PSALM LXXVII. 13.

THE sanctuary is the place in which God is known and His truth honoured and spoken.

I. The Enthroned Bible.—There is in Paris an old picture which represents an early Christian assembly, and above it a throne, but on that throne is seated neither king nor bishop. There rests simply an open Bible. In the sanctuary the Word of God is enthroned—the Word written, the Word spoken. In the sanctuary God's nature, character, and creative power are made known.

II. God's Way of Creation.—We hear a great deal about the discoveries of modern science; but the first verse of the Bible, the Book of the sanctuary, outweighs them all. The favourite theory of the day, though it is getting some hard knocks from some of your scientific men, is the theory of evolution; but that theory affirms not the cause, but simply the method of creation. The creative power remains the same whether by a direct act or by the slower process of evolution or development. Of course we are speaking of theistic evolution, for there is an atheistic form which would get life out of matter, instinct out of life, mind out of instinct, and free will out of necessity. There are atheistic evolutionists who will swallow all theories, anything but the sublime declaration of the sanctuary, 'In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth'.

III. God's Way of Providence.—By providence is meant His affectionate care over all that He has made. The universe is a cradle, and the hand of the Father—the Mother God—rocks it and all things here are to serve His children. He has placed all things under laws, and these laws are cruel only to those who are too ignorant or too careless to obey them. You say these laws are immutable, that they roll along relentlessly. But we should remember that these laws are also controllable. Who is the wise man? Why the man who subjugates these laws not by violating them, but by harvesting them and using them.

IV. The Indwelling Spirit.—There is also the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. The holy man must be followed by the Holy Ghost. He is the great revealer. He is within our hearts directing the current of our thoughts towards the pure, the spiritual, the heavenly. He so pure yet seeing our impurity dwelling within, moulding and fashioning that He may behold in us His fruits of purity and love. Thus we have in the sanctuary God's way made known as the Creator, Preserver, Redeemer, and Sanctifier. The Church exists to promote man's welfare everywhere. It is the way of the highest instruction, it is the way of consolation.—HUGH JOHNSTON, Christian World Pulpit, No. 1868, p. 120.

REFERENCE.—LXXVII. 13.—H. Melville, Sermons, vol. II. p. 297.

THE HIGHWAY IN THE SEA

'Thy way is in the sea.'—PSALM LXXVII. 19.

DOUBTLESS when the Psalmist penned our text his first thought was the crossing of the Red Sea. He was seeking to revive his drooping heart by recalling the saving power of God in Israel's past. Thy way is the sea—were there not glimpses in that of truths which the Exodus never could exhaust? So did the writer feel—so must we all feel—and it is on some of these suggestions that I wish to speak.

I. First, then, think of the sea as an object of dread. There were two places above all others dreaded by the Jews. The one was the desert and the other was the sea. The desert—for it was across the desert that these armies came which besieged Jerusalem and pillaged it. And the sea—because it was full of storm and treachery in Jewish eyes; it was the hungry, cruel, insatiable deep. Now comes the voice of the great Jewish singer and says to the people, 'God's way is in the sea'. In the very sphere and element they dread is the path and purpose of divinity. I think we should all do well to learn that lesson—God's way is in the very thing we dread. We love the energy and glow of life; but we dread the silence of death and the cold grave—but the way of the Lord of heaven is in the sea.

II. Again, the sea is the abiding home of mystery.

There is a twofold mystery about the sea—illimitable distance and unfathomed depths. Do you think it is profitless and idle dreaming to see in that a parable of life? The commonest life in the heart of the common crowd is more mysterious than any ocean, and it is its distance and its depths that make it so. It is not the achievements of man which are mysterious: it is the things which man never can achieve, and which he yet longs and hopes and hungers for, through century after century of failure. It is the reach of it through death into eternity that encircles with mystery the life of man.

III. Once more, the sea is the element of restlessness. We are not here to be satisfied and rounded. We are here to strive and yearn and toil and pray for things that are too large for threescore years. And in that distressing and yet Divine unrest there is the way and ordering of God. God's way is never in the stagnant pool; His way is ever in the restless sea.

IV. Lastly, I would have you note this about the sea; it is the meeting-place of all the waters. It is not in the things that isolate and part us that the way of God is pre-eminently seen; it is the things that draw us heart to heart; it is in the meeting-place of all the waters. In our sorrows and joys, our hopes and aspirations we are blended like the waters in the sea. And it is there, where we mingle in a common brotherhood, that the seeing eye will find the way of God.—G. H. MORRISON, The Unlighted Lustre, p. 83.

THE SECRECY OF GOD

'Thy way is in the sea, and Thy path in the great waters, and Thy footsteps are not known.'—PSALM LXXVII. 19.

MEN tell us that there are few more impressive sights than that of a burial at sea. It is even more solemn and arresting than the last rites beside an earthly grave. There is the ceasing of the throbbing engines; the gathering of the hushed crowd upon the deck. There is the simple service; the lifting of the body; and then—the plunge into the deep. And it is this element of silent secrecy, this hiding in unfathomable depths, which thrills and solemnizes and subdues. Something like that was in the poet's mind when he said of God, 'Thy way is in the sea'. Mingling with all his other thoughts was this, that God has His unfathomable secrets.

I. Note first some of the spheres in which the Divine secrecy is notable, and we shall think, to begin with, of God's gifts.

1. Think, for example, of the gift of love. In the darkest spot of earth some love is found. There is no man so brutal and so base but some one loves him and thrills at his approach. And yet how silent and how secret love is, hiding itself away from human eye, chary of uttering its depths in language, and speaking in a momentary glance. It is so always with the love of God. God's love is here, bedewing every thorn, shining on every hedge around the home. And yet how secret and hidden it all is—how meaningless to blind or holden eyes—till Christ has come, and showed His wounded side, and led us to the glory of the cross.

2. The same thing also is true of the gift of life. Life is the one impenetrable secret. We have it, and we thank God for it to-night, and yet the wisest knows not what it is.

3. Then once again this element of secrecy is evident in the providence of life. Not with the sound of bell does God arrive, when the feet are at the turning of the ways. Over the silent sea the boat approaches, with some one in it predestined to be ours; but the oars are muffled and we hear it not, as it comes from the haven of the far away. Decked with the broiery of common moments, the moments which are not common reach us. Wearing the aspect of our usual hours, our great hours of destiny arrive.

4. Note the element of secrecy in God's approaching to the soul in grace.

II. The secrecy of God is meant to be a spur to drive us on.

1. There are things that we are better not to hear, and God has the gracious strength to keep a secret. How often have we said in conversation, 'Ah, how I wish you had never told me that!' We can never look with the same eyes again since that one word was whispered in our ear. And we put it from us, and it comes again, and it rises from the dead when we least wish it; and we are meaner, and we are ashamed, just because some one could not keep a secret. There are times when there is strength in speech. There are times when there is strength in silence.

2. The secrecy of God should give us hope. There is hope for the world, and there is hope for men when we can say 'God's footsteps are not known'.

3. The secrecy of God is meant by God to keep us faithful. It is the pattern for our common life. It is given to help us on our daily round. Rarely are we summoned to great deeds. To many of us they never come at all. We are not beckoned along the shining road to anything that might arrest the world. We make our journey by a quiet way, with crosses that are very commonplace, with duties that are ordinary duties, unglorified by any sparkle as of dew. There are blessings in a life like that. When a man is famous his footsteps are well known. He is not the nearer God on that account. From the tiniest violet up to Jesus Christ God moves in quiet and unobtrusive paths. And if it is thus He lavishes His beauty, and makes His infinite sacrifice of love, we can be very near Him in our calling.—G. H. MORRISON, The Return of the Angels, p. 45.

REFERENCES.—LXXVII. 19.—A. P. Stanley, Sermons on Special Occasions, p. 340. C. J. Vaughan, Memorials of Harrow Sundays, p. 116. LXXVII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 172. LXXVIII. 5-7.—H. M. Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 238.

MEMORY, HOPE, AND EFFORT (A New Year's Sermon)

*That they might set their hope in God, and not forget the works of God, but keep His commandments.—PSALM LXXVIII, 7.

In its original application this verse is simply a statement of God's purpose in giving to Israel the Law, and such a history of deliverance. So, then, the words may permissibly bear the application which I purpose to make of them in this sermon, re-echoing only the thoughts which the season has already, I suppose, more or less, suggested to most of us. Though every day be a New Year's Day, still the alteration in our dates and our calendars should set us all thinking of that continued lapse of the mysterious thing—the creature of our own minds—which we call time.

I. Let us associate God with memory by thankful remembrance. I suppose that there are very few of the faculties of our nature which we more seldom try to regulate by Christian principles than that great power which we have of looking backwards. The one thing that all parts of our nature need is God, and that is as true about our power of remembrance as it is about any other part of our being. The past is then hallowed, noble, and yields its highest results and most blessed fruits for us when we link it closely with Him. The past should be regarded by each of us as it is, in deed and in truth, one long record of what God has done for us. Such an exercise of grateful God-recognizing remembrance will deliver us from the abuses of that great power by which so many of us turn our memories into a cause of weakness, if not of sin.

(a) There are people, and we are all tempted to be of the number, who look back upon the past and see nothing there but themselves, their own cleverness, their own success; burning incense to their own net, and sacrificing to their own drag.

(b) Another mood leads us to look back into the past dolefully and disappointedly, to say, 'I have broken down so often. I may as well give it all up.' Never! If only we will look back to God we shall be able to look forward to a perfect self.

(c) There are others to whom remembrance is mainly a gloating over old sins. Alas! for the man whose memory is but the paler portraiture of past sins. You may find a refuge from that curse of remembrance in remembering God.

(d) Some of us unwisely, and ungratefully, live in the light of departed blessings, so as to have no hearts either for present mercies or for present duties—for all these the remedy is that we should not forget the works of God, but see Him everywhere filling the past.

II. Let us live in the future by hope in Him, our remembrances and our hopes are closely connected. Hope owes to memory the pigments with which it paints, the canvas on which it paints, and the objects which it portrays there. But in all our earthly hopes there is a feeling of uncertainty which brings alarm as well as expectation. But if, according to my text, we set our hopes in God, then we shall have a certainty absolute.

III. Let us live in the present by strenuous obedience. After all memory and hope are meant to fit us for work in the flying moment. Both should impel us to this keeping of the commandments of God; for both yield motives which should incline us thereto. If my memory weakens me for present work, either because it depresses my hope of success, or because it saddens me with the remembrance of departed blessings, then it is a curse and not a good. And if I dream myself away in any future, and forget the exigencies of the imperative and swiftly passing moment, then the faculty of hope, too, is a curse and a weakening.—A. MACLAREN, Christ's Musts, p. 118.

REFERENCES.—LXXVIII. 9.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 9. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 696. LXXVIII. 10.—J. Baines, Sermons, p. 113.

DRINK FROM THE DEPTHS

'He gave them drink as out of the great depths.'—PSALM LXXVIII, 15.

THE Psalmist is here reviewing the providence of God that sustained the children of Israel in the desert. That providence had made a deep impression on him, and he delights to dwell upon its wonders. Take, for example, the water from the rock of which the Psalmist is speaking in our text. It comes to him in a flash as the great wonder of it that God gave them drink out of the great depths. What the people came for is a draught of water, and God in His mercy gives them their desire. On that thought I wish to dwell—carrying it through some of the activities of God.

I. Think then for a moment of the world of nature as it unfolds itself in all its beauty round us. There is not a bird or beast, there is not a tree or flower, but is ministered to in the way our text describes. I take the tiniest weed that roots among the stones, the flower in the crannied wall of which the poet speaks, and I ask what does it need to live? It needs a little warmth; it needs an occasional moistening with rain. Now in a certain measure this is true, but you can never stop there in this mysterious universe. Try to explain the light that a rose needs, and you are carried into the depths of solar energy.

II. Again, think of our senses for a moment, think of our sight and hearing for examples. To one man, as to the Peter Bell of Wordsworth, a primrose is just a primrose and no more. To another in the meanest flower that blows there are thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears. Or two men listen to a piece of music and one as he listens is profoundly stirred by it; yet play that piece before another, and it is sound and fury, signifying nothing. So at the back of every sense we have there is a deep that you can never fathom.

III. Again let us think of God's ways in providence in the ordering and discipline of our lives. One of the lessons we learn as we grow older is that our discipline is not exceptional. It is not by exceptional providences that we live. It is not by exceptional joys we are enriched. It is by sorrows that are as old as man, by joys that are common, as the wind is common that breathes on the meanest street.

IV. Then think again for a moment of the Bible. Now there is one thing that always arrests me in the Bible. It is that the Bible is such an ancient book and yet is so intensely modern and practical. There is not a problem you are called to face, there is not a burden you are forced to bear, but your strength for it all shall be as the strength of ten if you make a daily companion of your Bible. It gives us a drink out of the great depths.

V. Then, lastly, think for a moment upon Jesus—of Jesus in relation to His words. If ever words were as water to a thirsty world, surely it was the words that Jesus spake. That is why the words of Christ will live even when heaven and earth have passed away. You can exhaust the cup, or drain the goblet dry, but you cannot exhaust the spring fed from the depths.—G. H. MORRISON, The Wings of the Morning, p. 198.

MISTRUST THAT DESTROYS

'A fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also went up against Israel; because they believed not God, and trusted not in His salvation.'—PSALM LXXVIII. 21, 22.

I. UNBELIEF is malignant when it is a product of the flesh and its tyrannous appetites. Of that we have an instructive example in the text. That was not a guiding angel, a ministering presence, a guardian providence altogether to their minds, which brought them through the depths of the sea and forgot coupons for the banquets that should have been arranged for them at different stages of their journey. In the midst of their toils and privations the fretful descendants of Abraham were having the best possible training for prowess, sovereignty, full salvation.

II. There are men who are unbelievers because their vanity has been vexed and their ambition thwarted, and in the scheme of things which would win them faith and approval, others must needs be found bowing at their feet. God's programme of life and salvation differs from ours, and this tempts us to be unbelieving. Some of us make it a condition of the trust God asks from us that we shall first get all we want.

III. Another sign of malignant unbelief is that it thwarts men in working out the appointed problems of life and salvation. The mind trained to methods of historical research is exasperated to contempt by the uncritical methods of pietists who do not grasp the human part in revelation, and the Bible is despised because of the narrowness and illiteracy of some good Christians who honour it. The man needs our richest pity over whom, for any of these reasons, the Bible has lost its authority. Very often it happens that the unbelief we have cultivated so far afield, we bring back into the circle of our common duties, and find ourselves torn, disheartened, disabled in the presence of providential tasks which lie ready to our hands. That is where the condemnation begins. The unbelief which is malignant, kindling a fire against Jacob and wrath against Israel, is that which reduces men to the level of the brute before the lofty calls and solemn problems of daily life.

IV. The unbelief is malignant which impeaches a God who is in the very act of proving His covenant friendship with us and leading us forth into freedom, privilege, blessedness. The unbelief which affronts God is that which denies His personal sovereignty over us and impugns His gracious ministry in our lives. We are not dealing merely with the history of effete religions, and our mistrust is not the epitaph penned by a distempered soul for the tomb of a departed God. Our vaunted doubt is an affront to a living Benefactor, a stab at the warm love that is ever brooding over us, a gross filial impiety; for the signs that our lives are under constant guidance are as indisputable as those vouchsafed to Israel of old, however much they may differ in form.

V. Unbelief is malignant when the most memorable experiences of our history furnish sufficient warrant for the faith we are required to exercise. God never asks from men an arbitrary and impossible faith, and it will always be found that He has prepared us by the lessons of our previous history for the next heroic act of trust that is required. The demand for faith is culminative, and the longer our experience of His guiding and saving ministry, the greater the obligation that rests on us. The faith God seeks must be achieved first of all in connexion with the problems of our personal life, and when it is achieved there, the stupendous histories and pronouncements of the Bible will no longer cause us to stumble.—T. G. SELBY, The Unheeding God, p. 42.

SOUL FOOD

'Corn of heaven . . . angels' food.'—PSALM LXXVIII. 24, 25.

WHAT do you live upon? How many lives have you? Who is the sustainer of your life? In what direction do you look for daily sustenance? Surely here in these two texts, which are in reality one text, we find exactly what man needs at his best estate—'corn of heaven, angels' food'. Is such sustenance available? Yea. Are there any invitations to partake of this food? Certainly; invitations given as with the blast of trumpets to come and eat, to come buy wine and milk without money and without price.

I. What do we live upon? Here is corn from heaven, here is angels' food, and we may perhaps never touch it. Let it not be supposed that God is responsible for our self-improvement; He never meant us to impoverish ourselves, He never meant us to attempt to satisfy our hunger with the husks that the swine do eat.

II. This wonderful Psalm shows the absolute futility of mere miracles. God seems to have worked all His miracles in this 78th Psalm; it is as full of miracles as the Lord's sermons were full of parables. Yet all ended in a deeper atheism; not an atheism as we understand the word, a term emptied of God, but a term so filled with gods as to dethrone God.

These people in the wilderness tempted God to do another miracle, and then another, and at last miracles became commonplaces to them, ceasing to be miracles and sinking below mere anecdotes or transient circumstances. Let us get back to the idea that God is the sustainer of man, God is the bread-giver; let us go back to our little child-prayer, Give us this day our daily bread. That prayer will do more for the world than atheism has ever done; that prayer will keep the world sweet when many a vain intellectual theory will pervert its imagination and destroy its conscience.

III. 'Corn of heaven, angels' food.' Let the imagery stand for all that it really means. We cannot take out of it the idea that bread and water and honey and locusts and all the old wilderness' fare may be so accepted and utilized as to become as if it were corn of heaven and angels' food. Surely it was angels' food in the most literal sense that Adam ate when he was in the Garden of Eden.

Are we sustained by the living God? Do we live upon God? Do we understand how many kinds of food or elements of sustenance God can give to us? Jesus Christ revealed the great philosophy of living; He said, 'Man shall not live by bread alone'. The meaning is so often mistaken or perverted, as if the passage read, Man must have something more than bread, he must have something to his bread, it will not do to give him mere bread, bare bread. The passage has no such poor drivelling meaning. Here is a great philosophy of sustenance; man shall not live only by bread, as if there were only one way of living, as if there were only one method of keeping man together in his personal identity. God can feed a man on the rock or in the air or on the sea, away from civilization wholly. When men rightly live in God the world will be at rest, and not until then. There is no way of rightly living in God but through Jesus Christ His Son.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. II. p. 233.

REFERENCES.—LXXVIII. 25.—H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 1497, p. 113. LXXVIII. 40.—F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. i. p. 88. LXXVIII. 41.—Archdeacon Wilberforce, Sanctification by the Truth, p. 12. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 272. LXXVIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 178.

THE GOSPEL PALACES

'He built His sanctuary like high palaces, like the earth which He hath established for ever.'—PSALM LXXVIII. 69.

ALL ye who take part in the building of a church know that you have been admitted to the truest symbol of God's eternity. You have built what may be destined to have no end but in Christ's coming. Cast your thoughts back on the time when our ancient buildings were first reared. Consider the churches all around us; how many generations have passed since stone was put upon stone till the whole edifice was finished! The first movers and instruments of its erection, the minds that planned it, and the limbs that wrought at it, the pious hands that contributed to it, and the holy lips that consecrated it, have long, long ago, been taken away; yet we benefit by their good deed. Does it not seem a very strange thing that we should be fed, and lodged, and clothed in spiritual things by persons we never saw or heard of, and who never saw us, or could think of us, hundreds of years ago? Does it not seem strange that men should be able, not merely by acting on others, not by a continued influence carried on through many minds in a long succession, but by one simple and direct act, to come into contact with us, and as if with their own hand to benefit us, who live centuries later? What a visible, palpable specimen this, of the communion of saints! What a privilege thus to be immediately interested in the deeds of our forefathers! And what a call upon us, in like manner, to reach out our own hands towards our posterity! Freely we have received; let us freely give.—J. H. NEWMAN.

THE DIVINE FORGETFULNESS

'O remember not against us former iniquities: let Thy tender mercies speedily prevent (go before) us.'—PSALM LXXIX. 8.
'I will forgive their iniquity, and their sins will I remember no more.'—JEREMIAH XXXI. 34.

MAN'S cry and God's answer, that is our subject; man's cry—for pardon, renewal, restoration; God's answer—willingness and power both to forgive and forget.

I. Man's Cry for Pardon.—What is this sense of sin that pursues man so persistently, and of which the cry of the Psalmist is a proof that we can neither get away from it nor forget it without help from above? It is at once a proof of man's grandeur and of his impotence. God and Nature seen at strife within us. That which we should be and might have been rises upon us in clear tormenting vision; then that which we are gives this the lie and torments us still more. And so that strange sentiment, or experience, or quality of our nature rises in power within us—remorse, which is the feeling engendered by the changelessness of an ill-spent past, in whole or in part. Memory may sleep, but it never dies. We can bear many memories if we think they are our own, safely locked up in our bosoms. But there is another consciousness than our own, other than that of the whole human race; a consciousness universal as being, pure and retentive as the light, holy as holiness itself can be; which holds all that ever was, that has ever happened to us and within us, in its unfailing, unfading grasp, and which never forgets. It is the thought of this tremendous cosmic memory which is the ultimate bar of judgment at which all good and evil must receive their verdict, the ultimate correction of an easy-going optimism as regards the issue of wrongdoing. There is no escape from God's knowledge of the present, nor from His memory of the past.

II. The Transformation of Memory.—We shall not come into any satisfying faith in the forgiveness and forgetfulness of God till we realize that all reality of sin remains and must remain for ever; and yet that forgiveness and forgetfulness are both real. The Cross of Christ is the furthestmost point in the journey of heavenly love in seeking to bring back the lost; a love that bent all the Divine attributes (like the earth under the stresses that carry it round the sun) into a perfect circle of reconciliation. And so when man, recognizing this miracle of atoning love, repents and is reconciled to God as a dear child, the result is a moral forgiveness, which is also a moral forgetfulness. —E. GRIFFITH-JONES.

REFERENCES.—LXXIX. 15.—J. H. Hitchens, Catholic Sermons, vol. ii. p. 73. LXXIX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 197. LXXX. 1.—J. Parsons, Penny Pulpit, No. 1702, p. 655.

THE MIGHTINESS OF REDEMPTION

'Stir up Thy strength, and come and help us.'—PSALM LXXX. 2.

THE greatest of all helps to realize the magnitude of redemption is the experimental sense, the unwrought consciousness of 'the exceeding sinfulness of sin'. Take this for an axiom. He thinks lightly of the greatness of redemption who thinks lightly of the power of sin. He regards Jesus as a superfluous helper who regards Satan as a contemptible foe. The two spiritual conceptions are co-equal, correlative. It is when like David we cry out, 'Innumerable troubles are come about me: my sins have taken such hold upon me that I am not able to look up,' that like David also, we stretch out our hands to our mighty Succourer, and feel the force of the prayer which may often have passed our lips before, 'O Lord, let it be Thy pleasure to deliver me: make haste, O Lord, to help me. Thou art my Helper and Redeemer; make no long tarrying, O my God.'

I. I refuse to limit the great work of redemption to what is called, in the language of popular theology, 'the saving of the soul'. Wherever sin in its remotest consequences has reached, there Christ's work reaches also. We do a fatal injury, as it seems to me, to the work of redemption, as a practical human idea, when we disconnect it, as some are fond of doing, from the temporal and even the material interests of mankind. It is my full belief that the Cross of Christ has done, proportionately to the matter on which it works, as much for us in this world as it will do in the next. The 'Kingdom of Heaven' in the idea of its great founder began with St. John's baptism—runs its first course in this lower world—throws its light on 'life' as well as on immortality. For the law of the kingdom of God is progress—development—of the species, speaking generally; and of the individual, too, where it has free course and is not frustrated. It works more effectually in the nobler parts of our nature; in the spirit than in the soul; in the soul than in the body. But there is nothing in human nature that is too high to need it, too low to be susceptible of its influence. Even 'our vile bodies' are to be changed into the 'likeness of Christ's glorious body' according to the working whereby He 'is able to subdue all things unto Himself'. The fullness of spiritual discernment—the great gift of heaven first; sanctification, that which now worketh in us mightily, next; but 'the redemption of the body' also has its place in the scale of regeneration, though the quickening spirit of the last Adam has not yet swallowed up death in the completeness of His victory.

II. It is no reflection on the Divine power that in this or that instance it may seem to us to have failed in its purpose or to have wrought out its end by imperfect or even evil agencies. For to us is committed the scarcely less wonderful power of antagonism; we worms of the earth can frustrate as regards ourselves—ay, and as regards others—'the grace of God'. It is the inexplicable mystery of human free will, concurrent with Divine omnipotence. And if the treachery of a Judas, or the malice of a Caiaphas, or the moral weakness of a Pilate, or the fickleness of an ignorant crowd, were really agencies in the salvation of the world, what can we do but admire the resources of that omnipotence which by a Divine alchemy can transmute human evil into human good, and vindicate its sovereignty even by submitting to the use of base instrumentalities, and, like the light of the blessed sun, can pass through the foulest media, clouded perhaps, and robbed of some of its brightness, but yet uncontaminated and undefiled.—J. FRASER, University and Other Sermons, p. 248.

REFERENCES.—LXXX. 14.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons, p. 185. LXXX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 201.

THE PREPARATION FOR A RELIGIOUS LIFE

'Quicken us, and we will call upon Thy name.'—PSALM LXXX. 18.

I. THIS is a singular prayer from the worldly point of view. The common notion is that religion is a dulling process—a cooling down of the pulses of life. We speak of the yielding to temptation as fast living, and we blame for it what we call the ardour of youth. When a man begins to think seriously, we say that he has sobered down, grown mellow, abated in the fire of early years. All this implies one idea—that seriousness of life is a deadening of life. The Psalmist takes exactly the opposite view, 'Quicken us, and we will call upon Thy name'. To him religion is not a dulling, but a vivifying process—a process which does not diminish but which increases the heart's ardour, which does not retard but which accelerates the pulses of the being. He would suggest that to become religious a man needs, not less life, but more, not a narrowing but an enlargement of the stream.

II. It is generally supposed that when we begin to live in God we must subside in our life for the world. The Psalmist, on the contrary, says that before religion can dawn there must be a natural vivifying of the worldly powers, 'Quicken us, and we will call upon Thy name'. Religion in the heart is made the result of intensified natural life. And I think it will be found that the Psalmist is right. For what is the prevailing cause of irreligion? I say 'irreligion'—not 'doubt,' for doubt is a form of religious seriousness. What, I ask, is the prevailing cause of irreligion? It is indifference; and what is indifference? Is it not simply deadness—want of interest in the things of life. If you would make a religious man serious, you must quicken his pulse to the objects around him. It is this quickening of the pulse that the irreligious man resists. It is to resist intense feeling about worldly things that he flies from flower to flower of pleasure, deadening his appetite as he goes. It is to resist intense feeling about worldly things that he rests not in any spot, however green, but changes his place each hour lest he should read its solemnity. It is by veiling my sight of earth that I lose my sight of heaven.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 233.

REFERENCE.—LXXX. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. p. 284.

CONSECRATION AND EXPECTATION

'Hear, O My people, and I will testify unto thee,' etc.—
PSALM LXXXI. 8-10.

I. THE duty of religion flows directly from the fact of God. Wherever God is acknowledged there religion is obligatory. To us then who admit that there is a God of whom we know something religion cannot be optional. God is, and it is our duty to honour and obey Him. Full obedience, then, is one fundamental element of religion, as it is brought before us in our text. We might find a ground for demanding obedience to God further back than any special experience of God's redemptive working. A sufficient stringency of duty arises, for instance, from the relation of the creature to the Creator. The demand that we should perfectly obey and wholly consecrate ourselves to the Lord our God comes to us as it did to Israel. Nor can we pretend to have complied faithfully with it. Under the uniformity of our worship our fickleness has been every whit as real as that of Israel long ago. Might not an impartial observer conclude that we worshipped at least two Gods? A God of this world six days and a God of the world to come, whom we seek to placate, on the odd seventh day, with no great earnestness, by certain acts of worship of no long duration? The truth is that we fail in the fundamental element of religion which I have called obedience, unless we do all things, week-day and Sunday, to the glory of the only God. There is an interesting parallel between us and the Israelites. As Israel traced its origin to God's redemptive grace working by Moses, so we may trace the origin of our Christian Church to God's redemptive grace working by Christ.

II. We pass now to the second element of religion which our text gives us—the element of expectation. We fail in this duty of expectancy as much as in the duty of obedience. A large expectation is as much a duty as a complete consecration. The religion of redemption is emphatically the religion of hope. Our prayers disappoint us, not because we ask more than we had a right to expect, but because we ask too little. If we ask of the greater things we shall get all we need of the less. All sin is unreasonable, but no sin has so little to say for itself as the sin of those who profess to lament their failure, and yet refuse to admit those words of salvation which are ever sounding in their ears, and which, if believed, would make all things new.—P. J. MACLAGAN, The Gospel View of Things, p. 187.

REFERENCES.—LXXXI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 209. LXXXI. 12, 13.—Bishop Harvey Goodwin, Parish Sermons (2nd Series), p. 50. LXXXII. 8.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons, vol. iii. p. 1. LXXXII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 214. LXXXIII. 3.—J. T. Stannard, The Divine Humanity, p. 141. LXXXIII. 16.—J. Keble, Sermons from Lent to Passiontide, pp. 23, 34.—LXXXIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 217.

PSALM LXXXIV.

Foxe, in his Book of Martyrs, under the year 1554, in the reign of Queen Mary, gives an account of the youthful martyr. It is taken from his brother's narration. 'He suffered with great constancy, and recited the 84th Psalm as he was a-dying. Then there was a gentleman who said, "I pray God have mercy upon his soul". The people said, "Amen, Amen". Immediately fire was made. Then William cast his Psalter right into his brother's hand, who said, "William, think on the holy passion of Christ, and be not afraid of death!" And William answered, "I am not afraid". Then, lifting up his hands to heaven, he said, "Lord, Lord, Lord, receive my spirit"; and, casting down his head again into the smothering smoke, he yielded up his life for the truth, sealing it with his blood to the praise of God.'—JOHN KER.

DELIGHT IN GOD'S HOUSE

'How amiable are Thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts.'—
PSALM LXXXIV. 1.

THE utterance of a Hebrew exile who is cut off from the privileges of worship and sacrifice on Mount Zion. The Psalmist prays that he, though distant, may share the blessing of those who can enter the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High. And thus the close of the Psalm suggests that grace and glory are not altogether confined to the temple courts.

I. Even in the Old Testament no local sanctuary has a monopoly of the Divine Presence. And in the New Testament we realize that the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands. It has seemed easy and natural for Christians to chant this Psalm, referring it to the services of the Christian Church. Nevertheless we must distinguish and discriminate in our application of its phrases, and interpret them in the clear light of the argument of the Epistle to the Hebrews: 'Ye are come unto Mount Zion, unto the heavenly Jerusalem'.

II. It may even be questioned whether Christians should call any earthly building 'the House of God'. God's house for each individual man is just the place where he finds himself at home with God: 'any place where God grants the vision, where God lets down the ladder'.

III. Yet this expresses only part of the total truth. Christianity is supremely a fellowship, and we realize the living God in the fellowship of His children. It is among the gathered company of believers that Christ manifests His real presence, and fulfils His promise to their corporate and collective faith.—

T. H. DARLOW, The Upward Calling, p. 232.

THE HOUSE OF GOD

'How amiable are Thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!'
PSALM LXXXIV. I.

THIS is the language of love, and in this brief sentence is forcibly expressed the royal Psalmist's impassioned love for God, through the medium of His recognized abode.

I. The Object.—'Tabernacles' signifies places of temporary rather than of fixed or permanent abode; and in this is implied the evanescent, short-lived nature of the race, and all that belongs to sublunary existence.

II. The Special Significance of this Appellation.

—The advantages such Divine favour affords:—

(a) As a source of comfort and rejoicing.

(b) As essential to faith, faithfulness, and success.

III. The House of God as a Blessed Reality.—

The powers of darkness foiled, and victory on Israel's side.

CHRISTIAN WORSHIP

'How amiable are Thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts.'
PSALM LXXXIV. I.

THIS Psalm was written evidently under circumstances of some deep sorrow or anxiety which had caused absence, and that a constrained absence, from the tabernacles of the Lord. The Psalm further describes the going up of the pilgrims of Zion to the Temple of Jerusalem, and the increasing blessing that they felt in communion with one another, journeying all toward Jerusalem.

I. What is the position of affairs as appertaining to the interpretation of this Psalm? There was private worship then as now. Many of the Scriptures of the Old Testament enforced that duty; and there is public worship now as there was then, with all the Old Testament lessons carried forward, and all the New Testament lessons adding on their special edification and example.

II. In the New Testament the great rubric of public worship is this, 'Whosoever two or three are gathered together in My name,' says Christ, 'there am I in their midst'. And we have this additional command in the words of the Apostle, 'Forsaking not the assembling yourselves together as the manner of some is'. We urge these things because of two classes of men: (a) First because of the careless and the thoughtless who think they can live, but know that they cannot die, without the means of grace, and who seldom if ever attend the house of God. (b) Another class consists of some amongst our own selves who are so spiritual in their own mind, or in their own understanding of themselves, that they have no sympathy for those that are without, despise anything like material or concrete methods for conducting the worship of God, and esteem buildings, systems, forms, and all externals as nothing worth at all. In enforcing upon the careless and the thoughtless the important duty of public worship, you include the importance of private worship; because those persons who neglect public worship are almost sure to neglect private worship too; whereas, those that attend private worship are those that most value and appreciate the public worship of God in the communion of His people.

III. In the dispensation of the Spirit in which we now live amid all the spiritual demands of the New Testament Church, God still has appointed and approved of the outward and the visible means of grace. Is it by dreams and visions that God makes known His mind to us? No, but by His holy word which is a book—a book, a tangible, real, genuine, veritable book, so far external as to be a book printed on paper, and printed with ink, just as other books are, and that is the way in which God communicates whatever of His mind we have ever attained.

REFERENCES.—LXXXIV. 1.—R. D. B. Rawnsley, Sermons in Country Churches (3rd Series), p. 293. LXXXIV. 1, 2.—C. Bradley, Faithful Teaching, p. 116. LXXXIV. 3.—Spurgeon, My Sermon Notes—Genesis to Proverbs, p. 184. LXXXIV. 6.—P. Brooks, The Mystery of Iniquity, p. 18. Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 257. LXXXIV. 7.—J. Keble, Village Sermons on the Baptismal Service, p. 301. H. M. Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 230.

THE GLORIOUS LAMP OF HEAVEN

'The Lord God is a sun.'—PSALM LXXXIV. II.

I. THE progress of our life is not unlike the progress of astronomy. We all begin in one way or other by making this earth on which we dwell the centre. The strange thing is that while this remains the centre, for us as for the astronomers much is dark. A thousand problems baffle our inquiry, and a thousand questions are answered by a cry. But the day comes—and it comes to every man—when he has his choice of being a Copernicus. He has his choice of making the great refusal, or of making the grandest of all discoveries, for the greatest discovery a man can make is that God is the centre of the system.

II. How beneficent is the power of the sun, and yet from what a vast distance it is exercised. I am sure that most of us have been oppressed at times by the thought of a distant God. Like Job we have looked to the right hand and He was not there, and to the left and have seen nothing of His form, until under the weight of thoughts like these the distance of the Almighty Father chills us, and we cannot pray with realizing power nor can we walk with realizing faith. Tempted and tried thus let us recall our text: 'The Lord God is a shield—He is a sun'. Wherever His Throne be, in distances illimitable, shall He be outmatched in power by His creature?

III. Without the atmosphere the sun could never bless us. May I not use that mystery of nature to illuminate a kindred mystery of grace? It is one of the ways of God in all His workings to grant His blessings through an intermediary. Christ is the mediator of the better covenant. Through Him the sunshine of heaven's love can reach us and in the rays of that sunshine we are blessed.—G. H. MORRISON, The Unlighted Lustre, p. 65.

PSALM LXXXIV. 11.

'No good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly.' When Thomas Carlyle was leaving, in doubt and despondency, his quiet mountain home at Craigenputtock for the untried tumult of London, he quoted part of this verse for comfort to his brother Alexander and himself, but mingled it with the words of another passage, Romans viii. 28.—J. K.

REFERENCES.—LXXXIV. 11.—R. S. Candlish, Sonship and Brotherhood of Believers, pp. 66, 79. LXXXIV. 11, 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1699. LXXXIV. 12.—H. P. Wright, Preacher's Magazine, vol. xix. p. 80. LXXXIV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 224. E. Johnson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxv. p. 75.

THE PRAYER OF A PATRIOT

'Wilt Thou not revive us again, that Thy people may rejoice in Thee?'—PSALM LXXXV. 6.

AN old commentator has summed up the purport of this Psalm in the following words: 'The prayer of a patriot for his afflicted country, in which he pleads God's former mercies and by faith foresees better days'. Such a Psalm reminds us, first of all, that a good Christian must be a good patriot, ardently concerned for the truest welfare of his own people and his native land. Moreover, it suggests that we may appropriate to this England of ours in a modified yet real and profound sense the sacred word which applied originally to Israel.

I. This Psalm, with the reiterated stress which it lays on the pardon of man's sin and the turning away of God's wrath, reminds us of one truth which Christian workers never dare forget. The first and the supreme need of men is their need to be forgiven. In the eyes of the Apostles the world seemed divided into two great classes, the forgiven and the unforgiven. Compared with this ultimate distinction nothing else seriously matters. While we strive for social betterment and take counsel together over plans and efforts to cure the evils which afflict our land, let us give due place to that Divine remedy which implicitly includes the rest.

II. Wilt Thou not quicken us again? We implore Him who is the Lord and Giver of life to revive among us that life of the spirit which is so apt to be stifled and deadened by the pressure of the world. Nothing can give thoughtful Englishmen greater concern than the decay of high ideals alike in the politics and the literature of the nation. And in the Church itself, while we raise vast sums of money and multiply our religious machinery, do we not grow painfully aware of a certain dearth and poverty of spiritual passion which can only be re-inspired and rekindled from above?

III. We note finally this test and touchstone of a real revival. It fills Christians with new joy and delight in God Himself. As the Holy Ghost comes upon us and the power of the Highest overshadows us the Church breaks out in a fresh Magnificat, and sings: 'My spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour'. And the Church becomes the irresistible missionary when it can chant that victorious song.—T. H. DARLOW, The Upward Calling, p. 134.

REFERENCES.—LXXXV. 6.—C. Perron, Revival Sermons, p. 271. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (10th Series), p. 210. J. Kerry, A Book of Lay Sermons, p. 161. LXXXV. 9.—E. Bickersteth, Thoughts in Past Years, p. 283.

PSALM LXXXV. 10.

'MERCY and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other,' was the text of Dr. Thomas Goodwin, the great Independent divine, at the opening of Parliament, 27 January, 1659, when Richard Cromwell was installed as Protector. The sermon is a reasonable plea for liberty of conscience, and an exhortation to unity and peace—seed cast on stormy waters, not to be found till after many days.—J. K.

REFERENCE.—LXXXV. 11.—P. Brooks, The Law of Growth, p. 20.

THE TRUE OUTLOOK FOR FAITH

'Righteousness shall go before Him.'—PSALM LXXXV. 13.

I. WHY should the Psalmist say that God's righteousness goes before Him; why should he not have written, 'His righteousness will be seen as He is passing by'? Because this latter would not be true. It is not as God passes that His righteousness is seen. The idea I take to be that we cannot expect to understand the goodness of God until His plan has been unfolded. We feel His action to-day; we shall only learn its wisdom to-morrow. We see the storing of vegetable matter in the depths of the earth; we say, 'To what purpose is this waste?' By and by it is dug up for coal; it becomes the source of household fires and the means of swift locomotion. We find that in its buried state it has been waiting to be the minister to human civilization, and we say to God, 'Thou hast understood my thoughts afar off—Thou hast made provision in advance'. We see a man of great powers immured in a wilderness; we say again, 'To what purpose is this waste?' By and by the wilderness becomes a thoroughfare, and the solitude is broken. We find that in his buried state the man has been waiting for the hour of a great destiny, and we cry to God, 'The completed years have praised Thee'. We see the Priest of human souls crucified by the world; we say once more, 'To what purpose is this waste?' By and by that Cross becomes His glory, His kingdom, His crown. We find that in His buried state He has redeemed the world, and we cry to God, 'The fullness of the time has justified Thee'.

II. In all these acts the righteousness of God has gone before Him. It has not been seen while He was passing by. The thing seen was something apparently adverse to God—something which seemed to derogate from His providence. But the object present to the Divine eye was always the future. It rested not on the buried vegetation but on the coming coalfield, not on the deserted place but on the desert made populous, not on the death in humiliation but on the days when such humiliation should be deemed the climax of glory. To see the righteousness of God you must see Him by to-morrow's light.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 93.

A PATTERN OF PRAYER

'Bow down Thine ear, O Lord, hear me,' etc.—PSALM LXXXVI 1-5.

THE prayer that springs from a deep-felt need, and will not cease till that need is supplied, may say the same things over a hundred times, and yet they shall not be vain.

I. The Invocations. In general, this Psalm is remarkable for its frequent use of the Divine names. In almost every verse they recur, and their frequency gives us a vivid impression of earnestness, of consciousness of need, and of faith so sore pressed that it could only sustain itself by perpetual renewal of its grasp of God. Five times in these verses of our text does he invoke Him, and that by three several names—Jehovah, my God, Lord. These three sacred names have each a distinct meaning when used in prayer; they bring up various aspects of the character of God as the basis of our confidence, and the ground of our petitions. So, then, when we blend all these together, it is as if the Psalmist had said: 'The ever living, the covenant Jehovah, my God in whom I claim a personal interest, who loves me with an individualizing love, and cares for me with a specific care, the absolute monarch and sovereign of the whole universe is He to whom I come with my supplication. I think of His names, I trust in them, I present them to Him, whom they all but partially declare; and I ask Him—for His own name's sake, because of what He is and hath declared Himself to be, to hear my poor cry, to answer my imperfect faith, to show Himself yet once again that which His name hath from old proclaimed Him to be.'

II. So much then for the invocation, and now a word or two in reference to the petitions which these verses give us. As I have said, they are all substantially the same, and yet they so vary as to suggest how familiar all the aspects of the deliverance that the Psalmist desires were to him. The way in which God's mercy is to guard and save is left, with meek patience, to God's decision. No sorrow is so crushing and hopeless but that happiness may again visit the heart where trust and love abide. Only let us remember that this Psalm seeks for joy, where it seeks for help, not from earthly sources, but from God.

III. Finally, we have to consider the pleas on which these petitions are based. The logic of prayer here is very remarkable and beautiful. Every feature of the Psalmist's condition and character, as well as all that he knows of God, becomes in his life a reason with God for granting his prayer. The human side of the relation between God and His servant is further urged in the subsequent claims which refer to the Psalmist's longings and efforts after fellowship with God. It is His own mercy in Christ which we present. It is the work of His own love which we bring as our plea.—A. MACLAREN, Sermons Preached in Manchester, vol. III. p. 257.

REFERENCE.—LXXXVI. 9.—J. Wordsworth, 'The One Religion,' Bampton Lectures, 1881, p. 1.

RELIGIOUS CONCENTRATION

'Unite my heart to fear Thy name.'—PSALM LXXXVI. 12.

To a writer of such broad sympathies as the Psalmist, the doctrine of the Divine unity suggests a prophetic picture of the gathering together of all nations for God's worship. From the north and the south, the east and the west, he sees many races flowing together with one consent and bowing reverently before the Lord God of Israel. And as he contemplates the glory of the coming days he longs to realize an earnest of its peace in his own undivided consecration to God.

I. Various powers belong to us between which no true bond of coherence makes itself felt. Our minds seem to have suffered dismemberment, and we watch ourselves discharging God's service with little bits of our being only. There can be no complete oneness of character till we adopt the Psalmist's prayer and persevere till it is answered.

(a) That power of religious concentration for which the Psalmist prays is the just tribute to God's greatness. The worship and service of the Most High must absorb us and will even then be tremendously inadequate.

(b) A religion illimitable in the range of its interests demands a service into which all the forces of life gather themselves. Isolated acts of worship do not satisfy the spirit of its requirements. The homage Jehovah seeks is many-sided, including praise, faith, reverence, contemplation, obedience, philanthropy, and consuming love.

II. This united and mutually consistent action of all the powers of the soul is necessary to religious perfecting. Some parts of the nature are more predisposed to God and religious exercise and pursuits than others, but the goal is not reached whilst they act in isolation.

III. What is the difficulty which hinders this unification of all the forces of the nature in the Divine service. It is obvious that the impediment is not deficiencies of intellectual training. The mental powers do not act together in close file at a word of command from the hidden life, and it will be some years before that comes to pass. And this fact has its counterpart in the processes through which the art of religious concentration is attained. If sin had not introduced a fixed discord into man's nature it might still have been needful for him to acquire unity of thought and life by a term in the school of experience.

IV. The grace for which the Psalmist prays is one and the same with the power which sanctifies. Holiness is practical religious concentration, achieved through the commanding motive of love to God. When the heart is united to fear God's name all social and secular pursuits become indirect forms of worship, binding more closely to God and awakening delight at the thought of His presence.

V. The inevitable set of the human mind is towards concentration, and if we do not acquire the habit for good it will master us for evil. One man's nature specializes itself into the pursuit of pleasure, another's into the acquisition of power, and that of a third into money-getting, divorced even from the satisfaction of spending. It behoves us to see that it is the best within us which becomes dominant, and that this supreme concentration chooses for its processes the things which are pure, lovely, and sacred, rather than the things which are evil.—T. G. SELBY, The God of the Frail, p. 330.

REFERENCES.—LXXXVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 235. LXXXVI. 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvi. No. 1559.

THE CITY OF GOD

'Her foundations are upon the holy hills.'—PSALM LXXXVII. 1.

I. It is a remarkable circumstance that the splendid hopes of the Prophets and Psalmist of the Old Testament are always directed to a regenerated society in the future as the greatest blessing of the expected coming of the Messiah. The pious Israelite looked forward to the future of his people, that seed of Abraham which God has chosen for Himself; he did not contemplate his own future apart from theirs. And at times it almost seemed as if the sense of his personal destiny in the world beyond the grave were lost in his conviction of the great destiny of the nation to which he was so proud to belong. So it is with the kingdom of God which was to realize the brightest dreams of the Psalmist. Its blessings are for individual men and women; but they are given to them in virtue of their citizenship in the heavenly kingdom of Jesus Christ our Lord. The New Jerusalem like the Jerusalem of which the Psalmist wrote is the city of God.

II. And therefore surely it is a holy city. That is easy to believe of the Church in heaven; it is not so easy to believe of the Church on earth. For it is the perpetual reproach of Christians that the citizenship which they have inherited is too often despised and abused. We dare not measure the greatness of God's gifts to us His children by the eagerness and loyalty of our response. It is not our feeble faith but God's strong love that has laid the foundations on which this city is built.—J. H. BERNARD, Via Domini, p. 305.

REFERENCE.—LXXXVII. 2.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 249.

THE ANNIVERSARIES KEPT IN HEAVEN

'The Lord shall count, when He writeth up the people, that this man was born in Zion.'—PSALM LXXXVII. 6.

I. I UNDERSTAND the meaning of the passage to be that the anniversaries of the future will be held for the righteous. We observe at present the anniversaries of the intellectually great—of the poet, of the statesman, of the distinguished general, of the scientific discoverer. But without disparaging these, the Psalmist looks forward to a time when the birthdays observed will be on the ground of goodness. We hold the natal days of the heroes of history. What a surprise it would create if it were to be announced that a commemorative service was to be held to keep the centenary of some humble woman historically unknown! And yet it is not too much to say that in the large majority of cases the distinguished have been indebted to the unknown. Many a man who has had his theatre in the world has had his metropolis in the nursery; the crucial hours of his life have been the hours the world never saw—the hours spent at a mother's knee and brightened by a mother's teaching. Many a great thinker has got his wisdom from some obscure school-master 'never heard of half a mile from home'—from one who had all the thought in his soul but just lacked the gift of expression. Many a successful candidate for life's favour has owed his power of endurance to the cheering words of some optimistic Christian who met him at a time of despondency and prevented him from giving in. Many a toiling wrestler for the cure of human disease was first taught to love humanity by witnessing the holy patience of some humble sufferer who bore without repining, who was afflicted and murmured not, who carried the cross and made no sign.

II. The man who has reached the top of the mountain has been stimulated by the cry, 'Excelsior'; but it has been oftener the voice of another than of himself. It has come from the valley, from the place of the lowly, from the scene of the undistinguished. The deeds of silent sacrifice, the homes of humble piety, the acts of covert kindness, the words of unrecorded righteousness, the examples of unpublished purity—these have been the sources of human greatness.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 7.

REFERENCES.—LXXXVII. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 382. LXXXVII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 239. LXXXVIII. 1, 3.—Archbishop Alexander, Bampton Lectures, 1876, p. 133. LXXXVIII. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1090.

'I am afflicted and ready to die from my youth up; while I suffer Thy terrors I am distracted.'—PSALM LXXXVIII. 15.

ST. JOHN OF THE CROSS in The Ascent of Mount Carmel quotes this text in its Latin form: 'Pauper sum ego et in laboribus a juventute mea'. He says that David calls himself poor although it is clear that he was rich, because his will was not set on riches, and so he was in the same state as if he had really been poor. But if he had formerly been actually poor and had not been poor in will, he would not have been truly poor, since the soul was rich and full in appetite.—OBRAES ESPIRITUALES, San Juan de la Cruz, vol. i. p. 13.

REFERENCES.—LXXXVIII. 15, 16.—T. Arnold, Christian Life; Its Hopes, p. 106. Ibid. Sermons, vol. v. p. 106. LXXXVIII. 18.—C. Vince, The Unchanging Saviour, p. 224. LXXXVIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 242. LXXXIX. 11.—W. M. Sinclair, Words from St. Paul's, p. 1. LXXXIX. 14.—W. H. H. Murray, American Pulpit of To-day, vol. ii. p. 927.

THE JOYFUL SOUND

'Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound : they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of Thy countenance.'—PSALM LXXXIX. 15.

In these words David speaks of the blessedness of the people that know the joyful sound. Although year by year the sound of the trumpet brightened the hearts of God's chosen people, yet there was one year in which that sound brought them exceeding joy. It was the year of jubilee when on the day of atonement, when all the solemn services of that day were over, there was brought to the suffering and to the poor great joy. At the sound of that trumpet every slave was set free. Yet the words had a deeper meaning even for David; for all through the teaching of that olden time there was an under-current heard by those who had ears to hear, which told them of exceeding joy. It was the hope which was the centre of their life, the great object of their longing, the hope of one who would deliver them from worse than earthly bondage, and restore them to a possession which they had forfeited by their sin.

I. But to us have not these words a deeper meaning still? The joyful sounds that stir our hearts tell us not of a coming salvation but of a Saviour who has come. It speaks to us who through our sins had forfeited the kingdom of our God, and tells us that He, our Saviour, has opened that kingdom of heaven again to all believers.

II. But how many there are to whom this is but an idle tale—an empty, not a joyful sound. They shut out all these thoughts with the absorbing cares and the fleeting pleasures of a perishing world, content to live in a fool's paradise, to dream away the few short years of life, and then wake up to the awful realities of eternity. A thousand-fold more blessed than that careless, godless, reckless worldliness in which so many thousands live and die, is the fiercest agony of a sin-burdened soul, because it opens the heart to hear the joyful sound—the joyful sound which tells that, sinners though we be, and crushed beneath a load of guilt which is insupportable to us, there is one who has died to take away our sins, 'And the Lord hath laid on him the iniquities of us all'.

III. But again there are souls that have been roused to seek after God, who have long since begun the awful struggle against still unconquered sin, who are striving against the principalities and powers that surround them as they seek to fight their way to the open gates of the heavenly city, and whose hearts almost sink and fail within them as temptation comes back again and again, and as through their weakness they fall under temptation's power. Are there any who have known such a blessed unrest as this—such a glorious state of conflict as this—the conflict of an awakened soul against the powers of evil. Is it not a joyful sound that speaks to you from the lips of Jesus? 'My grace is sufficient for thee, my strength is made perfect in weakness. Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.'

IV. But again there are souls that are weary with the long labour and toil and trial of the heavenward road. They are weary of the conflict, long that it were over, yet wondering how or when it shall be. Oh, with all the power of joy comes to such hearts the blessed promise of our Lord and Saviour to all weary souls—'Come unto Me, and I will give you rest'.

REFERENCES.—LXXXIX. 15.—J. Cumming, Penny Pulpit, No. 1575, p. 231. Spurgeon, Old Testament Outlines, p. 126. LXXXIX. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. I. No. 11. LXXXIX. 19, 20.—G. Trevor, Types and the Antitype, p. 125. LXXXIX. 37, 38.—E. H. Gifford, Voices of the Prophets, p. 215.

MAN'S NEED OF IMMORTALITY

'Remember how short my time is ; wherefore hast Thou made all men in vain ?'—PSALM LXXXIX. 47.

I. I WOULD describe this as the earliest Bible cry for immortality. It is a very peculiar cry. It is grounded not upon instinct, but upon reason. It is not a longing founded upon the mere love of life. It is not a desire based upon the mere dread of death. It is not a wish rising from the mere search of new surroundings. It is a cry originating in the spirit of economy—the resistance to waste. The Psalmist is impressed with the inadequacy of the term of human life. He does not mean that it is too short for enjoyment; enjoyment is always taken at a quick draught. But he thinks it too short for the work assigned to it. He sees the labourer hired into the vineyard with orders to perform a certain task. But he finds that the task given to the labourer is one which he could not possibly perform within the limits of the working day. He says, 'What does the Lord of the vineyard mean by this disproportion between work and time, surely He must intend the labour to be continued into another day!'

II. You will find that the deepest cry of all ages has been the Psalmist's cry. What makes us crave a future is not a sense of this world's misery, but a sense of this world's vanity. We say with the Psalmist, 'Wherefore hast Thou made all men in vain—why hast Thou given them working orders which are quite incommensurate with the brief time they have to live on earth?' We feel that there is more furniture to be put into the house than the house will hold. We are prompted to boundless aspirations, and we live on earth for but an hour. We are inspired to endless love, and it never reaches summer. We are bidden by conscience to work for all ages, and we have only three score years and ten. Life's day is too short for us. It is not too short for the bee, which completes its destined palace. It is not too short for the lark, which completes its destined song. But it is too short for man whose ideal is unrealized, whose song is unfinished, whose labour in the field is scarce begun.

III. Therefore, O Lord, I know that this is not my goal. Thou hast furnished me with powers which here can have no adequate exercise. I speak of the ephemeral insect; yet if this life were my all, the insect would not be so ephemeral as I. . . . The insect finishes the work which Thou gavest it to do; I leave my studies incomplete, my book unwritten, my picture without its closing touch, my house without its topmost story. But it is just my incompleteness that makes my hope. I know Thou wouldst not give me power to be squandered; I know Thou hast appointed for me another day. It is not my fear that cries to Thee; it is my sense of justice and my wish to indicate Thy justice. If earth met all my needs, I would accept the day of death. But earth has not fully responded to any one cry of my spirit as I claim response from Thee. Surely there are answers waiting somewhere to the myriad epistles written by my heart! Forbid that I should think Thou hast made my life in vain.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 97.

REFERENCES. — LXXXIX. 47. — G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 21. J. Martineau, Hours of Thought, vol. i. p. 203. LXXXIX. — International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 250. XC. 1. — C. F. Aked, Christian World Pulpit, 1891. p. 10. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 46.

PSALM XC.

WHEN we have passed that limit of age which Psalm xc. indicates as the most usual boundary of human life, the near horizons become for us those of the world beyond this present life.—ERNEST NAVILLE to the COUNTESS DE GASPARDIN, La Comtesse Agénor de Gasparin et sa Famille, p. 426.

PSALM XC. was read by the Rev. J. McCormick over the victims of the great Matterhorn disaster of 1865. The Prayer Book from which it was read was found on the body of the Rev. Charles Hudson, one of the dead. Mr. McCormick wrote: 'Imagine us standing with our bronze-faced guides, leaning on their axes or alpenstocks, around that singular grave, in the centre of a snow-field, perhaps never before trodden by man, with that awful mountain frowning above us, under a cloudless sky—in the very sight, as it were, of the Almighty—and try and catch the sound of the words: "Lord, Thou hast been our refuge from one generation to another. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever the earth and world were made, Thou art God from everlasting, and world without end. Thou turnest man to destruction: again Thou sayest, Come again, ye children of men."'

THE OLD FAITH—WHAT IS PANTHEISM?

'Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever Thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, Thou art God.'—PSALM XC. 1, 2.

I. Pantheism is the attempt to reduce everything that exists to one vast principle. It sounds very plausible, but it can never get over one great difficulty at the very outset; mind is not matter, nor is matter mind. It is attempting to be too wise, and to forget the limited nature of our thoughts, our minds, our experiences. The earliest philosophers were materialists. They also made the mistake of trying to discover one principle for everything. The earliest Pantheist, on the other hand, was a nephew of Plato who ruled the school of Athens about 350 years before Christ. He thought that all that we mean by God was produced finally out of the long development of nature.

II. Meaning of Pantheism.—Pantheism derives its name from its motto, meaning one and all—that is, everything is God. According to this view God is the universe itself; beyond and outside (and before) the universe He does not exist, but only in the universe. He is the Soul, the Reason, the Spirit of the Universe, and all nature is His body. . . . The main point of Pantheistic belief is that the Soul of the Universe is not a personal, self-conscious Being who appears in His whole power and character in any one event or at any one moment, so as to be conscious of Himself or to make us conscious of Him; but that this Soul of the Universe is nothing but the one ever-same essence, filling everything and shaping everything by an unconscious necessity, unfolded only by the laws which govern everything, but apart from existing things having no reality to be seen or heard.

II. Insuperable Difficulties.—There are insuperable difficulties in Pantheism. The idea of a universal substance which exists without a Creator, by laws which had no author, merely brings us back to the great, ultimate question of all religion and all science—How did these things begin? And the answer of revelation that there is an eternal self-existing Being, who inhabiteth eternity, whom we know by His attributes of law, goodness, power, beauty, love, omnipotence, omnipresence, eternity, light, and truth, and who is known to us in part by His words, is in reality the only reasonable answer that can be given. The Pantheists are apt to insist on the difficulty they allege in conceiving of a Personality that is unlimited. But that difficulty only exists because our own personality is limited, and our experience is confined to our own personality. If we were to confine all theory and all belief to mere personal experience we should find little help in thought or life or conduct. The universal substance of which the Pantheists speak is just as much beyond our own experience. So it is with the eternity of that substance which they proclaim. It is equally beyond our experience to say whether the universe is limited or extends for ever and ever. We are surrounded by mysteries, and we can but rest on that explanation which appears most reasonable and best supported.—W. M. SINCLAIR, Church Family Newspaper, 1907, p. 212.

REFERENCE.—XC. 1, 2.—A. M. Fairbairn, The City of God, p. 35.

PSALM XC. 1-4.

THESE verses are the burial song of the Russian Church.

Dr. SROUGHTON, describing the funeral of John Hampden, says: 'His remains were conveyed to the churchyard of Great Hampden, close beside the old family mansion, where the patriot had spent so much of his life in the studies and sports of a country gentleman. Through lanes under the beech-covered chalk hills of the Chilterns a detachment of his favourite troops, bareheaded, carried him to his last resting-place—their arms reversed, their drums and ensigns muffled—mournfully chanting as they slowly marched along the dirge from the book of Psalms: "Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations. Thou turnest man to destruction. Thou carriest them away as with a flood; they are as a sleep: in the morning they are like grass which groweth up. In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down, and withereth." When the funeral was over, the soldiers retiring from the village church to their quarters made the green woods and the white hills, that summer day, resound to the beautiful prayer, so appropriate to their circumstances, Psalm XLIII.: "Judge me, O God, and plead my cause against an ungodly nation: O deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man. For Thou art the God of my strength: why dost Thou cast me off? Why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy? O send out Thy light and Thy truth; let them lead me." John Hampden met his death in June, 1643, in the beginning of the great civil war. He died in prayer, with the words, "O Lord God of hosts! great is Thy mercy; just and holy are Thy dealings unto us sinful men. O Lord, save my bleeding country. Have these realms in Thy special keeping. Lord Jesus, receive my soul! O Lord, save my country; O Lord, be merciful to—" His speech failed, and falling backwards he expired.

REFERENCES.—XC. 4.—C. Vince, The Unchanging Saviour, p. 49. D. Swing, American Pulpit of To-day, vol. i. p. 176. XC. 9.—J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vi. p. 272. R. D. B. Rawnsley, Sermons in Country Churches (1st Series), p. 299.

THREESCORE YEARS AND TEN

'The days of our years are threescore years and ten.'—PSALM XC. 10.

THE whole ever-shifting mysterious thing we call life is full of hope and parable and morning; still there is the morning star, that child of hope, that centre and source of infinite light. There is not a heart here in all these multitudes of people that has not been broken or will be broken. Every man is on the way to his own grave; yea, though he be laughing at the graves of others or heeding not that they are passing by him in blackness, the dead that are going to be buried, yet the fool is on the way to his own last frechold.

I. Life is short—yet so long. It is a contradiction in number; it is a paradox in reality. How short our life is! A flash—gone! How long! when will this black-robed procession unwind itself and get around the road and pass the corner that we may not see it any more? Yet life is short; for it is like unto something that is evanescent when it is treated of aright. It is a post among the hills and the valleys; it is a smoke rising up and fading away; a wind that comes for a little time, and then passeth on to blow on other acres and other worlds.

Life is short, therefore I can intermeddle with only a few things, therefore I had better consider which are the truly great and worthy things; therefore I must buy up the opportunity, redeem the time, and make the most of this dower more than gold with which God has blessed my personality. Our greatness is in our consciousness, its largeness, its intelligence, its sanctification; that is how we stand.

II. And not only is life short, but life needs help. The strongest man will say that; however rich a man is, he cannot do without some other man. There are times when it is so dark that even the outputting of the hand is a gospel. Oh to feel a holding hand, a familiar grip! it makes the darkness light, it brings sustenance to the soul. We cannot do without one another. The weakest may help the strongest. Paul said, 'Brethren, pray for us'. There is the mightiest man in the Church asking some man and woman heart to pray for him, when the water is deep and cold and the night so dark. It is a wonderful thing this, that we all need help, if not to-day yet to-morrow.

III. No help that can be given to man is so gracious, so complete, as the help that is given by the Son of God. On these three grounds I stand; millions stand on the same grounds and praise the same Saviour. Jesus Christ comes to us when other people are engaged with the feast and are pledged to the dance and have no time for old sorrow and wordless misery. Jesus Christ says, 'Call upon Me in the day of trouble'; nobody else will want to see you; call upon Me; look in your diary, and you will find the day of trouble is a disengaged day, a vacant line; others will come to you on all the other days, but call upon Me and I will fill up that space for you. Jesus Christ will go where no one else can go.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. III. p. 136.

THE DYING YEAR

'So teach us to number our days.'—PSALM XC. 12.

THE slow, sad experience of life wrought out in the Psalmist a twofold result—he has learnt the secret both of detachment and attachment. This aged pilgrim grows more and more weaned from the world and detached from things trivial and temporal. Such should be the effect of the right numbering of days and the years as they escape us—to learn at last that though the world passeth away and the lust thereof, yet he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever.

I. Like all the greatest spiritual poetry, this Psalm has a deep undertone of remorse and retribution. Which of us can gaze forward into his own future without a sense of judgment to come? And who dare face that future except by humble trust in the miracle of God's reparation and atonement.

II. What does it mean to 'number our days'? It means 'to take the measure of our days as compared with the work to be performed, with the provision to be laid up for eternity, with the preparation to be made for death, with the precaution to be taken against the judgment to come. It is to estimate human life by the purposes to which it should be applied, by the eternity to which it must conduct.' It means to gauge and test our own career in the light of its moral and spiritual issues. And as God teaches us this we understand the secret of true wisdom. For wisdom lies in a just estimate of the real values of things.—T. H. DARLOW, The Upward Calling, p. 436.

REFERENCES.—XC. 12.—H. P. Wright, Preacher's Magazine, vol. xix. p. 37. J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (4th Series), p. 2. XC. 14.—H. S. Wilmot-Buxton, A Year's Plain Sermons, p. 413. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lx. No. 513. J. Bush, A Memorial, p. 104.

A MESSAGE OF UNDYING HOPE

Shew Thy servants Thy work, and thy children Thy glory.
—PSALM XC. 16.

THE Psalmist here is looking out over a scene of great disappointment and failure. He sees in his mind's eye human life in its beginning, and in its end. And as he looks out over so much apparent failure his heart fails him. As he looks out and draws near to the end of his reflection on life, he utters the words which prevent despair, for as he looks out upon the failures he looks also beyond, and he knows that the work of God can never fail. He knows that though the work may seem to fail, though one man lives and dies and has apparently wrought but little, there are other hands to take up the work, other voices to deliver the message.

I. No Work for God Fails.—That is the secret of the saints' hope. They have done their work in fear and yet in faith, and they have laid themselves down, conscious that their work cannot fail. We, who reap the fruits of their labours, know at any rate that their toil has not been in vain. In our hand we hold the martyr's robes, red with the blood of the faithful, and stained with the tears of the penitent. We understand as the inspiration of their lives falls upon us that their work is eternal. And so, as we see the glory, as we gather where they have sown, we understand why it is that in the kingdom of God there is no such thing as failure.

II. The Call to Duty.—That is the message of the past; it is not a sentimental reflection on the days which are gone, nor is it a tearful meditation upon things which are gone, but it is rather the call to duty. For if the past is our inspiration, we are the fulfilment of its hopes and desires. The elders in every age are able to resign their tasks because they know that they will not appeal to the younger generation in vain. What answer shall we give them? Shall we not tell those whose days are being numbered that their faith is not misplaced, and that their confidence is sure?

III. A Message of Undying Hope.—And therefore, if the thought of the Psalmist becomes for us our warning and our hope, we of the younger generation do grow impatient as we wait for the day of the Lord. We want to see Him King. We would take Him by force, if need be, as men tried to take Him of old; we want to see Him King in street, in lane, in home, in workshop; we want to see Him King wherever the evil passions of men are rending them as the devil rent them of old; we long with a great longing to-day for the crowning of Christ. The pitiable thing is that the time is so short; we can do so little in the short span of our life. That was indeed a pathetic picture which some years ago took the world by storm. It was the picture of an artist who sat before his unfinished canvas with his brush slipping from his nerveless and dying fingers, conscious that he must pass away before his work was finished. The tragedy and pathos of it was that the time was short, that he would have given his right hand for another year of life, and it was not given to him. That is our feeling, and therefore the message of the Psalmist rings out to-day its cry of eternal and undying hope, because it tells us that our unfinished work shall be finished. It tells us that there is no task which He has set us that God will not complete hereafter; no message that He has bidden us deliver which shall not be uttered in time.

'Let Thy work appear unto Thy servants, and Thy glory unto their children.'—PSALM XC. 16.

THIS was the favourite text of Bishop Gordon, the pilgrim missionary of the Punjab, who was known as 'the Christian Fakir'. 'We should be thankful,' said this devoted pioneer, 'if the work is ours, so that God's glory is manifest to the next generation.'

REFERENCES.—XC. 16.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 208. XC. 16, 17.—H. M. Butler, Harrows School Sermons, p. 424. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 241.

WORKING AS UNTO GOD

'And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us: and establish Thou the work of our hands upon us: yea, the work of our hands establish Thou it.'—PSALM XC. 17.

THESE are the closing words of a most pathetic Psalm which we have sung in our service this morning. For ages it has been regarded as the poem or prayer of Moses, the man of God. Nor is there any reason to doubt the authorship. For us the Psalm is pathetic, not only because of the circumstances under which it was written, but especially from its place in our burial office. It has been heard by many of us on some of the saddest days of our lives, grandly contrasting the brevity of man's life with the eternity of the being of God, and earnestly pleading, 'Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us: and establish Thou the work of our hands upon us'.

The words give expression to a prayer, an implication, and a desire.

I. A Prayer.—'Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us.' Does the petition seem too bold for mortal man, begirt with infirmity and debased by sin? Let us remember the Holy Scriptures themselves encourage and warrant it. Must we ponder the glories of nature, in the crimson of the sunlit sky, the carpet of flowers in a summer wood, the dancing freeness of the waves of ocean, and must we say these are the folds of the skirts of the Most High? We may most truly thus reflect. And yet by this means we should never be able to conceive of the true beauty of the Lord our God. For this consists in the moral excellence of the Eternal. And, therefore, when the Lord would cause His glory to pass before Moses, He proclaimed the name of the Lord as 'gracious and merciful, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth'. And when we would behold the beauty of the Most High, we need not visit scenes of splendour, we need not wait to behold the blushing morn or crimson even, we need not plant ourselves on some lofty promontory to gaze upon the 'many-smiling face of ocean,' now gentle in its lapping, and again cruel in its rage. Far better shall we apprehend the Divine glory if we contemplate the Man of Sorrows, Who had not where to lay His head, and ponder reverently His truthfulness as before Pontius Pilate He witnessed a good confession; His gentleness as He took the children in His arms, and put His hands upon them and blessed them; His patience as He was speechless before His judge and prayed for His murderers. In these consist the true beauty of God; not in self-assertion, or display, or vindictive wrath. Let young men and young women learn that distinctions of title, accumulations of wealth, even stores of learning, cannot impart to the human character one-half the beauty that comes from truthfulness and gentleness and patience; from the things which are the very beauty of the Lord our God.

II. An Implication.—The text implies that man's time and energies are engrossed by work. 'The Divine dignity of work is set forth by the Saviour as in magnificent terms He asserts, 'My Father worketh hitherto, and I work'; and again as He reflects, 'I must work the works of Him that sent me while it is day: the night cometh when no man can work'. The simplicity and unity of all work is taught by the Lord's answer to the question, 'What must we do that we may work the works of God?' Instead of elaborating a list of various details, Jesus Christ returned one comprehensive, all-sufficient response: 'This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him Whom He hath sent'. Never let us think of our work as irksome, to be if possible avoided and scamped, a hindrance to our religious life. Rather, whatever the work allotted to us, we must regard it as chosen for us by our God, to be quickened, illumined, glorified by a living faith, and discharged in the name and to the glory of our God. Various, indeed, is the work to which we are called: some to labour with their hands in hard toil; others to toil with their brains in a labour no less irksome; others, again, to the responsible and difficult duty of the administration of wealth; others, once more, to the hardest of all toil, in the patient endurance of sickness and of pain. But, whatever the toil allotted to us, in the faith of Christ it is to be undertaken, and in that faith completed.

III. A Desire.—But, as we think of work, thus simple in its motive and aim, yet ever varied in its details, does not one earnest yearning fill our spirits? Though we may be but ordinary persons with only average abilities and opportunities, yet does not one question thrill us with a chilling anxiety? Our work, at which we have toiled so unsparingly year after year, what will be its end, its climax; will all be swallowed in a sea of nothings? Alas! from many a quarter the answer might seem to offer no brighter prospect. Look where we will in the narrow circles of our families and towns, or the larger view of nations and empires, one law of change seems everywhere triumphant. And yet the Hebrew Psalmist encourages us to express one of the deepest longings of our nature in the prayer, 'Establish the work of our hands upon us'. Nor is the prayer too bold or fruitless. For while the dreams and toils of earth and of selfishness must vanish and be engulfed, the work done in the name and for the sake of Christ, though it be but the gift of a cup of water, shall live on in its influence and its recompense. It makes all the difference in the world whether we work merely because of custom, through necessity, or consciously for Jesus, because of His Cross and love. Such faith saves our work from being monotonous or irksome, it makes it not in vain in the Lord, a building which will endure even though it be tried by fire.

GOD'S INNER CIRCLE

'He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.'—PSALM XCI. 1.

THIS wonderful Psalm has always been a favourite with the mystic and quietist. For it expresses what we may call the Beatitude of the Inner Circle. Most religions have distinguished carefully between the rank and file of the faithful, and that select company of initiates who taste the hidden wisdom and have access to the secret shrine. From the nature of the case some such distinction exists even in the kingdom of heaven. Christ Himself allowed a difference between 'His own friends' and those many disciples who are servants still. Only we must never forget on what this difference depends. . . . The Father who is Lord of heaven and earth has seen good to hide His secrets from the wise and prudent, and to reveal them unto babes.

I. As we recognize the reality of this Inner Circle of souls enlightened and initiated, these verses suggest some signs and tokens which characterize those who not merely wear their Lord's livery, but are actual courtiers in the palace of the Great King. We may say that they are more at home with God than other Christians, and they are also more alone with God. These dwellers in the secret place of the Most High are like children at home there, who have received the Spirit whereby they say always, 'Abba—that is, Father'.

II. Such spiritual intimacy requires a spiritual privacy as well. To come close to God means not merely to be withdrawn from the noise and glare of the world, but also to be embraced in that shadow with which the uncreated height softens His glory to our eyes. For those who are thus brought near to their Father in heaven, there rises a strange delight in remembering the Divine Omnipotence. They exult in His power and might, His majesty and dominion.

III. And thus it comes to pass that the self-same attributes of God which daunt and repel us at a distance, are transformed into our very shelter and joy when once He covers us with His feathers. 'Thou shalt not be afraid.' No promise is oftener repeated and ratified to the childlike soul. Those who belong to God's Inner Circle bear on their countenances the seal that they are quiet from fear of evil, that they have gained the victory over terror and dismay.

IV. In God's Inner Circle the childlike spirit is made one with the will and the love of the Almighty Father. And herein lies our security and refuge against whatsoever may await us in this world or in any other.—T. H. DARLOW, The Upward Calling, p. 38.

REFERENCES.—XCI. 1.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 134. W. L. Watkinson, The Ashes of Roses, p. 114. XCI. 1, 2.—R. S. Candlish, The Gospel of Forgiveness, p. 227. XCI. 1, 16.—E. H. Bickersteth, Thoughts in Past Years, p. 247. XCI. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1297. XCI. 3.—Ibid. vol. iii. No. 124. XCI. 3.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 24. XCI. 4.—C. Bosanquet, Tender Grass for the Lambs, p. 16. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 902. XCI. 5.—Ibid. Evening by Evening, p. 113. XCI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 278.

THE PERILS OF THE MIDDLE-AGED

'The destruction that wasteth at noonday.'—PSALM XCI. 6.

THE noonday of life is the time of middle age, when the morning freshness of youth has passed away. And so the destruction that wasteth at the noonday may be referred to the peculiar temptations of the period.

I. One of the features of middle age is this—that by that time a man has found his life-work. Now with this settlement into a single task there generally comes a certain happiness. But just here arises one danger of that period—it lies in the contraction of the manhood to the one groove in which the life-work runs. Absorbed in the business on which his living hangs a man contracts into a business man. No matter how successful a man be, if he is impoverished and contracted by success, then in the sight of God he is in peril of the destruction that wasteth at noonday. Faced then by that peril how may we hope to overcome it? One way is to have some lively interest out of the single line of the career. But there is something better. It is the thought that there once moved on earth a man who was perfect in the whole range of manhood. That is the value of fellowship with Christ in an age when specialism is inevitable.

II. One of the perils of the noonday is the deadening of faith. In middle age there is neither the stimulus of youth nor of age to lead a man to trust in the unseen. Youth has its dangers, but the sins of the middle age, though not so patent, may be more deadly, for they lead to that encrustation of the spirit which the Bible calls the hardening of the heart.

III. But not only is middle age the time when we are in peril of losing faith in God. It is also very notably the time when we are in danger of losing faith in man. We see how different men are from our dreams. The vision we had of them is rudely shattered, and with the shattering there goes our faith. Some men it makes utterly hard-hearted; others it makes tolerantly cynical. There is but one help in that temptation—it is to remember that though He knew the worst, Christ never for one hour lost faith in man.—G. H. MORRISON, The Wings of the Morning, p. 131.

THE REFUGE OF THE DEVOUT SOUL

'Because thou hast made the Lord, which is my refuge, even the Most High, thy habitation; there shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling.'—PSALM XCI. 9, 10.

I. WE have here the cry of the devout soul. This cry of the soul recognizing God as its asylum and home comes in response to a revelation of God's blessing and to large words of promise. So the words of my text, 'Thou art my refuge' are the best answer of the devout soul to the plain words of Divine promise. This cry of the devout soul suggests to me that our response ought to be the establishment of a clear personal relation between us and God. We must isolate ourselves and stand, God and we alone—together—at heart grips, we grasping His hand and He giving Himself to us.

II. Note how this cry of the devout soul recognizes God as He to Whom we must go because we need refuge. It is only when we know our dangers and defencelessness that God as the refuge of our souls becomes precious to us. So underlying and an essential part of all our confidence in God is the clear recognition of our own necessity. In all regions the consciousness of human want must go before the recognition of the Divine supply.

III. Note the still more abundant answer which that cry evokes. There may be observed a certain distinction of tone between those promises which precede and those which follow the cry. Those which follow have a certain elevation and completeness and fullness beyond those that precede. They who store in patient and thankful hearts the faithful promises of God, have taken a sure way to make the gifts still larger and His promise still sweeter, and their fulfilment more faithful and precious. By the body we are brought into connexion with this frail outer world, and we try to make our homes out of shifting cloud-wrack, and dream that we may dwell secure. But we need a better dwelling-place than earth and that which holds to earth. We have God Himself for our true home. The secret of exemption from every evil lies in no peculiar providence, ordering in some especial manner our outward circumstances, but in the submission of our wills to that which the good hand of the Lord our God sends us for our good; and in cleaving close to Him as our refuge.—A. MACLAREN, The God of the Amen, p. 158.

REFERENCE.—XCI. 9.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 58.

THE MINISTRY OF ANGELS

'He shall give His angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways.'—PSALM XCI. 11.

THE ministry of angels is too clearly written in Holy Scripture for any of us to doubt it, even if we had not the evidence of our own experience. The work of the angels is—

I. To Guide us.—It is a great mystery, yet who can question that we may be led by them? The Gospel for to-day's service tells us of the angels of little children always beholding the face of the Father in heaven. It is impossible to suppose that their work ceases when we pass from childhood's state; and it is a comfort to think that our angels, receiving their inspiration in heaven, will lead us in the right way, if only we will submit ourselves to them.

II. To Guard us; or, as the text has it, 'to keep' us. Years ago, when one, who is now a bishop, was curate in a rural parish, he was sent for after midnight to visit a distant house where there was said to be serious illness. He went there, passing through a lonely road, only to find that he had been hoaxed. Years passed, and the incident was never explained until the bishop was sent for to visit in prison a man condemned to death. The prisoner recalled the incident, and explained that it was he who had sought to lure the curate out that he might rob him. 'And why did you not do so?' asked the bishop. 'Because,' came the reply, 'another man joined you just when I was going to attack you.' There had been no man; who can doubt but that it was the bishop's guardian angel?

III. But Notice the Limitation.—'To keep thee,' but only in all thy ways, and the story of our Lord's temptation shows us that the guidance and guardianship is given only when we are in the right way.

REFERENCE.—XCI. 11.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Saints' Days, p. 372.

LET NOTHING YOU DISMAY

'Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under foot.'—PSALM XCI. 13.

THE whole of this Psalm is an unfolding of the certain outcome of fellowship with God. The man who dwells in the secret place of the Most High finds there a Divine power of protection and defence which lifts him into a place of safety in all the assaults of the enemy. As a hen covers her brood with her feathers, so is he covered by the Lord. He is defended as with a shield; he is upheld by angel ministrants so that his unwary footsteps do not slip. It is indeed a Psalm of the joy-bells which ring over the union of weakness with strength, of human need with Divine fullness. It tells with clear simplicity of the completeness of the provisions of grace for the life of the believer, and rings out, as though in defiance of the adversary, the clear note of certain victory in the inevitable conflicts of life.

I. The lion—strongest and fiercest of beasts—may well stand for a man's besetting sin, the temptation which is always nearest to him and from which there seems no available way of escape. And just as lions do not frequent the haunts of mankind, but are met in lonely and desert lands, so is this temptation met in the unshared solitudes of life. As in the days of Nero, Christians are always antagonizing lions, but the arena of their conflict is not open to the public. The struggle is waged without human spectators, and the victory when realized is unapplauded save in the courts of conscience and of heaven. Or, again, the lion may stand for the open opposition which every man meets as he pursues the pathway of God's revealed will.

II. The adder hidden in the grass or rocky crevices of the pathway, ready to dart out upon the unsuspecting pilgrim, with the power of death in its sting, well expresses the swiftness and unexpectedness with which temptation often assails men. The lion roars and gives warning of his approach, but the adder is most frequently encountered without any warning whatever of its presence. Suddenly the attack is delivered, and only he whose feet are Divinely shod can tread down the unlooked-for enemy. Who has not known temptation of this sort? It is of such that most defeat is recorded. Paradoxical though it sounds, such temptation usually finds its point of least resistance in a man's strongest part.

III. The dragon stands for temptation of an entirely different order, for no such beast is known to man, except as the creation of his own imaginations. The dragon is but the fierce creature of mythical story, the terror of earlier ages, and the dread of childhood. As such it stands here for those temptations which are largely the result of uncontrolled thought, those creatures whose existence is the projection of a disordered mind on the soul's vision. Though but imaginary, they are none the less strong to destroy those who do not in the courage of faith resolutely 'trample them underfoot,' and no Gospel promise of victory would be adequate which took no account of them. A man's strongest foes are not only of his own household but frequently of his own heart where the dragon has its birth. Evil desires, enmities, ambitions, jealousies, hot passions, are all the product of an unchecked imagination, and going forth from out the heart they assume mysterious strength to leap upon and overcome their own parent. Of the same origin, though of different form, is the dragon of dark pessimism, most frequently concerning the future.—J. STUART HOLDEN, The Pre-Eminent Lord, p. 29.

GOD'S ANSWER TO MAN'S TRUST

'Because he hath set his love upon Me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known My name.'—PSALM XCI. 14.

THESE words seem to me to carry two thoughts: the first what God delights to find in a man; and the second what God delights to give to the man in whom He finds it.

I. There are two things that the great Father's heart seeks, and wheresoever it finds them He is glad and lavishes upon such a one the most precious things in His possession. Now the word rendered 'set his love' includes more than is suggested by that rendering, beautiful as it is. It is not my love only that I am to fasten upon God, but my whole self that I am to bind to Him. God delights in us when we cling to Him. Let us cling to Him in our thoughts, hour by hour, moment by moment, amidst all the distractions of daily life. Let us cleave to Him still further by the obedient contact of our wills with His, receiving all our instructions from our Father in heaven. There is another thing in the text which, as I take it, is a consequence of that close union between man in his whole nature and God. You have to become acquainted with Him and be very familiar with Him—that is to say, to fix your whole self on Him—before you ‘know’ Him; and it is only the knowledge which is born of love and familiarity that is worth calling knowledge at all. Only he knows God to whom the commonplaces of religion have turned into facts which he verifies by his own experiences.

II. Note secondly what God gives to the man in whom He finds such things. ‘I will deliver him,’ says the promise. God’s promise is not that no evil shall come to the man who trusts him, but that he shall be delivered out of the evil that does come, and that it will not be truly evil. Still further we have another great promise: ‘I will set him on high because he hath known My name’. That is more than lifting a man up above the reach of the storm of life by means of external deliverance. There is a better thing than that—namely, that our whole inward life be lived loftily. Then perhaps there is a hint in the words, on an elevation even higher than that, when, life ended and earth done, He shall receive into His glory those whom He hath guided by His counsel.—A. MACLAREN, The God of the Amen, p. 167.

WHAT GOD WILL DO FOR US

‘He shall call upon Me, and I will answer him: I will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him, and honour him. With long life will I satisfy him, and shew him My salvation.’
—PSALM XCI. 15, 16.

THE words which we have now to consider cover the whole range of human life and need, and may be regarded as being a picture of the sure and blessed consequence of keeping our hearts fixed upon our Father, God. The verses of the text fall into three portions: there are promises for the suppliant, promises for the troubled, promises for mortals. Now let us look at these three.

I. The promise to the suppliant. If a man’s heart is set upon God, his very life-breath will be a cry to His Father. Any man who has learned to love God will live in the exercise and habit of prayer, and it will be his instinct to cry to God in all changing circumstances. True prayer is the cry of the soul for the living God in Whom is all that it needs, and out of Whom is nothing that will do it good.

II. (a) Further, here we have a promise for suppliants, ‘I will be with him in time of trouble’. The promise is not only that, when trials fall upon us, we shall become more conscious, if we take them rightly, of God’s presence, but that all which is meant by God’s presence shall really be more fully ours, and that He is actually nearer us. (b) Then there follows the next stage, deliverance from trouble, ‘I will deliver him’. He will deliver us not only by taking the burden off our backs, but by making us strong to carry it, and the sorrow which has changed into calm submission is sorrow from which we have been delivered. (c) Lastly, there is the third of these promises for the troubled, ‘I will honour him’. Is not that the end of a trouble which has been borne in company with Him; and from which, because it has been so borne, a man may be delivered even whilst it lasts? Is that not God’s way of glorifying us before heaven’s glory?

III. Last of all we have the promise for mortals, ‘With long life will I satisfy him, and show him My salvation’. The idea contained in this promise may be fully illustrated by the expression which is used in reference to a select few of the Old Testament saints, of whom it is recorded that they died ‘full of days’. They had got all out of the world which it could give, and were contented to have done with it all. The heart that lives near God will find in life all that life is capable of giving, but will be satisfied to have lived, and be contented to die.—A. MACLAREN, The God of the Amen, p. 177.

PSALM XCII.

Is called by Dante (Purg. xxviii. 80), Il Salmo Delectasti, because, in the Vulgate, the 4th verse begins with the words, ‘Thou hast made me glad’. A beautiful female form, representing the higher life, is introduced as saying, ‘She is so happy because she can sing like the Psalm Delectasti, “Thou, Lord, hast made me glad through Thy work”’.

CASAUBON was one of the most learned men of his age, and truly devout. He was so humble and reticent, that some doubted his religious spirit; but there is an incident he records in his diary which reveals it, and which shows the hold the book of Psalms had on the hearts of Christians of that time. He and his wife, residing in Paris, wished to go to the Protestant Church of Charenton. There was only a frail old boat to take them up the Seine, but they ventured it rather than lose the service. ‘On embarking,’ he says, ‘my wife, as her custom was, began to sing the Psalms. We had finished Psalm xci. and had reached Psalm xcii. 12, when the boat sank. With difficulty we saved our lives, but the Psalm-book, which had been a wedding gift to my wife twenty-two years before, was lost. We reached in time for the second service; and on looking into the book of a young man near me to see what was being sung, I found it was Psalm lxxxvi. 13, “for great is Thy mercy towards me: and Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest grave”. I thought immediately of the word of St. Ambrose, that “those who listen to, or read, the Psalms aright may find as if they had been indited expressly for themselves”’.

REFERENCES.—XCII. 2.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 227. Ibid. Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1138. XCII. 5.—W. L. Alexander, Sermons, p. 191. XCII. 10.—M. O. Evans, Christian World Pulpit, 1891, p. 322. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1122.

THE PALM-TREE

'The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree.'—PSALM XCII. 12.

THERE is a singular Rabbinical tradition that the 92nd Psalm was composed and sung by Adam in Paradise to celebrate God's power in creation. 'For Thou, Lord, hast made me glad through Thy work: I will triumph in the works of Thy hands' (v. 4). More in accordance with its actual history is the fact that this Psalm was sung in the temple services every Sabbath morning at the time of the offering of the first lamb, when the wine was poured out as a drink-offering unto the Lord. It is still used in the Sabbatical services of the synagogue: and so this 92nd Psalm has been interwoven with the religious history of the Jewish race for nearly three thousand years.

The great thought of the Psalmist is to express his joy in the clear conviction of God's righteous government of the world, manifested in the final overthrow of the wicked and the triumph of the righteous.

I have singled out the palm-tree as the subject of my sermon because I believe there is not in the Word of God a more striking type of the Christian life. I believe, with Basil, that Nature, as the handmaid of Revelation, is the 'school and lecture-room of souls'. To the sanctified imagination, creation is instinct with Divine teaching. In spring, the seed sown—some falling among thorns and some by the wayside, some on the rocky ground and some in the good soil—has its lessons of warning and instruction. In the summer, the new-mown grass speaks to us of the brevity of life. 'All flesh is as grass.' The golden sheaves of autumn remind us of the harvest at the end of the world; whilst the purity of winter's snow tells us that, although our sins may be as scarlet, yet that we may, through pardoning grace and justifying righteousness, be as white as snow.

The tall, stately palm, with its dark, pillar-like shaft, and its capital of feathery fronds, is one of the most graceful objects in nature. I am not surprised that Linnæus should call this tree 'the prince of the vegetable world,' or that Humboldt should speak of the palm as 'the loftiest and stateliest of all vegetable forms'. Whilst this tree is associated, speaking generally, with that part of the world which was the cradle of the human race, it is especially connected with the land of Palestine. The word Phœnicia is doubtless derived from the Greek word for palm. So much was the palm the representative tree of Palestine that Vespasian, when striking a coin to commemorate the capture of Jerusalem by Titus, depicts Judæa as a woman sitting dejected and desolate beneath a palm-tree, guarded by a Roman soldier. The Middle Ages continued this connexion of thought by giving the name of Palmer to the pilgrim who had returned from the Holy Sepulchre, because of the custom of bringing home the sacred branch. The palm was to Syria what the oak is to England, the spruce to Norway, the pine to Canada, and the chestnut to Spain—the representative tree.

I. It often flourishes in the desert, and always indicates moisture. We are told by travellers that on the northern borders of the Great Desert, under the Atlas Mountains, groves of palms are the great feature of the arid region. The heat is so intense that even the natives can scarcely endure the scorching blast when the wind blows from the south; and yet here, as we have observed, the palm flourishes. What is the explanation? Beneath the sand is moisture. The palm-tree rises from the sterile surface, but its tap-root drinks in the water from beneath. These palms of the desert seem to be striking emblems of many Christian lives. All men are equally dependent upon the aid of the Holy Spirit, but how different are the influences which surround the children of God! Some are planted, not as the palms in the Plain of Jericho, nor as willows by the water-courses, but rather as palms in the sterile desert. When we think of a man like Lot in Sodom, or of Joseph in Egypt, of Obadiah in the court of Ahab, of Daniel in Babylon, of saints in Cæsar's household, we ask, How could they live a life of holiness in such a moral desert? They were in the world and not of it! How can this thing be? Faith's penetrating root reached the fountain of living water. Their life was 'hid with Christ in God'.

II. The palm-tree grows as long as it lives. Physically we are like the Exogens, the oak and the elm, etc. We grow to maturity, and then imperceptibly we begin to decay. It is a law of our nature, but God never intended that it should be thus with our inner life, with the growth of grace in the soul. If we are truly children of God, we shall be like the palm. We shall grow till we die. 'The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree.' We shall 'go from strength to strength' until every one appeareth before God in Zion.

III. The palm-tree gives a grateful shade. The Christian ought to extend a genial, a sanctified, and a heavenly influence. If we think of a palm-grove as a picture of Christianity, we observe what beneficent institutions have grown beneath its shadow.

IV. The main feature of the palm is its upward growth—its tall, straight shaft. The idols of the Gentiles are compared to it. 'They are upright as the palm-tree' (Jer. x. 5). The affections of a righteous man are set on things above, and not on things below. They are ever moving heavenward, where Christ is. He is ever desiring more intimate communion with Jesus, ever breathing after heavenly joys, ever seeking a greater conformity to his Master, till he comes, 'in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ'.

V. The palm has ever been the emblem of joy and victory. Palm branches were used by the Greeks and Romans to celebrate their triumphs. So the saint on earth is victorious over sin and Satan and the world. He is more than conqueror 'through Him that hath loved him,' and ere long he will join the 'palmiferous company,' that 'great multitude which no man can number, of all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues,' standing 'before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands'.—J. W. BARDSLEY, Many Mansions, p. 80.

THREE TYPICAL FORMS OF GROWTH

'The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree: he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon.'—PSALM XCII. 12.

THERE are three typical ideas illustrated in the realm of plant life.

I. The palm is what is known as an Endogen, or inside grower, that is, the oldest and hardest wood is at the circumference, the newest and softest at the centre. Man's life is very much moulded and determined by his surroundings and by the intricate network of influences that hedge him in. Anyone, when once awakened to the sense of spiritual realities, and seeking to work out his own righteousness, appreciates the value of all outward helps, and accordingly makes diligent use of them. But the result is unsatisfactory. The deep places of the heart too often remain untouched.

II. The cedar is an Exogen, that is, it grows from the centre to the circumference, like most of our finest trees, adding a new ring of growth to the outside every successive year, so that you can tell its age by the number of concentric rings which the horizontal section of its stem exhibits. This is the method of growth more especially illustrated in the evangelic or Protestant form of Christianity. Normal Christianity begins with the heart. A leading peculiarity of the cedar and other plants which are marked by a growth from the centre to the circumference, is that they send out branches, and, being expansive, often cover an extensive area. Religious character is a growing thing, year by year, necessarily expanding and progressive, reaching forward to further and happier results, never satisfied with past attainments, but striving unceasingly after fuller unfolding and perfecting of character.

III. There is a third typical form, as may be instanced in the tree fern. This typical form is called by the botanist an Acrogen or top-grower, the growth of every successive year being a fresh layer of new wood on the summit of the former year's growth, suggesting the fact that your life must be upward as well as inward and outward, nearer to God, more heavenly. This growth Godward and heavenward will best insure the growth both of your inner being and that of the more outward aspects of Christian life.—J. MILLER, Sermons Literary and Scientific, p. 172.

THE BLESSING OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

'The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree.'—PSALM XCII. 12.

You will at once see by looking at this text that it is an exceedingly precious promise. The condition of the promise is that of righteousness.

I. The righteous man is the man who is in right relation with God, who has been made right, who has been properly adjusted to the law and the plan of Divine government for his life. Man in Adam lost his righteousness, and hence the work of God from that sad day until this good hour has been to bring man back into proper relationship and fellowship with God, and in order that that might be done it was necessary there should be atonement. The whole race of mankind has been redeemed and made righteous in the atoning death of Jesus Christ. But even this is conditional. It is here provided in the atonement of Jesus Christ, but no man ever shares that which is provided in this marvellous atonement until he comes, submitting by an act of his faith, and appropriates the merits of this atonement. To share the blessings of this promise there must be adjustment made between the soul and God. The soul must look up and receive by faith the atoning merit of the grace of Jesus Christ.

II. Now David is taking a simple everyday illustration, and with it he is attempting to teach the most profound and the most blessed truth. First of all, it is said of the palm-tree that it is the only tree that has its growth from the heart out. The righteous is a man whose growth shall be from within out. It is at the heart that the Spirit of God aims His first work, and from the heart to the head and to the feet and to the hands goes the Spirit of God, ramifying every avenue of our being in the likeness of Christ.

III. Then, again, let me say that the righteous shall grow like the palm-tree in that the palm-tree will not mix with any other tree. You cannot graft a palm-tree, you cannot graft anything to a palm-tree; the moment you begin a grafting process with the palm-tree it dies. The righteous man shall be a man that can live in any community and not find himself taken up with the conduct of the community in which he lives, provided that community is unrighteous.

IV. It is said by travellers in Eastern countries that as they pass through the desert regions the sight of the palm-tree, which tells of water near by, is greeted with great joy. So it is with the righteous man who is in right relationship with God, spiritually and bodily—that man is a sign of joy. He is a great comfort to this sorrowing world. Wherever a righteous man is found, a man in right relationship with God and right relationship with his fellow-men, he has got a reputation, and his reputation is like an oasis in the great desert world of need; and so it is with the Church.—LEN. G. BROUGHTON, The Homiletic Review, 1908, vol. LVI. p. 466.

REFERENCES.—XCII. 13.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 24. XCII. 13-16.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiii. No. 1365. XCII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 283. XCIII. 5.—A. Watson, Sermons for Sundays, Festivals, and Feasts (2nd Series), vol. iii. p. 9. XCIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 296. XCIV. 9.—J. Keble, Sermons for Septuagesima to Ash Wednesday, p. 65.

THE PRIMAL CONSCIOUSNESS

'He that planteth the ear, shall He not hear? He that formed the sight, shall He not see? He that chastiseth the heathen, shall He not correct? He that teacheth man knowledge, shall He not know?'—PSALM XCIV. 9, 10.

THESE verses assert that in due time God will act, for He cannot be otherwise than a God of knowledge, deep in whose heart counsels of inviolable righteousness lie hidden. He is always cognisant of what goes on in the world, and especially heedful of the cries and supplications of His own people. These acts of oppression, done to the fatherless and the widow, do not elude His notice. Drop by drop He counts the innocent blood that falls upon the green world He has made and bends His ear to each sigh of the down-trodden. There is a spiritual property in every sense with which the human body is informed, and that property has its immeasurable counterpart in the nature of the Godhead.

I. These words imply that if man possesses the attributes of personality, man's Maker must also possess them in an enhanced degree. Hence arises the sure confidence that a Divine judgment draws nigh which will banish the wrongs under which the faithful groan. It has ever been so in the past. Righteous acts that are not the outcome of a living and a righteous personality are inconceivable. The power that makes for righteousness must see and hear and know, and then set itself to unflinching judgment.

II. The Psalmist affirms that the distinction between right and wrong which God imprints upon the nations through the providences of history has its primal type in the mind of God Himself. The age-long discipline of the generations is the sign of an intense moral life in the Great King of the earth which vitalizes that discipline. Many of us habitually disregard the conscience, and yet at the same time feel that it is the truest and most trustworthy of all the faculties with which our beings have been equipped.

III. We need to indoctrinate ourselves with the argument of the Psalmist, for there is a tendency to depersonalize God, sometimes on grounds directly opposite to those which influence the advocates of a materialistic philosophy. Many thinkers assume that the special attribute of personality is here in the body rather than in the spirit, and that we make God less than infinite by adopting these anthropomorphic modes of speech. It is true our knowledge of God is approximate, but if we negative our approximations by saying that God is neither personal nor impersonal, we make the conception absolutely powerless, futile as a random guess. The lowliest and most limited creature into whom the qualities of personality have come is greater than galaxies of impersonal suns.

IV. The man who has become honestly and intelligently possessed with the truth that God is a person will find every subsequent article of the Christian Creed comparatively easy of acceptance. We cannot go far wrong in our theology if we hold that God is a person, and he who thinks the world can do without theology is a trifler whose folly is beyond ordinary expletives. Not a little obscurity has its beginnings in looseness upon this cardinal subject. Admit that God is a free, conscious, intelligent, self-determining person, and if you have the logical outlook, it will soon be evident that you have committed yourself to the sum and substance of the Christian faith.—T. G. SELBY, The God of the Frail, p. 22.

PSALM XCIV. 9, 10.

'HE that planted the ear, shall He not hear? He that formed the eye, shall He not see? He that teacheth man knowledge, shall not He know?' These verses made a strong impression on the mind of Sophia the Electress of Hanover, a woman of decided mental power, and were adopted with approbation by her friend the philosopher Leibnitz in his opposition to Atheism. The principle on which he reasoned was, that as the stream cannot rise above its fountain, intelligence in man implies an intelligent source. Thought must come from thought. Descartes had already given expression to the same idea in his Meditations, III.: 'Now it is manifest by the light of nature that there must be as much reality in the efficient cause as in the effect; for whence could the effect draw its reality but from the cause? And how could the cause communicate the power to it, if it had it not in itself? And from this it follows, not only that nothing can be produced from nothing, but also that what is more perfect cannot be a result of, and dependent on, what is less perfect.'—J. K.

REFERENCES.—XCIV. 12.—J. Budgen, Parochial Sermons, vol. ii. p. 219. Bishop Temple, Rugby Sermons (2nd Series), p. 39. XCIV. 16.—J. Budgen, Parochial Sermons, vol. ii. p. 219.

THE CHRISTIAN'S HIDDEN SOURCES OF DELIGHT

'In the multitude of my thoughts within me Thy comforts delight my soul.'—PSALM XCIV. 19.

OUR thoughts form the hidden sources of our lives, whether for good or for evil.

I. I am sure it will be good for us if we can find the track along which ran David's thoughts which gave him such great power and such sources of delight that his wonderful career was possible. The first of these thoughts of David he makes very clear to us in this Psalm. It was the thought of an immanent God in the world, one who hears and sees and cares. 'He that planted the ear, shall He not hear? He that formed the eye, shall He not see?' Here is the starting-point of David's hidden source of joy. God is in his world. He made it and He rules it. Here is the source of courage that will never grow weary.

II. Another thought that was a constant source of delight to David was the conviction that God was the defender of those who trusted Him. He cries out in this Psalm, 'The Lord will not cast off His people, neither will He forsake His inheritance. But judgment shall return unto unrighteousness: and all the upright in heart shall follow it.' And in another one of his great Psalms, having this same thought in mind, David says, 'The Lord shall keep thee from all evil; He shall keep thy soul'.

III. Another thought that gave David great delight was his discovery that much of the sorrow and trial which he experienced was not punishment, but chastening and discipline. David had got hold of this great thought of God's chastening love, and it was a source of delight to him; and it cannot help but be a source of perpetual delight to us if we will treasure this thought in our hearts and keep it to live by day and day.

IV. Another thought that gave David delight in his hour of darkness, so far as his outward circumstances were concerned, was the thought which he cherished that in the time of great emergency he could depend upon God's mercy. His heart rejoiced in the mercy of the God who comes to the rescue of the man in peril, whose feet have slipped and will go to disaster without help. It is the glory of our Christianity that it has a word about mercy to the man whose feet have slipped.—L. R. BANKS, Sermons Which Have Won Souls, p. 231.

THE CURE FOR CARE

'In the multitude of my thoughts within me Thy comforts delight my soul.'—PSALM XCIV. 19.

THIS Psalm is a cry for help against the insolence and cruelty of Israel's oppression, evidently at a time when the nation has been under the heel of heathen conquerors. There is a Divine purpose to be wrought out through all the struggles and the sorrow, a purpose of moral discipline.

I. The Psalmist questions his soul by his comforting faith. With spiritual insight he sees something of the meaning of discipline, and sees the hand of God in the dark passage through the cloud as well as in the brightness of the ultimate deliverance. He sees that if the Lord had not been his help all would have been ended long since. 'When I said, My foot hath slipped, Thy mercy, O Lord, was holding me up.' It is a vivid figure of compassing grace. Amid wickedness, rampant and triumphant, enmity without and trouble within, he entered into peace through the assurance of God's presence.

II. Times alter and circumstances change, but the essentials of life remain, and this cry of a wounded heart is the human cry, and we can interpret the Psalm for our own individual needs and personal situation. The way to peace for us to-day, as in this echo of a long past time, is in the assurance of God. This is the one need of man's heart. There can be no abiding consolation and no complete solution of the riddle of life, no safe refuge, except somewhere within where the soul can find rest. If life is meaningless, empty of any spiritual purpose, the world is a place of despair as much to us as the terrible situation depicted by the Psalmist of old. We, like him, and as much as him, need the comfort of God's love for the multitude of our cares. There is nothing the heart of man needs more than a message of courage and hope and confidence. And where is such a message possible except as a message of faith? The world is built as if for discipline, and its one need is comfort of some sort.

III. The only cure for care is the cure of faith. What is this faith which has such magical power? It simply means to fall back upon God, to trust to His love and live in the secret of His presence. We learn to cast our care upon God when we know that He cares for us, and this is the meaning of our Communion. It has many a message and many a lesson, but its deepest message and sweetest lesson is that of comfort. The deepest lesson of Holy Communion, however we interpret it, is the Real Presence of Christ. What trouble or distress is there in life that will not be dissipated by the light of that faith? The remedy for care is to know the love of God in Christ, and that remedy is open to us, not fitfully and casually, but always and everywhere.—HUGH BLACK, Christ's Service of Love, p. 42.

REFERENCES.—XCIV. 19.—A. Tucker, Preacher's Magazine, vol. xix. p. 510. J. Bunting, Sermons, vol. ii. pp. 214, 229. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 883. Ibid. vol. xix. No. 1116. J. S. Boone, Sermons, p. 23. J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 305. XCIV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 287. Expositor (2nd Series), vol. vi. p. 273.

PSALM XCV.

THIS Psalm, the Venite exultemus Domino, 'O come, let us sing unto the Lord,' was the chant of the Templars, the Knights of the Red Cross, when during the Crusades they entered into battle with the Saracens for the conquest of Jerusalem.

In a different spirit the great missionary, Christian Schwartz, took the 6th verse, and put it over the entrance of his new church in Tranquebar: 'O come, let us worship and bow down: let us kneel before the Lord our Maker'. He called the church Bethlehem, as his predecessor, Ziegenbalg, had built one with the name Jerusalem, which was filled with native converts.

A SEASIDE SERMON

'The sea is His, and He made it.'—PSALM XCV. 5.

WHEN we remember that the extent of the sea may be roughly estimated at 146,000,000 English square miles, or nearly three-fourths of the whole surface of the globe, and when we recall the fact that the Bible abounds in illustrations from nature, we might well be astonished if there were no reference to this sublime portion of creation. Until recently, little was known of the physical aspects of the sea, and therefore the allusions to the ocean in the Word of God are such as would occur to any thoughtful observer entirely ignorant of modern science. For example, the silent but mighty force of evaporation is one of the chief features of the sea system, and the wise man thus refers to it: 'Unto the place from whence the rivers come thither they return'. Again, the Psalmist says, 'He layeth up the deep as in a treasure-house'.

Consider the ocean as emblematic of three things: (1) of the unrest and instability of human life; (2) of national anarchy and revolution; (3) of mystery.

I. The sea, in the Bible, is a symbol of the unrest and instability of human life. This feature of the ocean has been the natural thought of men in all ages. It is true that there is no mention of the tides in the Bible, as is natural. 'The Mediterranean is not a tidal sea. This unrest of the ocean surface caused by the tides, the winds, the influence of rivers, the mighty currents which are ever exchanging the heavier and colder waters of the polar seas for the lighter and warmer waters of the tropical ocean, and again reversing the action, cause the sea to be 'ever restless'. There need no words of mine to speak of the constant changes of 'our life's wild restless sea'. The experience is universal. As unconscious infants received 'into Christ's holy Church,' the prayer went up for us that 'being steadfast in faith, joyful through hope, and rooted in charity,' we might so 'pass the waves of this troublesome world that finally' we might 'come to the land of everlasting life'; and in that service which will be read over each one of us, unless the Lord come first, to which the heart of every mourner will respond, will be heard words that speak of the recurring changes of human life: 'Man that is born of a woman hath but a short time to live, and is full of misery. He cometh up, and is cut down, like a flower; he fleeth as it were a shadow, and never continueth in one stay.'

This unrest of the sea is more than superficial. It is not only outward but inward. There is a constant oceanic circulation necessary to its salubrity. The silent action of the sun, ever absorbing and ever increasing the specific gravity of the surface waters, causes a vertical action. The heavier waters above are ever sinking below, and the lighter waters below are ever rising above. Again, many of the sea currents influence the lower waters—the Gulf Stream, e.g., is more than 300 feet deep as it crosses the Atlantic. Besides this, every single mollusc or coralline secretes solid matter for its cell which the sea holds in solution; and that very act of secretion destroys the equilibrium of the ocean, because the specific gravity of that portion of the water from which the coralline abstracts the solid matter is altered. In the remembrance of such facts as these, how true and forcible are the words of Isaiah: 'The wicked are like the troubled sea when it cannot rest'. 'There is no peace, saith my God, for the wicked.' If the surface disturbance of the ocean pictures the changing nature of our outward life, the hidden and unseen restlessness of the sea, even when its surface seems most calm, portrays the inquietude of hearts which have not found rest in Christ. 'The wicked are (1) outwardly restless, and (2) their souls are ever ejecting ungodly and unlovely thoughts.'

II. The unrest of the sea is used in the Bible as a striking emblem of national anarchy and revolution rising beyond the control of established governments.

III. The sea is the one object in nature which is most emblematic of mystery. I cannot recall a single instance of any well-known writer on the ocean who does not refer to this aspect of its being. Schleiden has drawn a charming but imaginary picture of the ocean depths from a number of individual objects brought up, but this description is a 'fancy sketch of the unknown'—'fiction founded on fact'. Deeply interesting as are the records of deep-sea soundings, each product which adheres to the tallow 'arming' of the sounding lead is, for the most part, to use the figure of Mr. Gosse, 'like the brick which the Greek fool carried about as a sample of the house he had to let'. The sea, like a thick curtain, hides the secrets of nature from the ken of man.

The sea is a striking emblem of the mysteries which must ever meet and surround the finite in contemplation of the infinite. The student of nature is brought face to face with mystery at every turn. The profoundest men of science have confessed that, in proportion to their acquisition of knowledge, they have discovered a never-ending area of mystery—as in the night, the further a light extends, the wider the surrounding sphere of darkness appears.

The Divine Being retires within Himself. He 'holdeth back the face of His throne, and spreadeth His cloud upon it'. He 'leadeth the blind by a way that they know not'. The operations of an Infinite Being must of necessity be as a 'great deep' to our limited apprehensions.

And this very mysteriousness, this making darkness His secret place, this inscrutability of counsel, is calculated to call forth a degree of reverence, and to develop in His people a childlike trust and confidence, which could be evoked in no other way. The danger of the theology of the present day is the seeking to eliminate all mystery from God. An Egyptian who, carrying something in a napkin, being asked what it was, answered that it was covered that no man should see it. We may well pray with good Bishop Hall, 'O Lord, let me be blessed with the knowledge of what Thou hast revealed; let me content myself to adore Thy Divine wisdom in what Thou hast not revealed. So, let me enjoy Thy light that I may avoid Thy fire.' 'What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter.' In heaven 'there shall be no more sea'—no more dark and painful mysteries, no obscurity, no misconception. There difficulties will be solved and parables will be interpreted. 'Now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face; now I know in part, but then shall I know even as also I am known.' If, with reference to the mysteries of Providence, we acknowledge with the Psalmist that 'clouds and darkness are round about Him,' the more we study Revelation the more we realize that God is a Being who covereth Himself 'with light as with a garment'.—J. W. BARDSLEY, Many Mansions, p. 128.

REFERENCES.—XCV. 4.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 216. XCV. 6.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, p. 319. H. R. Heywood, Sermons and Addresses, p. 105. J. Vaughan, Preacher's Magazine, vol. xix. p. 417. F. W. Farrar, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxv. p. 369. XCV.

7, 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvi. No. 1551. XCV. 8.—J. T. Bramston, Sermons to Boys, p. 80.

O come, let us worship, and fall down, and kneel before the Lord our Maker.—PSALM XCV. 6.

THESE words contain a spirit-stirring call to sing God's praise.

I. Who that has any true piety in his heart will not in his first moments of waking bethink him of the great Power who has watched over him, and kept him alive, and desire to make some acknowledgment of His goodness?

II. The contemplation of God's works seen in the creation is calculated to fill our souls with noble and worthy thoughts about God. It is calculated to make us humble in our estimate of ourselves, as forming a small part in the mighty whole.

III. And these two things—high reverence for the Holy God, coupled with a sense of our own unworthiness, help to make accepted worship.

IV. When we come to present ourselves before God, let us remember the amazing difference and distance between ourselves and the object of our worship.—R. D. B. RAWNSLEY, Village Sermons (3rd Series), p. 176.

WRONG IN THE HEART

'It is a people that do err in their heart.'—PSALM XCV. 10.

WE must get at the notion that people, including ourselves first and foremost, are in the sight of God wrong at the heart. It is there that revivals take place. A revival is not a reformation; a true spiritual revival is not a universal washing of face and hands. There are many who have doubts and hesitations about what theologians are disposed to call the Fall; I will not discuss that question; my business is not with the Fall, but with the fallen, the living fact, the putrid humanity that is about me and in me.

I. So many people would make the inner life a mere question, as it were, one among a thousand. It is in reality a fact by itself; it is without parallel, it is a solemn loneliness; it is the soul face to face with its own immortality. In the text we seem to have gotten down upon the very rock of this whole question. We must have done so, because the text is an utterance of the Divine lips. The text is, 'It is a people that do err in their hearts,' in their very soul, in their very blood.

II. Many persons look upon society as if it were merely cutaneously affected, something the matter with the skin, with the surface of things, but the Great Healer, who hails from Gilead and brings balm with Him, says, Stand aside: this is not a question of the skin, but of the heart, of the very source of the blood stream; this is a case of blood-poisoning, life-poisoning.

Whatever the application is, it must be fundamental, internal, spiritual, complete. Where do you find that remedy? Only in one place. 'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin.'

III. There again and again and evermore we are thrown back upon the Divine and the eternal. This is a great tribute to the majesty of man. He never is anywhere so eulogized, if the expression may be allowed, as in the Bible; never is he so humiliated, never is he so recognized and praised, as in the Bible. How great must he be who can be cured only by God! We start at our humiliations, and thence we proceed by the help of the Holy Ghost to see how besotted and befooled we are, and then we are led to the fountain opened in the house of David for sin and for uncleanness.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 222.

REFERENCE.—XCV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 292.

A NEW SONG

'O sing unto the Lord a new song: sing unto the Lord, all the earth.'—PSALM XCVI. 1.

WHAT does a 'new song' mean?

I. A living experience. There never has been an age of great poetry which was not first an age of great action, great thought, great living. We shall never sing a new song till we have lived a real, pulsing, genuine new life of our own, not the pale shadow of other and greater lives. Whatever songs and Psalms come echoing down the ages, we must hear God's voice with our own ears.

II. A bright outlook and bold spirit. The faith that has no future has no song on its lips, for there is no hope in its heart. History never 'repeats' itself; every nation has a new rôle to fill, a new destiny to attain, a future of its own to mould and conquer. God has given us a new time and a glowing future, and He looks that we should sound out of this new time a new song.

III. What shall be the keynote of our new song to God in this generation? Shall it not still be Jesus? The highest genius may well lay its brightest tribute of rhythm and melody at His feet, and the lowliest voice may acceptably sing it. A songless faith is a dying faith. A faith that has a true song in it has the future before it, and heaven at last, where the multitude who no man can number will sing the song of Moses and the Lamb, ancient as time, yet new as the morning.—W. R. INGE, Christian World Pulpit, p. 290.

REFERENCES.—XCVI. 9.—J. Bolton, Selected Sermons (2nd Series), p. 159. XCVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 303. XCVII. 2.—G. W. Brameld, Practical Sermons, p. 304. H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 2603.

THE INSTINCT AFTER RISING

'O ye that love the Lord, see that ye hate the thing which is evil.'—PSALM XCVII. 10.

WHY is it that the study of human life in the Bible is so striking and helpful? Is it not because, as we close the book, we cannot help forming a moral judgment of the man himself? Take, for example, the life of Saul. We do not pass judgment upon him as a warrior or as a great leader, but we pass judgment upon Saul as a whole. David did much darker deeds than ever Saul did, and yet our judgment on the whole is in favour of David and against Saul.

Why is it that, on the whole, we regard the life of Saul as the life of a man who has failed? Is it not because, underneath all his brilliant achievements, we cannot help noticing a moral deterioration?

I. The truth is that Holy Scripture teaches us that the outcome and the end of life is not what a man has done, or what a man has said, but it is what life has made of the man. Not so much what man has made of the life, but what life has made of the man. Life is a machinery with its complicated system for the working out of character, and at the end the soul comes out beaten upon by all the manifold forces and influences of life; the soul comes out of all those forces which baffle analysis, and there is your man. Holy Scripture says that the outcome of life is the formation of character, and that, compared with this, nothing else in the world matters.

Now we feel this, I think, when we see a young man, for example, whose whole theory of life seems to be to cull all the good things he can get; and we see him shirking difficulties and escaping troubles—not rising—refusing to become great, and we condemn him. Sometimes we say, 'Well, all the suffering that that man endured, all the struggles he underwent, were worth while, for see what a character has been evolved'. Or we say, 'All that luxury, all that ease and comfort, were not worth while, for the man has gone down'. Sometimes we see a man who has been raised from poverty up to wealth, and we say, 'I liked that man better when he was poor, for when he was poor there seemed to be a splendour of character about him, which has now been overlaid by all this comfort and luxury and ease'. Here is a fine lady who is lying upon her death-bed. She has had her day, and she has had her sway, and she has done her acts, and she has said her words, and she has had her receptions, and, as you her friends stand by her bedside, why is it that you do not feel any of that triumph which comes from a sense of strength and power? It is because you know, who knew her well, that, underneath all, her character has deteriorated, and she has become small instead of great. Or, once more, you stand by the coffin of your dead friend. You have crossed his hands in calmness and peace, and closed his eyes. Why is it that, in spite of all he has done—and he seems to have done great things—why is it that you are unhappy? It is because you know that, underneath it all, his moral nature has worsened. He has become a poorer character than he was.

II. Well, but then, you say, how shall we define character?

Character is defined by one of two movements of the human will. That man is a good man, whatever his creed may be, who is always striving after what he thinks is the best. And that man, whatever his creed may be, is not a good man who, when he sees the good, deliberately turns away from it. That man is not good who, seeing the best, gropes after what he likes, and not after what he ought to like, who aims not at the high but at the low. That man is not a good man who does not aim at what he thinks to be noblest and the purest and the best.

Now, remember, I do not say that a man is a good man who always does right, for I fancy that none of us then would come under the category of goodness at all. But I say that man is a good man who, in spite of piteous failures, is always striving after what he believes to be best. For, underneath all the variety of nationality, race, and religion, underneath all variety of these things that change and give colour and tone to life, underneath all is this distinction between men good and bad. 'I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God'—the dead, morally small, intellectually small, morally great and intellectually great—'I saw them stand before God, and I observed a division'; and what was the cause of that division? One man could say with truth, 'Lord, when saw I Thee in prison, or sick, and did not try to help?' And the other man saw good and turned away; saw light and turned away; saw moral rectitude and chose moral evil.

III. Here is the key to human life. You tell me about a man. He may be a great public character, and you say to me, 'He is a man of great gifts and great wealth'. And I say to you, 'Tell me something about the man'. And you say, 'He is a man of extraordinary fascination and wonderful power of influence'. I say, 'Tell me something about the man'. You say, 'He is a man of wonderful power of mind and body and reason'. I say, 'I do not know the man yet; tell me something about the man'. And then you say, 'And all these powers of influence and fascination and wealth he used for his own ends'. Now I know your man. That one act of the will is the secret of that man's life, and all the rest is only a setting to the picture.

But, further, you may say, 'Well, but I cannot feel that I am perfectly free. I cannot feel that my will is absolutely free.' No man in his senses will ever say to you that at any given moment of your life you are free from anything that you have done in the past. Remember this, that habit works by a very vigorous law, and the law of habit is this—that the oftener you do anything, the more you deprive yourself of freedom, until at last you say, 'I cannot do the things that I would'. Now it is in the power of every man to work himself out of bad habits. He can get free by struggle, hard struggle. Not to-day, not to-morrow, it may be, not for a year perhaps, but he can get free if he will struggle in the light of God, and in the power of God's might he can get free, and at last he will sing with joy and peace, 'The snare is broken and I am delivered'.

That instinct after rising is the truest expression of your nature. Freedom of the will does not mean that at any moment you are free from the trammels of the past, but it does mean that there is a fountain of strength within you, and a power of good without you, by virtue of which you can regain your moral liberty.

And now, how shall these things be? I find that

I seem to have two wills. 'I am,' you say, 'a man of strong purpose, and yet, when I come to things moral, I seem to be powerless. What am I to do?' St. Paul says that behind your conscience, and behind your reason, you can set a person, a person whom you love. And now supposing that you set the greatest and the dearest of men, Jesus Christ, and supposing you learn to love Him, and supposing that you hear His Voice, the Voice of One who died for the honour of God and for the sake of men, the Voice that called the Magdalene to His feet. Suppose you hear that Voice sounding through your conscience, will not at length devotion to Him, the love of Him, draw all your passions, one by one, upon the side of right as against wrong? 'O ye that love the Lord, see that ye hate the thing that is evil.'

There are many things that society hates. It hates being dull, it hates being bored, it hates badly fitting clothes, it hates long sermons, it hates being found out. It hates evil when evil touches its pocket or injures its character in the face of men, but it does not hate evil as evil. Ye that love the Lord, see that ye hate above all things the thing that is evil. And as you learn to love the Lord, as you learn to hate evil, you will learn to love good, until at length stealthily, quietly, in moments unknown and unmeasured, one by one, all your errant desires will come back from the side of wrong and take their place on the side of right, until at last your whole nature is brought into submission, and your whole heart flung down at the feet of God.

REFERENCES.—XCVII. 10.—J. T. Bramston, Sermons to Boys, p. 87. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 208.

SOWN LIGHT

'Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart.'—PSALM XCVII. 11.

CONSIDER these words as speaking: (1) Of the future of the believer; (2) of the life of the believer in this present time; (3) as prophetic of the death and resurrection of Christ.

In applying the words 'Light is sown for the righteous' to the future of the believer, I am but following the thought of the Psalmist and the principle contained in the figure which he employs.

I. This world is the seed-time: the harvest is in the world to come: in other words, the prosperity of the righteous is future. The believer has light now, but it is only sown. The promised immortality is but the full unveiling of that sun by whose clouded light the believer walks on earth.

II. The expression 'Light is sown for the righteous' is figurative of the spiritual life of the believer in this present time. The idea of 'sown light,' or light diffused and scattered abroad, is common to poets in all ages. It is used by both Virgil and Lucretius. The latter says:—

And the sun from mid-heaven sheds his heat
On every side, and sows the fields with light.

While our own Milton adopts the same figure—

Now morn her rosy steps in the Eastern clime
Advancing, sowed the earth with orient pearl.

What is night, but the turning of the earth on its axis from the sun? What is day, but the turning of the earth towards the source of light? What is spiritual darkness, but the turning of the heart from God? What is conversion, but the turning of the soul towards the 'Light of the world'? From the moment that the day breaks and the Sun of Righteousness dawns upon the soul, light is strewn upon life's way: so that the righteous man advances step by step in the light. 'The path of the just is as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day.' Progressiveness is the law of spiritual growth. 'First the blade, then the ear, and after that the full corn in the ear.'

III. The sentence 'Light is sown for the righteous' is, I believe, prophetic of Christ. In the Prayer Book version the words are rendered, 'There is sprung up a Light for the righteous' Was He not the Light? Was He not sown? sown in the darkness of the grave? 'Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.' Whilst the Light was hidden in the sepulchre the disciples were sad. It was but sown. After His resurrection the Sun of Righteousness scaled the heavens, and now shines with healing in His wings.—J. W. BARDSLEY, Many Mansions, p. 251.

REFERENCES.—XCVII. 11.—M. Biggs, Practical Sermons on Old Testament Subjects, p. 209. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 836. XCVII.—B. F. Westcott, The Incarnation and Common Life, p. 41. XCVII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 305. XCVIII.—Ibid. vol. ii. p. 307.

A NEW SONG

'O sing unto the Lord a new song.'—PSALM XCVIII. 1.

IN some half-dozen of the Psalms, in Isaiah, and in the Apocalypse there is mention of a New Song, and in this weary world, where many are feeling very old, and in an age that is straining after novelty, it may be helpful to meditate awhile upon Jehovah's New Song.

I. A New Heart Sings a New Song.—First, then, it may be a new song, not because the words are new, for they may be the most familiar words to us, nor because of the originality of the sentiment, but because the song wells up from a new heart, from a heart renewed by the Spirit of the Lord. Old themes, old thoughts, old facts are touched with fresh light, and brighten with unwonted lustre.

II. New Mercies Demand a New Song.—But this leads us to think about another kind of occasion, for which there must be a new song. It is when there are special mercies to acknowledge, and particular and signal deliverance to celebrate. In the abounding gratitude of the moment for extraordinary favour vouchsafed the soul asks a special measure, and fits new words of rapture to new music. It is only a jaded voluptuary who could interpret in a dreary sense the text that 'there is no new thing under the sun'; there are still crises of unusual blessing—providential interventions which the believing heart will thankfully recognize. Wherefore, we would ask, shall joy succeed mourning without being mentioned in a hymn to God? Shall we be relieved from sharp passages of anxiety, and not offer our Deliverer supreme acknowledgment? We are poor beggars at the gate of His bounty, if when we cry for bread, and have our wants supplied, we scant our thanks to Him. We have but praise that we can offer. It is our solitary gift; shall we stint it? Nevertheless, it will be proportioned partly to the loving spirit which He has infused into us, and partly to our sense of His benefits. Therefore, when we realize cause of more than wonted gladness, we must wake within us our most fervent notes of praise.

III. We Need to be Stimulated to Praise and Thanksgiving.—We have a faculty for pressing our eyes towards the gloomy portions of the picture. We are often tempted to grumble and to murmur. The many Christian privileges we enjoy are occasionally the reason why we are so speedily sensible when we miss any of them. But were our lot never so obscure and inhospitable, even in such case we were the more in fellowship with our suffering Saviour; and these light afflictions, they are precursors of abundant felicity by and by. Therefore let us cheer one another with the gladsome prospect, and be determined not to be dismal Christians. Instead of the old habitual grumble, let there be the New Song; instead of lamenting our few advantages, let us bewail our little use of those which we do possess—in short, instead of thinking so much about ourselves, let us meditate on Christ. That will be a talisman of joy for us that will unlock our lips and enrapture our tongue. There is plenty of music in life for those who choose to sing; there is melody everywhere for those whose ears are attuned to it. For every saint there is a harp, and for every ransomed child of God a New Song.

THE RELATION OF SEVERITY TO PARDON

'Thou wast a God that forgavest them, though Thou tookest vengeance of their doings.'—PSALM XCIX. 8 (R.V.).

I. THERE is a great confusion of thought on the subject of retribution. It is supposed that when a man suffers for his fault it indicates that God is angry with him. The notion is that God may forgive him after suffering his penalty, but that the receiving of the penalty implies Divine displeasure. The Psalmist's view is just the opposite. He says that in dealing with His people God forgave first and punished afterwards. 'Thou wast a God that forgavest them, though Thou tookest vengeance of their doings.' The idea seems to be that when God forgives a man, part of his forgiveness consists in the reparation of his wrong.

II. You will observe that God's vengeance is here said to fall on acts—not on persons. The more I love a wrongdoer and the more perfectly I forgive his wrong, the more shall I be eager to have it counteracted, expiated. If I have a son whose fast living has involved him in deep debt, my enmity to the debt will only be increased by my reconciliation to himself. If I had cast him off, I might wash my hands of his disgrace. But, as I have received him back, his disgrace pains me, revolts me. I appropriate it as in part my own. I feel that his creditors lie at my door. I feel by the very love I bear him that his deed has left a stain upon my own garment which both in his interest and mine must be rubbed out. The debt must be paid if possible with his co-operation, certainly with his consent. The blotting out of the debt is my paternal vengeance upon his deed, and it comes from the very heart of my fatherhood. It is the voice not of my anger, but of my love. It is the product of my pardon, the ground of my forgiveness, the result of my recognition, the retribution would never have been desired by me unless the song had first sounded in my soul, 'This my son was dead and is alive again, was lost and is found'.

III. Lord, let me not faint when my deed is rebuked by Thee; let me not say 'I am rejected of heaven'. I plant a tree of evil and ask Thy pardon: by and by the tempest comes and tears it down. Shall I say it is Thy vengeance upon me? Nay; it is only Thy vengeance upon my tree. The tearing down of my structure is itself the sign of my pardon. If Thou hadst loved me less, Thou wouldst have let it stand. It is not Thine anger but Thy love that demands atonement. After spiritual death is passed the judgment comes. Teach me that the judgment is a sign of life, not death. In my chastisement let me read Thy charity. In my correction let me recognize Thy Christ. In my retribution let me detect Thy radiance. In my pain let me feel Thy pity. In my forfeiture let me behold Thy favour. In my remorse let me discern Thy reconciliation. In the sharpness of my visitation let me hail the shining of Thy visage. There is no proof of Thy Fatherhood like the scourging of my sin.—G. MATHEWSON, Messages of Hope, p. 105.

PARDON WITH PUNISHMENT

'Thou wast a God that forgavest them, though Thou tookest vengeance of their inventions.'—PSALM XCIX. 8.

PARDON and retribution are ever united: they spring from one source of holy love, and they ought to become to us the occasions of solemn and thankful praise.

I. Forgiveness is, at bottom, the undisturbed communication of the Love of God to sinful men. We are far too apt to think that God pardons men in the fashion in which the sovereign pardons a culprit who has been sentenced to be hanged. There need be neither pity on the one side nor penitence on the other. Such inadequate notions of the Divine forgiveness arise, among other reasons, because so many of us have false notions of the true punishment of sin. And still further the true idea of forgiveness is to be found, not in the region of law only, but in the region of love and fatherhood. The forgiveness of God is over and over again set forth in Scripture as being a father's forgiveness. The blessing of forgiveness is not fully comprehended when it is thought of as shutting some outward hell or the quenching of its flames. It goes much deeper than this, and means the untroubled communion of love and delight between the reconciled father and the repentant child.

II. But still further, this being so, let me remind you that such pardon does necessarily sweep away the one true penalty of sin. What is the penalty of sin? 'The wages of sin is death.' What is death? 'The wrenching away of a dependent soul from God. How is that penalty ended? When the soul is united in the threefold bond of trust, love, and obedience. The communication of the love is the barring of the hell.

III. Then there comes a third thought, viz. the one which is most prominently expressed in the text, that the pardoning mercy of God leaves many penalties unremoved. Forgiveness and punishment both come from the same source, and generally go together. There is an aspect in which it is true that the very greatness of the previous sin may become the occasion for the loftiest devotion and the lowliest trust in a pardoned man. The effects may be so modified as to contribute to the depth and power of his Christian character. But even when the grace of God so modifies them, they remain. And though in some sense it be true that pardon is better than innocence, the converse is true, that innocence is better than pardon.

IV. Pardoning love so modifies the punishment that it becomes an occasion for solemn thankfulness. The outward act remaining the same, its whole aspect to us, the objects of it, is changed, when we think of it as flowing from the same love which pardons. The stroke has now ceased to be a mere natural result of our evil. We see that it is no sign of anger, but of love. Whatever painful consequences of past sin may still linger about our lives, or haunt our hearts, we may be sure of two things about them all—that they come from Forgiving Mercy, that they come for our profit. The stroke of condemnation will never fall upon our pardoned hearts. That it may not the loving strokes of His discipline must needs accompany the embrace of His forgiveness.—A. MACLAREN.

FORGIVENESS MINGLED WITH JUDGMENT

'Thou wast a God that forgavest them, though Thou tookest vengeance of their doings.'—PSALM XCIX. 8.

MERCY and judgment must be harmonized. A magnanimous pardon worthy of God's Fatherhood and a scrupulous honour for law worthy of the Judge of all worlds, must meet together in God's providential government. We sometimes assume that forgiveness and judgment exclude each other, and that the climax of clemency is to release from pain rather than to produce sympathy with righteousness. But that is unscriptural and untrue. The forgiven suffer sometimes even beyond the average lot of their fellows. Many reasons can be assigned for this intimate association between judgment and forgiveness.

I. God joins pardon with impressive correction to guard us against mean utilitarian views of grace, and to train us into a true appreciation of the inwardness of His saving work. In the beginning of a soul's return to God it is often moved by selfish, superficial fear. The unhappy effects that follow after sin stir up loathing, trepidation, mental distress, outward amendment and prayer. But these initial motives are intended to be temporary and transitional only, and that man has not tasted the deepest secret of forgiveness who looks upon the grace as mere security against the portentous suffering in which the Divine wrath manifests itself.

II. Our surviving imperfections require that the forgiveness of the past shall be associated with a rigid judgment of its lapses. The fact that we look upon our oft-repeated delinquencies as trivial in their import shows that we need an admonitory discipline of sternness as well as a generous and compassionate absolution. Again and again are we tempted to a presumption which would pervert the grace of God. And the more closely God takes us to His favour and friendship the more urgent is the necessity for the providential lesson.

III. This union of judgment and mercy in the Divine dealings with us is designed to show that the law of retributive righteousness never ceases to operate in our lives. It is immanent as God Himself, for the law is the form assumed by His personal activity. Our deceitful hearts tempt us to imagine that the government which frees us from condemnation must be weak, shift, vacillating in its foundation principles. In the dawning hours of our release from fear moods arise when we incline to think that grace is some clever surreptitious process to disburden us from our bonds and obligations, and following upon that we fall into an unconfessed and inarticulate antinomianism.

IV. This association of judgment and mercy makes the public declaration of Divine forgiveness possible. Escape must not be too easy for the man who is liable to fall away and repeat his offences. As private citizens even we can hold no relation with the man who seeks to shirk the just pain and penalty of his transgression. We might be suspected of condoning delinquencies, and when those delinquencies are felonious, to do so might carry with it serious consequences.

V. These chastisements are intended to illuminate the character of God, and to give an assuring insight into the dispositions of those upon whom they fall. Although infinite love associates itself with infinite holiness, that holiness is exacting to the last degree. It is no light thing to come short of Divine glory. Not only does the Divine government compel a judicial reckoning with the lapses of God's people, but something in the Divine character likewise insists upon it. He who experiences no inward quickening cannot be absolved from condemnation, and to that inward quickening temporal chastisements are contributory.—T. G. SELBY, The God of the Frail, p. 54.

REFERENCES.—XCIX. 8.—Expositor (1st Series), vol. ix. p. 160. XCIX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 308. C. 2.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 9. C. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1265. C.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 310. CI. 1.—H. Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. ii. p. 107.

'It is He that hath made us, and not we ourselves.'—PSALM C. 3.

THIS text is closely associated with the personal history of Melancthon, but the facts are quite wrongly given by Dr. John Ker in his book on the Psalms. Dr. Ker supposed that the use of the verse related to a bereavement which took place shortly before the Reformer's death. It was, on the contrary, a passage which accompanied him in thought from the year 1529, when at the age of thirty-two he lost his baby son George, who was born at Jena on 25 November, 1527. Luther, writing to Jonas on 17 August, 1529, tells of this bereavement, and says that Melancthon was suffering under it the more severely, because he had no previous experience of such a loss. Luther wrote: 'Hic cogitare potes, quid nobis sit operæ et curæ, ut hunc hominem tenerrimi et patheticissimi cordis solemur. Scis, quanti referat hunc hominem vivere et valere. Nos omnes cum eo ægrescimus et mœsti sumus' (Enders. Luther's Briefwechsel, vol. vii. p. 147). In letters of the time Melancthon told his friends of the loss of little George, who was a child of rarest promise. He calls him 'suavissimus puer,' and we may conjecture that this child was all the dearer because the elder boy, Philip, who grew up and lived to old age, was delicate in body and dull in intellect. On 2 September, 1529, Melancthon wrote to Myconius: 'I have lost my younger son, a very sweet boy'. His letters of the time are full of expressions of grief. 'Nothing in life was ever dearer to me than that little boy. There shone in him some rare gifts of mind. No words can tell anything of the wound I received when I lost him.' Not for years afterwards did Melancthon venture to write of the passage which had comforted him in sorrow. After his own almost fatal illness at Weimar in 1540, he was attempting to comfort a friend in bereavement, and we find this passage: 'At the time of my son's death these words, "Ipse fecit nos, et non ipsi nos," brought me wonderful comfort when they came suddenly before me as I was looking through the Psalms' (Corpus Reformatorum, vol. iii. p. 1069).

In later years we find allusions to the same text in his letters of consolation. Thus, in July, 1549, he wrote to an acquaintance in Hamburg:—

'I remember that a certain friend of mine, who was in deep grief because of the death of his son, came by chance on a journey, while his sorrow was still fresh, on that passage in the Psalms, "Ipse fecit nos, et non ipsi nos". This admonition of providence so penetrated his thoughts that it was, he said, as if some Divine flame had been suddenly kindled in his heart while he was reading that text, and afterwards he became much more resigned.'—C.R. vol. vii. p. 429.

The text was chosen by Edward FitzGerald for his tombstone.

RELIGION AT HOME

'I will walk within my house with a perfect heart.'—PSALM CI. 2.

THE ultimate basis of human society is the home. Out of this primal bond arise our highest virtues and our most sacred claims.

I. Thus it must needs be a primary instinct with a Christian to say, 'I will walk within my house with a perfect heart'. Unless we can please God in our own family and among our own kinsfolk, we may despair of succeeding among strangers or on public platforms.

II. Many young men and women are apt to dream that if they had a household of their own they could order it in the love and fear of God. But at present they are only members of a family where it is their duty not to give orders but to obey. Religion, if it be genuine, will make a good son and a good daughter all the more reverent and considerate and sympathetic and tender toward their father and mother.

III. The tie between brothers and sisters involves a relationship and a duty which are different though hardly less serious. The Bible is full of instances of its obligation, and of how fatally that obligation may be broken and denied.

IV. Often a modern household includes servants, and our domestic religion must embrace them also in its circle. We preach Christ to our servants when we treat them with the same fairness and gentleness and deference and courtesy and consideration which we ourselves should desire if we were in their places. People complain about bad servants; but in the long run they generally get the kind of service that they deserve to get.—T. H. DARLOW, The Upward Calling, p. 326.

REFERENCES.—CI. 2.—J. J. Bourdillon, Plain Sermons for Family Reading (2nd Series), p. 202. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1230. CI. 11.—J. Keble, Sermons from Easter to Ascension Day, p. 323. CI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 313. CII. 15.—G. S. Barrett, Old Testament Outlines, p. 132. CII. 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1411. CII. 18.—Archbishop Alexander, Bampton Lectures, 1876, p. 105.

AN UNFINISHED LIFE

'I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days.'—PSALM CII. 24.

I. THE inscription of this Psalm is unique. It describes the inner subject of the Psalm and makes a very beautiful heading. A prayer of the afflicted when he is overwhelmed and poureth out his complaint before the Lord. The afflictions are those of the nation and of the Psalmist himself, who added to his own sorrows the sorrow of his people. The elegy moves with mournful strain as he describes the bitterness of his pain. He has eaten ashes like bread, and mingled his drink with weeping. His days are shortened, his strength wasted, and death has crept up close to him, so that he is withered like grass. It seems to him so untimely, so premature that he should be taken, for he is assured that God is about to remember Zion and to have mercy upon her. To have gone through all the pain and tribulation without tasting the ultimate joy, to have borne all the toil and the burden without sharing in the harvest and in the joy of the harvest-home, to have taken part in the long weary strife and to fall in the hour of victory, that eyes which had seen all the desolation and been salt with tears through many a sorrow should be closed in death as the new era breaks—that is the dreadful pathos of the situation.

II. We, too, have often a similar feeling about what we call unfinished lives and untimely deaths; we have this sense of pathos not for the victor of a hundred fights, but for the soldier who falls in his first campaign, not for the statesman who passes away laden with years and honours, but for the promising novice who was just earning his first laurels, not for the man who could say after a long and strenuous life, 'I have fought a good fight, I have finished the course'. Pity to him is an insult. He has lived out his life and done his work, and entered into his rest. We are oppressed with the thought of the irony of human life and of the vanity of human wishes at the sight of all unfinished work. The manuscript with the sentence broken off where the pen fell from the fingers, the picture with here and there a figure only sketched in charcoal, the statue with only suggestions of the beauty that was designed by it. But unfinished work can never be half so sad as unfinished lives. We pass by the unfinished work to consider the work actually accomplished. But an unfinished life has no such other reference to offer. It is a crop blighted before the harvest.

III. In all this natural train of thought we are liable to fall into a great and grievous error. We may have a wrong standard of judgment as to what is a finished life. We mostly think of it as length of days, the telling of a long tale. A long life may be an unfinished life, though it has run out to the last sand undisturbed. It may never have grasped for one moment the real purpose of living so that to all intents it is cut off in the midst of its days though the days were as the days of Methuselah. Human life cannot be judged by its years nor even by its work, but must be judged by its spirit, not the palpable and outside, such as the years passed or the deeds accomplished, but what is attained through the time and through the deeds, the true set of the character, the bent of life the discipline of the heart, the culture of the soul. Early or late, young or old, that is a finished life when the true end of life is apprehended. If a man has learned to love God and obey Him, if he has submitted his will to the will of God, if he has linked his life to the Eternal life and his love to the Eternal love, his life is not unfinished, though it seems taken away in the midst of his days. There can be nothing untimely when his times are in God's hands. Nothing can happen too early or too late.—HUGH BLACK, University Sermons, p. 131.

REFERENCES.—CII. 24.—Expositor (3rd Series), vol. iv. p. 377. CII. 25-27.—J. J. Blunt, Plain Sermons (2nd Series), p. 114.

THE PERMANENCE OF SPIRIT IN THE FLEETINGNESS OF NATURE

'They shall perish, but Thou shalt endure: yea all of them shall wax old like a garment: but Thou art the same.'—PSALM CII. 26, 27.

I. The sentiment of this passage is to my mind unique in literature. The common sentiment of men in looking on the face of nature is the contrary. You gaze upon a field which you trod in childhood: and almost with bitterness the thought comes over you. Why is matter so much more enduring than spirit? You think of the multitude who are dead since first you trod this field—this field which seems to stand as fresh and green as of yore. It is such a sentiment as this which Tennyson expresses when he makes the brook sing 'Men may come and men may go, but I go on for ever'. It is such a sentiment as this which Byron expresses when he surveys the sea and cries, 'Time writes no wrinkle on thine azure brow'. It is such a sentiment as this which we all express when we speak of 'the everlasting hills'; we are contrasting the permanence of nature with the transitoriness of spirit.

II. In this outpouring of the Psalmist we have exactly the opposite idea; here, nature is the perishable and spirit the permanent. He looks at the field, at the sea, at the hills, and cries, 'They perish but the great Spirit remaineth'. It is the inversion of Tennyson's song—'Brooks may come and brooks may go, but soul goes on for ever'. And there is no doubt, even from a literary point of view, that the Psalmist is right. Even in this world the most abiding thing is a soul. The brook could never say 'I,' because it does not remain the same brook for two minutes. So far from going on for ever, it needs to be renewed every instant. The drops are new each moment. They only seem the same because my spirit is the same. It is my spirit which says 'I'—not the brook. The Psalmist saw this. He saw that the permanence attributed to each natural form is an illusion cast by the shadow of the soul's own immortality. The bloom of the flower is not a single bloom; it is a momentarily repeated colour. The water of a stream is not a single water; it is an ever renewed liquid. The strength of the mountain is not a single strength; it is a constantly replenished force coming from the play of atoms. The spirit alone abides; the spirit alone says 'I'.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 65.

REFERENCES.—CII. 26.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Watson's Mission Sermons (1st Series), p. 44. CII. 27.—W. Baird, The Hallowing of Our Common Life, p. 1. CII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 316.

PSALM CIII. 1-6.

WE have here a succession of scenes: (1) We are introduced to the law court, and we have a graphic picture of the condemned sinner brought before the bar of God and forced to plead guilty. The great act of Justification—'Who forgiveth all thine iniquities'. (2) We are taken to the hospital ward—'Who healeth all thy diseases'. Sin as a disease dealt with by the Great Physician. (3) The slave market—'Who redeemeth thy life from destruction'. (4) The throne room—'Who crowneth thee with loving-kindness'. (5) The banqueting hall—'Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things'; and (6) the heavenward flight—'Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's'.—ALEXANDER WHYTE.

BUNDLES OF BENEFITS

'Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all His benefits : who forgiveth all thine iniquities ; who healeth all thy diseases ; who redeemeth thy life from destruction ; who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies ; who satisfieth thy mouth with good things.'—PSALM CIII. 2, 5.

THE Psalmist set himself one day to count up the benefits he had received from God. He had not proceeded far when he found himself engaged in an impossible task. He found he could not count the blessings he had received in a single day, so set himself to find a help to memory. He took those benefits which he desired not to forget, and he tied them up in bundles. He shaped the bundles into a song. Let us open the bundles and examine them. There are five of them ; we see that they are divided into three and two. The first three are bound together by a common reference to sin, and the consequence of sin. The last two reveal how God would deal with His people if sin were taken out of the way.

I. Who Forgiveth All Thine Iniquities.—The forgiveness of sin is one of the greatest wonders of Christian experience. It tells us that a man may turn over a new leaf, that his future may not be a copy of his past. The forgiveness of sin is possible, for it is one of the surest facts of real experience.

II. Who Healeth All Thy Diseases.—Sin has its consequences and one of them is disease. Sin then makes disease, and God's relation to disease is described so fully that it gives a distinctive name for God—Jehovah the Healer.

III. Who Redeemeth Thy Life from Destruction.—On the one hand, the final outcome of sin is destruction ; on the other hand, the culmination of God's action in relation to sin is redemption. Not a redemption of the soul, but of the body, it is the redemption of both, of the whole man.

IV. Who Crowneth Thee with Loving-kindness and Tender Mercies.—These words are about the most musical and poetic in the whole Bible. God crowns with loving-kindness and tender mercies, and these are the highest expression of the loving interest which God has in His people.

V. Satisfieth Thy Mouth with Food.—The note of Christianity is that no human needs are left unsatisfied. Satisfied with food, so that every need shall be met, this is the promise. Thus in this fifth bundle there are many things for which the Psalmist might well be grateful not only for what is expressed in it, but for the promise of large blessings yet in store for us in the days to come.—J. IVERACH, The Other Side of Greatness, p. 119.

REFERENCES.—CIII. 3.—W. G. Horder, Christian World Pulpit, 1891, p. 374. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxv. No. 1492. CIII. 3, 4.—H. Drummond, The Ideal Life, p. 145.

RECOVERED YOUTHFULNESS

'Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things ; so that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's.'—PSALM CIII. 5.

THE great lesson is that those whom God forgives, crowns with favour, and feeds with spiritual bounties, possess the secret of perpetual youth. The life that God nurtures will always rejuvenate itself and escape the weariness and humiliation of age.

I. We find the process of waste and repair going on in connexion with the common experience of life. Great troubles come to men in sad and obstinate succession, so that they break down utterly ; hope exhausts itself, and they are unable to expect anything besides new troubles or the stated recurrence of the old. And then brighter days come. The cloud breaks and the tension is overpast. They are like the man who goes down into the troubled pool a wreck and comes back with the bloom of a child on his face. Youth has renewed itself.

II. Youth is a symbol of the flowing tide of life, and in the natural order of things, age stands for its ebb. If God renew our youth like the eagle's we shall face without a single hurt the storms and conflicts and testing times of our earthly pilgrimage. Religious life never ought to be old. He whom God thus revives and inspires is able to forget his sorrows and to disburden himself of cares.

III. Many experiences remind us that the attritions in our daily lot tend to wear out religious life itself, and if we neglect the superhuman sources of repair it must wane and perish as surely as an over-pressed physical life. The spirit of the world, which looks everywhere with the suspicious eye, and affirms that the only law observed by the individual and the race is the law of selfishness, has taken possession of us, and every early enthusiasm is black with frostbite. Perhaps it is better we should stand aside and make way for the young, for we are stale, hypercritical, fertile in doubts and misgivings, prone to unhappy forecasts ; and the work of the hour can only be done by those whose hearts are warm and eager. But surely that need not be. Religion brings the promise of rejuvenation to the mind, and the temper that has mastered us indicates that we are in closer intimacy with the world than with the God who renews the youth of His servants like the eagle's.

IV. The temper of old age sometimes steals upon men in their corporate life and influence wanes till final eclipse is reached. It is the decay of faith which disintegrates and topples down dominant nations and conquering empires. The frictions of toil, the fever of overwrought civilizations, the burdens and responsibilities of empire will wear a nation down into weakness, decrepitude, weariness, and despair unless its life be continually revived at the everlasting springs.

V. The recovered youthfulness is in itself meetness for immortality. We need not be appalled at the thought of spending an endless existence in God's presence, if in the Divine fountain of life we receive renewed baptisms into virginal freshness and vigour. The nature whose youth is here renewed like the eagle's will be invigorated there for ever-ascending flights. The progress to which we are beckoned is towards an ideal of perpetual youth.—T. G. SELBY, The Unheeding God, p. 216.

REFERENCES.—CIII. 5.—S. A. Brooke, Christ in Modern Life, p. 351. CIII. 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xx. No. 1171.

DO OUR SINS ALWAYS FIND US OUT?

'He hath not dealt with us after our sins.'—PSALM CIII. 10.

If there be any one truth which holds the modern mind with a more relentless grasp than any other, it is that sin is followed inevitably and inescapably by its due penalty.

This solemn assurance is bound upon our minds by quoting some of the most emphatic sentences of Scripture. 'The soul that sinneth it shall die.' 'They have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind.' 'The wages of sin is death.' 'Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.' 'Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death.' These teachers strike us with a silent dread as they summon up the conspicuous sinners and make them pass in a procession of shame. Esau finds his profane word fastened as a doom on his spirit. Jacob is driven by his sin into exile, and compelled to reap its reward many years after, both in his own anguish and in the sins of the children. Saul becomes a madman and a suicide. David walks in the streets of his city with men's eyes condemning him, and sees his iniquity blighting his home and undoing the work of his unstained manhood. Solomon's voluptuous day ends in a corruption whose penalty he himself begins to bear. And so name after name is summoned up, down to Judas rushing on death in his despair, to show that each man receives the full reward of his iniquity.

Now of the element of truth in this teaching no one need have any doubt, but it is a truth so much overstated, and sometimes set down so nakedly, and without relation to other truths, as to be almost a lie. It is not the whole truth and nothing but the truth. It is not true that every sin is visited by its due penalty. It is not true that a man's sin always finds him out. It was true that if those Israelites to whom this sombre message was spoken had selfishly remained on the farther side of Jordan, and been content with their own portion, a severe penalty would have fallen upon them. Theirs would have been one of those modern sins for which a man suffers more surely than he knows. It is the sin of the man who selfishly and indulgently 'cultivates his garden'. But it is not true that a man always pays the uttermost farthing. The man who says so forgets that no single law is unlimited in its scope and power. He ignores the facts of life. He knows nothing of Christian experience. He forgets that law is not supreme and dominant. And he leaves out of account this imperial truth, that there is in the world and over the world a great will, a tender heart, and an infinite power. He forgets that this will uses and controls law. In a word, this grim and crude and unchastened teaching leaves out—God. The Psalmist saw the truth steadily, and he saw it whole when he wrote, 'He hath not dealt with us after our sins'.

Two boys were playing on a narrow ledge, worn smooth by adventurous feet, in the face of a seaside cliff. They had come along the path from the mill, which was set beside the neighbouring stream. Some twenty feet beneath the deep sea-green water lapped against the rock. One of the boys was the miller's son—a bold, lawless spirit. He had been warned again and again of the peril of the path. He had been caught and chastised. His defiant spirit loved the danger. This day a careless step to the edge paid its penalty, and he fell into the smooth deep water below. Death seemed to be his just fate. But his keen cry was heard in the mill, and his father ran out with anger on his face. But when he saw his son struggling with death the frown became a spasm of anguish, and at the risk of his own life he plunged in and rescued him. As that boy lay in his exhaustion, tended by loving care, he knew how far it was true that our sin finds us out. He understood this Psalmist's profounder word, 'He hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities'. He knew that the world, which seems to be all law, is really all love, and that mercy rejoices against judgment.

Let me illustrate this truth to you, looking at it along the broad lines of God's dealings with us.

I. Look, in the first place, along the line of God's providence. When a man's sin should find him out God's providence often interferes to avert the penalty and to hide the shame. A man has bowed his head for the stroke, but all that he has felt has been the touch of God's hand in mercy. Paul taught that 'whatsoever' a man soweth, that, and nothing different from that, shall he reap. If a man sow oats, he shall reap oats and not barley. If he sow figs, he shall not reap thistles. 'He that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.' But between the sowing and the reaping there come in other laws. There lies the whole providence of God. A man may sow and never reap at all. A man may reap where he has not sown, and gather where he has not strawed. And so between a man's sin and his finding out there comes in the providence of God. It is written in many a scripture, 'He hath not dealt with us after our sins'.

II. Look, in the second place, along the line of God's law. Men sometimes speak as though this law of penalty were the one dominant and overruling ordinance. They speak as though the consequences of a man's sin must sweep on like a grim and unresting fate, must pursue him as a Nemesis with the steady foot of inescapable vengeance. It is a terrifying truth that our sin sets in motion blind forces of retribution. Every man is aghast when he realizes how wide and far-reaching is the range of a single evil deed. But God uses His law to conquer law. God enlists the higher law of mercy to repel the lower law of judgment. God counterworks the law of retribution by the law of repair.

III. Look, in the third place, along the line of God's grace. Clearly God deals with infinite mercy in His providence and in His law. But there is an inner world where, at first sight, a man's sins find him out ruthlessly. God's providence may prevent the direst consequences. God's law may renew the life and bring out the fair blossom of many an outward grace. But there are what Newman calls, in the noble title of his overdrawn sermon, 'The moral consequences of single sins'. 'There are those moral and spiritual issues and effects which are the curse of the soul. The profligate may sit 'a sober man among his boys,' but he cannot undo the past. He cannot cleanse his memory, he cannot be wholesome in thought. The events of a man's wilful years may be left behind him, but in the disability of his conscience, the defects of his character, the torture of old desires, and the indelible hues of sin and error with which his mind is dyed, he shows that his sin is finding him out. And deepest of all there is the sense of things done which cannot be undone, the unanswerable accusation of the past, the breach between the soul and God. We need something more than sweet providence, and something more than correcting law. We need grace. We need that forgiveness and renewal which are proclaimed in the Gospel and wrought out in the Cross of Christ. We need something more than the working of a providence which may interpose between us and our due reward. We need something more than laws which may order and direct new forces. We need to have the breach closed between God and the soul. We need the guilty conscience cleansed. We need the most awful and most desolating consequence of all removed from us, our fearfulness of God and our alienation to Him. These are given us by the Cross. —W. M. CLOW, The Cross in Christian Experience, p. 167.

THE INFINITE FORGIVENESS

'As far as the east is from the west, so far hath He removed our transgressions from us.'—PSALM CIII. 12.

THE writer of this Psalm groups his thoughts under three clearly defined heads. He speaks in the opening verses of personal forgiveness and the blessings which cluster round it. He next dwells upon the forgiveness which God has extended to His people in their covenant life, as illustrated in past history and the present outlook. And he fittingly closes his meditations with a tribute of praise to the power and sovereign dominion of the God whose mercy reaches to all generations. Our text belongs to the second division, and in terms of inspired rhapsody extols God's pardoning compassion to the race He had called into His covenant.

I. The average Jew acquired his sense of the Divine forgiveness by remembering that he was an organic part of a redeeming community. God had pitied and pardoned, in significant ways, the race to which he and his forefathers belonged; and whilst affirming from time to time by the prescribed forms his covenant birthright, he was under little or no temptation to regard himself as an outcast.

II. The hope of salvation which some men in modern days entertain because of their affiliation to the Church is a part of the same idea, and is a doubtful survival from Jewish times. God deals with men in racial and confederated aggregates, and is it not well to be identified with an accredited body to which His mercy is pledged? But another idea was emphasized in the ministry of Jesus Christ. His message was a message of condemnation to the body politic but of absolution to the separate penitent. He taught that the Divine Father dealt with the individual, that responsibility was first personal and afterwards corporate, and that men must be saved apart before they are gathered into elect communities.

III. It is the prerogative of a personal God to forgive, and where the Divine personality is either denied or relegated to an obscure background, no place can be found for this cardinal doctrine of the evangelical creed.

IV. The Psalmist's rhapsody is in no sense exaggerated and the disabilities of our sin do not follow us a day longer than we need their lessons. God's mercy brings a sweet oblivion of the shame and selfishness of misspent years. In the check put upon our natural and spiritual strength by the errors of the past, in the shrunken opportunities of which our half-maimed lives are made up, in the less splendid honours that beckon us forward, there may be plain marks of a disability entailed by early unfaithfulness and transgression; and yet God in His love has come so near to us that His immeasurable Being is interposed between our souls and past sin.

V. But the Psalmist implies in his magnificent metaphor that human transgression is dealt with by an act of superhuman grace and power. 'As far as the east is from the west.' The terms were of unknown range and unlimited elasticity. These figures of the firmament meant for him just as much as they mean for us with our larger knowledge. All the dimensions of space are used to illustrate this hymn of the Divine mercy through every line of which there murmurs the exhilarating breath of a spiritual springtide. No term can be put to the compassions of Almighty God.

VI. Although the Psalmist speaks in such bold and uncompromising terms of God's forgiveness, we must not assume that there is any strain of indifference to moral distinctions in the magnanimous act he celebrates. To pardon implies a vast constraint of pity, an indescribable sacrifice, the cost of which men only began to learn centuries later, and the immensity of which is still a mystery to us.—T. G. SELBY, The God of the Frail, p. 39.

REFERENCE.—CIII. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1108.

THE FATHER AND HIS CHILDREN

'Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him.'—PSALM CIII. 13.

THE life of each man may be looked at from two very different points of view. He may be regarded as an individual or as a member of society. Each of these two aspects brings into sight its own particular gifts and opportunities and obligations and advantages.

Our Lord's parables are divided into two classes according as they treat of this social general aspect of man's life or of his particular and individual life. Some of those which begin to tell us about the kingdom of God deal with social aspects of human life. Others, such as that of the Prodigal Son, are altogether occupied with the life of each individual. All these individualistic parables start with the great assumption that each man is related to God in a particular manner.

I. God is Your Father, and Because He is so, you have a Claim Upon God.—He wishes us to understand that the obligations of Fatherhood are distinctly upon Him. He draws a parallel: 'If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask Him?' He not only acknowledges that the claims of Fatherhood are upon Him but He acknowledges it in a way with which we are familiar and on grounds which we can thoroughly understand. God cannot neglect you nor forget you, nor refuse to hear your prayer. He asks you to believe that. This is the great primary act of trusting God which your heavenly Father asks of every heart of man.

(a) We learn it not from Nature.—If this demand upon our faith were made simply in the face of what we call the common course of Nature it would be practically impossible for us to respond to it.

(b) But from Redemption.—As we look out into the world and its history we see One hanging on Calvary. He claims to be God Himself, and if He is then, of course, the sight of Jesus of Nazareth, God Himself, hanging on the cross of pain and shame does not relieve all our doubts and all our difficulties, it does not tell us how this sad state of things came about or why it is allowed to go on, but it does tell us how God cares.

And this leads us to a further consideration.

II. Fatherhood Means that God has a Claim on Us.—He has a claim on our life and our obedience, and a claim on our service. It is always the service of sons. If you find yourselves engaged in anxious and strenuous work, you are there because God has said, 'Son, go and work to-day'.

A poor lady found in her son's coat when he came back from school three of the letters which she had written to him unopened. Poor lady! She said, 'My boy had the first claims on me, and I put everything aside to write to him every week,' and this was the result, and you can gather how she felt.

So God feels to-day over your unopened Bible and your unsaid prayers. Remember that we are not neglecting a tyrant but wounding the God Who loves us and Whose heart cries out for us all the time.

'Like as a father pitieth his children.'—PSALM CIII. 13.

DR. DALE says on this text: 'Years ago when death came to me first and took a child, the anguish was great. Watching her while she lay dying, I learnt for the first time what is meant by the words, "Like as a father pitieth his children". Only so could I be taught the pity of God. And I learnt, too, at the same time, what God must feel at the loss of His children. What are all these passionate affections but parables of Divine things. Shall God suffer and not we?'

REFERENCES.—CIII. 13.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 186. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1650.

THE GOD OF THE FRAIL

'Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him. For he knoweth our frame: He remembereth that we are dust.'—PSALM CIII. 13, 14.

OUR text directly asserts that God pities us because of the pains and vicissitudes to which this fragile framework of our passing lives condemns us. It also indirectly suggests that He blends mercy with His judgment because of the limitations under which we have to pass our probation upon earth, and because also of the obstructions presented by the flesh to our best thought and service, as well as to the great destiny which is already asserting its promise within us.

I. These words remind us that the pathos of our mortality enlists the pity of the Eternal. God's survey takes in the final picture of our weakness and all the scenes of pain and humiliation which lead up to the last, sad, tear-bathed page of our earthly history. Is not His scrutiny mollified by the remembrance of everything we may have to endure? That principle is the clue to many enigmas in God's dealings with the children of men. But for the infirmities of the flesh we might never taste the sweetest springs of God's tenderness. It is not without a far-reaching reason that God has fashioned us of a weak, sensitive, perishable material. It is the children of the dust who are destined to know at last the deepest secret of His heart.

II. These words imply that this brief life man spends in the flesh enlists the Divine compassion, because great spiritual issues turn upon a right use of its opportunities. The issues of a stern probation intertwine themselves with the textures of our earthly lives.

(a) This probation is not only limited in its appointed term, but hampered by the desires engendered within the bodily framework. But in His merciful judgment God penetrates through what is apparent and avoids our pitiable confusions between moral and physical causes.

(b) These words seem to imply that we are the objects of pity because the flesh puts a drag upon our holiest aspiration and service. The Divine Father remembers that we are compassed with frailty and hemmed in by disqualifications. Whilst waywardness must be corrected and moral deformity in all its aspects must be removed, He has taught us that infirmity is distinguished from sin, and, through the mission of One who was tempted like unto His brethren, has assured us of exhaustless compassion.

(c) The flesh obscures the vision of spiritual things, and these words imply that the Father of light looks graciously upon those who are peering through the imprisoning gloom of the senses in the hope that they will yet see His face. The splendour in which God dwells is filtered of its overpowering brightness by the dullness of the flesh, and we may strain our spiritual senses in vain to see it as it is. God ordained this when He made man of the dust of the ground, and for our constitutional limitations has ready an apologetic, tender, magnanimous final—'He remembereth that we are flesh'.—T. G. SELBY, The God of the Frail, p. 1.

REFERENCES.—CIII. 13, 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 941. CIII. 15, 16.—J. Aspinall, Parish Sermons (1st Series), p. 55. CIII. International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 323. CIV. 1.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 257. CIV. 13, 14.—T. Barker, Plain Sermons, p. 98. CIV. 16.—T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 141. CIV. 19.—E. A. Askew, Sermons Preached in Greystoke Church, p. 132. CIV. 19-23.—H. M. Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 176.

PSALM CIII.

THIS Psalm was read once a day in the family of John Angell James, of Birmingham. When his wife died he was asked if it should be read. 'Yes,' he said, 'it is as full of comfort as of thanksgiving.'

PSALM CIV.

THE 104th Psalm was a favourite with Alexander von Humboldt. After speaking in his Cosmos of the exalted views of nature given in the Old Testament, as the living expression of the omnipresence of God in the visible world, he refers specially to this Psalm: 'We are astonished to find, in a lyrical form of such limited compass, the whole universe, the heavens and the earth, sketched with a few bold touches. The toilsome labour of man, from the rising of the sun to his setting, when his daily work is done, is contrasted with the moving life of the elements of nature. This contrast and generalization of the action of the natural world, and this vision of an omnipresent invisible power which can renew the earth or crumble it to dust, are not so much a glowing and gentle, as a solemn and exalted conception of creation!' Humboldt names Psalms LXV. 6-13, LXXIV. 15-17, as having similar features in softer form.

Verses 19-24 are the Evensong of the Russian Church.—J. K.

THE POWERS OF NATURE

'Who maketh His angels spirits; His ministers a flaming fire.'—PSALM CIV. 4.

WHEN we survey Almighty God surrounded by His holy angels, His thousand thousands of ministering Spirits, and ten thousand times ten thousand standing before Him, the idea of His awful Majesty rises before us more powerfully and impressively. We begin to see how little we are, how altogether mean and worthless in ourselves, and how high He is, and fearful. The very lowest of His angels is indefinitely above us in this our present state; how high then must be the Lord of angels! The very seraphim hide their faces before His glory while they praise Him; how shamefaced then should sinners be when they come into His presence!

It is a motive to our exertions in doing the will of God to think that, if we attain to heaven, we shall become the fellows of the blessed angels. Indeed, what do we know of the courts of heaven, but as peopled by them? and therefore doubtless they are revealed to us that we may have something to fix our thoughts on when we look heavenwards. Heaven, indeed, is the palace of Almighty God, and of Him doubtless we must think in the first place; and again of His Son our Saviour, who died for us, and who is manifested in the Gospels, in order that we may have something definite to look forward to: for the same cause, surely, the angels also are revealed to us, that heaven may be as little as possible an unknown place in our imaginations.—J. H. NEWMAN.

THE DAY'S WORK

'Man goeth forth to his work and to his labour until the evening.'—PSALM CIV. 23.

I. What are we in the World for?—Why are we here and what for? He is a little man in a little world who thinks he can give a complete answer to this question. This mystery is great, but it is plainly the purpose of the mystery to challenge our courage and to lead the human mind onward step by step to the conquest of the unknown. We are here, must it not be? as parts of this great creation, to fill our place in it as faithfully as we can; to contribute to the development of its purpose by bringing our individual life with all its peculiar endowments and opportunities, relations, and interest into correspondence with that purpose; to work in harmony with the power, the wisdom, the goodness which most manifestly pervade the world, and are slowly building it up into strength and beauty.

II. Man's Creative Power.—We are here to share the work of God in creating the world—called not only to subdue and control but to create. Creation is not finished but is always proceeding. And in this continuous and never-ceasing work of creation man can help or hinder, develop or retard, the creative purpose and process. The one great teaching of modern knowledge is that not anything above a certain low level of excellence comes by natural law unaided by man. That all best things in the world of nature to-day are the result of his thought and toil. Man is not only a factor in evolution but an instrument. He has his contribution to make toward the finishing and perfecting of the material universe.

III. Man's Share in Making Himself.—In his own making and saving, in the development of personal faculty and character, man is called to work and to labour until the evening. What he can do for the earth and for the creatures and things which live upon it he can do for himself, fulfil and finish the Creator's purpose and plan. God makes nothing right away and perfect at once. Like the rest of His work man was left unfinished that man himself might complete what God began. We can do nothing ourselves without co-operation. To an extent practically unlimited we can make or mar ourselves. We cannot be passive recipients of the Divinest blessing of life. The salvation that costs us nothing is worth nothing, an unreal rescue from an unreal danger. God needs our co-operation or He will fail of His saving purpose.

IV. Man's Share in Christ's Work.—In redeeming the world even more than in creating it God works through men and in human ways. God the Saviour must be helped even more than God the Creator. It is through men God helps and saves men and creates His new heaven and His new earth. They are the hiding-place of His power, and through their hands He reaches forth to save and heal His wandering children.

THEOLOGY AND SCIENCE

O Lord, how manifold are Thy works! in wisdom hast Thou made them all: the earth is full of Thy riches.'—PSALM CIV. 24.

THIS Psalm is a beautiful poem on Natural Theology. Natural Theology (by which is meant the knowledge of God to be obtained from the study of nature) was in much worse favour during the first half of the nineteenth century than it has been since. When, however, the science of geology became developed, the system of Natural Theology which has been so popular, received a rude shock. It was shown by the geological records within the rocks, i.e. by the fossils there preserved, that the world instead of being as chronologists had supposed only about 6000 years old, must have existed untold ages, and that instead of the work of creation being confined to six literal days, life has existed upon the earth for many millions of years. The result of this revelation on the part of natural science led many good people to denounce it as being contrary to the revelation in God's word. For some twenty or thirty years the battle was hot between the theologians and scientists. Of late, however, the noise of battle has grown less loud. We have come to recognize the fact that revelation and nature are two parts of one whole: that both books are written by God Himself: and that He does not contradict in one what He has written in another, but one is the compliment of the other—the other part—without which it cannot be fully understood. Nature without the Bible is certainly not complete: and the Bible in many respects becomes a much more intelligible book when it is read in the light which a knowledge of nature gives. Let me give an example on both sides.

I. First, on the need of revelation to supplement the teaching of nature. From none of the records in the book of nature do we gain any light whatever on the origin of matter, or of life in the first instance. We see as it were the working of the machinery but do not see or understand the motive power. There must be, as even Mr. Herbert Spencer freely admits, a power behind all the operations of nature, the existence of which the man of science cannot ignore, although he cannot find out by his science what it is. Now here comes in revelation with the explanation which nature does not give. Here God reveals Himself as the Power, the Force, whose existence the man of science admits. He is the first great cause. Here then in the teaching of this book we find the counterpart of nature.

II. Now on the other side, let me give an example of the advantage which the believer in revelation may derive from the study of nature: how it helps us to interpret and to understand the Bible. So far from Scripture and physical science being at variance, we shall find that the two harmonize most perfectly. Just as modern researches into the history of ancient nations—such as Assyria, Babylon, Egypt—are continually throwing new light upon Bible history and prophetic teaching, so also the researches of our scientific men are constantly helping us better to understand the Scriptures. Instead of warning young people against the study of physical science lest it should lead them to scepticism and agnosticism, I would advise all who can to study nature. Accept the fact that the force, which as Herbert Spencer admits, lies behind all phenomena is the great God; believe that in His infinite mind the conception of nature existed before the facts of nature were wrought out, even as the conception of a piece of machinery exists in the mind of the inventor before it is formed. Study nature in this reasonable spirit, and everywhere you will see more and more clear evidence of the working of an intelligent, omniscient mind; and you will be constrained to say, 'O Lord, how manifold are Thy works! in wisdom hast Thou made them all: the earth is full of Thy riches'.—S. J. WHITMEY, British Weekly Pulpit, p. 217.

REFERENCES.—CIV. 24.—W. F. Shaw, Sermon Sketches, p. 30. A. Jessopp, Norwich School Sermons, p. 64. T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 155. G. S. Barrett, Old Testament Outlines, p. 140. C. Kingsley, Village Sermons, p. 1. CIV. 28.—J. D. Burns, Christian World Pulpit, 1891, p. 314. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1259. CIV. 28.—G. A. Sowter, Sowing and Reaping, p. 37. CV 1, 2.—B. F. Westcott, Village Sermons, p. 333. CV. 17.—H. J. Buxton, God's Heroes, p. 20. CV. 17-19.—G. Trevor, Types and the Anti-type, p. 71.

THE SPIRIT OF THANKSGIVING

'Thou openest Thy hand. . . I will sing unto the Lord.'—PSALM CIV. 28, 33.

THE intention of Providence includes a response as well as a gift—an appeal or a claim made on us as well as the meeting our appeal. Providence towards mankind requires a personal and kindred return from men. It is not satisfied by some recognition in the way of religious routine, or by men in believing that it is Divine and benevolent. 'Lord, Lord,' is not enough. Nothing is enough unless God hears His bounty answered by the Spirit of His Son saying in our hearts, Abba, Father, and unless He receives the service of our redeemed.

I. Life and Duty.—Religion is practically two things: Life and Duty. It comes from God as Life. It goes to Him still alive—'a living sacrifice, acceptable to God, a reasonable service'—as Duty. In the power of the life that it receives it keeps the Commandments, it obeys and tends to sympathize with the Divine purpose and intention. The Spirit of Christ speaking through its heart says, 'Abba, Father'. The same Spirit, working in its life, does the Father's will. And so keeping the Commandments it becomes more than a recipient of life and a pensioner on bounty; it 'enters into life,' it exercises the citizenship of the kingdom of heaven. How much good there is in the world that seems to miss completion and life because it keeps out of this great vital cycle. God is ceaselessly pouring upon our lives and out of His open hand and yearning heart stimulus and opportunity and cheer. And we only occasionally allow the life that He is giving to go back to him in communion and service. Truth springs from the earth and righteousness looks down from heaven. But the truth sinks back to earth again, failing of contact with that which claims it from above and could alone complete it. On all sides we can see so much that is so good accomplishing so little because it does not go up alive to God—repentances that stick fast in the mire; strength that beats the air or builds on sand; sacrifices that are mainly losses; faith that sings no songs. And for this great sad fact of wasted goodness and exhausting effort there is but one sufficient explanation—the absence or the lack of life.

II. The Cycle of God's Providence.—Nothing surely can make our lives satisfactory outside the cycle of God's loving Providence, and nothing can really frustrate them if they be making their true answer to God, uttering their Abba, Father. This is the purpose of our being and of that Father by Providence which works continually to bring us into harmony, communion, fellowship with God. If we will consent to it, and come willingly into its cycle of blessing, nothing can stay us from singing to the Lord. For underneath all our singing will be the gladness of a speech that must for ever make for praise—the voice of the Spirit in our hearts, saying Abba, Father.

REFERENCES.—CIV. 30.—J. M. Neale, Readings for the Aged (4th Series), p. 122. Ibid. Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 382. J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (4th Series), p. 52. J. Keble, Sermons for Ascension Day to Trinity Sunday, p. 164. CIV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 329. Expositor (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 174.

THE TRIAL OF JOSEPH

'Until the time that His word came: the word of the Lord tried him.'—PSALM CV. 19.

THE career of Joseph is of the kind to which we give the name of romance. That word is a vague one, and it would cost us some pains to define; but we all think we know a romance when we hear it, and the tale of Joseph is one. A boy of genius, hated by his brothers because he was a genius and knew it, led through startling vicissitudes of fortune, from a father's partial love to the estate of slave, from the black arch of a dungeon to the splendour round a throne; then the marshal of a drama of poetic justice, apt almost beyond the devices of fiction; last in a scene of rarely equalled pathos binding up again the ruptured bond of home, and crowning the boy's dream of dominion over his father's house by a fulfilment as sweet as it was wonderful. What have we here but the very authentic stuff of romance, even as you would find it in an Odyssey of Greeks, or a tale of Arabians, or a chivalrous fiction of our North.

I. Joseph's tale is our tale. I called it a romance; and I call the moral life of a man or woman a romance. There is a region of your life to which the marvellous cleaves and cannot be separated. The moment we have to think not of the trader or labourer or citizen, but of the spiritual being that wears the name which is ours, that moment our life is touched with mystery. I see not why one should be more thrilled by the romance which Joseph lived between home and prison and palace, than by the romance we live ourselves between cradle and life-work and the grave.

II. Is Joseph's prison also ours? That, too. And in it are spent the more part of our days. A prison not of brick or stone; a prison with walls of glass, and you can see through them; of air, and you cannot touch them; but the walls hold you caged as if they were iron or granite. The name of that prison is Life in the Flesh.

III. 'The promise of Jehovah tried him.' How blessed is it when this, the most universal trial of the religious life—the contradiction between our faith and the things which do appear—is felt by us, to remember that it is trial, that the promise is only trying us. How supportable is this world of appearances when once we have seen that these daunting and humiliating appearances are there only that we may have our chance of resisting them, of refusing to be brow-beaten, of asserting against them the Divine assurance in our hearts that we are not what we seem, and this mortal encompassment is not the fact.

REFERENCES.—CV. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1277. CV. 24.—G. S. Barrett, Old Testament Outlines, p. 140. CV. 41.—J. Davies, Penny Pulpit, No. 1513, p. 241. CV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 339.

THE BIOGRAPHY OF A SOUL

'They believed His words; they sang His praise. They soon forgot His works, and lusted exceedingly in the wilderness.'—PSALM CVI. 12-14.

I. THEY believed His words. I venture to say there is not a soul who cannot recall, at least once or twice, such hours of vivid deliverance, when God's power thrust itself into your life and made clear your path before you. It may require perhaps a certain effort on your part to remember just at once such times of Divine interposition, but they are there none the less. They come in different ways.

(a) Perhaps it was that day when some one dearer to you than life itself was lying on the borderland of death. You just prayed with all the passion of a soul that shrank from the anguish of bereavement, that God would hear you and give you back, even for a little while, the life that seemed to be slipping from your grasp. Then the miracle took place.

(b) Or it may be that this Divine interposition in life comes through deliverance from some great temptation.

(c) Or it may be that God reveals Himself in a human life in saving from some great personal peril.

II. Most of us who have experienced such deliverance have written the second chapter in that spiritual biography, the chapter of praise. I do not know anything more beautiful than he who has thus come out of such a deliverance writing in his deeds of love and charity his record of gratitude.

III. But then comes the other side of all this, the story of forgetfulness and indifference. They believed His words, then sang His praise, but they soon forgot Him. Literally, they made haste to forget Him. The vividness of their faith was obliterated by the suddenness of their indifference.

IV. Forgetfulness passed by a natural stage into apostasy. When the psalm of gratitude ceased, the discord of sin began. The soul must feed on something. It craved other food. Its passions demanded other sustenance. So inevitably sin creates an unnatural and unsatisfied appetite. It begins by making us forget God and it ends by making us crave for that which makes the very thought of God distasteful. So the tragic schism between the soul and its Maker is rendered complete.—D. S. MACKAY, The Religion of the Threshold, p. 310.

REFERENCE.—CVI. 15.—R. M. BENSON, Redemption, p. 30.

MAN'S REJECTION OF GOD

'They thought scorn of that pleasant land, and gave no credence unto His word.'—PSALM CVI. 24.

WHATEVER diversity of opinion upon the sacred significance of life may be represented in this congregation, there is at least one thing upon which all serious-minded souls will agree, and that is, that there is nothing more important in the moral order than man's acceptance or rejection of God.

I. Causes of Man's Rejection of God.—In the Bible there are many causes for man's rejection of God.

(a) Dissatisfaction with the Invisible.—The first of these seems to be the incapacity of man to rest satisfied with the invisible. He doubts the invisible. It does not seem to satisfy him, and he ever and anon looks about him in the world for some object upon which he can fasten the marvellously mixed emotions of his nature and at the same time satisfy the inquisitiveness of his reason. Hence it was that in early days when Moses, the man of God, was in the mount with the Father of us all, receiving from Him a revelation, the privileged people were dissatisfied with his absence and with that which the absence represented; they longed for the visible. They thought that the visible was the real.

(b) Evil Associations.—But this is not at all the only reason. We come down the stream of Hebrew history. We pass through the judicial period, through the monarchical period, and we come to the golden age of the Old Hebrew monarchy, to Solomon in his splendour, in all his Oriental magnificence. He has been warned of God against the peril of evil associates. He became associated with heathen women, and his heart strayed from God Who made him what he was. And thus we are enabled to see that evil associates, forbidden by God and known to men, will come between God and man and will produce the same result in the moral order that is produced by man's impatience with a religion that has in its centre the invisible.

(c) Thinking Scorn of Religion.—But in our text you have not to do with either of these. Here the cause that leads to separation between man and God is in the field of fancy. It is in the realm of the imagination. 'They thought scorn of that pleasant land.' The children of Israel wondered why they had been brought up from Egypt. Their insurrection took the practical form of trying to stone Moses. And the cause of this was that not one of them knew anything about the land. They refused the evidence, and they were in a state of open hostility to God their Father. They thought scorn of the land, and the consequence of this 'thinking scorn' is that they 'gave no credence' to the word of Moses. The word of Moses was the Word of God, and therefore the rejection of the message of Moses was the rejection of the Word of God. They thought scorn; and then they appear to have lost the capacity even to believe rightly about Divine things.

II. An Everyday Experience.—That spirit is not quite extinct. There is a large number of persons who first think scorn of religion and then become not only disobedient to God's Word, but apparently they lose the power to grasp the weight of its increasing evidence. To bring this subject up to everyday life, we do not say that God gives us a land flowing with milk and honey, we do not adorn this land with all the fertility with which God was pleased to stimulate the spiritual life of the Israelitish nation. But we have our Canaan. What Canaan was to the Israelites Christ is to us, Christ in all the majesty of His Person, Christ in all the potentiality of His office, Christ in all the catholicity of His love, Christ in all His unchanging, undying sympathy with suffering humanity.

III. Factors in Coming to Christ.—But in our invitations to men to come to our Canaan, that is, to Christ, there are three factors that must not be omitted:—

(a) A Sense of Sin.—The first of these is sin. Let men be as optimistic as they may about the advancement of education, about the spread of order, sin cannot be excluded from the body politic nor from the individual nor from the race. It is as certain as that there is blood in the body, that penetrating and inter-penetrating the moral nature of man there is the awful reality that God calls sin. For that God has been pleased to provide a great remedy. It is pardon, and this pardon is given through Christ. Society cannot pardon sin. Society can punish. It is only Christ Who has the power to say 'Go, and sin no more'.

(b) Repentance.—The second factor in our message is repentance. Man needs this if he desires to have perpetual affinity and association with God. A bad, unpardoned soul in heaven would make it hell. There must be affinity between those who dwell together, and the only way in which this affinity can be ours is announced to us by Him Who has made it absolutely certain, that is, Christ. He gives us His righteousness, and when we are in Christ God beholds us as in Him. We are one with His righteousness.

(c) Power.—And there is the third great factor that we may not be without. I need not only that my sins be forgiven, I want power to resist sin. I want freedom, and freedom consists in the power to master sin that will otherwise master me. Why do men commit sin at all? Because sin is stronger than man. Christ makes man stronger than his sin. Young men, carry away that sentence with you, love it, translate it into the moral rhetoric of your everyday life, and when you are tempted again, remember that Christ makes you stronger than your sin.

IV. What is our Response?—What is our response to the appeal? Is there nobody here who thinks 'scorn of the pleasant land,' and then gives 'no credence' to the Word of God Almighty? Is there no one who thinks scorn? Why, there are crowds of men who gather their ideas of religion not from their Bible, not from the character of people who love the Bible and God, but from some caustic publication or novel that seems to make light of truths that God holds dear, and of religion by which we are to live and without which we dare not die. You think scorn of the pleasant land and of those who think anything of it. No, you will say, that is hard, that is uncharitable—we do not think scorn, but we will act scorn. God expects every soul baptized into the Church and who rejoices in the association with Christ, to work and to labour. He has purchased to Himself 'a peculiar people, zealous of good works'. How many here are addicted to any form of moral work? Spiritual levity precedes spiritual unbelief, and spiritual unbelief means spiritual sterility. The man that is frivolous about religion will soon disbelieve it, and the man who disbelieves will not only not aid God's work but will hinder it. All this is very serious and sorrowful. Now what are we to do? The first thing, I say, and especially to the young, is this: In all my reading I have never yet read of one experience, and that is that any soul who gave himself to Christ ever regretted having done so. You will never find a nobler religion than the one presented to you. Whoever discovered a better? Frivolity is such a peril to the English nation at the present time. Who would have his spirit tossed upon the torrent of the stream and in the end find himself without possibility of returning, without capacity to believe? 'There are dangers in the world of the imagination, dangers in the world of fancy, dangers which God has immortalized for our learning in these well-known words—'They thought scorn of that pleasant land, and gave no credence unto His word'.

THE PLEASANT LAND

'Yea, they despised the pleasant land, they believed not His word: but murmured in their tents, and hearkened not unto the voice of the Lord.'—PSALM CVI. 24, 25.

THIS Psalm was written when Israel had a long history stretching far back into the past. The particular episode brought before us in these verses is the refusal of the children of Israel to advance and take possession of the Promised Land. There is one parallel which is frequently drawn between ourselves and the ancient Israelites. Canaan was to the Israelites what heaven is to us.

I. There is a Pleasant Land nearer to us than that which is divided from us by death. A Pleasant Land which we might possess now if we had the courage and made the necessary effort. Much that is meant to be ours now we push from us, and locate somewhere in the after-life. The Christians of the Dispersion really knew something of the 'joy unspeakable and full of glory'. We find Wesley testifying to what he had seen—men, women, and children saved from sin, and filled with warm, holy feelings. Christian experience has been shared by many who had no genius of any kind.

II. Let us be real then, and ask ourselves what efforts were necessary to enter this Pleasant Land.

(a) Inwardly we should have to overcome our sins, our sinful ways of thinking or speaking, our sloth, despondency from past failures, the deadening weight of routine, acquiescence in what we are.

(b) Outwardly, too, we have our difficulties. Some may fear social coolness, ridicule heard or suspected. We have often heard exhortations to greater earnestness, and have approved. Has not our habitual sloth interposed between the approving judgment and the will to do? As Israel murmured 'in the tents' so we excuse our sloth by what we are and have been.

III. But besides our contempt of the Pleasant Land of Christian experience another reason for our failure is unbelief. Such unbelief is fashionable. When Christianity was young Christian joy and exultation were then real things. But in these later ages our religion is a sober thing, and it is well if we attain peace. All the spiritual experiences of the New Testament, then, are real, and are possible now. What is begun here is perfected there.—P. J. MACLAGAN, The Gospel View of Things, p. 23.

THEIR INVENTIONS

PSALM CVI. 29.

How often does the word 'inventions' occur in the holy record? It seems quite a modern word, but in reality what is there that is modern? The whole text reads: 'Thus'—as a thing done over and over again—'Thus they provoked Him to anger with their inventions,' their tricks, their small novelties, their empty and futile devices. We do not make any graven images now; still we may be credited with inventions, as we shall presently see. What are these inventions, under what name soever they may flourish amongst us? They are attempts to do without God, to put substitutes instead of the living Father, to displace the spiritual and ineffable by something that we can see and handle.

I. What are these inventions? They are attempts to supplement God. The Israelites did not wish to dethrone Jehovah. It would have struck them as a very curious suggestion if you had charged them with a desire to get rid of God; they would have replied that they had no such desire or intention, but they would endeavour to supplement the majesty of the Eternal; something that was nearer to their own hands they would like to be able to approach. It is so difficult to take in eternity, it was never fitted to the human nostril; and so difficult to take in infinity, it was never shaped and adapted to the human eye. So they would have something supplemental, something subsidiary, something of the nature of a deputized Jehovah. They, poor innocent creatures, did not want to unseat the King, they wanted to have some kinglings to whom they could talk in a way more or less familiar. These were part of the 'inventions' of old Israel.

II. What has been the opinion of God about all these inventions? That opinion is given in the text—'They provoked Him to anger with their inventions: and the plague brake in upon them'. God has cleansing days, great ventilating shafts which He opens now and then in the cumbrous process of all this human evolution; so He calls in the plague, and says: 'They are past entreaty, pray for them no more, let the plague go'. And then we wonder where the plague came from, and what we have done to provoke this uproar and upset of the ordinary commonplaces of life. There is always a moral reason even behind an earthquake.

III. Now 'their inventions' sometimes take curious forms and expressions—as lots, coincidences, omens. Sometimes we have given way to these tricky and apparently innocent temptations. An omen! I heard a voice, I heard no words, but I heard a voice, and it seemed to be a calling, an inviting, seductive voice; something I am sure is going to happen, because the omen was so distinct and so delightful and impressive. 'Man was made upright, but he sought out many inventions.' We are led away from simplicity; we are led away from restful truths. We tempt God.

IV. What is God's view of all such invention? We have that view in the text, and in Psalm xcix. 8 we have 'Thou tookest vengeance of their inventions'. He wrung their necks, and dashed them to the dust; He has swept out all these god-houses and invention-museums and ground them to powder, and He will do so again, and all your lots and omens and coincidences and shadows and table-rappings and table-turnings and all your miserable inventions, which are lies from the beginning to the end, because they spring out of a lie. The Apostle in Romans i. 30 says, 'They are inventors of evil things'. Good things do not need inventing; evil things suggest themselves for incarnation and expression, and the evil things sometimes have falsehood enough in them to say, If you embody us, if you incarnate us, you will do a world of good by showing what evil really is if properly interpreted. You know the old fable in the writings of Erasmus in which the tempted man asks for a dark place, for a more hidden place, and when he gets to the place which he cannot get beyond he says to the woman-devil, Can God see us here? That one question was like a lightning flash that cut the darkness in pieces and made midnight brilliant as noonday. We cannot bury ourselves out of God's sight; He is as familiar with the bottomless pit as with the immeasurable heights of heaven.

Then whence is the cleansing? There is only one answer to that inquiry. Only one power can cleanse the heart and bring us back to holiness, simplicity, and real sonship in the household of God. All this has to come out of us by blood, by the precious blood, by the redeeming, atoning, priestly blood of the Son of God.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 136.

REFERENCES.—CVI. 45.—L. E. Shelford, The Church of the People, p. 128. CVI. 48.—J. Percival, Some Helps for School Life, p. 177. CVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 339. CVII. 9.—W. G. Rutherford, The Key of Knowledge, p. 256. CVII. 14.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons, vol. iii. p. 149. CVII. 17-20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxi. No. 1824. CVII. 19.—E. A. Askew, Sermons Preached in Greystoke Church, p. 42. CVII. 21.—J. Baldwin Brown, Christian World Pulpit, vol. vi. pp. 312, 375. CVII. 23.—S. Gregory, How to Steer a Ship, p. 91.

FROM THE SEA TO THE CITY

'They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters; these see the works of the Lord and His wonders in the deep.'—PSALM CVII. 23, 24.

To return to London—in this forge of human work and passion—when one has been living with great nature, almost in solitude, is always a curious experience. The things which are considered of vast importance in London seem small; the battles waged here with amazing ardour, needless and apart from the greater issues of life. Man, we think, is walking in a vain show, and disquieting himself in vain. The great things of nature, the mighty powers we have felt at work, have dwarfed the business and battles in which men are so impetuously concerned. Yet while we live in the movement of mankind, with a silent love and with faith in its salvation, knowing that in its errors there is truth, and in its wrong victorious good—we ought, when we have been for a time near to the life of nature, to be able to bring back from it some thoughts which may support, dignify, and add beauty to our life with humanity.

I. I have been staying in Cornwall on the very verge of the Atlantic; all day long, around the Lizard Point, the multitudinous ships passed by. I thought of all this energy of man, of all this sorrow of the world, as I watched the ships sail by, and wondered at that unconquerable force and hopefulness of mankind which failure only urged into greater activities—and wondering, I said, 'Almighty God is at the root of man, else long ago he had despaired'.

II. Secondly, could we but realize the Infinite, set free our thought from the limiting notions of space and time, imagine even in a little way the infinite scale in which things are done, all that I have tried to say would become clearer to us. We live and die, we think, in a finite world. In reality we are sailing in the infinite, and our little life here is like the momentary opening and closing of an eyelid in comparison with the endless being which even now belongs to us, and in which we live. The conception of the Infinite has been made a thousand-fold easier to us by science. But its clearest revelation is in the soul itself. The soul knows, as it knows immediately what love is, that the Infinite is the fact which underlies the universe; knows that it is consciously at one with infinity and belongs to it for ever. To realize the infinite love, to feel our childhood to it, to live in it, to die for it, and to pass, after death, into closer union with it—that is to be a Christian and to have the Christian faith. And no words contain its fullness so completely as those which Jesus used, when he called the infinite Creator our Father, and us, who share in his infinity, His children.

III. This world in which we live, this limited world of time and space, this present in which we clash incessantly with transient and dying things, with interests of a day—this is only our momentary home. We are to do our duty in it, to share in its higher life, to love our comrades in its fleeting scene—but our true resting-place is not in the passing and the finite. We are sailing over the infinite which for the moment seems the finite, to a further infinite, on which, in a doubling and redoubling life, we shall sail for ever.—S. A. BROOKE, The Kingship of Love, p. 1.

REFERENCE.—CVII. 23, 24.—C. Kingsley, Discipline and Other Sermons, p. 23.

'JESUS, LOVER OF MY SOUL'

'So He bringeth them unto their desired haven.'—PSALM CVII. 30.

To the Oriental mind in olden times the sea appealed chiefly as an object of terror. Its masterfulness was the one thing about it which affected the imagination.

I. Notwithstanding all the study that has been given to it the sea remains the most masterful thing with which man has got to do. Only He who made the sea can get it to do His bidding. He sits above the storm and is King over it.

II. The sacred writers never conceive of the universe as a great machine with a great unknown behind it, to whom any individual man or thing is of no moment whatever. When they speak, as so often they do, of the operations of nature, it is by referring not to what are called the laws of nature, but to the authors of these laws.

III. However appalling and inscrutable the phenomena of nature may be, they are included in all the things mentioned by St. Paul as working together for good. The various parts of our lives, and the manifold events which go to make up history, cannot be rightly understood, if they can be understood at all, when they are taken by themselves; each has its place in the whole, and where that place is, He who has all eternity to work in will let us know some day.

IV. I wonder whether Charles Wesley was thinking of the scene associated with our text when he wrote 'Jesus, Lover of my Soul'. This hymn has been the salvation of many a voyager on life's troubled sea. For in truth human life may be likened to a voyage.—W. TAYLOR, Twelve Favourite Hymns, p. 97.

REFERENCES.—CVII. 30.—E. A. Askew, Sermons Preached in Greystoke Church, p. 51. Spurgeon, Down by the Sea, p. 170. J. M. Neale, Sermon Passages of the Psalms, p. 226. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, A Year's Plain Sermons, p. 254. CVII. 40, 41.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 238.

DARK DAYS AND THEIR COMPENSATIONS

'Who is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord.'—PSALM CVII. 43.

ASTRONOMY would be impossible if it were always daylight. Only in the dark do we grow aware of these companies of constellations to which the sunshine had blinded our eyes. The chief discoveries of the moral firmament only become possible to us under similar conditions. There are strange outlooks and splendours of the human spirit which never begin to reveal themselves until after the sun of prosperity and happiness has gone out of the sky.

I. This Psalm celebrates the blessed experience of those whom God takes down into the darkness that they may learn there the mysteries of His love. They are described as fainting travellers in the desert, as forlorn captives in the dungeon, as sick men about to die, as sailors ready to founder in a tempest. But in each case the result is the same. In their blackest extremity they find underneath them the Everlasting Arms, and they are brought back to praise the Everlasting Mercy. Do we not often meet with shallow Christians who are curiously uneducated in spiritual things, because their experience hitherto has included so little except sunshine?

II. How little of the Bible you can understand so long as you only read it in sunshiny weather. But in black midnight sorrows its pages begin to shine and burn like the stars. Scripture remains more or less a sealed volume to those who have never suffered. But our extremity becomes its opportunity, and we realize then that it carries the one prescription for the pain of the whole world.

III. The loving-kindness of the Lord is represented here as a great induction from the experience of His people. When we consider the manifold applications and consolations of the righteous, and learn how the saints are distressed and succoured and emptied and satisfied, there is borne in upon us a sweet and solemn sense of the everlasting faithfulness and patience of their Redeemer. The final value of a spiritual biography lies in the record of how God brought His servant through deep waters and dark nights, and how, having suffered the loss of all things, that man found his infinite compensation in the holy and acceptable and perfect will of God.—T. H. DARLOW, The Upward Calling, p. 27.

REFERENCES.—CVII. 43.—C. Bradley, The Christian Life, p. 98. E. Thring, Uppingham Sermons, vol. i. p. 392. CVII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 357.

THE LIFE OF PRAISE

'O God, my heart is ready, my heart is ready. I will sing and give praise with the best member that I have.'—PSALM CVIII. 1.

I. Unselfishness of Praise.—To praise is more unselfish than even to pray and thank. You will not expect me to underrate or minimize the need of prayer. But yet though to pray is according to the will of God, there is an element of selfishness in prayer. We are asking something for ourselves, or for others, for those we love; we are in the attitude of receivers when we pray rather than that of givers. You will not expect me to minimize the need and glory of thanksgiving, and yet even when we thank, even thanks contain an element of self; it is for something that you have received that you render thanks. I have no doubt that you—or many of you—do praise God, but do you realize at all the greatness, patience, and generosity of God? In order to praise aright we must take in more and more the greatness and the generosity and the patience of the God whom we praise.

II. The Greatness of God.—Think of His greatness, even from the point of view of nature. To engineer twenty million blazing suns through space from day to day with perfect order and perfect quiet, to have nature not only working like machinery, but sleeping like a picture the whole time, and while He does it, to paint, at the same time, the beauty of the smallest shell upon the seashore. Or think of God's wonderful generosity. Why are we alive at all? Why are we enjoying the glories of this summer morning? Just because of the generosity of God.

III. The Highest Act of Worship.—Praise is the highest act of worship because it demands the exercise of every faculty that we have. There in praise must be the reverent attitude of the body, the devotion and loyalty of the mind, the emotion of the heart, and the bowing down of the heroic, yet subject spirit. When we come to church and give our praise it is the will, the royal and yet subject will that brings us, the will that is royal because it is the image of God—a free, personal spirit as God is a free, personal spirit, and ye are subject to God. Then once again praise is the highest act of Christian worship because it joins more completely than anything else to the life and the worship of heaven. Many, or most of you, have lost some and, perhaps, many whom you have loved; and we all have naturally a poignant feeling when we have lost some one dear to us, especially some one whom we regarded as cut off in his prime. Now nothing can so bridge over that, nothing can make us so at one with the world to come that when we are summoned to die there is no shock to break as living a life of praise. Meditate upon God's greatness, His generosity; and then when your call comes, not only will you be able to say of your patient, tired body, 'I will lay me down in peace and take my rest,' but looking up, you will say with the Psalmist, 'O God, my heart is ready, my heart is ready; I will sing and give praise with the best member that I have'.—BISHOP A. WINNINGTON-INGRAM, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXVII. p. 107.

REFERENCES.—CVIII. 12.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 242. CVIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 364. CIX. 4.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 15. CIX. 5.—C. G. Finney, Penny Pulpit, No. 1703, p. 663.

AN IMPRECATORY PSALM

'Let another take his office.'—PSALM CIX. 7.

It is not too much to say that, save in the Athanasian Creed itself, nowhere have Christian people found more widespread spiritual difficulty than in what are commonly known as the Imprecatory Psalms, and even among these none is equal to the Psalm whence the text is taken. How are we to understand them; how, especially when we are told to forgive us we would be forgiven, can we, in Christian churches, take them on our lips? The explanations are various. Bishop Hall, in his desire for an explanation, would alter the optative to the future. In the case before us this is undoubtedly the natural conclusion. Whether in accord with a wish or not, the fact was plain: when an office was once forfeited or lost another must take it. Whose office? We are reminded of the election of St. Matthias, by lot after prayer, to the post vacated by the traitor Judas. St. Peter quotes the Greek Septuagint version of the Old Testament, and says with peculiar appropriateness, 'his bishoprick let another take'. And what an occasion it was! Peter applied the ancient words of prophecy in this Psalm to Judas Iscariot.

I. Peter and Judas.—Peter speaking of Judas! Was there no inappropriateness in this, think you? For it is an indisputable fact that in one sense Peter and Judas were both in the same category. Both, alas! had greatly sinned; and yet there was a difference and distinction even here. Peter denied Christ, while Judas betrayed Him; but there was this difference: Peter's denial had been an act of sudden impulse, while Judas's betrayal was but the final outcome of a long-cherished secret, deliberate, wicked design. Peter had fallen owing to the fear of man, forgetful of God, Who is alone truly to be feared here and hereafter as well. But Judas was guilty of hypocrisy, lying, and covetousness in their most terrible form; and Christ, recognizing the sad and evil fact of the sinister presence of Judas Iscariot amid the little band said, 'One of you is a devil'. Peter and Judas! There was another difference between them. Not only in their sin but in its results. Judas Iscariot was smitten with remorse, but Peter had a godly sorrow that worked unto repentance.

II. The Temporary Character of Office.—And are there no ways in which that prophecy may appeal to us? Let us see. In one sense it must—temporari-ness. We are here but a short time; only One, Jesus Christ, as the Epistle to the Hebrews teaches us, abides a priest eternally, having His office unchangeable. That tender Old Testament picture of Aaron, Eleazar, and Moses going up together to Mount Hor and Aaron dying there, and Moses and Eleazar coming down from the mount alone, is a true parable of the succession of office. God buries His workmen, but He carries on His work. Some day your medical practice, or your profession, or your business, or your shop, or your clerkship, or your Church office, or your own particular work will be held by some one else. Another name will be painted up outside. The wind will pass over you, and your place, like that of the flower of the field, shall know you no more. Strangers that know you not, and with different ways, will come. What they do concerns you not. Your duty is with yourself. Make the most of your present opportunity before old Time, with his hour-glass, lays us of the present generation low, like as he has done to the past, and like as he shall do to us as well. The time comes when the door of earthly opportunity shall be shut, and to each of us in turn the inevitable sentence must go forth, 'Let another take his office'.

III. Unfitness for Office.—But if this is the common law over which human control is not, there are other senses in which the answer must rest with ourselves. There are offices held by people manifestly unfit—the square man, as the old saying goes, in the round hole. Our English Charles I., the French Louis XVI., a succession of Russian Czars; who can assert that nothing but harm was done by deposition, in filling their position by others? How much good would be done if people who are in unsuitable positions everywhere could have the gentle word of release spoken, passing them to suitable spheres and letting others take their office! But more often unfitness lies in deliberate fault rather than in actual misfortune. We are not fit for noble tasks because we make no effort. It is God's inexorable law that office is taken from those who misuse it.

IV. Hold fast that which Thou Hast.—Yes, there is one tiny place in God's Church and universe which no one can fill so well as ourselves. Christ's office none can take, yet that office is there for a purpose—to save us, to enable us each one to be faithful.

REFERENCES.—CIX. 8.—Bishop Woodford, Occasional Sermons, vol. i. p. 67. J. Keble, Sermons for the Saints' Days, pp. 154, 165. CIX. 40.—R. M. Benson, Redemption, p. 221. CIX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 364. CX. 1.—J. Budgen, Parochial Sermons, vol. i. p. 58.

CREATION'S WITNESS TO THE YOUTH OF JESUS

'Thou hast the dew of thy youth.'—PSALM CX. 3.

ON the one hand, we have the eternal youth of Christ, and for us who are Christians, Christ is the Creator. On the other hand, we have this great creation, the handiwork of this eternal youth. Let us try and discover the witness of creation to the perpetual youth of Jesus Christ.

I. First, then, youth is the season of abounding energy. There is an eager strenuousness in opening life that is tamed or tempered by the advance of years: I look abroad upon creation, I watch the motion of the tides; I hear the roaring of the breakers; I mark the sweep of the rivers; I am told of the resistless progress of the glacier. And I cannot think of these resistless powers but I feel the stamp of energy on nature. Now as I see these energies of nature, I feel that the heart that fashioned it was young. Christ may have lived from everlasting ages before the moment of creation came; but the eternal morning was still upon His brow when He conceived and bodied out the world.

II. Once more, youth is the season of romance. It is in youth if ever that every dream is sweet and every sound is melody. In other words, life's time of light and time of colour comes not in age but in youth. Well, now, I lift my eyes into the face of nature, and the splendour of light and the wealth of colour amaze me. I cannot watch the play of light and shade upon the sea, nor the magnificent splendours of the setting sun, but I feel that this is the romance of youth. That light and colour is not the work of age, it is the outpouring of a youthful heart. It speaks to me of the perpetual youth of Jesus.

III. But again, youth is the season of vast designs. To youth there is nothing impossible. Now we live in a world of vast design. Its distances are vast. Its times are vast. This vastness, then, of space and time, that are inwrought into the design of the creation are eloquent of youth. And as I dwell on that, I turn to Christ and say, 'Thou hast the dew of Thy youth'.

IV. Lastly, youth is the time of hope. There is a royal hopefulness in youth that is magnificent. And I must be blind, indeed, if in the world around me I have found no traces of that youthful spirit. In every spring there is the hope of summer. In every summer there is hope of harvest. So as we go out into the summer world, we shall take with us that thought of its creator. And we will remember that the Creator is our portion, and that He gives eternal life and eternal youth to us.—G. H. MORRISON, Flood-Tide, p. 282.

THE DEW OF THE MORNING

'Thou hast thy young warriors as the dew of the morning.'—PSALM CX. 3.

It is fitting that a little child should be a Christian, because our Master, like every good man, loved children, and the child heart in its simplicity and purity is the symbol of the kingdom of Heaven. It is fitting that an old man be a Christian, because Christ only of all teachers has lifted the veil from the other world and assured the human soul that the grave is the gate of life. It is fitting that a woman be a Christian, because Christ cast His shield over womanhood, and fulfilled the finest aspirations of a woman's heart. It is fitting that a man bearing the burden of life in his middle years should be a Christian, because the peace of Christ can alone garrison the heart and mind against corrupting worldliness. But there are reasons why of all people it is most fitting that a man in the flush of his youth should accept Christ, and why the religion of Jesus makes its most persuasive appeal to men in their early life, and why the words of this ancient prophecy should ever come true: 'Thou hast thy young warriors as the dew of the morning'.

And the reason I wish to urge this is because our Master was a young man.

REFERENCES.—CX. 3.—J. Vaughan, Children's Sermons, 1876, p. 132. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ii. No. 74. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 397.

A PRIEST AFTER THE ORDER OF MELCHIZEDEK

'A priest after the order of Melchizedek.'—PSALM CX. 4.

LET us consider what a priest means, and what place, if any, he holds in the Church of Christ. The profession of priest is, I suppose, the oldest in the world. The opponents of religion in the eighteenth century pretended that the priests invented religion. Of course that is not true. Religion invented the priests. But since religion is practically universal we find priests everywhere and in all times.

I. What is the essential idea of a priest? What does the word imply, over and above what is implied by such words as minister or pastor? It implies this, the priest is an ambassador between God and man. The traditions in his case are, or should be, part of the stored wisdom of humanity in Divine things, the experience of God's saints in their dealings with God. The true and false priests are thus as far apart as heaven and hell. The false priest desires that men should remain bound till he comes to set them free. He will plunder his people like the sons of Eli; he will sacrifice the innocent blood like Caiaphas; to maintain the supposed interests of the Church he will buy the gift of God to sell it at a profit like Simon Magus. But the true priest is a born teacher and healer. He teaches and he heals because he cannot help it, necessity is laid upon him—yea, woe is me (he says) if I preach not the Gospel.

II. In the Church of Christ the grace of the priestly office is not reserved for a particular caste or profession. This power of helping others in their spiritual life, of lifting them up when they have fallen, of encouraging them when they are faint, and showing them the right path when they are in doubt is the most blessed gift which God gives to any man. It is given irrespectively of profession or sex, and it is given to be used.—W. R. INGE, All Saints' Sermons, p. 161.

REFERENCES.—CX. 4.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 398. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (2nd Series), p. 29. CX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 373. CXI. 2.—Bishop Wilberforce, Sermons, p. 182.

THE BEGINNING OF WISDOM

'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.'—PSALM CXI. 10.

ARE we as a people entering upon a period of physical and moral deterioration? It is a question which is vexing the minds of many. May it not be said that few lovers of their country can be wholly at their ease as they watch the streams of thought and habit and speech which seem to be carrying along with them the great masses of our people of every rank and class?

I. The Source of Strength.—Have we as a people the moral stuff and strength with which we can venture to be what is called an imperial race. It is easy, of course, to talk in generalities. Do we not all agree in our heart of hearts that we stand as a people in grave need of a moral renovation, a strengthening of our moral fibre, and a raising of our moral idea? Now if this be so, what is to be the attitude of those who wish to be on the side of religion? We are not to bemoan these tendencies but to redeem them. It is the special duty of a religious man at the present moment to look round about and ask, What is it that I feel to be wrong in the tendencies of this people of which I am a part? and then to set himself, with serious prayer and self-discipline, to exhibit in his own life and extend by his own influences just those very primary moral qualities of which he feels that his kind is lacking.

II. The Lack of Reverence.—If you were asked which of all these qualities is the one of which we stand most patiently in need, what would your answer be? I think there are many of you who would say, We stand most in need of the sense of reverence, the recognition of an excellence beyond and above ourselves which claims our homage and devotion. Now it is plain is it not? it is needless to labour the point, that there can be no great future for any nation which is lacking in the sense of reverence. In the case of the people, as in the case of men, we can only rise if we can dare to stoop; we can only rise in character if at some point we bow in reverence. It is forgetfulness of God that is accountable for the spread of impudence and irreverence. It is the fear of God that alone can restore it.

III. The Fear of God.—So it is that the Bible lays down from beginning to end that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. It is not a slavish terror. It is merely a reverent and reasonable recollection of the claim and being of God.

IV. God as a Sovereign.—In our hold of the Fatherhood of God let us not forget His sovereignty. Let us keep before us always this sense of the majesty and the mastery of God. And from this sense of reverence for God we shall draw a sense of reverence for the world in which he has placed us. We shall feel that it is after all the vestibule of a great Presence.—ARCHBISHOP LANG, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXVII. p. 213.

REFERENCES.—CXI. 10.—J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 177. CXI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 382.

HEAVENLY LIGHT IN EARTHLY DARKNESS

'Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness.'—
PSALM CXII. 4.

EVERYWHERE the blessing is given on conditions. Men fail to receive because they refuse to meet the conditions laid down. Even grace can enter only the open heart and a free salvation can be gripped only by faith.

I. The man who in the text is promised light is the upright. He dares stand on his feet, does not cringe to the great, nor apologize to the foolish. With a clear conscience he can look the whole world in the face. He is upright. He does the right thing at any cost. We must admit that the hard and sometimes harsh theology of our fathers made strong men. I am afraid the softer theology of to-day has a tendency to make a race of weaklings. There seems to be nothing worth contending for. Even among Christians we have too much moral flabbiness and too little grit. True manliness is not all strength, but strength blended with grace. The good man is not only brave, but is also a gentleman.

II. Man's pain is never in vain. His sufferings are never for nothing. Man, to be man, must struggle, fight, and conquer. He must struggle on to even keep what he has, and if he wants more he can have it only in the sweat of his face. His very dinner is a victory over many opposing forces. His clothing is won in battle. The house in which he dwells is a conquest. All progress is through war and sacrifice. Those who oppose us teach us. A world without pain, without a trial, without a sorrow, would be a world without a hero, without a saint, without a martyr.

III. Nothing succeeds like failure. On noblest natures failure acts like a spur to greater efforts. Men are stung to victories. Out of failures they are made conquerors. For the upright there is light in the darkness itself. We sometimes think progress is slow and evil is strong, but amidst all the strifes and fightings we hear the voice of the all-conquering Christ saying: 'Lo, I come'. He is winning His kingdom, the kingdom of love and truth. He will not fail us nor fail any who trust Him. In this confidence let us face the future. The Lord's servants are not fighting a losing battle, for the battle is the Lord's, and our defeat would be His too. Our victory will be His also.—W. J. EVANS, Homiletic Review, vol. LVI. p. 386.

PSALM CXII. 4.

SPEAKING of the Irish problem in 1868, John Bright observed: 'It is a dark and heavy cloud, and its darkness extends over the feelings of men in all parts of the British Empire. But there is a consolation which we may all take to ourselves. An inspired king and bard and prophet has left us words which are not only the expression of a fact, but which we may take as the utterance of a prophecy. He says, "To the upright there ariseth light in the darkness". Let us try in this matter to be upright. Let us try to be just. That cloud will be dispelled.'

REFERENCES.—CXII. 4.—E. Bersler, Sermons (2nd Series), pp. 273, 286. CXII. 6.—W. F. Shaw, Sermon Sketches, p. 110. CXII. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 647. CXII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 384. CXIII.—Ibid. p. 387.

THE RESPONSE OF THE ENVIRONMENT

'When Israel went out of Egypt, the mountains skipped like rams.'—PSALM CXIV. 1, 4.

I. It is said that man is affected by his environment. It is true; but it is equally true that man's environment is affected by him. We are influenced by the sights and sounds around us; but it is no less certain that the sights and sounds around us are influenced by us. In this passage we have an incident of the latter kind. When Israel went out of Egypt there was a change in her environment. 'The mountains skipped.' She transferred to the things around her the impression of her own joy. She was inwardly leaping and dancing, and, as in a mirror, she saw the mountains leaping and dancing too. Why the mountains? Why not the brooks, the streams, the rivers? Is not the idea of motion more suitable to these? Certainly; therefore the Psalmist, because he was a poet, did not select them. He selected the most unlikely things—the mountains. The mountains naturally suggest anything but dancing. They suggest immobility, steadfastness, iron determination to be affected by nothing. And that is just where the dramatic power of this poet comes in. He sees the joy of the soul infecting the most stolid objects in the world—the sober, grave, serious mountains. If these could be made to dance to the rhythm of the heart, no part of nature could possibly remain unmoved.

II. I regard it as a fine stroke of literary genius that, in seeking a partner for the dance of the spirits, the Psalmist should have chosen, not the streams, but the mountains. He wants to show how utterly dependent is the aspect of Nature on the state of the heart, even where the aspect of Nature seems most fixed and stereotyped. He tells how in the joy of the spirit even the stable mountains cannot keep still to the eye of the beholder, but leap and bound and vibrate to the pulse of the gladdened soul.

III. Have you not felt this power of joy over prosaic things. Have you not felt how cold has lost its chillness, how rain has lost its dreariness, how wind has lost its bitterness, when the heart was young. Have you not felt how the long way became short, how the rough road became smooth, how the muddy path became clean, when the heart was young. The Psalmist was right when he said that when the soul is emancipated from its Egypt the very mountains leap.

IV. Lord, 'Thou hast said, 'I go to prepare a place for you'. Yes, and the preparation must be rather in me than in the place. Any place will be joyous if my heart be young. When my heart grows old I get weary of localities; I migrate from spot to spot, I flit from flower to flower, I sigh for the wings of a dove to break the monotony of my rest. But that is because my heart is not leaping. If my heart would leap everything would leap—the very mountains. It is not new objects I want; it is renewed joy in them. Revive the joy of my heart, O Lord! make my spirit young again! Then shall the waves resound once more; then shall the mountains leap as they did at morning's glow.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 61.

REFERENCES.—CXIV. 3.—T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 172. CXIV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 300. CXV. 2, 3.—J. J. Ingram, Preacher's Magazine, vol. xix. p. 304.

PSALM CXV.

Non Nobis Domine was the battle-song of the heroic John Sobieski, King of Poland, 12 September, 1683, when he marched down from the heights of Kalenberg, and defeated the immense army of the Turks which was besieging Vienna, and had reduced it to the last extremity. It was a turning-point in history, the final great Eastern invasion which has thundered at that gate of Europe; and ever since, the Turkish power and Mohammedan faith have been on the wane. 'There was indescribable enthusiasm as the Psalm was sung, 'Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is now their God? But our God is in the heavens: He hath done whatsoever He hath pleased'.—J. K.

TRUE KNOWLEDGE THROUGH SPIRITUAL INSIGHT

'Eyes have they, but they see not.'—PSALM CXV. 5.

THE heathen, with his idol gods about him, has challenged the champion of a spiritual religion to show him his God. The answer was simple and complete, though not, we may be sure, convincing to the opponent. It was this: 'As for our God, He is in heaven'. 'To have eyes, and yet not see, in body and in spirit, that and some of the several stages of it are the points which I ask you to consider.

I. Let me take first the eyes of the body, and illustrate my meaning, as to their seeing or not seeing, by one or two examples.

(a) You have seen a ray of light caught by a prism by some skilful operator, and thrown on to a surface carefully prepared to receive it. But striking and suggestive and beautiful as what you see is, you do not see all that is there. The human eye is not so arranged as to see it all. That is a case in which the eye of the body is unable to see that which science shows to be there.

(b) You stand before some monument of ages long gone by. Its surface bears the marks of time, and to the untrained eye shows nothing but irregular depressions. But the trained eye sees in one or another of the depressions the last lingering trace of what a thousand years ago was part of a letter, and sends to the brain the information which determines of what race they were who raised the monument.

(c) The rich and varied gifts, the pure exalted pleasures which the eyes of the body are intended to minister to man, are marred by want of sympathetic observation even more than by want of knowledge. The unlearned, unlettered man will often read through the bodily eye in nature, and in his whole environment, lessons fair and touching, lessons far beyond the reach of that saddest product of this or any age—the man with well-trained head, and richly garnered mind and memory, and empty heart.

II. But none of us would long be satisfied with the life of the body alone, lived ever so well and worthily. We must, if we would avoid a growing discontent, live the inner, the spiritual life too. The eye of the spirit must be an eye that sees. How shall we help it to see? That which the spirit of man most needs, for its full play and development, is just that which in this hurrying age is ever more and more difficult to obtain—rest and quiet, time and place for contemplation.

III. If the eye of the spirit is by care and contemplation trained to see spiritual verity, to range as freely and keenly over the realms of the unseen as the eye of the body over the works of nature and of art, what shall it, in its furthest flight, its keenest insight, what shall it see? the eye of the spirit cannot but travel far, whatever and however the man believes. For the man who believes, ask him what in the end his inner eye can see. He tells you—they are his own words—'I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God'.—BISHOP G. F. BROWNE, Cambridge Sermons, p. 52.

'They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them.'—PSALM CXV. 8.

ST. JOHN OF THE CROSS explains this text as follows: 'He who loves the creature, remains as low as that creature, and in a certain sense even lower, because love makes the lover not only equal, but subject to the object of his affection'.

REFERENCES.—CXV. — International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 392. CXVI. 7.—W. P. J. Bingham, Sermons on Easter Subjects, p. 119. CXVI. 9.—J. Baines, Twenty Sermons, p. 163.

'I believed, therefore have I spoken.'—PSALM CXVI. 10.

ERNEST NAVILLE, the eminent philosopher of Geneva, wrote to the Countess de Gasparin in 1892: 'I often ask myself what view, as death approaches, can be taken of their own past by men of letters who have used their pens in the service of evil passions, or have employed their talent in spreading a doubt which consumes them and the melancholy effects of which they cannot fail to recognize. People of that sort arouse within me feelings which fluctuate between scorn and pity. Happy are those who can say, borrowing the words of Holy Scripture, "I believed, therefore have I spoken"—La Comtesse Agénor de Gasparin et sa Famille, pp. 426, 427.

REFERENCES.—CXVI. 13.—H. M. Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 89. CXVI. 15.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Saints' Days, p. 30. CXVI. 16.—Spurgeon, Sermons to Young Men, p. 325. CXVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 397.

PSALM CXVII.

THE Psalm sung by Cromwell and his army after the victory of Dunbar, 3 September, 1650, and known afterwards by the Puritans as the Dunbar Psalm. As the Scottish army left their strong position on the heights to offer their raw soldiers to Cromwell's veterans, he pointed to the sun, whose disc was rising over the German Ocean, with the words, 'Let God arise, let His enemies be scattered'.

It was the custom of Philip Henry to sing the 117th Psalm every Sabbath after the first sermon as the fullest expression of thanksgiving. He used to say that the more singing of Psalms there is in our families and congregations on Sabbath, the more like they are to heaven; and that he preferred singing whole Psalms to pieces of them.

REFERENCES.—CXVIII. 10.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 254. CXVIII. 15.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, A Year's Plain Sermons, p. 137.

A CRY OF FAITH AND JOY

'I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord.'
—PSALM CXVIII. 17.

WE shall never, I suppose, know from whose lips and heart this cry of faith and joy first sprang. One thing is clear—there has been a great danger threatening the very life of a man or a nation. There has been more than danger—there has been the very presence of death; but the hour of suspense has now passed, and the man or the nation survives. Doubt has gone, certainty takes its place, and that certainty gives the thought of service, of newness of life, of joyful self-consecration. I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord.

Let us, then, take these ancient words of our Psalmist, and see whether they may not lead us up to some holy mountain spot of which we may say with reverent truth, 'It is good for us to be here'. For observe there is not only past history which we can but faintly decipher, there is also present biography. The pulses of life are in them. You can almost hear the beating of their hearts. Again and again they rise up and give their message to men.

I. It is not men and women alone that are threatened with death. It is the same with causes, and books, and faiths, and churches. These, too, have their hours of seeming sickness and joyous revival. It is the better men and women in each generation who give the life-blood of their hearts to some great causes which are restored to mankind, freedom, or justice, or peace, or temperance, or purity, and for a time they seem to make way. They are almost more than conquerors; their zeal, their enthusiasm, perhaps their eloquence, win for a time. The reformers are not only revered but popular; all men go after them. And then comes the change. Applause is coldly silent; its place is taken first by apathy and then by abuse. How many of the choicest spirits of the past and present have known these times of decline and depression and almost seeming death! How many whose names are now household words for noble service to God and man, how many, I say, of these have felt in dark hours that their labour was in vain! And yet in such cases the day of seeming death has been the day of real recovery, and the fainting, feeble cause might have said, through the lips of its faithful champions, 'I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord'.

II. Believing most profoundly, as I do, that the moral life of our nation will advance in the future much in the same way that it has advanced in the past, and observing how much it has owed in each generation to a few earnest Christian men and women, who rested neither day nor night till they could redress some great wrong or impart to men some great gift of God, I offer this voice of the Psalmist to any here who are struggling might and main for some righteous cause, and seem to themselves, it may be, to be watching by its bed of sickness. Public opinion, they say, is less in earnest than it once was. The tide is ebbing, not flowing. Men care less for righteousness, and justice, and virtue. In the smoke and dust of the battle we lose sight both of flag and leader. We see not our signs. There is no more any prophet, neither is there among us any that knoweth how long. If there are any tempted to say this in their haste and in the bitterness or sadness of their heart, I bid them be of good cheer and take this verse of ours to their comfort, and make it the very anchor of their soul.

III. If I mistake not, there are just now many good men and good women who have anxious fears for a life yet more precious and august than any of which we have just been thinking. I mean the life of the Bible. They say to themselves that if its power over men's hearts and lives is on the wane, and is still to be on the wane, the loss is simply fatal. Nothing, absolutely nothing, can be set against it. In this belief I for one cannot doubt that they are right. Whatever is best in our country, whatever is purest, truest, most honourable, most serious, most tender, most devout has been largely drawn, I will not say from the careful study, but from the simple and reverent love of the Bible. England and Scotland, without reverence for the Bible, would be false to their history and themselves. And I think we must go further and say many of those who foresee the grave character of the danger if it should ever arrive are also fain to believe that it is now upon us, even at the door. The supposed evil is a fact; the play has begun. The Bible, they complain, is no longer what it was in British homes and schools. It is circulated and translated, and carried by brave and loving hands to the ends of the earth, but it is less loved at home; it is less appealed to as the supreme court of conscience; it is less authoritative in moulding people's ways of thinking, and feeling, and acting. It is not easy to speak clearly and wisely on this great and many-sided subject. It is still less easy to speak words of soberness neither too rash nor too vague, but I think we may venture to say two things. First, the free criticism of both the Old and the New Testaments will in the next half-century wear a different face to devout minds from that which it wears to-day. They will start with less suspicion, they will end with less disquietude; they will count their gains as well as their losses. They will see that this dreaded criticism, while it has taken away something, has left behind infinitely more. Then, secondly, I believe that the value, the unspeakable and wholly unrivalled value, of the Bible can never fade from the minds and consciences of men. For all time they will go to the Bible; they will persist in going to it for their ideas of God Himself, of His mind towards us, and His dealings with us, with our failures and infirmities, our sorrows and our sins.

I take for granted that all the more thoughtful among us try at times to think what will be the England of the future. We ask ourselves, Is He indeed come, or do we look for another? Will the Name of the Lord Jesus Christ, lifted up on the Cross, still our best and dearest, our tenderest and saintliest—will that Name still be, by common consent, more and more above every name? Will it, far more than now, far more than ever, yet purify our private and ennoble our public life? Will it make us at least ashamed of our wretched feuds and factions, our belittling of each other's good, our trampling on each other's falls, as though we wished before we died to add one more text to the Bible? For such questions as these there is no accepted oracle, either when we put them to ourselves or when others put them to us. The future will belie both our hopes and our fears. We, in our dim, blind way are the servants, often it might seem the slaves, of the present; but, thank God, one form of freedom is even now ours. Our old men may dream dreams, and our young men may see visions, and among these dreams and these visions a place may be found for the majestic image of the Holy Bible, the Book which Jesus the Messiah loved, and interpreted, and quoted—quoted even on the Cross, and claimed it as His own witness—the image, I say, of this Master's Bible, supposed by men of little faith to be lying on a bed of sickness, outlived, outvoiced, outargued, and yet rising, as it were, from its couch and pointing as of old to the Cross and to Him that hangs upon the Cross, with a new and a most sure word of prophecy—'I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord'.

'I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord.'
—PSALM CXVIII. 17.

THIS is a text which often meets us in German Reformation annals. It was one of Luther's favourite passages in the Psalm which he called 'the beautiful Confitemini,' and his own dear Psalm. It is also associated with Melancthon's dangerous illness at Weimar in 1540. Writing five years later to his friend Camerarius, Melancthon said: 'I should like you to sing that text: Non moriar sed vivam, et narrabo opera Domini. When I lay ill at Weimar, I saw that verse written on the wall, and rejoiced at the good omen.' A biographer of Melancthon has suggested that it was Luther who wrote the words on the wall, but in his last illness (April, 1560) Melancthon recalled this experience and said that he had seen the words in a dream at Weimar.

DR. DALE chose the text, 'I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord,' as the text for his first sermon at Carr's Lane meeting, Birmingham, after his serious illness in 1891. Writing to Mr. Richard Davies he said that text is 'an exclamation which I suppose was originally intended as a cry from the heart of the Jewish nation when it had returned from exile and caught sight of its true vocation, but which . . . expressed very naturally the emotion with which a Christian minister returned to his work after an experience like mine'.

REFERENCE.—CXVIII. 17.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 268. CXVIII. 22.—Ibid. p. 278.

THE REFUSED STONE

'The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner.'—PSALM CXVIII. 22.

'THE stone which the builders refused.' But surely the builders could not be wrong? They were experts. We pay for an expert in our age; for we have high prices to pay for the most elaborate ignorance. They knew exactly what stone to choose and what stone not to choose, and they reported upon the case, and upon their report the stone was cast away with a spitting of contempt upon it. Does God delight to baffle the malevolent ingenuity of man? Has He some special pride in taking the experts by the feet and dipping them into the river as if He would drown them in the waters of contempt? It is an awful thing to be an expert when you do not know anything about the business in which you profess to be a proficient; your aggravation is sevenfold.

I. Many persons have undertaken to refuse the Bible stone. God has made it the head stone of the corner. Every day brings a new witness to the truth of the Bible, and even to the science of the Bible, and one day even Moses will have what is due to him in the way of tribute and gratitude and coronation. Moses has stood many a test; our hearts have ached for the grand old man as he had to die without treading the land that was fruitful with the harvest of a promise. Our grief was premature. Do not interfere with God's way. He knows it is better to die here than to die there; let Him fix the place, and dig the grave, and write the epitaph; and as for us, let us stand back; we are of yesterday and know nothing.

II. Refusals do not end in themselves. Do not suppose that the matter is of no consequence; that we can refuse, and nothing more will be heard of it.

It is not so written in the Book. They refused to obey, and the consequence is that the Lord mocked them and shamed them. We have to face our refusals. We cannot throw our lives behind our backs, and say, Nothing more will be heard of this. Everything more will be heard of it; we shall give an account to God for every idle word we have spoken; we shall have to account for our decisions and elections and preferences.

III. There is a refusal which is right. Moses when he was come of age refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter. The offer was made to him, he might have had the honour, he might have occupied an exalted position; he was learned in all the lore of the Egyptians, he had been proved to be a man of capacity, of great physical beauty and majesty, of great moral force and dignity; and when the offer was made to him that he might be the son of the king's daughter, he said, No. Then what will you choose? I choose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God. These are the refusals that mark critical points in human history. These, too, are the refusals which bring character to completeness and to crowning majesty. Resist, refuse the devil, and he will flee from you.

IV. We cannot depose those whom God has called in His electing love to this position or to that. We can say to Him, Lord, make me much, little, nothing, but let me know that it is Thy doing, and I shall be calm with Thine own peace; I shall not know the burning of jealousy and of envy; I will know that He who set the stars in their places has appointed my habitation. That is the spirit in which to accept the providence of life, and work out the destiny fixed by the love of God. Understand that we cannot all be at the head of the corner. Honour enough for us if we be in the God-built edifice, whether in the base, in the midst, or at the top.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. II. p. 2.

THE BLUNDER OF THE BUILDER

'The stone which the builders refused has become the head stone of the corner. This is the Lord's doing; it is marvellous in our eyes.'—PSALM CXVIII. 22, 23.

TAKING this incident as a parable of life, the blunder of the builders corrected by the providence of God, let us notice, in the first place, how often in our human experience this parable finds illustration, and then we shall be better able to appreciate its application to the history of our Lord and Saviour.

I. Interpreting our text in its purely human aspect, have we not here in this incident of the rejected stone a picture of misunderstood lives, a parable of unappreciated life? Lives misunderstood, love unappreciated, devotion neglected, the tender ministry of a woman's love cast aside—there is the hidden spring of much of life's silent tragedy.

II. Our text is also a picture of unappreciated truth. How often the truth which to-day lies at the foundation of life was in a previous age sneered at and condemned. The great builders of the temple of truth have frequently been forced to confess their blunder in casting aside some new idea quarried out of eternity, but whose significance they failed to understand.

III. The blunder of the builders reminds us of the compensations which God reserves for His servants who are misunderstood or unappreciated. Our text lifts for a moment the curtain that sways between time and eternity, long enough to see how lives that are stunted here break into the fullness of unshackled power yonder. But this reversal of the builder's blunder is not necessarily deferred to eternity. We witness the vindication of rejected truth on this earth.

IV. We turn to the last application of our text, as a prophecy fulfilled in Jesus Christ. It is the glory of our age that never was the place of Christ in human history so clearly recognized as now. All that is deepest and most sacred in life to-day, the noblest charities, the most enduring influences, the hopes of progress, no less than the achievements of the past, rest upon the great truths which became incarnate in His character and found expression in His life.—D. S. MACKAY, The Religion of the Threshold, p. 249.

REFERENCE.—CXVIII. 22-24.—H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 1696, p. 607.

DIFFICULTY OF REALIZING SACRED PRIVILEGES

(Easter)

'This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it.'—PSALM CXVIII. 24.

THIS is Easter Day. Let us say this again and again to ourselves with fear and great joy. As children say to themselves, 'This is the spring,' or 'This is the sea,' trying to grasp the thought, and not let it go; as travellers in a foreign land say, 'This is that great city,' or 'This is that famous building,' knowing it has a long history through centuries, and vexed with themselves that they know so little about it; so let us say, This is the Day of Days, the Royal Day, the Lord's Day. This is the Day on which Christ arose from the dead; the Day which brought us salvation. It is a Day which has made us greater than we know. It is our Day of rest, the true Sabbath. Christ entered into His rest, and so do we. It brings us, in figure, through the grave and gate of death to our season of refreshment in Abraham's bosom. We have had enough of weariness, and dreariness and listlessness, and sorrow, and remorse. We have had enough of this troublesome world. We have had enough of its noise and din. Noise is its best music. But now there is stillness; and it is a stillness that speaks. We know how strange the feeling is of perfect silence after continued sound. Such is our blessedness now. Calm and serene days have begun; and Christ is heard in them, and His still small voice, because the world speaks not. Let we only put off the world, and we put on Christ. The receding from one is an approach to the other.—

J. H. NEWMAN.

EASTER DAY MORNING

'This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it.'—PSALM CXVIII. 24.

I. I would say to all who love the Lord Jesus Christ, to all who have mourned for their sins that brought Him to His death, that we have two reasons to rejoice to-day—that we rejoice both for His sake and for our own. We rejoice because He Whom we love, He Who loved us, and died for love of us, is not now dead, but alive for evermore. And again we rejoice because we are ourselves alive from the dead, able to live a holy life, a life in God's presence, like the life which He lives now. Yet these two reasons for joy are one, because the truth is, that He and we are one. Still we can distinguish in thought and word what cannot be separated; we may say that we rejoice for Jesus' sake that He is alive and for our own sake that we share His life. They who mourn for the dead without a Christian's hope do not cease to love those whom, as they think, they have lost for ever; they grieve that they cannot feel their love, that those who are gone are no longer able to love them. But Jesus is not only alive in the sense that our departed friends are, but in every sense; He not only is a living soul but is alive both in Soul and Body, alive and working with all the powers of true God and true man. We can, in the Spirit, have direct intercourse with Him and He with us; He knows all our love to Him, and He tells us all that we can comprehend of His love to us.

II. Again we rejoice for Jesus' sake that we ourselves are alive. If we were still dead in sin, we could do nothing for Him; even if we knew how He loves us, we could make no return to Him for His love, no reparation to Him for our sins against Him, our wrongs done to His loving heart. But now we can; if we are indeed united to Christ by faith; if we have died to sin on His Cross, and risen with Him to a new life now, we can do Him real service; now, by our works of charity to His Brethren we can do acts of kindness to Himself, can do what He will actually be grateful for, will reckon as returns made for His own unutterable acts of kindness to us. Remembering our state by nature, our own sinfulness when Jesus first loved us, we are enabled to measure the greatness of His love, who loved us when we were so unworthy; but now we are not ashamed to accept His love, because, unworthy as we were, we are so no longer—He has made us worthy. Loved by Him and sanctified by His Spirit of Love, we will not shrink away from His presence and say we are unworthy of it; but will come nearer to Him, and seek to be made one with Him, knowing that if we are united to His spotless holiness the sins of our own nature are of a surety all purged away.—
W. H. SIMCOX, The Cessation of Prophecy, p. 810.

THE LORD'S VICTORY

(Easter Day)

'This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it.'—PSALM CXVIII. 24.

I. It is clear why our Church selects the 118th Psalm for Easter Day. It is full of the great tidings of a risen conquering Lord—a Psalm of rejoicing, and a giving of thanks to Almighty God.

II. If there comes one day above all others in the year on which it becomes a Christian to be in gladness, to put away his sorrow, to be lifted up in heart, it is Easter Day.

III. Jesus is shown to us, no longer in humiliation, a very scorn of men, no longer subject to insult, no longer enduring great suffering, but shown to us as a Mighty Conqueror.

IV. The joy that a Christian feels to-day, it is a widespread joy; it is not only that the Holy and Innocent Jesus has shown Himself the Conqueror, but it is because the benefit of His victory reaches far and wide—reaches to all the race which He came to save.

V. The resurrection of the dead is assured to us by what happened to-day; that is our blessed hope, which the Lord Jesus Christ, by bursting the bonds of death, has given us for an anchor of the soul, safe, sure, and steadfast.—II. D. B. RAWNSLEY, Village Sermons (3rd Series), p. 92.

REFERENCES.—CXVIII. 24.—Canon Beeching, The Grace of Episcopacy, p. 19. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 255. CXVIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 402.

PSALM CXIX.

THIS Psalm was the special admiration of Pascal, who, as his sister Madame Perier says, often spoke with such feeling about it, 'that he seemed transported, qu'il paraissait hors de lui même'. He used to say that, 'with the deep study of life, it contained the sum of all the Christian virtues'. He singled out verse 59 as giving the turning-point of man's character and destiny: 'I thought on my ways, and turned my feet unto Thy testimonies'.

VERSE 9. 'Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? By taking heed thereto according to Thy word.' Henry Scougal, author of The Life of God in the Soul of Man, when a youth, opened his Bible and lighted by peradventure on this passage. It went to his heart, and he gave himself to God, and to the Christian ministry. He became Professor of Theology, King's College, Aberdeen, and dying in 1678 at the early age of twenty-eight, has left a fragrance in his name which associates it with that of Leighton.

VERSE 20. Chalmers says that though 'he could not speak of the raptures of Christian enjoyment, he thought he could enter into the feeling of the Psalmist, "My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto Thy judgments at all times"'.—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—CXIX. 1.—J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 226. J. Keble, Sermons for Christmas and Epiphany, p. 186. CXIX. 11.—A. Maclaren, After the Resurrection, p. 258. CXIX. 18.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons, vol. v. p. 77.

H. M. Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 169. J. Keble, Sermons for Advent to Christmas Eve, p. 312. CXIX. 25.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons, vol. iv. p. 259. CXIX. 32.—J. Keble, Village Sermons on the Baptismal Service, p. 126. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 95. E. J. Boyce, Parochial Sermons, p. 64.

'I will speak of Thy testimonies before kings, and will not be ashamed.'—PSALM CXIX. 40.

THIS was the text printed on the title page of the Augsburg Confession which was published in quarto form in April, 1531, with the Apology. The text is given in Latin: 'Et loquebar de testimoniis tuis in conspectu Regum et non confundebamur'. A copy with this motto, says Dr. J. W. Richard, is found in the royal library at Dresden. 'Beneath the title Melancthon wrote with his own hand, D Doctori Martino. Et rogo ut legat et emendet.'

REFERENCES.—CXIX. 54.—J. Monro-Gibson, A Strong City, p. 195. CXIX. 55, 56.—J. Keble, Sermons for Ascension Day to Trinity Sunday, p. 292. CXIX. 59, 60.—G. Jackson, The Scottish Review, vol. iii. p. 107. CXIX. 62.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 284. CXIX. 63.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Saints' Days, p. 394. CXIX. 75.—F. Bourdillon, Plain Sermons for Family Reading (2nd Series), p. 217. CXIX. 80.—J. Smith, The Integrity of Scripture, p. 151. CXIX. 89-91.—R. Allen, The Words of Christ, p. 258. CXIX. 90.—A. Tucker, Preachers' Magazine, vol. xix. p. 323.

COMFORT IN TROUBLE

'The same is my comfort in my trouble: for Thy word hath quickened me.'—PSALM CXIX. 50.

WHEN we study the Psalms with a religious purpose, we would know something of the writers, and it is unfortunate that we know very little about them.

But when we look into so long a Psalm as the 119th we seem to see somewhat of the circumstances of the writer's life. It is a late Psalm, a Psalm written by one who lived in times when the Jewish nation was being influenced by the heathen nations around, and it seemed almost as if the persecution had gone further in reference to him who wrote the Psalm, as if they had actually placed him in durance vile. Yet, clinging more strongly to the words of God revealed to him and to his nation by the prophets of old, they were the sole comfort to him in his distress. 'The same is my comfort in my trouble: for Thy word hath quickened me.'

I. Now we come to the application to ourselves. Does it ever happen that we are similarly situated? Has it never occurred to us that we have been under influences which we felt were influences which tended to weaken the hold of the Christian faith upon our souls and our hearts? Certainly, we are from time to time brought face to face with persecution. Have we had recourse to God's promises, written and preserved to us in God's Word, and can we say with this pious Jew, 'The same is my comfort in my trouble'? You and I will all, some time or other, have to face trouble and pain. Pain will certainly come to us before the pilgrimage is over, and what a glorious and splendid thing it will be if you and I, like this pious Jew, can say of our trouble that we have got its corresponding comfort. This, I know, is my trouble, and this is my comfort. We will face trouble, then, much more readily when we know we have got our comfort.

Now let us consider just for a moment that thought, 'My comfort in my trouble'. It is quite clear that the words are emphatic, that the Psalmist meant to draw attention to himself, both in reference to his trouble and in reference to his comfort. And so you and I must also be emphatic, and devote our attention to our trouble and our comfort. Let us see, then, in what way he speaks of God's revelation as his comfort.

First of all, he would distinguish it from the comfort that other persons receive. The man of the world finds comfort in various sources. But this saint of God speaks of God's Word as 'my comfort'. It tells of that spiritual experience which is peculiar to each one of us when we with all our hearts strive to serve God, and it speaks of that comfort and joy which we can recollect we have received in reading with faith and with love God's Word, and deriving from it that help which we well know we need in the hour of our trouble.

Or again, it is my comfort as revealing to me the cause of my trouble. The servant of God looks to God's Word, and there he finds that God has allowed this trouble to come upon him to try him, to see whether he really loves Him, to see whether that heart of the pilgrim responds to the heart of Him Who is its King, its Guide. And therefore he begins to feel that the trouble is, after all, one allowed to come upon him by God for some good reason of His own, and in that he receives comfort.

Or, again, it is my comfort, this message from God's Word, because it is one always present with me wherever I go. Wherever I am there is that message from God which I recollect, remember imperfectly perhaps in reference to the exact words, but there it is. I store it up in my memory: it is an ever-present comfort.

But one word more. The verse in the Psalm consists of two clauses: 'The same is my comfort in my trouble; for Thy Word hath quickened me'; that is to say, that the result of this comfort which God gives to His striving and faithful soldier, in these messages which He conveys through His revealed Word to His soul, gives him new life, quickens him.

II. This quickening of our spiritual life, this quickening of our effort in the affairs of our daily life, comes to us in two distinct ways.

First of all it comes to us from outside, it comes to us from our reading of God's Word. Holy Scripture is full of comfort and encouragement to those who strive with a good heart. Only be strong and of a good courage. When the Apostles thought they were overwhelmed with the waves of the storm on the lake, Jesus was present with them, and when, in their fear, they saw Him coming, He cried out, 'Be not afraid: it is I'. And we see in every page of God's Word how God was the comfort and support of His servants of old.

And it gives us new life from within. For we recall, in reference to that moment of our spiritual wavering, many a time when God was very good to us. Our spiritual experience tells us of a time when temptation came and seemed almost as if it were going to overwhelm us, and how God in His goodness sent the angel, and He closed the lion's mouth that it should not hurt us. And we feel guilty of ingratitude because we doubted that God would help us, and the thought of what He has done for us in the past gives us new life. Yes, there wells up from within a new vigour; the grace of God has been given us.

Ask yourselves to what extent you can take these words home; ask yourselves, in reference to your trouble, to what extent God is your comfort? Can we say: 'Thy Word, Thy revealed truth is my comfort, shall be my comfort all the days of my pilgrimage, whenever my trouble shall come upon me?' May God give us grace to answer this aright.

THE MYSTERY OF PAIN

'It is good for me that I have been in trouble: that I may learn Thy statutes.'—PSALM CXIX. 71.

It is scarcely surprising if the mystery of pain has been a problem which beyond almost any other has tasked the brain and wearied the heart of many of the world's greatest thinkers. With the steady advance of knowledge, moreover, especially that of a scientific character, the shadows upon the picture seem to grow yet more sombre of hue. Day by day the cry continues all around us, 'Has God forgotten to be gracious? Has He shut up His loving-kindness in displeasure? Why does He not eradicate the ape and tiger instincts from the heart of man? Why tarry the wheels of His chariot so long in coming? Why does He not lay bare His holy arm and scatter the legions of iniquity for ever?' Over and over again, when men have witnessed some helpless body racked with pain in its most exquisite forms, when they have beheld the great social cankers sapping the very springs of life, when the dogs of war are let loose and they see before them such horrors as those depicted by Zola in La Débâcle, at such seasons as these the cry has often risen to men's lips, 'Is there any reward for the righteous? Is there a Judge Who judgeth the earth?'

I. Pain the Result of Sin.—It is important for us to remember at the outset that a huge amount of the pain of which we ourselves are the unwilling witnesses, perhaps even victims, to-day, is the direct or indirect result of sin, and being such it is wholly unjustifiable for us to cast the tiniest stigma of blame upon the Almighty for its existence. The sins of the fathers are visited upon the children, yea, even unto the third and fourth generation. This statement is not a mere piece of philosophic theory, it is a tremendous present-day fact of which even the most unreflecting among us cannot fail to take notice. Consequences are God's commentaries. If you narrow down the subject for a moment to those particular forms of child-suffering which touch our hearts so deeply, we shall learn from those whose mission in life it is to do what they can to alleviate cruelty and suffering at this time,—we shall learn from them that ninety-nine per cent. of the child-cruelty with which they are brought into contact is the result simply and solely of the curse of intemperance on the part of their parents or guardians.

II. The Discipline of Pain.—But my purpose now is rather to dwell upon pain and suffering regarded from their disciplinary point of view—that is to say, as exercising an important influence in the formation and development of the highest type in Christian character, that type of Christian character which has been so wonderfully summed up for us by the great Apostle in the familiar words, the life which is 'hid with Christ in God' First of all, then, I would appeal to the testimony of the Gospels. I do not mean necessarily the experience of great thinkers, but also that of the humblest and most commonplace of the sons of men. Can we fail to recognize it as a truth that pain and suffering have been responsible, times without number, for the development of the most beautiful traits of Christian character? Is it not an incontestable fact that pain is, as it were, a great moral lever wielding a far mightier power than riches, or force, or both. The road to victory lies across the burning, fiery furnace of martyrdom. It was in the presence of a Man of Sorrows that the great unshaken imperial might of Rome was at length compelled to bow, and at last crumbled to atoms. Hence we can understand the tremendous words of the Master when He charged us to take up our cross and follow Him. Pain, suffering, discipline, these are potent beyond anything else to uplift our poor human nature to its true height. Trial or suffering, this must be the lot of us all. It was through discipline like this that the great Captain of our salvation, wearing the robe of flesh, was exalted to the right hand of the Father Himself, and we ourselves cannot rebel against a similar lot. 'I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me.' And this leads us to a second thought: the formation within each one of a Divine character through and by the aid of suffering and discipline. This brings in its train many consequences which are altogether external to ourselves, but which are none the less of a most far-reaching type. Cases undoubtedly do exist, and have existed, in which the effect of suffering, whether it be physical or mental, appears to be the freezing up of all love. This result, however, we may truly regard as being applicable to a very small minority of people indeed, whereas, on the other hand, suffering and discipline, if only they be accepted in the true Christian temper, in the spirit of the Christ, with a manful determination to show forth in our own body the marks of the Lord Jesus Himself—suffering such as this is bound, however little we ourselves may be conscious of the fact, to produce flowers of grace which could never otherwise have put forth their exquisite blossoms. Personal suffering—this is a cross which we must inevitably endure if we desire our own individual souls to be filled with the Divine grace of sympathy, if we desire to take our share in bearing the burdens of our comrades. It will quicken our spiritual perceptions till we become possessed of an insight, altogether foreign to any previous experience, an insight which will impel us to extend a helping hand to a companion who has perhaps been racked with some long agony. The very fact that we ourselves have partaken of God's gift of suffering will throw around us in the eyes of our fellow-men a bright halo of love. It will draw our fellow-men to our side, to be absolutely at one, in full sympathy and communion with our fellow-men. In order to bring about this end, the influence of sorrow is a thousand times more powerful than that of joy. Pain and sorrow possess an attractive power of a most extraordinary type. They simply weld the most divergent characters together. Whether it be the soldiers who have fought shoulder to shoulder through some toilsome campaign, or the patriots who have sworn that they will give their life-blood if need be for the triumph of their cause, or the husband and wife upon whose heads the storms of adversity have descended in blinding torrents; these will be the people who will be able to exclaim with the full heart of the Psalmist, 'It is good for me that I have been in trouble'.

III. Christianity and Life.—Suffering and discipline, then, are mighty factors in our spiritual education, and when we dwell upon such themes as these the inherent reasonableness of much which would be otherwise dark and inscrutable is beginning to dawn on our minds. Now we are ascended to higher ground still. The very clouds themselves seem to be rolling away. We almost fancy that we can get a glimpse of the heavenly Jerusalem. Life—this is the great title of Christianity—remember not simply the purification of this life, passed in this world of lights and shadows, has the promise of an infinitely purer, grander life in the vast ages which are as yet unborn. Once realize and take home to yourselves the great fact that this world is not an end of itself, but rather a school of character, and the discipline of pain and suffering seems forthwith to fall into its place as a normal and necessary element in the Divine government of the world. We are constrained to believe that each one of us exists for a definite purpose, but the purpose which is apparently the sign of each personality is ever being ceaselessly baffled. In all that we attempt to perform we are fettered, shackled, hampered. Pleasure, knowledge, achievement, each of these in turn breaks down, and as we fall upon them they pierce us through and through. But remember, we are working for the most glorious of futures, when the life we now enjoy will attain to its complete development, when we shall indeed know what it is to realize ourselves; for we shall wake up with Christ's own likeness and be satisfied with it. Amid all the sad scenes with which we are so constantly confronted, in the presence of the bitter, aching sorrows which sooner or later descend upon us all, till the iron literally enters into our soul, it is difficult to grasp the fact that the whole picture is one of ordered beauty, and not a mass of confused colour destitute of all semblance of design; but have patience, have faith, the work never ceases to go on, although things often seem so meaningless and unintelligible.

REFERENCE.—CXIX. 71.—H. Windross, The Life Victorious, p. 33.

PSALM CXIX.

VERSE 92. 'Unless Thy law had been my delight, I should have perished in mine affliction,' is written on Martin Luther's Bible by his own hand. The date is 1542, and the Bible is preserved at the Brandenburg Mark Museum, Berlin.—J. K.

THE SINNER AND THE SAVIOUR

'I am Thine, O save me: for I have sought Thy commandments.'—PSALM CXIX. 94.

WE notice as we read this Psalm that there is one thought that occurs in every single verse right through the Psalm from beginning to end, and that is the thought of God's law. The writer has evidently learned one great fact in his life, that we depend upon God for all our good things, and without Him we can do nothing; he has learned that as God is the supporter and stay of the whole creation, so He is the supporter and stay of the individual human life. And then, as he dwells upon this change, there is another thought which comes to his mind, and which seems to press upon him almost as strongly as that first thought, and that is that there is something between man and God which prevents man from following God's will, and that something he knows to be the existence of sin. He feels his need of pardon, and so he prays, 'I am Thine, O save me'.

I. The Need of a Saviour.—This need is a need which we should all of us feel. There have been times, and we know it, when we have wandered far away from God. There have been times when we have seen before us the choice between good and evil, and we have deliberately chosen that which is evil. We have preferred sin. We have loved sin, and chosen it because we preferred it. But God has blessings in store for the sinner, as soon as the sinner becomes penitent and turns from the evil of his ways. And so all that we have to do is to understand the real meaning of the word penitence, or the word conversion, which means practically the same, and see that we are truly penitent, and then we may believe that much blessing is in store for us, that is in store for those who are undefiled in the way.

II. The Meaning of Penitence.—Let us try and see what is the real meaning of this word, penitence. The first step necessary in true penitence is that we must learn to know ourselves. The writer of this Psalm says, 'I am Thine, O save me, for I have sought Thy commandments,' and that is necessary for us as it was necessary for him. There are a great many people who have never done what the prodigal son did, they have never come to themselves or thought of their own ways, and learned what their own life has been. How can we gain this necessary self-knowledge? The man of the world would tell us that if we would know human nature, our own nature and lives, we must live in the world, we must see something of the world, we must not be too hard on the faults of the world. Sometimes they will say the best man is the man who has fallen into sin himself. But Christ says to us something very different from this. Christ says, If you would know human nature, know yourself and your own life, there must be times when you cut yourself off from the world, and when you get alone with God. And so, if we would know what real penitence is, it is necessary first of all to know ourselves and our own life, and to call upon the Lord, 'O save me'.

III. A Change of Life.—Conversion means turning to God, seeking His commandments, and we must make no mistake about it. It means a change of heart, which must be followed by a change of life. Real penitence, real conversion is not a state of feeling, but a change of life. The result of our conversion, or our turning to God, may show itself in different ways. It sometimes is a sudden result, and it shows itself suddenly in the complete change of a life, so that those who know us can see what has taken place in our lives and see at once we have turned to God. But conversion does not always come to a man in this way. Sometimes it comes slowly and gradually. Sometimes God's Holy Spirit has to deal with a man very gently, and lead him on slowly, step by step, correcting one fault at a time, gradually changing his life; and it is only after a long time that we see the result of the change in his changed life.

REFERENCE.—CXIX. 94.—H. Woodcock, Sermon Outlines, p. 76.

PSALM CXIX. 97.

RUSKIN SAYS: 'If people would but read the text of their Bibles with heartier purpose of understanding it, instead of superstitiously, they would see that throughout the parts which they are intended to make most personally their own (the P-salms) it is always the Law which is spoken of with chief joy. The Psalms respecting mercy are often sorrowful, as in thought of what it cost; but those respecting the law are always full of delight. David cannot contain himself for joy in thinking of it,—he is never weary of its praise: "How love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day. Thy testimonies are my delight and my counsellors; sweeter, also, than honey and the honey-comb."'—Modern Painters, vol. v., pt. vii. chap. iv. § 22.

VERSE 97. Henry Martyn says: 'I experienced a solemn gladness in learning this part, "MEM," of the 119th Psalm'.—J. K.

MY LAMP

'Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path.'
—PSALM CXIX. 105.

THE Word of God is compared to a lamp or lantern such as that which is carried on dark nights in country places in lands where fixed lights are not to be found. Let us see how the Word of God may be compared to such a lamp.

I. First like a lighted lantern on a dark and lonely journey it is a pleasant companion. A lamp cannot indeed talk to us or even listen to our voices; but its cheerful light close beside us, belonging to us, and going on continually with us, takes away our feeling of loneliness, and we feel that the common saying is quite true that 'a light is pleasant company'. This is much more true of the Word of God. Life has not only its sunny days, but its long dark nights in which we must go on just the same in the way that is set before us. But even in the dark nights of temptation, pain, disappointment, sickness or bereavement, we need not travel alone, for this lamp may be ever at our sides, cheering us with its radiance.

II. Then again the Word of God, like a lighted lantern, is a protection against danger. The shining light of the truth we love will often preserve us from the more accidental spiritual dangers and temptations of life. It will save also in deliberately planned attacks of our spiritual enemies upon us. A thief would not choose to try to rob a man who carried a lighted lamp in his hand or to break open the lock of a house with the Master's lantern shining full on him.

III. But the third and principal value of a lamp is that it shows us the way, and it is in this respect especially that the truth of God is most precious to us.

(a) It shows us the entrance to the way.

(b) Then it shows us the way itself, as we travel on step by step through the lonely darkness. If at some meeting of the ways we might in darkness have turned in the wrong direction this lamp will show us the true path, whispering kindly to us 'This is the way, walk ye in it; when ye turn to the right, or when ye turn to the left' (Is. xxx. 21).

(c) Then lastly the Word of God will show us the end of the way. The word of God is a lamp that will light us all the way to heaven, where we shall need it no more.—R. BREWIN, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. III. p. 24.

PSALM CXIX.

VERSE 105. 'Thy word is a lamp unto my feet.' This is the text prefixed to a little book called The Lantern of Light, which was the favourite reading of the Lollards before the Reformation. The close of a prayer in the preface shows the principles of these children of the dawn: 'When Thou, O Lord, didst die upon the cross, Thou didst breathe into Thy Word the spirit of life, and didst give it power to quicken us through Thine own precious blood, as Thou Thyself hast said: "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life".' The Lollards of England and Scotland were charged with reading the Bible in their mother tongue—Wyclif's translation—and with esteeming it above any instruction they received from the priests. On this account they were called Biblemen. A considerable number of them were taken up for trial in Kyle in Ayrshire, and other western districts, in 1494, nearly seventy years before the time of Knox. That region, so prominent in the time of the Reformation and the Covenant, had the seed in the soil.—JOHN KER.

REFERENCES.—CXIX. 105.—C. Bosanquet, Tender Grass for the Lambs, p. 154. J. Keble, Sermons from Advent to Christmas, p. 257. R. Allen, The Words of Christ, p. 15. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 199. CXIX. 112.—G. Bellett, Parochial Sermons, p. 54. CXIX. 117.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1657.

THE QUALIFICATION OF A SERVANT

'I am Thy servant; give me understanding, that I may know Thy testimonies.'—PSALM CXIX, 125.

I. I SHOULD call this distinctively the servant's prayer. At first sight it might seem that the prayer of a servant should be more elementary. It might seem that the simple duty of a servant is to ask for orders. The Psalmist has a different view. To his mind the perfection of domestic service is not the receiving but the forestalling of orders—the providing for requirements beforehand. 'Because I am a servant, give me understanding, that I may know in advance the things thou hast need of—that I may not require to wait for Thy verbal instructions but may consider the wants of Thy household.' That is the Psalmist's meaning, and it is founded on truth. For, in God's house as in man's house, there are two ways in which one may be a 'good and faithful servant'—a lower way and a higher way. The lower way is that of the beginner. It is the waiting for every detail. 'What wouldst Thou have me do this day?' So asks the incipient servant. And in answer the heavenly Father gives the details; He issues Ten Commandments.

II. But as yet He misses something in the servant—that thing which the Psalmist calls understanding. He craves in the servant a second stage of goodness and faithfulness. Let us suppose that the Father names four rooms of His sanctuary which require sweeping. Let us suppose that on descending from His presence the servant finds that in the interval a fifth apartment has become soiled. Would it not be desirable that in the mind of him or her the understanding should supersede the command. Is the fifth room to be left useless because there is no verbal enactment concerning it? Is there none of the Lord's servants with discernment enough to improvise an eleventh commandment to satisfy God's will instead of His mere law? That is what the Father longs for, that is what the Psalmist prays for, that is what the instinct of all hearts desire.

III. Lord, men of old have said, 'Teach us Thy law'; rather shall my prayer be, 'Teach me Thy will'. My voice shalt Thou hear in the morning; but it will be to suggest not to receive orders. Wilt Thou give me liberty to act for Thee without command! Wilt Thou let us keep Thy house in order where from Thee I have received no order? Wilt Thou give me a commission without detail—a mandate to help where I see heaviness, to brighten where I meet burdens, to comfort where I find calamities, to free where I encounter fetters, to protect where I recognize poverty, to cheer where the atmosphere is chill!—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 125.

REFERENCES.—CXIX. 126-128.—A. MacLaren, Old Testament Outlines, p. 146. CXIX. 129.—H. Woodcock, Sermon Outlines, p. 57. Bishop Woodford, Occasional Sermons, vol. I. 238. CXIX. 129, 130.—J. Wordsworth, 'The One Religion,' Bampton Lectures, 1881, p. 115. CXIX. 130.—R. Shutts, Penny Pulpit, No. 1715, p. 761. CXIX. 132.—J. Koble, Sermons for Sundays After Trinity, pp. 245, 417. CXIX. 133.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 878.

PSALM CXIX. 136.

IN Thomas Hughes' Life of Daniel Macmillan, a letter of the publisher to Mr. Llewellyn Davies is quoted, in which he observes of Plato: 'There is none of the yearning over the sins of the world which expresses itself in "Tears run down my cheeks because men keep not Thy law," nor "I could wish myself accursed for my brethren's sake". He has no feeling of bearing the sins of the world. Vice and mean conduct are very ugly. He would do all in his power to banish them: but he speaks of them in the tone of a "very lofty Athenian gentleman".'

REFERENCES.—CXIX. 140.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, pp. 290, 299. CXIX. 144.—T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 85. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvi. No. 1572. CXIX. 148.—H. Melville, Penny Pulpit, No. 1613, p. 301. CXIX. 151.—W. H. H. Murray, American Pulpit of To-day, vol. iii. p. 209. CXIX. 162.—G. A. Sowter, From Heart to Heart, p. 66. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1671. CXIX. 176.—T. Arnold, Christian Life: Its Hopes, p. 171. J. Bolton, Selected Sermons (2nd Series), p. 135. CXIX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 409. CXX.—Ibid. p. 444.

PSALM CXXI.

DR. BLAIKIE, in his Life of Livingstone, tells that this Psalm and the 135th were read by him when he parted with his family and went out first as a missionary to Africa. 'I remember my father and him,' writes his sister, 'talking over the prospects of Christian missions. They said that the time would come when rich and great men would think it an honour to support whole stations of missionaries, instead of spending their money on hounds and horses. On the morning of 17 November, 1840, we got up at five o'clock. David read the 121st and the 135th Psalms and prayed. My father and he walked to Glasgow to catch the Liverpool steamer.' The old man walked back with a lonely heart to Blantyre, while his son's face was set in earnest toward the dark continent.—J. K.

THE RELIGION OF THE THRESHOLD

'The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth, and even for evermore.'—PSALM CXXI. 8.

BETWEEN these two things—the exits and the entrances of the day—lie the whole problem and struggle of existence.

I. Get into the habit each morning and evening of meeting God for a moment on the threshold as you go out and come in, and though you may not see it, others will begin to see a new element of strength and tenderness in your character. The man and the woman who keep tryst with God at the threshold for just a moment each day as they go out and come in are ready for every contingency.

II. Of course, to offer that kind of prayer means that you and I are determined to live a certain kind of life. There are three definite blessings on which we may surely count every day as we go out and come in, if we live this religion of the threshold.

(a) It will redeem the monotony of the day, and will sweeten its drudgery.

(b) It will make us ready for the unexpected things in life.

(c) It will hallow our evenings and sanctify our moments of rest. A simple religion, this religion of the doorstep, but death will be sweeter if we have learned to keep tryst with God as we go out and in.—D. S. MACKAY, The Religion of the Threshold, p. 25.

REFERENCES.—CXXI. 8.—H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 2241. CXXI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 446. CXXII. 3.—Canon Barnett, A Lent in London, p. 114. CXXII. 4.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. iii. p. 242. CXXII. 6-9.—J. Bowstead, Practical Sermons, vol. ii. p. 80. CXXII. 8, 9.—H. M. Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 183. CXXII. International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 448. CXXIII. 2.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Sundays After Trinity, p. 1. Expositor (3rd Series), vol. iv. p. 80. CXXIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 450.

PSALM CXXIV.

WHEN the conflict was over, the venerable Theodore Beza, eighty years old, returned solemn thanks, and gave out the 124th Psalm to be sung. Every year since, on 12 December, it has been sung in Geneva.

DR. THOLUCK of Halle used to tell an anecdote of his father-in-law. He was a convert from Roman Catholicism; and as it happens sometimes that though the mind may be entirely emancipated, the desire for priestly absolution returns, his son-in-law asked him before he died, if he had any such feeling. The dying man expressed his sole confidence in the great High Priest, and, giving a wave of triumph with his hand, said in the words of Luther's version of the psalm—

Strick ist Entzwei, und wir sind frei.

Broke are their nets, and thus escapèd we.

THE biographer of M'Cheyne, giving an account of his death, tells that 'next day he continued sunk in body and mind, till about the time his people met for their usual evening prayer meeting, when he requested to be left alone for half an hour. When his servant entered the room again, he exclaimed with a joyful voice, 'My soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowler; the snare is broken, and I am escaped'. His countenance, as he said this, bespoke inward peace; and ever after he was observed to be happy.—J. K.

REFERENCES.—CXXIV. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1696. CXXIV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 452. CXXV. 1.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1450. CXXV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 453. W. Brock, Midsummer Morning Sermons, p. 74.

BIBLE MOUNTAINS

'As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about His people from henceforth even for ever.'—PSALM CXXV. 2.

ARE there many mountains mentioned in the Bible? Are they lumped under one generalization? They are not so massed, they are spoken of in detail, as if each were almost a living thing or a living church or pillars of some vaster edifice. May we not bring them usefully into the whole action of our daily life and service and suffering? Some mountains are red with blood, some soft with dew, but both the hills were set up by Him Who buildeth all things.

I. Who can forget Mount Moriah? who could pronounce that sweet word frivolously? All the hill-side is alive with thoughts, and the thoughts are almost winged things, fluttering and flying and shaking from their wings great suggestions and pensive yet triumphant memory. Yours has been a poor landscape if there is no Moriah.

II. Is there not somewhere a hill of fellowship, a kind of council-chamber amid the rocks, a high place where certain men that seemed to be the very pillars of society are closeted? Yes, there is a hill of that kind. What is its name? Tabor. You love the name. Are not names as birds that sing their own songs? Do you not realize even in Tabor solemnity, possibility, suggestion? Who was on Tabor? Moses and Elias and Jesus. There must be hills that are as council-chambers in the Church and in the individual heart, Tabors on the top of which the most eloquent must be silent, and therefore the more eloquent.

III. Are there any other severe mountains in the Old Testament? Yes, there is one severest of all; surely this mountain is nought but rocks; you could not plant the simplest flower in those crannies so high and solemn. I refer to the Mount Sinai, the mount of law, the mount where the eternal righteousness was, so to say, born in this bitter, gruesome Bethlehem. He is either a great man or a small one who is independent of the Commandments. We may in some way plant beautiful flowers on the grim hill; that is surely not forbidden; or we may by the providence of God so enlarge the plain into garden land as to include the mountain; let it stand, but give it a new and blessed environment.

IV. We must have the rock, and its companion law, and in our yearnings after something quieter we may find our holy prayer lovingly and sufficiently answered by taking a glimpse at another mountain. What mountain is that? It is Mount Hermon. 'As the dew upon Hermon.' Dew is often to us more acceptable than lightning and snow and crushing tempest, though all these may be sanctified and ennobled by the great voice of law and claim of righteousness.

V. Can there be more mountains in this mountainous land of the Bible? Yes, a hundred more; we can touch but two of them. There is a mountain I should like to see; it is the mount of vision from one of whose peaks men catch glimpses of the land they long to go to. It is Mount Nebo. I would not care to see the specific and nameless grave amid the solitudes of Nebo, it would be enough for me to know that one sorely tried life climbed the steep of Nebo that he might catch sight of another land, while Jordan rolled between his poor old heart and that green Canaan. There are such mountainous times in the history of our souls.

VI. It was so on Mount Olivet. Jesus climbed that Olivet hill that He might leave it for ever behind Him as a mere letter or a term in geography. The ending-place was the beginning-place in the history of Christ; He did not end on Olivet; Olivet was to the dear Saviour a beginning, the point at which He started, a point therefore never to be forgotten. Blessed are they who climb Olivet, for they shall not die. The most beautiful sentence in the whole history of burial is to be found in connexion with this same Olivet, as also in connexion with old Nebo. Moses we know nothing about as to his death or his burial-place, and Jesus did not die on Olivet, but ascended; herein is the poem complete, the poem of Moses and the Lamb. Nebo and Olivet shoulder each other in the memory of a common and most blessed and significant history.—JOSEPH PARKER, Oily Temple Pulpit, vol. III. p. 108.

SOWING IN TEARS

'They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.'—PSALM CXXVI. 5.

THE words of the text are an inspired proverb. They are found to-day in all literatures, and they bear a twofold meaning: (1) that patient, enduring toil shall sooner or later have its reward; (2) that vicarious suffering lies at the root of all advancement in social, national, and religious life.

I. See how the principle which is embedded in the text is found everywhere in nature. Death lies between sowing and reaping. There is not a blade of grass in our fields, nor a flower in our gardens, which has not been produced by the sorrows of nature by her sufferings and death.

II. We see the great fact in nature, illustrated in God's providential and moral government of the world. I appeal to individual experience. Just as that loveliest of all Swiss flowers, the Blue Gentian, grows most luxuriantly under the cornices of snow, have not your greatest happiness and calmest peace grown from beneath your greatest sorrows?

Our fathers 'sowed in tears'; we, the children, 'reap in joy'. 'Are we not led up the great aisle of nature to the altar on Calvary, and prepared by the great facts of nature and of human life for regarding the expiatory sacrifice of Jesus with adoring faith?'

III. If we see a certain law in nature and in God's providential and moral government of the world, as far as we can trace His footsteps, we shall find the same principle in Divine Revelation, and in the history of the Church of God. What is the grand theme, the great central truth of the Bible? Is it not atonement? the highest form of vicarious suffering—the death of 'the just for the unjust'—the fit for the unfit?

1. My text gives the history of all true prayer. The saints in felicity are reaping the harvest of seed sown in penitential sorrow for sin.

2. Consider the Church's work. The history of the Church is but a continuation of the history of Christ. He who was the Sower was also the Seed. 'Except a corn of wheat fall to the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die it bringeth forth much fruit.' Was not Jesus the 'Man of Sorrows'? Did He not sow in tears? On the Day of Pentecost He began to 'reap in joy'. He has been reaping ever since in the centuries of the Church's history. Is He not reaping to-day?—J. W. BARDSLEY, Many Mansions, p. 105.

THE PREPARATION OF THE SOIL

'They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.'—PSALM CXXVI. 5.
(See also the Parable of the Sower.—MATT. XIII.)

IN these words the Psalmist expresses a very important truth, one which finds a parallel in the proverb 'No gains without pains'. We may perhaps be allowed to state a kindred truth in passive form, which would enable us to derive more instruction and profit from the Parable of the Sower, 'They that are sowed upon in tears shall bear fruit in joy'. It is our gracious Lord who sows the seed, and it is He who will reap the harvest.

I. We read of the wayside, the rock, the thorns, and the good ground.

(a) 'The seed that fell by the wayside had no possible chance of bearing fruit; it was trodden under foot by the immediate passer-by and devoured before the day was done by the birds of the air. That wayside, because difficult to get at with the plough, might have been broken up and prepared for the seed had the husbandman been more industrious, but was barren and fruitless because of his neglect.

(b) Some fell upon the rock. It had not enough earth from which to gather moisture and so it and the seed were wasted.

(c) And some fell among thorns, or rather the roots or seeds of thorns, which grew up along with the corn and drew all the goodness of the soil to themselves, so that the corn was soon choked and overshadowed, and could not bear fruit. Again the blame lay with some one, with him who had tilled the soil, for he had not cleared it thoroughly before the seed was sown.

(d) And some fell on good ground which had been properly broken up and cleaned and thoroughly prepared so that the seed had a chance to live its full life and bring forth fruit according to its nature, some thirty, some sixty, and some a hundred fold.

II. 'He that hath ears to hear let him hear.' In the interpretation of the parable, we learn that Jesus Christ and His servants sow seed, which is the Word of God. The field is the heart and lives of men, which have to be prepared for the seed if it is to bear fruit in them. What is the preparation which our hearts must receive to fit them for the seed which is sown by the Master Hand or by His Holy Spirit through His servants in the world? We must search our hearts and examine them by means of the law of God, enlarged and exemplified by Christ in His teaching and His works. We must plough up everything, and sift every thought, and it will be remarkable if we are not appalled with the revelation such an examination will make, if we are not overwhelmed with the thought that so much of our lives has been lived in culpable ignorance of our sinfulness and unfitness for God's presence, so much in disregard of His will and purpose concerning us, and so much in neglect of the great gift which He offers us. When our self-examination is complete and we feel crushed and broken; when we are humbled to the dust with a sense of our sinfulness and weakness, our merciful Lord will speak to us words of comfort and love. He will sow the seed which is the fruit of His life in our hearts.

REFERENCE.—CXXVI. 5, 6.—J. Baldwin Brown, Aids to the Development of the Divine Life, No. ii.

DIVINE SERVICE A SPECULATION

'He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.'—PSALM CXXVI. 6.

It may be assumed that God has a kingdom in this world, and that although it appears in different forms it can always be recognized; for it means the increase of knowledge, the spread of charity, the deliverance of the oppressed, the rescue of the fallen, the preaching of Christ's Evangel. We believe that God is calling us daily to cast ourselves into His work and to be fellow-labourers together with Him for the redemption of humanity.

I. Were one restricted to three departments of beneficence, as an illustration of hazardous and yet hopeful speculation, he might take for the first—

(a) Foreign Missions. Its pioneers were laughed at in society, and lectured by the Church; they were hindered and persecuted; their passion for human souls and their splendid self-abnegation were neither welcome nor admired. We are now beginning to rescue their names and to recognize what those men who were judged in their day fools and fanatics have done for philology and anthropology, for geography and commerce, and most of all for religion.

(b) How slow again has been the progress of education, how bitter its controversies, how vast its outlay, how many have been its servants. But the spirit of intelligence is spreading like leaven through the heavy mass of the people.

(c) The pioneers of temperance fought an unpopular and arduous battle, and none of the benefactors of society have suffered more through defeat and disappointment. Evidence can be produced to show that there is no decrease in the statistics on drink and no improvements in the habits of the people, and every person who is not a raging optimist will admit that drunkenness still battens on the vitals of England. On the other hand, it is beyond question that the nation as a whole is learning temperance and self-respect. Drunkenness, except in cases where it is a disease, is now confined to the lowest classes in the commonwealth, and there it is a misfortune as much as a vice.

II. God's servants would not be discouraged if they remembered that beneficence has many conditions of success, and one of them is time. You cannot change the face of a country in ten years; you cannot create an intelligent, temperate, thrifty people in less than three generations. Work for such high ends, and on such spiritual lines must be without haste and without rest, and the first workmen must be content to leave their unfinished building to their successors.

III. But the spiritual workman should remember that if the rate of progress be slow the far result is already discounted, and that if he speculates it is not in the sense that he may lose altogether, but that he loses in the present in order to gain in the future. Remember in moments of depression, when your own work and that of your generation seems a failure, that the kingdom of God has a long past. The history of commerce records how men have been willing to stake all they had upon one transaction in the hope of huge gain; the history of religion records how a greater multitude have risked everything for the good of their fellow-men and the kingdom of God. Theirs is the higher spirit and the future vision; theirs has been the master speculation of humanity. Time alone is arbiter of their wisdom, and time has already justified the venture of beneficence.—JOHN WATSON, The Inspiration of Our Faith, p. 298.

REFERENCES.—CXXVI. 6.—J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 263. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 867. CXXVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 455.

GOD THE BUILDER OF THE HOME

'Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it.'—PSALM CXXVII. 1.

HE who undertakes to build up a home without God fails and fails dismally. The first requisite in the building of the home is character, and the final purpose of every true home is the strengthening and development of character. Let us consider the practical bearing of this thought of the home as a school of character.

I. The first necessity is surely a frank recognition of the Divinity of the home. The division of secular and sacred is misleading in almost all its applications; nothing is secular but that which is enfeebling, ugly, sinful; everything which has a legitimate function in life should be viewed by Christian people as sacred, and the scenes of all such activities should be holy places. You read the report of a gathering held in some church or chapel, and the newspaper informs you that the 'sacred edifice' was well filled. Now whilst for my own part I fully understand and sympathize with the deep and often superstitious veneration even of the wood and stone that has been long associated with the prayer and praise of devout people, I find a deeper truth in the view of Puritanism that every place in which reverence is paid to God, and duty performed in fellowship with Him, becomes thereby sacred. Convention would scarcely permit the reporter to describe your house as a 'sacred edifice,' but it ought to be that, and the sense of its holiness ought to grow on you year by year as the Divine meaning of the home becomes clearer.

II. The acknowledgment of God in the home is the basis of all true culture of souls, and the secret of the best type of home influence. And in speaking of the 'culture of souls' and of 'home influence' it is well to remind you that such words do not refer merely to the influence of parents upon children; the earliest pupils in the school of the home are the husband and wife themselves. They are at once pupils and teachers, each learning from the other, each instructing the other.

III. In the presence of the most solemn of all life's tasks, the training of children, how momentous is the significance of our text! The religious destiny of the rising generation is largely, under God, within the power of the parents. What do our children acquire in our homes? Maxims of commonplace morality, or the sense of God as a near and warm friend? To believe in the grandeur of your children's possibilities, fathers and mothers, to believe that even in childhood they may acquire the God-regarding habit, how great a matter is this, and what dignity and worth it would impart to their characters! The Lord builds our homes that our labour be not in vain! He will. He does. The very word 'home' thrills us; it comes to us laden with the sacred associations of many faithful generations; and by His grace shall we not covenant with Him and with one another in high resolve to make home life yet more joyous and Divine?

REFERENCES.—CXXVII. 1.—J. S. Bartlett, Sermons, p. 198. C. J. Vaughan, Memorials of Harrow Sundays, p. 1. C. D. Bell, The Name Above Every Name, p. 232. J. Baldwin Brown, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxiii. p. 103. CXXVII. 1-3.—J. Bowstead, Practical Sermons, vol. i. p. 129.

THE GIFT OF SLEEP

'He giveth His beloved (in) sleep.'—PSALM CXXVII. 3.

THE Psalmist is warning against that overwork which so surely degenerates into worry. He is picturing the man who overdrives himself until he has no leisure and no liberty. Remember that the Psalmist never dreamed of casting a slur upon honest, manly labour. What was borne in upon his soul was this: that by overtoil we lose more than we gain, for many of the richest gifts of heaven only approach us as by the path of slumber.

I. Let me consider that thought, thinking first of the blessings of our infancy. There is a world of love encompassing an infant, yet how unconscious the babe is of it all. Not alone in the land beyond the river is a place prepared for every one God loves. When into this present life a child awakes, hearts have been busy with the preparation; it is clad and fed, and sheltered from the storm. Yet who more passive than that little infant? Helpless it lies, and doomed to certain death if life depended upon its puny efforts. But 'God giveth to His beloved sleep'.

II. Our text has a great depth of meaning when we think upon the influences that play upon youth. Mightier influences than any teacher wields are being wielded beyond the class-room walls; in the loving intercourse of home there is progressing a deeper education than has ever been dreamed of in the standards. Its lesson book is not the printed page; it is the happy companionship of boyhood. Yet how absolutely and utterly unconscious is the youth of the blessings which are ingathering on him so, and which are to make him rich through all the years.

III. Our text has large significance in regard to the pursuit of happiness. The only sure way to miss the gift of happiness is to rise early and sit up late for it. The way to be happy is not to toil for happiness. It is to be awake to what is higher and fall asleep to that, and then as the day goes on, comes the discovery that 'God giveth to His beloved in sleep'.—G. H. MORRISON, The Wings of the Morning, p. 24.

REFERENCES.—CXXVII. 2.—H. Melvill, Penny Pulpit, No. 1666, p. 367. J. T. Stannard, The Divine Humanity, p. 125. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 12. C. J. Vaughan, Memorials of Harrow Sundays, p. 1. CXXVII. 3.—W. Braden, Christian World Pulpit, vol. vii. p. 369. CXXVII. 3-5.—H. W. Beecher, Ibid. vol. ix. p. 323. CXXVII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 457.

THE REWARD OF THE GOD-FEARING

'Behold, thus shall the man be blessed that feareth the Lord.'—PSALM CXXVIII. 4.

I. Questions of a Future Life.—It is an interesting and curious problem to explain the absence or dimness of the belief in a future life among the Jews for so many centuries, especially when we consider the great place which the doctrines of the immortalities of the soul and of reward and punishment after death held in the religion of Egypt. A long life, a prosperous life was all that they looked for. In the earlier stages of Jewish thought the Messianic hope, the glorious future was for the nation, not for the individual. Sceptics it is true were not wanting. The author of the book of Job attacked the doctrine as untrue, the author of Ecclesiastes as unsatisfying. But it was the sharp lesson of fact which at last undermined its dominion over the thought of men. The religious Jew living under the insane tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes; the kindred but undevout dynasty of the Hasmonæans; the half alien and wholly unpatriotic rule of the Herods, could no longer hold to this belief. The good things of this life were too obviously not with Jehovah's worshippers. And side by side with the waning of earthly hopes came a deepening of religious consciousness. The pious Israelite, feeling his fate to be in the hand of God, and sure that God would not forsake him, begins to expect that he, and all the godly, will have a share in the future of the nation.

II. Belief in the Early Return of Christ.—The belief in an early return of the Lord carried the Church through the first century of her existence; and even before men had time to say 'The Lord delayeth His coming,' the visions of enthusiastic faith had set into dogma. The Christian knew that Christ would come to judgment at last (though he himself should pass to his rest long ere the coming), and that they who have done good shall go into life everlasting, and they that have done evil into everlasting fire. There was no doubt about the reward of the elect; no scruples about the fate of the reprobate.

III. Present Day Position.—We can no longer dream that old dream, that virtue and piety bring material prosperity. God has told us that He maketh His sun to shine upon the evil and the good, and sendeth His rain upon the just and the unjust. But there is implanted in the heart of man a clear unreasoning certainty—unreasoning because it is earlier than reason and of a higher authority—that it is better somehow to do right than wrong, irrespective of pains or pleasures resulting. It is this that saved pro-Christian societies, this that in great measure saves society to-day from anarchy and dissolution; the instinctive belief that the reward of goodness lies there, in the right act itself, and in the character which makes the right act natural. And for the believer the universal law is expressed in terms of a higher and more intimate knowledge of the Divine. For him the motive and the reward of life are found alike in the clear and passionate consciousness of the abiding Presence of God.—J. PEILE, Church Family Newspaper, 1907, p. 604.

REFERENCES.—CXXVIII. 5.—W. M. Statham, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xviii. p. 360. CXXVIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 459. CXXIX.—Ibid. vol. ii. p. 461.

THE SORROWS OF THE NIGHT

'More than they that watch for the morning.'—PSALM CXXX. 6.

Few have gone far along life's way without understanding what it is to watch for the morning. The invalid, helpless, sleepless, every nerve strained, with a great weight of confused woe heavy on his breast, welcomes the chill light, though it brings but little respite—though he can only say, 'Rise thou thus, dim dawn, again?' Even in full strength, when we lie awake at night, there may come to us all the cruel possibilities of the future, as well as the real anxieties of the present, till there is no more spirit left in us. But when the morning dawns, when we put on the armour of light, we are stronger to meet our foes.

Perhaps the sorrows of the night were never felt so little as now, when people fly to narcotics on the slightest provocation. In other times they were well understood. Whether the pain was of the body or the soul it ached on unallayed. Rousseau has a striking phrase, les frayeurs nocturnes, and the Middle Ages in particular knew those terrors in all their forms. It is this which gives their tenderness to the Provençal songs of the morning.

I. There is another coming desired more eagerly by the Christian heart, and promised by Jesus Christ Himself when He spoke the word, Hereafter ye shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven. This phrase cannot be reduced and tamed into anything short of lunacy if Christ was not Divine. This second advent is continually insisted on by Himself and His Apostles; its solemn note resounds through exhortation, comfort, and warning. Yet in our day it is largely ignored in Christian teaching, and is left as the heritage of comparatively small and obscure companies, who encumber it with false and doubtful interpretations. But the truth itself is independent of all these entanglements. It is simply that Christ is to appear suddenly, and the time may be close upon us; we are to be ready, for in such an hour as we think not the Son of Man may come.

II. What is the significance of this expectation to us? How is it to alter and colour our lives? We do not look for the Appearing in our own life here. As we have parted with the dear ones who, like ourselves, have been partakers of the power of His resurrection, we have felt that we, too, must die, and the clouds of the valley have been sweet. We have looked to join our own among the shaded glories under the Altar-Throne, there to wait and pray for the adoption. But we should think of the advent as near, even at the doors, all the days we go out and in. Christ is with us according to His promise, but He stands by us unseen, and in spite of all His gifts there is still a hiding of His power. The meaning of the promise is that the fight will not go on for ever, that the flux and reflux of the tide of battle will at last cease, that a decisive interposition will end the war, and that the Son of Man will purge His kingdom of all things that offend, and them that do iniquity. Since Christ came, all have owned that a new force is astir, but we see not yet all things put under Him.

III. The day and hour we know not. Even the angels in heaven know not. More wonderful and touching still, this secret was kept from the Son in His humiliation. He consented to be ignorant of the time when His work should reach its term. We may reverently conjecture that this was one drop in His cup, that the tumult and anguish of His soul were not complete without it, that to sympathize with us perfectly He must know the turmoil of our spirits in expecting the end. Perhaps He meant to teach us that the best help for present duty and suffering is always to be expecting the second advent, always to be ignorant of the time. We are to fight as if no new succours were to come, we are to fight knowing that they are coming, it may be in our day, it may be after we have died on the field, but that with them the victory is sure. But the belief that even now the Lord is at hand will ever help to keep us in the earnest purity of the girded loins and the burning lamp, and deliver us from any hope that falls short of God.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, Ten Minute Sermons, p. 108.

PSALM CXXX.

It was the 130th Psalm, sung in St. Paul's, May, 1788, and heard by John Wesley with deep emotion, that prepared him for the truth of justification by faith, which he embraced shortly afterwards, through reading Luther on the Galatians. His conversations with Peter Bohlen, of the Moravian Brethren, also aided him greatly, and helped to preserve him from the mystic legalism of Law's Serious Call, to which he was at one time inclined. But for this decision, the mighty movement which has sprung from Wesley would have failed in the birth.—J. K.

REFERENCES.—CXXX.—J. W. Bardsley, Many Mansions, p. 315. CXXX. 4.—J. Keble, Miscellaneous Sermons, p. 441. M. Biggs, Practical Sermons on the Old Testament Subjects, p. 220. CXXX. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 351. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 367. CXXX.—H. Woodcock, Sermon Outlines, p. 170. International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 464. A. Maclaren, A Year's Ministry (2nd Series), p. 31. C. Kingsley, Westminster Sermons, p. 262. CXXXI. 2.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Sunday After Trinity, p. 163. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (10th Series), p. 234. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1210. CXXXI.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 135. International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 460. C. Kingsley, Westminster Sermons, p. 280.

THE SONG OF THE BUILDERS

'Lord, remember David, and all his afflictions,' etc.—
PSALM CXXXII.

I. LET us gather from this portion some lessons touching preparatory work. 'Lord, remember David, and all his afflictions.' Look for a moment at the picture which is given us here of the aged king setting himself to his task. The historical book tells us that as soon as 'the Lord had given him rest from all his enemies round about' he began to think of building a house for God. He will put his own comfort second; God's service—which is but the noblest name for duty—first. Notice, too, that David's devotedness does make a plea with God. The prayer goes upon the supposition that his toil and self-sacrifices will not, cannot, be all in vain. And the prayer built upon that supposition is answered. God does not require perfect faithfulness in us His servants ere He blesses us with His smile; He does not need that the temple should be all complete ere He enters in. And consider, too, how God's remembrance of such preparatory work is shown. David saw no result from all his toils to build the temple. But none the less was it true that God remembered David and all his afflictions and accepted and crowned his work.

II. Thus we come to the second section of our Psalm, stretching from the eighth to the ninth verse, the prayer for God's blessing on the builder's work. The Psalmist asks first that God would dwell in the completed temple, and that the symbol of His presence may now at last, after so many wanderings, rest there. May we not from all this draw needful lessons for ourselves? And first as to the one great blessing which all builders for God should desire. We all think far too much of external activity, and too little of that Spirit who must guide and fructify it; too much of the institutions and too little of the indwelling God. And that presence is all which we need to make ourselves strong, and our work effectual. From this fundamental petition all the other clauses of the prayer flow. Taken together they are the sum of the Psalmist's desire for his nation, the ideal of what Israel might and should be, of what it certainly would be if God dwelt in it.

III. The final section of the Psalm contains the Divine answer, which more than fulfils the Psalmist's desire. The Church asks God to arise into His rest; and He answers by adding the promise of perpetuity; 'This is My rest for ever; here will I dwell'. The Church asks for robes of righteousness for the priests; and He replies with robes of salvation, which is the perfecting and most glorious issue of righteousness. The Church asked that the people might shout for joy; and He replies with an emphatic reduplication of the word, which implies the exuberance and continuance of the joyful acclaim. The Church asked for favour to the King; and He replies by the promise that the horn of his power shall continually increase, their light of guidance and gladness shall be always his, that victory over all his enemies shall attend his arm, and an ever-blossoming crown his head. Put this in its widest form and what does it come to but that great law of His grace, by which He over-answers all our poor desires, and giving us more than we had expected, shames us out of our distrust. For this law holds for us in all our works and in all our prayers.—A. MACLAREN, Sermons Preached in Manchester, p. 259.

REFERENCES.—CXXXII.—S. Cox, The Pilgrim Psalms, p. 261. CXXXII. 8.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 310. CXXXII. 9.—F. D. Maurice, Sermons, vol. vi. p. 237. CXXXII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 467.

PSALM CXXXIII.

THE American Greely Expedition went into their winter house in 1881, amid the eternal ice and snow of the Arctic Circle, with a night before them of four months and a half. They arranged their reckoning of time so as to keep their Sabbath, and have a religious service, including the reading of the Psalms. The first Sabbath contained Psalm cxxxiii., and the Commander brought before the men the duty of brotherly feeling, and his hope that every one would endeavour to cherish a friendly spirit, and endeavour to reconcile those who might drift into any unpleasant controversy. The result may be found in the fact to which he bears witness, that though 'for months without drinking water, destitute of warmth, with sleeping-bags frozen to the ground, with walls, roof, and floor covered with frost and ice, deprived of sufficient light, heat, or food, they were never without courage, faith, and hope'.—J. K.

REFERENCES.—CXXXIII. 1.—J. W. Bardsley, Many Mansions, p. 320. H. M. Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 282. CXXXIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 475. CXXXIV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 475. CXXXIV.—Ibid. p. 478. CXXXVI. 17-22.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1285. CXXXVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 481.

NATIONAL REPENTANCE

'By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept when we remembered Thee, O Zion.'—PSALM CXXXVII. 1.

THERE are many causes which may well bring the Psalmist's sad words to our lips, 'By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept when we remembered Thee, O Zion'.

I. The present condition of the Christian Church is a spectacle which must arouse sad thoughts as we contrast what is with what was. Is there any greater obstacle to the triumph of Christianity at the present day than the miserable fact that Christians are not agreed among themselves as to what Christianity means? As we think of the loss of spiritual power consequent on this loss of unity, we can but cry with the Psalmist, 'By the waters of Babylon we sit down and weep when we remember Thee, O Zion'. We hear a great deal about the Reunion of Christendom, and many laments are made over the disunion that we see. If reunion is ever to be attained by the Church Militant here on earth, it must be preceded by the penitence of the Christian world. Until we have sorrowed for the sins which have caused and do cause it, until we realize the spiritual force which we have lost by our divisions, until we sorrow for schism as not only an unfortunate inconvenience but as a sin, we cannot expect God will grant the unity for which we pray.

II. Worship, Work, Submission—these are the steps to the assurance of personal protection, of present deliverance from evil. Personal penitence really draws us away from ourselves, and suggests to us worship, work, submission as the primary duties of the penitent life. But the penitence must be personal to begin with. It is our own shortcomings, not those of other people with which we are concerned.—J. H. BERNARD, Via Domini, p. 72.

REFERENCE.—CXXXVII. 1.—E. Blencowe, Plain Sermons to a Country Congregation (2nd Series), p. 484.

THE SONGS OF ZION

'The songs of Zion.'—PSALM CXXXVII. 3.

VARIOUS kinds of song may be classed as songs of Zion.

I. First there is the song of the pardoned penitent. Mark that he does not attempt to praise God until he has asked for the fullest absolution of his foul crimes; and he then declares that if God will wash him, if God will create in him a clean heart, then will be the opening of his lips. In one single sentence this song of Zion is to be sung by the pardoned and the justified believer.

II. Another of the songs of Zion is the song of the adoring creature. And here I am reminded that one of our English divines has drawn a distinction, of which I would not make much, but still which seems to have some element of truth in it, namely, that there is some difference—a difference well worthy at any rate to be noticed, between thanksgiving and praise. When we are thanking God we are directly acknowledging mercies which we, or others for whom we are giving thanks, have received. But in the case of praise we are not necessarily to connect it with a special gift. Look, for instance, at the Psalms of David, the great manual of devotion for believers, both under the New and Old Testament. We find there in the early chapters, but notably in the concluding Psalms, that there is praise rendered to God not simply for mercies that we have received, but for His great acts—for His past acts in the Church, for His past acts in the world, for the laws of nature, for all those marvellous exhibitions of His power and wisdom which are before our eyes; and even the very inanimate creation and the irrational creation are called upon to praise God.

III. Then again we have, as one of the songs of Zion, the song of the recipient of mercy. And here I am speaking, not only of those great mercies which throw into the shade even all the other mercies of God for awhile, but I am speaking of the most ordinary mercies which we receive at God's hands. Do not forget the giver when the freshness of the enjoyment of the mercy is past. It will be well for us to recollect that every mercy, as it is renewed to us day by day, is not to be taken as a matter of course.

IV. Again, there is the song as we read in Scripture of the heaven-bound pilgrims, how they shall come to Zion with songs upon their heads, the redeemed of the Lord. 'Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage;' what does that mean? It means to say that while we are journeying to heaven if we are indeed God's people in Christ Jesus, if we have received and are by humble faith realizing His salvation, and are delivered from the bondage of sin as well as from its burdens, and if we have the blessed gift of the Comforter, the Holy Spirit dwelling within us, that we are not to go onward toward heaven as if every Christian man were the most gloomy being in the world. The joy of the Lord is not only our privilege but our strength.

V. Again, to come closer home there is the song of the sanctuary. When we turn to the Saviour's own example, we find that when He instituted the Holy Sacrament, in which I believe we are not only to commemorate His death, but by living faith are to have spiritual communion with Him, He followed the custom of the festal supper, and gave us an example by singing a hymn before they went from that table.

VI. Lastly, there is one more of the songs of Zion. There is the song of Zion which is to be sung by the glorified above, that song which is to be the utterance—the ceaseless utterance—of their gratitude and praise for all the eternal love wherewith they were loved, for the grace by which they were redeemed, the grace which gave the Saviour, and the grace which brought the Saviour, and the grace which gave the Spirit, and the grace which educated and kept them and brought them home. That will be the song in which they will find that even angels will join them.—J. C. MILLER, Penny Pulpit, vol. xcl. No. 911, p. 9.

REFERENCES.—CXXXVII. 4.—C. Bradley, Faithful Teaching, p. 40. T. Arnold, Sermons, vol. iv. p. 221. H. P. Liddon, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xvi. p. 197.

CHRISTIAN PATRIOTISM

'If I forget Thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning.'—PSALM CXXXVII. 5.

THERE is a blustering and hectoring and noisy patriotism with which religion can have nothing whatever to do. If a man be bad his patriotism never can be good. No sentiment is more human than true patriotism and none is more Divine. It takes the dearest memories of earth and links them with the august purposes of heaven.

I. Now, of course, we will be ready to admit that patriotism is not exclusively a Christian virtue. Much of the noblest patriotism that the world has known has been witnessed in countries that knew nothing of Christ Jesus; the love of country like a mother's love for her children, blossomed and fruited long before Christ was born. Patriotism, then, is not a Christian virtue only. But just as the love of the mother for her child has been ennobled and transfigured by Christ Jesus, so the love of one's country, that is a common heritage implanted in the natural heart by God, has been touched into new glory by Christ Jesus. What are the features then of a distinctive Christian patriotism? To answer that, I shall ask you to think for a moment of the patriotism of Jesus Christ Himself.

II. What then distinguished the patriotism of Jesus? Two features, and (a) first the absence of contempt. There was no scorn of other nationalities, nor was there any disdain of outlanders, in the deep-seated patriotism of Jesus Christ. He never preached beyond the boundaries of His Israel, yet He foresaw the day of a universal Gospel. So for the first time in human history the claims of the whole wide world were recognized, and the disdain that had been part and parcel of true patriotism once, was banished from that Christian grace for ever. (b) The second feature of Christ's patriotism was His recognition that the worst enemies of a people are their sins. To the average Jew the great enemy was Rome, for Rome had enslaved Palestine. To the average Jew the first task of a true patriot was to hurl defiance at that intruding power. It is very significant and very strange that no such defiance fell from the lips of Jesus. He never cried, 'Woe unto you, ye Romans'. He cried 'Woe unto ye, ye Scribes and Pharisees'; and that, too, was the cry of a patriot, only it brought the patriot to Calvary. In the long run, if a nation perishes, it is not another's guns, it is its own sins that ruin it. And so you see that what we call Christian patriotism is a far wider and larger thing than the world knew of once. Wherever men are fighting against evil in their own hearts, in their own village or town, wherever there is a brave and steady effort to give us a purer, a better, and a soberer land, there, there is Christian patriotism just as surely as in the heroic daring of the field of war.—G. H. MORRISON, The Unlighted Lustre, p. 93.

REFERENCE.—CXXXVII. 5.—J. Percival, Some Helps for School Life, p. 264.

IMPERIAL PATRIOTISM

'If I forget Thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember Thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy.'—PSALM CXXXVII. 5, 6.

I. It has been urged that whilst our faith revived virtues which were languishing unto death under the former civilization, and called into existence others unknown, Christianity has been a cruel stepmother to one of the noblest qualities of Paganism. Chastity and pity have come to their full height under the inspiration of Christ, humility and self-sacrifice have been vindicated by His example; but patriotism has been starved. One is haunted with the feeling that in proportion as people become spiritual they cease to be national, and the more they think of the world which is to come, the less they are concerned about the world which is, and especially about that portion which God has given them for a habitation. Let us lay it to heart that if the Church be of God, so also is the State, and that if anyone imagines that religion has loosed him from those civic duties which were a law of love to the Pagan conscience, he really holds that religion is in conflict with the order of God. As a matter of fact the most intensely Christian nations have been the most national—witness the Irish and the Scots, two extremes of rigorous and unbending faith.

II. What Jesus did for patriotism was not to abrogate it, which would have been sorry work for one sprung from the loins of the royal house of Judah, or to depreciate it and set His Church against the State in every century, but to cleanse it from impurities and give it a noble direction. Jesus rendered two services to patriotism and one was to inspire it with a noble mind. Patriotism must labour for the good of all and the injury of none, to build up a nation in faith towards God, and love towards man. Jesus has also taught us by His charity to believe that men of different views may have an equally good intention, and that there may be politics which will rise above parties. If indeed any party should claim to have the monopoly of honesty it is self-condemned; it is the party not of nationalism but of Pharisaism. Nothing can be more unworthy than to impute bad motives to fellow-citizens who attempt the good of the commonwealth by other means than ours, nothing more ungrateful than to belittle the labour of any who serve the State with a true heart.

III. One infers from the spirit of Christianity that the Church as represented by her ministers ought not to meddle with the machinery of politics. It is not for the Church of Christ to play upon the ambition of parties, offering and receiving bribes which are not less binding because they do not happen to be pecuniary, or to agitate the State for the passing of laws. But surely it is within her commission to feed the spirit of nationality in the hearts of the English people, teaching them that as God trained the Jews apart, that they might give His law to the world, so has He placed us in our island home that we may dispense justice to distant nations.—JOHN WATSON, The Inspiration of Our Faith, p. 249.

REFERENCES.—CXXXVII. 5, 6.—C. D. Bell, The Power of God, p. 277. CXXXVII.—B. F. Westcott, The Incarnation and Common Life, p. 41. International Critical Commentary, vol. II. p. 484. Expositor (1st Series), vol. iv. p. 232. CXXXVIII. 8.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 32.

'Forsake not the works of Thine own hands.'—PSALM CXXXVIII. 8.

IN Unorthodox London (2nd Series, pp. 255-60) C. Maurice Davies describes a service at the City Temple. He says that Dr. Parker took as his text the words, 'Forsake not the works of Thine own hands'.

'He proposed to examine the natural claims we had on God. We did not ask to be here in this world, but here we are, and therefore we had a right by nature, by the state of things in which we found ourselves, to say that, under such circumstances, we ought not to be forsaken. It was not enough to bring us here. If we had asked to be brought, then we might have divided the responsibility.

'You yourselves,' he said, 'allow the efficacy of such an appeal. A child, it may be, left you ten years ago, and though that child could not plead virtue, it could groan forth the heart-breaking word, "Bad as I am, I am your own flesh and blood. I have done wrong, but don't let me rot. This flesh is your flesh. May I not come home on that natural claim?" So we could say to God, "Thou didst not make us thoughtlessly. That would have been unworthy of a work which comprised within it the stars and the angels. Don't forsake us."

'Some said,' the preacher continued, 'that as vessels of wrath, God had the right to dash us to pieces just as the potter had the work of his hands. No: God might dispose thus of masses of men, but He dealt differently with individuals. The text was a lawful, a pathetic, and a universal appeal. Now what was God's answer to this pathetic appeal of forsaken men? The whole constitution of nature,' he again submitted, 'was God's answer by anticipation. It would have no meaning else. For every desire of man there was a provision: for his hunger a table, for his thirst fountains of living water—springs perennial and inexhaustible. The answer came before the cry. Nature would be one huge waste if this were not so. When we are asked, "Will God forsake the works of His hands," we may take the whole scheme of nature for our answer. The whole constitution of things—mountains, streams, forests, fowl, and fish—are a pledge that God will not forsake man. He makes His rain to fall and His sun to shine on all—on the man who prays and on the man who blasphemes. You ask what is man's claim on God. This is the infinite reply.

'No bird ever sang the pathetic refrain of the text. The young lion finds his mouthful of food. It is man only that realizes the idea of being forsaken. The greater the life the greater the need, just as it had been curiously said, the more glorious the intellect the nearer to insanity. It is man who cries, "Why standest Thou so far off, O God?" Millions of human voices were gathered up in that cry on the Cross, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" We see man's greatness in his distress. As man suffers more than beast or bird, so he can enjoy and know and realize more. Are ye not much better than they?

'It is we who have forsaken God. The forsakenness is not on man's side. His children have gone from Him to be guests at the devil's table. All we, like sheep, have gone astray.

'Does God forsake the righteous? Don't let us give an opinion to-day. Let an old man speak—a bright old man, with silver locks on his shoulder and an eye like a star. He has a harp in his hand, and thus the old minstrel sings, "I have been young and now am old, yet saw I never the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging their bread". David never saw the child of God dead upon his Father's doorstep. If you are forsaken, ask yourselves whether you have been righteous. Paul and David—the great reasoner and the greater singer—answer, "Cast down, but not forsaken".

'Make His service your delight
He'll make your wants His care.

'The above is only a condensation of a long and eloquent discourse. Some of the bits were worthy of Charles Dickens. For instance, picturing the abode of a poor widow, Dr. Parker spoke of "a place out of which even a sheriff's officer could not take more than the shadow, and would not take that because he could not sell it". "I have been as nearly forsaken as any man in the world. I looked around on all sides, but could see no way out—no lateral way, only a vertical one!"

REFERENCES.—CXXXVIII. 8.—A. Maclaren, Old Testament Outlines, p. 152. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. p. 231. Ibid. vol. xxv. No. 1506. A. P. Peabody, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xii. p. 158.

THE SEARCHING OF GOD

'O Lord, Thou hast searched me, and known me.'—PSALM CXXXIX. 1.

WE are prone to associate the searching-work of God with events of a striking or memorable kind. It is in great calamities and overwhelming sorrow that we feel with peculiar vividness God's presence. When Job was in the enjoyment of prosperity he was an eminently reverent man; but it was in the hour of his black and bitter midnight that he cried out, 'The hand of God hath touched me'. And that same spirit lodges in every breast, so that God's searching comes to be associated with hours when life is shaken to its deeps, and when all the daughters of music are laid low. Now the point to be noted is, that in this Psalm the writer is not thinking of such hours. There is no trace that he has suffered terribly, or been plunged into irreparable loss. 'Thou knowest my downsitting and my uprising'—my usual, ordinary, daily life—it was there that the Psalmist recognized the searching; it was there that he woke to see that he was known.

I. We are searched and known by the slow and steady passing of the years. There is a revealing power in the flight of time, just because time is the minister of God. In heaven there will be no more time; there will be no more need of any searching ministry. There we shall know even as we are known in the burning and shining of the light of God. But here, where the light of God is dimmed and broken, we are urged forward through the course of years, and the light of the passing years achieves on earth what the light of the Presence will achieve in glory.

II. Then once again God searches all of us by the responsibilities He lays upon us. It is in our duties and not in our romance that the true self is searched and known. Think of those servants in the parable who got the talents. Could you have gauged their character before they got the talents? Were they not all respectable and honest, and seemingly worthy of their Master's confidence? But to one of the servants the Master gave five talents, to another two, and to another one, and what distinguished and revealed the men was the use they made of that responsibility. They were not searched by what they had to suffer; the men were searched by what they had to do. They were revealed by what their Master gave, and by the use they made of what they got.

III. Once more, God has a way of searching us by lifting our eyes from the detail to the whole. He sets the detail in its true perspective, and seeing it thus, we come to see ourselves. You note how the writer of this Psalm proceeds: 'Thou knowest my down-sitting and my uprising,' he says. These are details; little particular actions; the unconsidered events of every day. But the writer does not stop with these details—he passes on to the survey of his life: 'Thou compassed my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways'.

We are all prone to be blinded by detail, so that we scarcely realize what we are doing. There are lines of conduct which we would never take if we only realized all that they meant. There are certain sins to which we would never yield, if we but saw them in their vile completeness. But the present is so tyrannical and sweet, and the action of the hour is so absorbing, that we cannot see the forest for the trees, nor reckon out the course that we are taking. We often say, looking back upon our sufferings, 'We wonder how we ever could have borne it'. One secret of our bearing it was this, that we only suffered one moment at a time. And so, looking back upon our foolish past, we sometimes say, 'How ever could we do it?' and one secret of our doing it was this, that we only acted one moment at a time. When a man is dimly conscious he is wrong, he has a strange power of forgetting yesterday. When a man is hurrying to fulfil his passion, he shuts his ears to the calling of to-morrow. And the work of God is to revive that yesterday, and tear the curtain from the sad to-morrow, and show a man his action of to-day set in the general story of his life.

IV. Again, God has a common way of searching us, by showing us our own case in another's life. We may never know ourselves until we see ourselves divested of all the trappings of self-love.

V. Does not God search us by bringing new influences to bear upon our lives? Some one enters the circuit of our being, and the light they bring illuminates ourselves. We are all prone in our ordinary course to settle down into a dull routine. The vision of the highest fades away from us, and we go forward without high ambition. Our feelings lose their freshness and their zest, and we are not eager and strenuous as we once were, and we are content with far lower levels now than would have contented us in earlier days. All this may come to a man, and come so gradually that he hardly notices all that he has lost. His spiritual life has grown so dull and dead that prayer is a mockery and joy is flown. Then we meet one whom we have not seen for years, one who has wrestled heavenward 'gainst storm and tide—and in that moment we realize it all. Nothing is said to blame or to rebuke us. The influence lies deeper than all speech. Nothing is done to make us feel ashamed. We may be welcomed with the old warmth of friendship. But there is something in that nobler life, suddenly brought into contact with our own, that touches the conscience, and shows us to ourselves, and quickens us to the shame that is medicinal.—G. H. MORRISON, The Return of the Angels, p. 109.

PSALM CXXXIX. I.

RUSKIN says of this Psalm: 'All the true religions of the world are forms of the prayer, "Search me and know my heart: prove me and examine my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting". And there are, broadly speaking, two ways in which the Father of men does this: the first, by making them eager to tell their faults to Him themselves (Father, I have sinned against heaven and before Thee); the second, by making them sure they cannot be hidden, if they would: "If I make my bed in hell, behold, Thou art there".'

REFERENCES.—CXXXIX. 1.—J. Keble, Sermons for Easter to Ascension Day, p. 97. CXXXIX. 1, 2.—C. Vince, The Unchanging Saviour, p. 21. CXXXIX. 1-3.—Bishop Temple, Rugby Sermons (1st Series), p. 178. CXXXIX. 1-6.—W. G. T. Shedd, American Pulpit of To-day, vol. i. p. 281. CXXXIX. 1-12.—E. W. Shalders, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xi. p. 328. H. Woodcock, Sermon Outlines, p. 133. CXXXIX. 7.—Bishop Bethell, Sermons, vol. i. p. 351. A. P. Perbody, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xx. p. 118. P. McAdam Muir, Modern Substitutes for Christianity, p. 65. CXXXIX. 9.—A. P. Stauley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xiv. p. 257.

THE COMFORT OF GOD'S OMNIPRESENCE

'If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there Thy right hand shall hold me.'—PSALM CXXXIX. 9, 10.

I. THE greatest comfort in all hours of separation is the idea of God. When you are to be divided from a friend by an earthly sea there can be no deeper solace than the thought that you and he are to be really within the hollow of a single hand—that, while unable to touch one another, you will be in the presence of one who is touching you both. And when there comes the separation of that widest sea—death, there is again no solace so deep as that. At such a time what do I want to know? Is it whether the streets of heaven are paved with gold? Is it whether the songs of heaven are rich in music? Is it whether the work of heaven is wrought by angels? It is none of these things. It is whether in this vast universe beyond the earth there is anything which can connect my life with the life of my departed brother.

II. What a comfort to be told that, with all our seeming separation, we are still inmates of the same house—the house of God! That is just what the Psalmist says. He says that absolute separation between two souls is an impossibility—that the wings of the morning can never lift outside the gates of God. If you had departed into the far-off land and I, lingering here, had a message to send you, I should not, like Adelaide Procter, make music the medium of transmission. That would be wireless telegraphy; the song might reach the wrong quarter. But if I knew there was an invisible being in the universe who, spite of the poles of distance, had one hand on you and the other on me, I should find my medium of communication in him. I should say, 'Convey into the heart of my friend the impression that he is still remembered by me, still loved by me, still longed for by me'.

III. If a man feels himself in contact with God, he is in contact with all worlds. I once heard an old woman express great confidence that she would meet her departed husband beyond the grave. Experimenting on her understanding I said, 'Of course in that vast district it may take some time to find him'. She answered, 'It will need no time; I shall just ask Christ to take me to my husband, and He will take me at once'. With all its crudeness and primitiveness, the answer was on the lines of Herbert Spencer. If all the forces of the universe are the parts of one central force, that central force can at any moment unite them all: the wings of the morning can do nothing to divide.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 196.

'If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there shall Thy hand lead me.'—PSALM CXXXIX. 9, 10.

From this text Bishop Selwyn preached on the Sunday after his arrival in Auckland in 1842. In the afternoon of the same day, to the astonishment of all, he conducted a service in the Maori language, so quickly had he learned it while on his voyage out.

REFERENCES.—CXXXIX. 11.—H. N. Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 245 (P.B.V.). M. G. Glazebrook, Prospice, p. 241. CXXXIX. 12.—B. Gregory, How to Steer a Ship, p. 50. CXXXIX. 13-24.—E. W. Shalders, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xi. p. 360. CXXXIX. 14.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons, p. 306. J. Baldwin Brown, Christian World Pulpit, vol. vi. p. 321.

PSALM CXXXIX. 16.

RUSKIN says: 'Was the great precipice shaped by His finger, as Adam was shaped out of the dust?

Were its clefts and ledges carved upon it by its Creator, as the letters were on the 'Tables of the Law? The only answer is—"Behold the cloud". No eye ever "saw its substance, yet being imperfect"; its history is a monotone of endurance and destruction; all that we can certainly know of it is that it was once greater than it is now, and it only gathers vastness and still gathers, as it fades into the abyss of the unknown.'

REFERENCES.—CXXXIX. 10.—Bishop Bethell, Sermons, vol. i. p. 369. CXXXIX. 17.—W. L. Alexander, Sermons, p. 191. Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 121.

STILL WITH THEE

'When I awake, I am still with Thee.'—PSALM CXXXIX. 18.

A MAN whose religion is of a shallow kind is content with occasional acknowledgment of God. He has his stated seasons of approach, and his rigid periods of worship. There are long times when, as the Psalmist says, God is not in all his thoughts. He wages his warfare on the field of business in total forgetfulness of the Divine. That is one mark of a religious life which is neither very deep nor very real; it never issues in spiritual strength, nor in the bright experience of joy. Now in the book of Psalms it is not so. The Psalmist's recognition is continuous. What you feel about the Psalmist is just this, that always he sets the Lord before him. And it is this continual recognition, and this unvarying practice of God's presence, which kindle the Psalmist when he is discouraged, and bring the joy that cometh in the morning. When we go to sleep mastered by some thought, that thought is still beside us when we wake. If it be trouble on which we closed our eyes, how swiftly in the morn does it return! And it was because the Psalmist lived with God, and went to sleep under the wing of God, that he could take his pen and write in all sincerity, 'When I awake, I am still with Thee'.

Now I want to widen out that thought, for human life has various awakings.

I. And in the first place we might apply it to the waking of the child into maturity. God is with us in our sorest duty. God is with us in our heaviest sorrow. God is with us in our humblest task, if only it be valiantly done. And this is the joy of it when we awake, that through all we strive to do, and all we bear, God and His grace become more wonderful than in the earlier morning when we dreamed.

II. Again our text has a deep application when we think of the awaking to new knowledge. Through every increase and advance of knowledge the heart still hungers for the living God. We never outgrow that, no matter what we learn. We never get beyond it or above it. The heart and God were made for one another, and only in that communion is there rest.

III. Once more, our text is full of meaning when we think of the waking from spiritual lethargy. I believe that the long-suffering of God shines brightest, not against our blackest sins, but against those periods when we were slumberous, and when the eyes of our trust were sealed in sleep.

IV. I think, too, we should bear our text in mind in view of any time of crushing sorrow. In all great sorrow there is something numbing, an insensibility like that of sleep. It is one of the triumphs of our modern medicine that it can apply opiates so powerfully. A prick of a needle or a little sprinkling, and one forgets the agony of pain. But God has His opiates no less than man, reserved for the hours when the physician fails, so that the mourner says, 'I cannot take it in—it is like a dream—I cannot realize it'. There is mercy in that numbing of the spirit. The worst might be unbearable without it. When vividness of perception would be torture, God giveth to His beloved sleep.

V. Does not our text apply to the last awaking in eternity? 'I shall be satisfied when I awake,' and satisfied because I am with Thee.—G. H. MORRISON, The Return of the Angels, p. 290.

ALWAYS WITH GOD

'When I awake, I am still with Thee.'—PSALM CXXXIX. 18

UNDER what conditions did the Psalmist make this declaration? He said, 'When I awake I am still with Thee'. Where else had he been? He had been asleep; the reference is to natural sleep, but I am going to broaden the outlook and say next to nothing about that natural sleep. Still, confined to that little event, it is a very marvellous text. 'When I awake, I am still with Thee.' I have been in the darkness, and I should have been lost there, my dream teacher was grim, and the darkness was full of nightmare and sorrow and bitterness, but lo, when I awake, it is all right, I am still in my bed, I am still in safety, I am still in my house, I am still with Thee.

I. 'When I awake,' let us take that in its more ideal and poetic sense, in its higher intellectual aspect, and let us begin by saying how well we know what it is for a man to have his eyes opened, and yet not to be awake. We characterize some persons as sleepy, not alert, allowing chances to pass by, seeing nothing; it would require all God's thunder to get an idea into their heads. So we speak of them, so we characterize them: let us take care lest we are taking our own portraits, lest we are indicating our own intellectual and spiritual condition.

1. When I awake intellectually I am still with Thee; once I did not seem to have any mind; as for intellect, I did not know the meaning of the word. I begin to see somewhat of it now in dim outline, and what I do see I like, for there is a light even in the shadow. The weary, trying, weakening thing is that men who can be alert in business and bargaining are absolutely and wilfully half-asleep when the question is God, prayer, forgiveness, immortality. That is so strange and so wearying to the poor heart.

2. When I awake spiritually I am astounded at myself. I knew nothing about myself; I thought I was good enough so far as time permitted me to be good and circumstances allowed me to look after my own conduct, but when I awoke I saw that there was something finer than conduct, behind it, beneath it, above it. What was that ethereal, spiritual something? It was motive, disposition, spiritual impulse, moral intent. Conduct was a thing that was marked up in plain figures in the window, and I could go and buy it, and wear it, and look as respectable as other men; but when I awoke spiritually I saw that what I really needed was not something marked in plain figures in the window, but a new heart, a new life, new sensitiveness, in other words, a grander, a new personality. I thought life a run, a rattle, a feast, a wedding, a burial; I now see that all these poor outlines are nothing except in so far as they indicate that behind them all and above them all there is a spirit, a slumbering immortality.

II. Thus it is so all the way through. When I am awake and take a wakeful man's view of God's providence, I see how much God has been doing in the sleeping time. I used to call all these things events; in my fancy I published a morning journal, and called the leading column Events of the Day. Now that I am awake, at noonday awake, throbbing in every pulse, quivering in every nerve, I see that events make up a great Bible, a marvellous revelation; I see that God takes up these little patches, and so to say makes of them a great coverlet, a great area of philosophy, experience, and suggestion. Oh that men would connect things, bring them up into coherency and unity and final meaning.

III. Now the singer says, 'When I awake, I am still with Thee'. Always with God, without knowing it sometimes. I now begin to see that I live and move and have my being in God. Oh, it is all so mystic, so wondrous! I used to desire to fall asleep that I might forget everything; I have got so far on the road of progress that I sometimes say in my poor bedside prayer, 'Lord, send me to-night a dream of comfort, a dream of light, a dream of song'. And then I do this, as you do it—which is the most perilous experiment that a man can conduct or have any hand in conducting—I fall asleep. We have taken the poetry out of that expression and made it flat prose. 'I fell asleep,' says the man who does not know what sleep means in its innermost purpose and providential interpretation. That a man should willingly and eagerly go out of himself, leave himself as a half-dead thing on his feather-bed, and go away whence he may never return—oh, that is surely, if properly interpreted and understood, a deeply religious act. And yet men who throw themselves into that invisible power and presence and sanctuary called Sleep, dare not throw themselves by faith into the heart of God.

IV. 'I am still with Thee.' One man said this in other words on a very remarkable occasion. He fell asleep wearied, fatigued, exhausted, self-despising in some degree; he fell asleep among the stones, he could not keep his eyes open, and therefore he fell into natural slumber. And as the morning crept on and all things showed themselves in a grey light, he arose, and looking round upon all the spectres of cloud and mist and growing light, he said, 'I am in the house of God, this is the gate of heaven, and I knew it not'. With true wakefulness comes true religion. Get intellectually alert, and you will begin to be religious. The universe is a less place to the fool than it is to the wise man. Have we not all hours of darkness? Are there not times when we cannot see the star? and yet when we sleep, partially at least, through the weary night there comes a great evangel, a great revelation on the white hills of the east, and we say, 'Why, we must have been mistaken, it was not darkness, at least it was that kind of darkness which is a quality of light. This is none other than the house of God.' 'These are the experiences that thief cannot steal, that moth and rust cannot corrupt. We must pass through them personally and really, and not try to live upon the leavings of other souls. Then what shall come to pass? We shall say, as the east whitens and the opal rises which will die in crimson, 'Lo! this is none other than the house of God—God—God'.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 252.

DIVINE SCRUTINY AND GUIDANCE

'Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me, and know my thoughts: and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.'—PSALM CXXXIX, 23, 24.

THE Psalmist sets forth in poetry what theology calls the doctrine of the Divine omniscience. He believes in Jehovah, the God of all the earth, and therefore believes in a Providence so universal that it misses nothing.

I. God's providence is everywhere, but it does not dissipate itself in a mere general supervision of creation. It is all-seeing, all-surrounding, all-embracing, but it is not diffused in matter and dispersed through space. The Psalmist dwells on what that means, how there is no limit to God's knowledge of him. The strange and awe-inspiring thought is borne in on him that the God with whom he has to do has a perfect knowledge of him, that the whole life and soul lie open and naked before Him. No spot of creation is empty of God. Whither can he go from God's spirit, or whither can he flee from His presence? The practical ethical thought suggested by such a conception to the Psalmist is the question, how can God, the pure and holy One, with such an intimate and unerring knowledge, tolerate wicked men? He feels he must separate himself from the men who live in revolt against good and who hate God. But he is not content with such moral indignation against others. He is driven in to consider the state of his own heart, and to be willing to open up his whole nature to the Divine scrutiny that he may be purged from evil.

II. Divine examination and Divine guidance are the two petitions of the prayer; and the two are not only connected, but are dependent on each other. We all in some form know and admit the value of some sort of examination of life, the need of some kind of judgment and test; and we know that life and character are weighed on some balance or other. Religion also seeks for self-examination. Any kind of self-judgment is better than none; for there is always a chance of learning the truth, and of discovering duty. There is another kind of examination we are constantly undergoing—the judgment of others. We are always incurring criticism, the attempt of others to estimate our work and our worth. The world judges results. It cannot take account of motives or even of opportunities. Outside criticism cannot avoid being largely surface criticism. In the region especially of character, such examination constantly errs. On the whole, self-examination has a better chance of arriving at a true state of affairs.

III. But here is a judgment, both from without and from within, which can test the life. It is to this the Psalmist offers himself, to a judgment that is unerring, a scrutiny that is both just and merciful, an examination that will set for him a standard by which he can examine himself. All the methods of self-examination most approved of by the masters of devotional life will not themselves lead a man to the way everlasting. The Psalmist is not thinking of any such methods, or even of self-scrutiny at all when he asks to be searched and tried. It is the recognition and acceptance of God that he feels is the important thing. He would have God hold his hand and lead him in the way of life. He would turn the scrutiny into guidance; and this is done by simple surrender.—HUGH BLACK, Christ's Service of Love, p. 158.

THE SIGH OF THE SINCERE

'Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me, and know my thoughts: and see if there be any way of wickedness in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.'—PSALM CXXXIX, 23, 24.

IN this wonderful Psalm the Divine attributes of omnipresence and omniscience are most eloquently set forth. It is a large subject; but the writer does not lose himself in immensity—he recognizes its immediate personal bearing. 'O Lord, Thou hast searched me, and known me. Thou knowest my downsitting and mine uprising. Thou understandest my thought afar off. Thou searchest out my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways.' And the moral bearing of the solemn theme is felt by the Psalmist to be of the first consequence. He does not contemplate the Divine immanence and transcendence like a poet, nor treat it as a philosopher, metaphysician, or theologian. He is fully alive to the fact that the all-pervading Spirit is the Spirit of righteousness.

I. The Examination Invoked.

1. Mark the range of this examination. 'Search me, O God, and know my heart.' Bishop Horsley's translation reads: 'O Jehovah, Thou hast explored me, and Thou knowest me'. God knows him because He has explored him. The Psalmist stands perplexed before the mystery of his own being; he is at once ignorant of himself and yet mistrustful of himself; he does not know himself, yet knows himself suffi-

ently well to suspect himself; therefore he appeals to the Spirit who searcheth all things. How true it is that we are mainly unknown to ourselves; that within us are unexplored regions; that our heart is substantially undiscovered! Schopenhauer one day strayed into the Royal Gardens of Berlin; and when an officer inquired of him, 'Who are you, sir?' the philosopher responded, 'I don't know; I shall be glad if you can tell me'. The officer reported him for a lunatic; but he was far from that—he was one who had deeply pondered the mystery of personality, and was accordingly puzzled by it.

Our personality is largely unmapped; the heights and depths of the soul, its capacities and forces, its possibilities for good and evil, are only dimly perceived and faintly understood. We know more of the world outside than we do of the universe within us. The psychological Columbus has not yet arrived; no Cortez has yet scaled the peaks of the soul.

But what is beyond our ken is set in the light of God's countenance.

2. The depth of this examination. 'And know my thoughts.' 'My inward thoughts, my distant thoughts, the thoughts not yet come into my mind.' Ewald translates this, 'Prove me, and know my dreams'. Not the dreams of the night, which are fantastic and negligible; but the waking dream, the first ghostly inception of the act. All acts are first dreams, too faint for definition, too elusive for anything like satisfactory explanation; and evil acts are first evil dreams so shadowy as apparently to be without serious signification. Every robbery is first transacted in the phantom gold of imagination; murder is first rehearsed within the closed doors of secret malice; we lie in our heart before we lie with our tongue; the unclean act is born in a sullied fancy; deeds of pride, covetousness, and ambition are first dalliances with mental imagery and emotional moods apparently far from reality. Our dreams indicate what we potentially are, they forecast what we may actually become, and they have a strange trick of fulfilling themselves. Yes, this is the main matter—what we mean in our heart of hearts, what lies at the bottom of our heart. 'All mind finally becomes visible.'

It is one thing to examine ourselves; it is another to surrender ourselves unreservedly to the Divine criticism. When, in 1896, the engineers were planning the foundations for the Williamsburg Bridge, New York, the deepest of their twenty-two borings was a hundred and twelve feet below high water. Steel drills had indicated bed-rock from twelve to twenty feet higher than was the actual case; the diamond drill, however, showed the supposed bed-rock to be merely a deposit of boulders. So the diamond drill of God pierces our self-delusions, detects the fallacy of our assumptions, proves what we thought sterling to be only stones of emptiness, discloses the very truth of things far down the secret places of the soul.

3. The severity of this examination. 'Try me.' 'Prove me.' He is willing to be subjected to severe discipline that the falseness and foulness of nature shall be seven-fold purified. In the Revised Version the third verse stands, 'Thou searchest out my path and my lying down'. But the margin reads 'Thou winnowest my path'—a close and cleansing scrutiny. As the thresher separates the golden corn from the valueless chaff, so the Psalmist prays that the Divine Analyst will deliver him from whatever is gross and worthless.

The consummate ability of Stas, the Belgian chemist, is celebrated because he 'eliminated from his chemicals every trace of that pervasive element, sodium, so thoroughly that even its spectroscopic detection was impossible'. But such is the efficacy of Divine grace that it can eliminate so thoroughly every trace of that pervasive and persistent element known as sin that we may be presented before the throne holy and unreprouvable and without blemish. That the sincere may attain this purification, they are prepared to pass through the hot fires of bitter and manifold discipline.

II. The Design of this Examination.—The ulterior purpose, as expressed by the text, is twofold.

1. Deliverance from our own way of life. Our own way is a way of emptiness. Some would translate these words, 'any way of idols in me'. It signifies the vanity, the unreality, the delusiveness of the objects on which the natural man fixes his ambition and hope. We sometimes say of a thing, 'There is nothing in it'. We may say this of wealth, honour, pleasure, fame; if we make idols of them, we know that an idol is nothing in the world. If I follow the desires and devices of my own heart, I walk in a vain show and disquiet myself in vain. Our own way is a way of pain. 'See if there is any way of grievousness in me.' Our own way is a way of destruction. Not leading to a goal of lasting felicity, but descending into darkness and despair. The other petition seeks—

2. Guidance in God's way. 'And lead me in the way everlasting.' The way of final peace, security, and progress; of imperishable strength, full felicity, and of eternal life.—W. L. WATKINSON, The Fatal Barter, pp. 95-109.

GOD'S MICROSCOPE

'Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me, and know my thoughts: and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.'—PSALM CXXXIX. 23, 24.

LET us look at the request preferred, a request for the scrutiny of God to examine David's heart, then the acknowledgment which the Psalmist makes; and then the purpose which he proposes—leading in the way everlasting.

I. Let us look at the request: 'Search me, O Lord, and examine my heart: try me, and know my thoughts'. This is a rare desire, taken in all its comprehensiveness. It is not a common thing for a man to desire anything that is calculated to wound his pride or mortify his vanity. The man must have been very sincere towards himself, and must have been very anxious to be sincere towards God, before he ever could have preferred such a request as this. Then this desire shows that David had made considerable progress in the things of God. No man who is not influenced by religious principles can with sincerity offer this prayer. A man may feel, for instance, a desire for deeper acquaintance with God; but that does not necessarily imply a knowledge of religion; for we know that unbelievers have desired to know about Him who everywhere gives manifestations of His power. But show me a man who is anxious to know how many secret evils are lurking and undetected in his moral nature; show me a man who is anxious that God should bring into the full blaze of Divine truth all the evils in his heart, and you show me a man who is anxious for holiness.

II. Next David's acknowledgments, first of the omnipotence and omniscience of God; second that that omniscience alone can search his heart. (a) First the omnipotence and omnipresence of God; the Psalm is a treatise on the omniscience and omnipresence of Jehovah. He ascends to the height of heaven, then to the depths of hell; He fills the whole of nature, and David feels that everywhere God is at his side, and His eye upon him; that he cannot escape from that glance, either in heaven or hell, or in the infinite space. (b) And the next acknowledgment is that this omniscience alone could search him; that if he was to do it effectually God was to do it with His glance. What deep conviction David must have had of the depravity of his heart when he felt that no glance but the glance Divine could search his heart.

III. There is next a gracious purpose proposed—to lead in the way everlasting. Now David did not want to know himself merely out of curiosity, he did not want to know himself that he might see how much good was in him, but that he might know the bad that was in him. There was another thing—self-examination should lead to correction. It would have been sheer hypocrisy if David knew that there had been any way of wickedness in him; if he knew that there were wrongs uncorrected it was his business to correct the wrongs he did know before asking God to show him other wrongs. We must correct ourselves as fast as we know ourselves if there be any good in self-examination. It would be in vain to attempt to conquer a country leaving enemies behind, and so it is in spiritual life. It is not for you to leave enemies behind you, foes unconquered, and then for you to ask God to show you foes that you might fight them; but you must master every rood of the field over which you march, and then when every foe is conquered you may say, 'Thou hast led me in the way everlasting'.—R. ROBERTS, Penny Pulpit, vol. xvl No. 934, p. 193.

REFERENCES.—CXXXIX. 23, 24.—J. Keble, Sermons for Lent to Passiontide, p. 253. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (10th Series), p. 222. CXXXIX. 24.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 903. CXXXIX.—J. Martineau, Endeavour After the Christian Life, n. 12. International Critical Commentary, vol.

ii. p. 401. CXL. 12.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 310. CXL.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 402.

OUR WORDS

'Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips.'—PSALM CXLI. 3.

THE occasion which called forth the Psalm was no doubt the rebellion of David's son, Absalom. And it may be that in a fit of penitential grief for the hard things he has said, he calls upon God to make him more careful in the future.

I. First, the careless word. Be on your guard against this. You spoke lightly, may be, of the Saviour's Name on some occasion. You spoke slightly of religion. Some child or little one in the kingdom, some weak one just entering in, perhaps, was standing by and heard you. It changed the course of his life. It changed it for worse. You jested once on sacred things. Some soul was hesitating as to whether it should take this path or that. You decided. It was the wrong path. A careless word from you has wrought a soul's perdition! This is the idle word of which men must give account.

II. Now for a pleasanter word—a word which we may well search for in ourselves and be happy if we find it—the word of transparent truthfulness. What is truth? Well might Pilate ask. But we at least know that truthfulness is the best thing in words. One of the best traits of any character, and the trait which above all others suffers us to repose our confidence in a man, is his truthfulness. What is required of every man is that he be a truth speaker.

III. The word of minor untruthfulness. This is sometimes called the white lie. We can lie most abominably by half-truths. We may make it a safe rule, that if any statement has any intention of being a half-truth we have no right to use it. White lies and half-truths and insincere speeches are not to be countenanced by Christian men and women.

IV. The angry word. Is this ever justifiable? May we use it and yet be blameless? There are occasions upon which we may. There is a righteous anger. We read of Christ being angered. But it was a just and well-balanced anger. It was never misplaced. It was directed with wholesome purpose, and always against evil. Above all things, avoid words of merely selfish anger.

V. The little word. Only a syllable. Only yes or no. You might have said it or you might not. But, oh, the difference if you had or had not. It had the power to make or mar the day for you or some one else. We never really know what may be the end of any small beginning. We never know what great structure may at last be reared upon a tiny word.

VI. The profane word. We are to guard against the profane word in any shape. And none of us are quite guiltless. Profane speech in all its branches is hateful and an offence unto God. No man can of himself regulate his word: we need the help and guidance of the Holy Spirit. We must invoke His aid in this matter. We must see what His influence is in our hearts.

REFERENCES.—CXLII. 3.—Buxton, The School of Christ, p. 87. CXLII. 4.—C. Perren, Revival, p. 319. CXLII. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xviii. No. 1049. CXLII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 506.

THE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SECOND PSALM

PSALM CXLII.

I. LIFE and liberty are sweet but we may pay too dear a price even for the sweetest things. David is now at liberty; he has escaped out of the prison-house of Gath; but he has made his escape and obtained his liberty at much too great a price. For years past the name of Gath had been the proudest name that David's flatterers could speak in his willing ears. But after his disgraceful escape from that city to David's old age, it brought a cloud to his brow and a blush to his cheek to hear the name of Gath. But then it is out of such degradation and shame that weak and evil men rise on stepping-stones of their own transgressions to true honour and wisdom, to stable godliness and exercised virtue. And no man will be dishonoured or degraded who speaks to himself about himself as David spake to himself as he climbed to his mountain cave in Adullam: 'What time I am again afraid I will trust in the Most High. . . . In God I will put my trust in my next trouble; I will not fear again what flesh shall do to me, for I have learned that Thou tellest my wanderings, that Thou puttest my tears into Thy bottle, and that my name is in Thy book.'

II. The prophet Gad puts a whole volume into two verses in connexion with David's life. 'David,' he says, 'escaped from Gath and came to the cave of Adullam; when his brethren and his father's house heard of it they went thither down to him, and every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented gathered themselves unto him; and he became a captain over them; and there were with him about four hundred men.'

III. 'I will take sentry myself to-night,' said David to his captains one Sabbath evening after Gad and Abiathar had sanctified the day, and blessed with an evening blessing the four hundred; 'May God give His sleep to every hammock, for I will be sentinel myself to-night'. Wrapping around him the cloak that Michal had worked for him in happier days, and taking in his hand Goliath's sword, David paced the rocky shelves and poured out his full heart to God all that Sabbath night. We are thankful for this dramatic 142nd Psalm; but it would have been a grand piece of devotional literature, aye of national history, had we had all that David said to God that sentinel night; but what he did say was not fitted or intended for any human ear. As Hezekiah showed to God the insulting letter, so David showed Him all the insults and injuries he had suffered at the hands of Saul, and no doubt it was at such moments that revenge and retaliation gave way to godly sorrow and pity, till David was able to forget his trouble and forgive his enemy.

IV. Calmed and quieted with his midnight prayer under the open heaven, the sentry halted on his scabbard, and mused and meditated on all the marvellous way the Lord had led him from the pastures of Bethlehem up to the cave of Adullam. And if at any time he felt the banishment of Adullam—and he had a thousand thoughts during those lonely hours—he soon recollected who held the keys; and though the door had been opened he would not have escaped. 'Bring my soul out of prison' was his last word to God, as the day broke in the east, 'that I may praise Thy name; the righteous shall compass me about; for Thou shalt deal bountifully with me'. And how well was that hope fulfilled to David, how bountifully did God deal with David, and how hath the righteous compassed David about, as rapt listeners compass round the sweetest music, as rejoicing fellow-worshippers compass round a miracle of Divine grace, so in all ages will the righteous compass David about. —ALEXANDER WHYTE.

MEMORABLE DAYS

'I remember the days. . . .'—PSALM CXLIII. 5.

I. 'I REMEMBER the days'—when there were no days; I remember the period before duration was broken up into fragmentary hours and perishable opportunities; my time enables me to go back by spiritual interpretation and ideality into the chambers of the infinite, the eternal presence.

'I remember the days:' I have written them down in my book kept in the treasure-house of mine heart; no thief can break through and steal; the days are my own, the history is a gathering of nuggets which I can melt and mint into the current coin which I need for to-day's spending. Poor is he who has no yesterday; an atheist he must be who does not live in the days that are gone, and does not so live in them as to appropriate other men's experience and add it to his own wisdom. We might all be rich; the memory should be a bank, nay, more, it should be a gold mine, it should be a peculiar and an inexhaustible treasure.

The days are very many, we can name but a few of them, but the few should represent the multitude. Our subject is Memorable Days, days that can never be forgotten; days that created a place for themselves in the field of the memory; days of strife and temple-building and triumph and sorrow unutterable; yet all the days accumulate into a day, the many becoming unified, the unity glowing like an altar on the highways of time.

II. Who does not remember what the Psalmist calls in Psalm cxi. 7 the day of battle? Recall the battle as your own; recall the victory as God's. God appoints the battle, God knows exactly how much fighting is good for us. History is made by fighters; let us always fight in the right spirit, and for the right object, then we shall be in God's majority, though we may be overturned and overbourne for a moment, and though it may be said that we were borne down by an overwhelming mediocrity—a much better word than majority!

III. Who is there that cannot recall what Nahum in the first chapter and seventh verse of his Burden calls the day of trouble? Man is born unto trouble as the sparks fly upward. Poor is the life that has had no trouble day; it is a mean, frivolous, shallow life. Trouble works miracles of sculpture in the countenance and miracles of music in the voice, and gives the hand a new masonry when it shakes some outstretched hand of love. Trouble may have been one of our best friends; it shattered many an idol, it showed just what windows were southward and what windows opened upon the black north. Consult experience; have long conversation with the man whose house has for many a day been in the dark valley; he will help thee, he knows how to pray; his prayer may be brief, but in the power of Christ it reaches heaven and brings back the light you need.

IV. And there is a day called in the Scriptures, notably in 2 Cor. vi. 2, the day of salvation. Jesus Christ used an equivalent expression in the house of Zaccheus; said He, 'This day is salvation come to this house'; your day was a day of bondage, to-day is a day of salvation; yesterday you were slaves, to-day you are free men. Salvation is one of the greatest words in all language; it is as great as love, it is as glorious as light, it is as welcome as rain when the earth has been famishing for want of water.

V. In Eccles. vii. 1 we read of another day, common day, 'the day of death'. There is no discharge in that war. You may have company until the last day and the last noon of that day and the last sunset of that day, but after that you must go alone. There are some fifty odd yards of life's pilgrimage that every pilgrim must walk alone.

VI. There is another day referred to in Genesis xxxii. 26, 'the day breaketh'; the breaking day, the dawning day, the larger light, the Sabbath day. There is poetry in the very word day-break; it is a poem in a hyphenated word. 'Till the day break and the shadows flee away:' we wait for the day! When Paul and his co-voyagers were in Adria, the historian says that they did all that lay in their power, and then they waited for the day; in still more explicit and holy language, they wished for the day. There is liberation in light. There is no gaol so deep and so unbearable as the prison of darkness; we know not what it holds, we cannot tell what loathsome beast may be one stride of our standing-place, we cannot tell but that if we move we shall dash our brains out against some protruding rock. What then do we do? we wish for the light, we wish for the day; one little beam would signify liberty, one laugh of light would signify and herald a festival of joy—alive! That is what we want. O ye great poets, sing of the day, repeat your prayer, it suits eloquent lips like yours—light! When the Amen of God comes the morning will shine upon the rejoicing and liberated earth.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. 1. p. 150.

THE SOLDIER'S REST

'Hear me, O Lord, and that soon. . . . For Thy righteousness sake bring my soul out of trouble.'—PSALM CXLIII. 7-11.

THERE you have the transition of a soul from the rest which it needed in long conflict and many failures, from the rest, to the energy of a new service. 'Show me the way that I should walk in.' 'Quicken me, O Lord, according to Thy Word.' We need rest and may claim it at various times. If men will but taste deeply of the fountain of that rest, they will, before they know it, be roused up in new strength to the new service, and so it would be quite well to think of the promises of rest, and the duty of leaning all our weight upon God.

I. The Nature of the Rest.—First, then, about the rest itself, which is not a rest of sloth, a rest from toil. It is a rest from the strain of poverty, or the strain of covetousness and ambition. Found in pleasure, in the satisfaction of our desires? No; found in the spirit of contentment. We rest from struggle or from ambition in contentment; we rest from adversity and strife and contention in patience, not by God's taking away the causes of our unrest, not by His blunting the weapons of our accusers and oppressors, but by the spirit of patience in our hearts, the spirit of Jesus Christ, by which He submitted to the unjust judge, and for us bore our stripes and hung upon the tree. It is our rest from injustice, from tyranny, from adversity, from conflict. Our rest from anxiety, debate, discussion, and doubt is not in the clearing up of the atmosphere in which we view all things, but it is in taking into our hearts the great treasure of a trustful reliance on God, though we see Him not, though He seem to smite us. Rest from distraction is not found in being able to comprise and manage all the objects of our desire, so as to be able to husband our time and forces and gain them all, it is found in returning to the single eye, in submitting every desire to the yoke of Jesus Christ.

II. Peace and Warfare.—We find our joy in conflict; the kingdom we come into is no land of milk and honey, no Sabbath place of rest. It is called a kingdom because it is the sphere of activity and influence of a King on His march. We have a peace, but it is the peace of soldiers under the banner of a King in arms. No man liveth to himself but to the Lord, Who needs him for His service. He must live, he must be strong in the Lord, for the needs of others; he must rest for them, he must be revived for them, he must find strength for them, and, dying for them unto sin, he shall live again for them unto righteousness. He shall fight well because he hath rested well for them.

Just take that one word, rest, and find energy; rest, and in your peace find war; rest for others that you may fight for others. It is the corporate nature of your life which makes your rest necessary, which makes your weariness necessary, for it is to teach you to bring your single note into the great chord of life.

PLANTS GROWN UP IN THEIR YOUTH

'That our sons may be as plants grown up in their youth.'—
PSALM CXLIV. 12.

DAVID is not praying that the youth of the land should have any abnormal precociousness; the picture before his mind is that of vigorous, healthful, upright, manly and ingenuous youth.

I. A Healthful Frame; a Strong, Robust, Vigorous Physique.—It has been said that, as righteousness is the health of the soul, so health is the righteousness of the body. All very true; but we must not run into the opposite error of encouraging the notion that thoughtful, refined, cultured, religious men must be pale-faced and delicate, and with a supreme contempt of a sound physical development.

II. A Solid Character.—I know it has been said that the weak side of young men is very weak. Youth is prone to excess, and, on the sunny side of twenty, there is a tendency to carry more sail than ballast. It is a fine thing to see a young man with some solidity about him; some moral backbone; to see stamped upon such an one's face and gait and manner, the self-respect that accompanies truthfulness, integrity, and goodness.

III. A Hidden Life.—Doubtless, what chiefly struck the eye of the Psalmist, as he looked on those young trees, was their exuberant vitality. That life came from God. Man's power is marvellous, but it stops short of this. He can neither understand or impart life. Personal and saving religion is no development from within, no product of moral evolution; it is something whose germ must be imparted to you by the Holy Spirit; and without which germ you are, in the sight of God, absolutely dead. 'One thing thou lackest.' And that one thing God only can give you.—J. THAIN DAVIDSON, The City Youth, p. 238.

REFERENCES.—CXLIV. 12.—W. Walters, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxi. p. 338. CXLV. 1, 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1902.

THE TRUE CONCEPTION OF GOD

'One generation shall praise Thy works to another.'—
PSALM CXLV. 4.

It is needful to the understanding of this Psalm and its lesson that we should realize that the religion of separation has no place whatever in the spirit of it. The conception of God here is not a being whom men can obey while they separate themselves from all human interest. It is a conception of a God who brings man back again into human interests and uplifts and dignifies all that they have to do day by day.

I. This Psalmist sees God where some of us even to-day do not see Him, in nature. God speaks through all physical life. Have some of us guessed the most elementary thought in religion, that if there be a God of faith He must be the same as the God of all knowledge, of all attainment in science, that the truth in all revelation must be the truth concerning Him whom you see in sky and sea, in all the wonders of life about you? And yet men to-day will speak with something like a sneaking contempt of all endeavour to understand what God does in this part of His world. I know good people yet who think the decoration of a church to be one of the greatest sins of the world. I will not for a moment quarrel with any man in his conviction, but may I ask this one question: Have we any right to rob the Creator of this part of His praise? Have we a right to make that dull which God had made eloquent with the acknowledgment of His power? You shut out great possible thoughts of God when you consign this part of the revelation of Him to a lower place and will let it have no part in your worship.

II. Teach men that God is the first word and the last word in everything that is beautiful and orderly. The sublimest picture that you ever saw upon canvas was in God's mind before it was in the artist's. The most beautiful music that ever thrilled you through and through was a thought in God before it entered into the mind of him who, you say, created it. Everything that is best in our life is of Him. Nature is a shrine of His worship, a side chapel in the great cathedral of service that we may render Him. Our generation demands this side of our utterance of what God is. Men are being taught that knowledge in its very nature is anti-religious. We need to teach men that nothing is so religious as the reverent humble growth into a better understanding of what God is, and of what God is doing. Bring into your conception of life your conception of God. Start with a belief of a God who is in humanity and seeks to work in humanity; come to the aspirations and desires of men with this vision, and you are bound to be a helper of men.—W. H. HARWOOD, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 497.

REFERENCE.—CXLV. 6, 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1828.

PSALM CXLV. 9.

RUSKIN says: 'To declare that we have such a loving Father, whose mercy is over all his works, and whose will and law is so lovely and lovable that it is sweeter than honey, and more precious than gold, to those who can "taste and see" that the Lord is Good—this, surely, is a most pleasant and glorious good message and spell to bring to men'.

REFERENCES.—CXLV. 9.—E. A. Bray, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 219. E. Johnson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxvii. p. 250. CXLV. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1796.

THE COMMUNION OF SAINTS

'All Thy works praise Thee, O Lord, and Thy saints give thanks unto Thee: they shew the glory of Thy kingdom, and talk of Thy power.'—PSALM CXLV. 10, 11.

THIS is the special glory of the Christian Church, that its members do not depend merely on what is visible, they are not mere stones of a building, piled one on another, and bound together from without, but they are one and all the births and manifestations of one and the same unseen spiritual principle or power, 'living stones,' internally connected, as branches from a tree, not as the parts of a heap. They are members of the Body of Christ. That Divine and adorable Form, which the Apostles saw and handled, after ascending into heaven became a principle of life, a secret origin of existence to all who believe, through the gracious ministration of the Holy Ghost. This is the fruitful Vine, and the rich Olive-tree upon and out of which all saints, though wild and barren by nature, grow, that they may bring forth fruit unto God.

THE INVISIBLE CHURCH

FIFTY times as many saints are in the invisible world sealed for immortality as are now struggling on upon earth towards it; unless indeed the later generations have a greater measure of saints than the former ones. Well then may the Church be called invisible, not only as regards her vital principle, but in respect to her members. 'That which is born of the Spirit is spirit;' and since God the Holy Ghost is invisible, so is His work. The Church is invisible, because the great number of her true children have been perfected and removed, and because those who are still on earth cannot be ascertained by mortal eye; and had God so willed, she might have had no visible tokens at all of her existence, and been as entirely and absolutely hidden from us as the Holy Ghost is, her Lord and Governor.

As landmarks or buoys inform the steersman, as the shadow on the dial is an index of the sun's course; so, if we would cross the path of Christ, if we would arrest His eye and engage His attention, if we would interest ourselves in the special virtue and fullness of His grace, we must join ourselves to that ministry which, when He ascended up on high, He gave us as a relic, and let drop from Him as the mantle of Elijah, the pledge and token of his never-failing grace from age to age. 'Tell me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest, where Thou makest Thy flock to rest at noon; for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of Thy companions?' Such is the petition, as it were, of the soul that seeks for Christ. His answer is as precise as the question. 'If thou know not, O thou fairest among women, go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock, and feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents.' Out of the Church is no salvation—I mean to say out of that great invisible company, who are one and all incorporate in the one mystical body of Christ, and quickened by one Spirit: now, by adhering to the visible ministry which the Apostles left behind them, we approach unto what we see not, to Mount Zion, to the heavenly Jerusalem, to the spirits of the just, to the first-born elected to salvation, to angels innumerable, to Jesus the One Mediator, and to God. This heavenly Jerusalem is the true Spouse of Christ and Virgin Mother of saints; and the visible ministry on earth, the bishops and pastors, together with Christians depending on them, at this or that day is called the Church, though really but a fragment of it, as being that part of it which is seen and can be pointed out, and as resembling it in type, and witnessing it, and leading towards it.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—CXLV. 13.—Archbishop Alexander, Bampton Lectures, 1876, p. 159. J. G. Greenbough, The Cross in Modern Life, p. 96. CXLV. 16.—G. L. Richardson, Sermons for Harvest, p. 27. J. J. West, Penny Pulpit, No. 1823. CXLV. 21.—M. G. Glazebrook, Prospice, p. 116. CXLV.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 525. CXLVI. 1.—Canon Beeching, The Grace of Episcopacy, p. 201. CXLVI. 4.—T. Binney, King's Weigh-House Chapel Sermons (2nd Series), p. 97. CXLVI. 5.—C. Bradley, The Christian Life, p. 289. CXLVI. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 484. CXLVI.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 530.

PRAISE AND LIFE

'O praise the Lord, for it is a good thing to sing praises unto our God: yea, a joyful and pleasant thing it is to be thankful.'—PSALM CXLVII. 1.

'Young men and maidens, old men and children, praise the Name of the Lord: for His Name only is excellent, and His praise above heaven and earth.'—PSALM CXLVIII. 12.

I. The Universal Hallelulah.—One has amplified and localized and modernized the application of this Psalm because it is, perhaps, in its call to Nature to find a voice and praise the Lord, more nearly akin to our own modern thought, more like the high Christian teaching of our own poet Wordsworth than any other in the Hebrew Psalter.

II. A Pagan Hymn of Praise.—We should err if we thought that the idea of praise to the Most High God was either Jewish or Christian. The pagan worshippers of Isis in Egypt have left on record their sense of the need of praise. But there is a difference. The pagan feels that praise is due to the great creating power, knows it is a good thing to sing praises unto the Lord, but he does not see that everything which hath breath can and must praise the Lord, by living its life to the full. And here come in the Hebrew ideal and the Christian ideal to help us. Praise is life that recognizes its fountain-head, utters its joy to the Giver by living life at its best, and magnifies the Giver of all life by fulfilling its appointed life-task with its utmost perfection.

III. Christ's Praiseful Life.—Christ's life was one long hymn of praise at its noblest and best. He came to glorify the Father by living His Father's life in human shape at its highest. It was in order to teach men that life lived in fullest obedience to the Divine will and in entire dependence upon God was praise, that Jesus pointed men to the lilies of the field and the birds of the air, and showed that in their perfect obedience to the law of their being there, and in their entire dependence upon the Divine will, they the makers of sweet praise were patterns for us men and our salvation. And since the day of Christ, who came to be the bread for all the world, men whose spirits have eaten the bread of life He gave them—that sweet food from heaven which was knowledge of and obedience to the Divine will, coupled with power from on high to assimilate that knowledge and make it part of daily life—the world has known that just in proportion as they were really alive unto God, men could praise God, and has realized that the dead (those in whom the Spirit of Christ is not) cannot praise God, neither they that go down to the pit of selfishness and sin; nay rather, but that the living, they alone can praise God as we do this day.—H. D. B. RAWNSLEY, Christian World Pulpit, No. 1868, p. 123.

REFERENCES.—CXLVII. 1.—Blomfield, Sermons in Town and Country, p. 335. CXLVII. 2.—Morrison, Sermons Preached at Lyme Regis, p. 145. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1320. CXLVII. 2-5.—J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. i. p. 217.

THE BUILDER OF JERUSALEM

'The Lord doth build up Jerusalem; He gathereth together the outcasts of Israel. He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds. He telleth the number of the stars; He calleth them all by their names. Great is our Lord, and of great power; His understanding is infinite.'—PSALM CXLVII. 2-5.

If we were asked to select a passage to read to somebody about our God, could we select a much more beautiful passage than this 147th Psalm? It is so simple, so sublime. The sentences are so short, they might all almost be put into words of one syllable. Just as the sun itself is reflected in the dewdrop, so the glory of our God is reflected in these simple words.

Consider the loveliness of our God.

I. First of all, notice that His work is constructive? God does not destroy and cast down: He builds up—constructs. Our God builds us up, that is Creation. He took us out of the dust of the earth and built us up into perfection. That is the whole history. What building! He took the very lowest, you see—Dust. Where did the dust come from? Poor dust body. He breathed into it the 'breath of life'—Equipment under the action of God. That is our Creation—Construction: and our whole life, Edification: and the end, Perfection. 'The Lord doth build up.' 'Who shall build the tabernacle?' 'Let us make three tabernacles.' The heavens cannot contain Him, Who dwelleth with those who are of a humble and contrite heart. 'The Lord doth build up.'

II. Notice what it is He builds up—Jerusalem. This is no localization. If you want an idea of localization, go to Jerusalem and see for yourself, but the Jerusalem for us is the Jerusalem which cometh down out of heaven: it is a city where we may dwell all together, and the light of the city is God Himself. A Holy City He builds, an Eternal City, a City of Peace. 'He gathereth together the outcasts of Israel.' It is not God's will that any should be an outcast—He gathereth them together. If anybody is an outcast it is not that God has cast Him out, but that he has cast God out of his soul.

III. 'He healeth those that are broken in heart.' So many people in this cruel world are what we call 'broken-down' people—broken in health, broken in wealth, lost their money, lost all thought, lost all sympathy, lost all love—lost all peace, lost heart, 'broken-hearted'. Our God healeth those that are broken in heart. It is not a partial or tentative healing; it goes to the very core, it goes down to the very root: He healeth the heart. He is the only real heart doctor. If the heart is all right all else will be right. 'He healeth those that are broken in heart.' Our God alone can do it. He Who made the heart can heal it.

IV. 'And bindeth up their wounds.' Note the tender expression. Some people think that the Old Testament is hard and crude, and the New Testament loving and sweet. You cannot find any verse in the Bible more lovely and tender than this verse about our God. He, 'bindeth up their wounds'. 'The Hands that made you will bind up your wounds; The Fingers that created you will heal you. What more can you want? It is like the text which says: 'He maketh all my bed in my sickness'.

V. And while God is doing all this, what about the Universe? Does He leave the universe to take care of itself? to go on as it likes? Oh, no. 'He ordereth all things in heaven and earth.' If once He let the universe go, where would it go?—a general crash. 'He telleth the number of the stars.' No man has ever yet been able to tell the number of the stars, and there never will be a man who can tell their number, for they are infinite. But God, Who is infinite, can tell the number of them. And why? He will not miss one of them. The Lord who will not let a lamb be lost out of the flock will not let a single star be lost out of the firmament. He Who will bring back the wanderer, and get the outcast of Israel home, telleth the number of the stars. He telleth every one. And what is more singular than that: there is a sort of familiarity between God and the stars. Look up into the heavens and think, 'He calleth them all by their names'. We call the stars by heathen names. I do not think the names by which we call the stars are the same as the names by which God calls them—just as if He spoke to the stars and the stars answered him back again, a sort of sympathetic give and take between the Creator and the created. Who knows? 'His wisdom is infinite.' What if the light created speaks to the Light Uncreated, which is God? How do you know? There are many more things in heaven and earth than you or I understand, and science is every day showing to us how very little we know of the things that are. 'He telleth the number of the stars, and calleth them all by their names.' How great is His power! and 'His understanding is infinite!'

VI. Bring this subject under the glorious light of the Gospel. 'The Lord buildeth up Jerusalem.' We who know the Gospel know how He did it. He built it up with His Blood. The Church of God is built up with the precious Blood of the Covenant.

'He gathereth together the outcasts of Israel.' You know what that means now. You know how they cast Him out of the city, and that He was the great Outcast of Israel, and the poor outcasts of Israel are brought home by the great Outcast of Israel.

'He healeth those that are broken in heart.' How could He heal the broken-hearted so well? Because His own Heart was broken and wounded. It is wounded men that need a wounded Saviour. A broken-hearted man needs a broken-hearted Saviour.

'He telleth the number of the stars.' What are the stars but His Saints? The Saints shine as the stars for ever and ever, and God knows them. 'Right dear in the sight of the Lord is the death of His Saints,' and they shine as the stars.

REFERENCES.—CXLVII. 3, 4.—F. Bourdillon, Plain Sermons for Family Reading, p. 122. CXLVII. 5.—W. F. Shaw, Sermon Sketches, p. 15. CXLVII. 7, 9.—C. Kingsley, The Water of Life, p. 317.

PSALM CXLVII. 8.

RUSKIN writes: 'Look up towards the higher hills, where the waves of everlasting green roll silently into their long inlets among the shadows of the pines, and we may, perhaps, at last know the meaning of those quiet words of the 147th Psalm, "He maketh grass to grow upon the mountains".'

REFERENCES.—CXLVII. 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 672. CXLVII. 10-18.—Ibid. vol. xii. No. 670.

PSALM CXLVIII.

ST. BERNARD of Clairvaux thus describes the death of his brother Gerard: 'Who could ever have loved me as he did? He was a brother by blood, but far more in the faith. God grant, Gerard, that I may not have lost thee, but that thou hast only gone before me; for, of a surety, thou hast joined those whom, in thy last night below, thou didst invite to praise God, when suddenly, to the surprise of all, thou, with a serene countenance and cheerful voice, didst commence chanting that Psalm, "Praise ye the Lord from the heavens; praise Him in the heights. Praise ye Him, all his angels; praise ye Him, all his hosts." At that moment, O my brother, the day dawned on thee, though it was night to us; the night to thee was all brightness. Just as I reached his side, I heard him utter aloud those words of Christ, "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit!" Then repeating the verse over again, and resting on the word Father, Father! he turned to me and smiling said, "O how gracious of God to be the Father of men, and what an honour for men to be His children!"'

REFERENCES.—CXLVIII. 1.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on Passages of the Psalms, p. 318. CXLVIII. 3.—Archdeacon Sinclair, Words from St. Paul's, p. 20.

THE WEATHER

'Fire and hail, snow and vapours: wind and storm, fulfilling His Word.'—PSALM CXLVIII. 8 (Prayer Book Version).

THIS verse tells us what God wants us to think about that most frequent of topics of conversation, the weather. The weather brings us into contact, immediate contact, with the forces of Nature. Here is a verse that strikes the keynote, true now, true then, always to be true.

I. The Will of God.—And what is the first word whenever we think of the weather? God has brought into existence in this universe of ours forces of two kinds, forces that can disobey His will, such as the forces that we call human nature, and forces that cannot disobey His will; such are the forces that make for the weather. So whenever we realize what a storm, thunder, lightning, mist, fog, and rain, are doing, we are realizing what is going on among agents that cannot help doing what they do—we are witnessing the direct action of God, forces that are fulfilling His Word.

II. Therefore, No Grumbling.—What is the second thought? It is a very practical conclusion, which we see to be a good one very plainly, though I quite admit it is not very easy to fall in with it. Do not let us ever grumble at the weather, do not let us ever grumble at anything that we cannot absolutely help, because if our will does not come in, why then it is God's will. I shall never forget the remark of an old Scottish gamekeeper, a good, old-fashioned Presbyterian. Some sportsmen were grumbling at the weather, and one of them went a step further and was cursing the weather; and the old gamekeeper said reverently, in a tone that the man could not help hearing, 'It wets the sods and fills the burns, and it's God's will'. The weather, and any other inevitable thing, is God's will.

III. An Ideal.—The third thought is this. Let us take the weather as our ideal. Is that a lowering of ideals that we who have a will of our own should wish that we were like forces that have no will? That depends upon how we use the power given to us. If mankind always used the free will which we have, to a certain extent, so as to make us act far better than the forces of Nature, of course it would be a Divine conception of existence; but, alas, you need not live more than a single day in any place on the face of this world to find out that we have not made good use of our will! We have sinned, we are full of negligences and ignorances, forgetfulness of God's law. The best thing we can do is to ask of God, 'Make me subservient to Thy will, make my will Thine. I want to be like those forces of Nature who have not a will of their own, fulfilling Thy word.' It is the highest ideal to be in God's hands, to know that you are in God's hands. It makes a strong life, a life that brings influence to bear on the men and women of one's generation.

IV. Storms and their Results.—The last thought I have time for is this: Observe results of the weather upon the physical world round about. Observe the result of every kind of weather, stormy weather, stress of weather, upon the face of Nature. Terrible storms, what we call catastrophes, sometimes gradually work upon the Nature upon which these forces are exerted that which is very striking, grand, and beautiful for us to see. From one point of view, in human nature, though the changes have sometimes come gradually and sometimes suddenly, these scenes of beauty would not have been there had it not been for the wind and storms and vapours fulfilling God's Word. If we are yielded up to God's will, every stress and every strain of trial is just helping to carve out, moulding and modelling a life that shall be beautiful in God's service.

PSALM CXLVIII. 8.

RUSKIN says: 'The snow, the vapour, and the stormy wind fulfil His word. Are our acts and thoughts lighter and wilder than these—that we should forget it?'

YOUTH AND AGE

'Both young men, and maidens; old men, and children: let them praise the name of the Lord.'—PSALM CXLVIII. 12, 13.

THE young have special needs of their own which the Gospel must recognize if it is to be of any use to them; and the mature or aged, in like manner, have their own special wants, which cannot be met by the provision made for the young, but can only be satisfied by a Gospel which understands and sympathizes with them.

I. For the young He has the Gospel of Living; for the old the Gospel of Dying. A considerable proportion of those who have passed middle life have, by repeated experiences, been made acquainted with death. If you speak to them about it, you awaken a hundred tragic and tender memories, every one of which constrains them to prepare to meet their God. It is of life the young mind thinks, not of death. It must mingle with the warm rush of the healthy blood and keep time with the beating of the bounding heart. But is there not a response to this in the Gospel of Christ? Is it not pre-eminently a gospel of life? There is nothing else about which it is more constantly speaking, 'I am come,' said Christ, 'that ye might have life, and that ye might have it more abundantly'.

II. To the young Christ brings the Gospel of Inspiration; to the old the Gospel of Consolation. Youth looks around on the world in which it finds itself, and notes its defects with a fresh and inevitable glance. It burns to put them right. Christ taught the individual to realize his dignity as an immortal being; and the life He condemned most severely was that which accomplishes nothing. There is nothing too small to be done to the honour of God. The New Testament is from beginning to end a record of how men who were nothing in themselves became princes of thought and action through the inspiration of Christ.

III. For the young Christ has the Gospel of Giving; for the old the Gospel of Receiving. Christ has a cause on earth which can only be carried on by the energy of those who are willing to devote themselves to His service. He is not here any longer to carry on His cause Himself; He has left it to the charge of those who are willing to act in His name. It needs courage, initiative, sacrifice; it needs the lives of men. This appeal comes home especially to the young. There is a work you can do for Him in youth that none can do in old age.—J. STALKER, The Four Men, p. 178.

REFERENCES.—CXLVIII. 12.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 285. S. Gregory,

How to Steer a Ship, p. 113. H. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxviii. p. 70.

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE OF YOUNG PEOPLE

'Both young men, and maidens; . . . let them praise the name of the Lord.'—PSALM CXLVIII. 12, 13.

It is scarcely superfluous to ask, What is religion? for we cannot strive too earnestly for clear conception of such great terms. Definitions of religion are innumerable, but I think it would not be easy to excel that of Dr. Agar Beet, who states it as 'such conception of the unseen as makes for righteousness'. No part of your manifold life is so precious as your religious life. All else is moulded by it.

I. Characteristics of the Religion of Young People.—Whilst in one sense religion is the same in men and women of all ages, in another sense it varies according to years. The essence is one, the expression differs. Even among young people religion is marked by variety. It is the glory of Christianity that it is adaptive to individuality. It helps to make each of you himself, herself. Intellectual inquiry is a usual mark of young people's religion. Their heart is set to know the reason of things. As we grow older most of us are less anxious for explanations. Age tolerates mystery. Youth resents it. Young people's religion is a religion of gladness. A mournful piety can never meet the needs of youth. Enthusiasm is a precious feature of the young people's religion. The august and winsome truth of godliness together with its cheering experiences kindle the ardour of youth. They fire the heart with the flame of Jehovah.

II. Temptations of the Religion of Young People.—Young religionists are liable to over-criticalness. Everything is put under microscopic tests. There is ample room for legitimate criticism, but never seek to afford space for pedantic criticism. Hyper-sensitiveness often vitiates youthful religion. It is well to have due sensitiveness, but if it degenerate into touchiness it becomes a curse to ourselves and to our friends.

III. Advantage of the Religion of Young People.—Reasons might be multiplied why young men and women should dedicate themselves to God's service. They have the advantage of physical strength. It is easier to be a Christian in health than in sickness. They have also mental alertness and freshness. Their potencies of mind, consecrated unreservedly, may be used for God and man. The religion of youth has the accumulated experience of the past to profit by. The universal past waits to enrich your future. That you live in this privileged age gives you an immense religious advantage. The means of being good and doing good are multiplied to an unprecedented extent.

IV. Obligations of the Religion of Young People.—Your religion must be reflective. In all your thoughts let your God be. Let your religion be intensely Biblical. Make God's Book your book. Prayer must strongly mark your Christian life.

Nothing must arrest your devotions. Your religion must be a religion of service. The Church needs you, and the world needs you.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, Messages for Home and Life, p. 123.

REFERENCES.—CXLVIII. 12, 13.—W. Brock, Midsummer Morning Sermons, p. 53. G. Dawson, Sermons on Daily Life and Duty, p. 64.

A PEOPLE NEAR UNTO HIM

'A people near unto Him. Praise ye the Lord.'—PSALM CXLVIII. 14.

THERE was a time when we could not take these words to ourselves. We were not a people near unto God. Our sins had separated us from God, and we had no idea that we had gone so far from God until we tried to come back again to God. The prodigal had no idea he had gone into such a far country until he tried to come back to his father. But whilst he was yet a great way off the father saw him, ran, fell upon his neck, and kissed him. And now we who once were far off are 'made nigh by the blood of Christ'.

I. How are we Brought Near?—How are we brought near to God? We are brought nigh by the blood of Christ. Now this is true both objectively and subjectively. It is true objectively. The only power which will save us is the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. I know there are those who will tell you there is nothing objective in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ; that that Cross was simply a manifestation of God's love, and that any idea of a sacrifice or an atonement for sin must be entirely put upon one side, for, unless we are willing to do so, we shall drive all thinking men to unbelief. There is only one old Gospel, that Jesus Christ died for our sins, according to the Scripture. He died 'the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God'.

II. How Near have we been Brought?—If it is by the Blood of Christ that we are brought near to God, how near, practically, have you and I been brought to God? Let me bring you to the Old Testament picture of that wonderful scene which is portrayed for us in Exodus xix. and following chapters. God descends upon Mount Sinai. You may regard that mountain as a very pivot of the earth to-day, for God is there. And I want you in your thought to draw four concentric circles round about that mountain. And as we press through one circle to another, I want you to ask yourselves, Have I reached that point of nearness to God? The outermost circle is described in Exodus xix. 16 and 17, 'And it came to pass on the third day in the morning, that there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud; so that all the people that was in the camp trembled. And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mount.' And when they heard God speaking to them it seemed as if the very earth trembled beneath the very breath of God. No wonder all the people trembled; no wonder Moses never allowed them to forget that day. Again and again in Deuteronomy he reminds them that they were brought so nigh unto God 'that the Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire'. Those people were brought very near to God when God spake to them, and His Voice reverberated in the very inmost souls. Do you know what it is to be brought thus near to God, so near that we lose sight of everything else, and God alone is the great reality in your life, and God speaks to you, and as God speaks to you you tremble? This nearness of impression is very solemn, it is not something to be treated lightly; and yet the nearness of impression is not enough. This very people who stood there and trembled, and lifted up their hands in despair and said, 'All that the Lord hath said will we do, and be obedient,' went away, and in a few days afterwards were dancing and playing round about the camp. And is not it so sometimes with ourselves? If you know what it is to get on the top of the hill with God, there will be a change in your life, in your character. As you come down to your daily life, there will be unselfishness, there will be consideration for others, there will be a spirit of self-sacrifice, a spirit of gentleness and a spirit of love, which will so overflow your very life and character that men will know that you are a man who is living in very close intimate communion with Jesus Christ.

REFERENCES.—CXLVIII. 14.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 138. CXLVIII.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 538.

GOD'S INHERITANCE IN SAINTS

'For the Lord taketh pleasure in His people: He will beautify the meek with salvation.'—PSALM CXLIX. 4.

THE Lord takes pleasure and finds delight in those that run to do His bidding.

I. The Lord cares nothing for the strength of a horse or for the rapidity with which a man's legs can carry him from place to place; but He loves to see a meek and humble believer trusting Him. That delight begins with the repentance and with the true sorrow for sin, the sorrow according to God. There is a godly element in sorrow.

II. God is the highest and the holiest of beings. He is in heaven; He is enthroned there; that is His proper throne and His proper shrine; but there is one dwelling-place for the sake of which He will come down from heaven—that is, when He sees a humble and a contrite heart, where there is reverence for His Word and a trembling and holy fear—not a servile fear, but a filial fear, like that of a child to a father.

III. It is very common for people to say that the angels rejoice over every returning sinner. Whose joy is it? Not the angels' joy, it is God's joy, and the thought is that God is so full that He cannot contain His joy, and so the whole of the heavenly hosts are marshalled, and He says, 'Share My joy,' and the great heart of God overflows and they hold up their cups to catch the overflowing of the infinite chalice of the love of God.

IV. It is a great thing to have Christ's compassion when you have fallen. Is it not a greater thing to have Christ's sympathy when you stand, and is it not worth while to fortify ourselves against all the assaults of the devil when we remember that we can change the feeling of compassion in Jesus Christ over our fall to one of delight and sympathy over our victory?—ARTHUR T. PIERSON, Homiletic Review, 1904, vol. XLVIII. p. 378.

REFERENCES.—CXLIX. 4.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 98. Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 120. CXLIX. 9.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Saints' Days, p. 444. J. Bolton, Selected Sermons (2nd Series), p. 97. CXLIX.—International Critical Commentary, vol. ii. p. 541.

MUSIC AS A FACTOR IN CULTURE

'Praise ye the Lord!'—PSALM CL. 1.

Music is a gift of God. Like all the sciences it is a radiation of Divine truth.

I. The Divinity of music further appears in the fact that the greatest musicians have been good men; and to develop the mighty impulses which they have felt in their souls, the great musicians have chosen lofty Divine themes. It is a mission of music to soften and remove the asperities of men. It helps to unify the race and make men homogeneous in spite of controversy and unbelief, the music of all the Christian Church is saving this world for the Christmas of Christ. The hymn and the singer are often a long way in advance of the sermon and hearer in evangelizing influences. Music refines and ennobles. Music brightens life's dark places, and soothes the heart in trouble.

II. Music could not enjoy its best development until man had passed beyond his feudal age and reached the time when the lion and the tiger were being eliminated from his nature. Men had to pass beyond their barbaric, belligerent, and boisterous eras before they could realize that the highest expression of mind and spirit is in music. Music, if not more perfect than printing, the art preservative of all arts, is surely the best interpreter of all art and science. The mystery and miracle of truth reveal their open sesame when studied through the atmosphere of music. Music is thus an intellectual factor. It is not so much a truth-seeker as a truth-finder.

III. Instrumental as well as vocal music should be made a part of the public school curriculum of every child. True religion like true love is emotional, and music is the most adequate impression of the emotional faculties. Faith sings, unbelief never. Music reveals God. All revivals of religion have been accompanied by revivals of sacred songs. Music is the language of celestial throngs. True eloquence is thought winged with music. The infinite God is more perfectly worshipped with musical accompaniment because music goes beyond language and logic and opens up the vistas of faith through which can be seen the King in His beauty.

MUSIC AND RELIGION

'Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord.'—
PSALM CL. 6.

I. ALL concerted music has an educational value far higher than that of music written for a single performer. It is the work of people associated together as they are in society, and thus it teaches the lesson of life to those who are willing to learn. For, first, it demands preparation, careful and continuous. And that—be sure of it—is one of the most valuable lessons that we can learn; we can compass nothing great, we cannot even understand anything great, without patience and pains. Once more. In life as in music we cannot all take leading parts. Most of us are but members of the great chorus, our voices serve to swell and deepen the harmonies of human life. In life as in music, perhaps many of us shall do our work the better the less we make a show of doing it publicly.

II. Music has an important office to fulfil in religion, in those great duties which we call duties to God. For noble music reveals to us that there is another world beside that which we can see; it gives expression to the inarticulate yearnings of our souls after something higher and better than earth can give. It is the language of emotion, as speech is the language of intellect. It speaks to us of that which we feel, as distinct from that which we can be said to know. Thus we put it to its worthiest and most fitting use when we employ it to express religious emotion, to be the vehicle of prayer and of praise. Religious music, then, is the language of religious emotions. Through it we express the unspeakable desire of our hearts. But religion is not altogether made up of emotion. Our feelings are so unstable and so changeful that they have to be controlled by intellect. And as the most perfectly developed man is he who has developed both his feelings and his reason, who is neither the slave of sentiment on the one hand, nor the slave of logic on the other, so the worthiest way we have of expressing the deliberate yet passionate devotion of thankful hearts is neither by words alone nor by music alone, but by song, by perfect music wedded to noble words.

III. And this perhaps explains for us in some measure those mysterious pictures in the Revelation of St. John of the employments of the saints in heaven. Every faculty, every instinct of their glorified humanity they consecrate to God's glory. How does St. John describe their occupation? He sums it up as eternal praise. Music is the symbol of perfect consecration, the consecration of body and soul to the glory and praise of God. And as the best incentive to faithful service here is that love of God in redemption which was consummated in the sacrifice of the Cross, so the perpetual burden of the Anthem of Saints is, Worthy the Lamb that was slain!—J. H. BERNARD, Via Domini, p. 294.

REFERENCES.—CL. 6.—A. W. Hare, Alton Sermons, p. 371. H. E. Manning, Sermons, vol. iii. p. 276.

PROVERBS

PROVERBS

CHAP. I.

RUSKIN writes: 'Read this first of Proverbs with me, please. The Proverbs of Solomon, the son of David, king of Israel.

"To know wisdom and instruction."

"(Not to opine them.)"

"To perceive the words of understanding."

"(He that hath eyes, let him read—he that hath ears, hear, and for the Blind and the Deaf,—if patient and silent by the roadside,—there may also be some one to say, "He is coming.") "To receive the instruction of WISDOM, JUSTICE, and JUDGMENT, and EQUITY."

"Four things,—Oh friends, which you have not only to perceive but to receive."—Fors Clavigera, Letter LXXVII.

REFERENCES.—I. 1.—J. B. Mozley, Sermons Parochial and Occasional, p. 96. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 9. I. 1-19.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 71. I. 6.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 14. I. 7.—Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. vii. p. 1. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 17. I. 8.—Ibid. p. 21. I. 9.—Ibid. p. 25.

TEMPTERS

'My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not.'—PROVERBS I. 10.

I. A DANGER implied. It is the nature of sin to be aggressive. No person was ever guilty of only one sin. His first sin might aptly have been called Gad—'a troop cometh'. There was never one sinner yet who did not try to make another like himself. On earth there is a huge propaganda of evil. Hence this world is a place of danger to the young and inexperienced.

II. A method exposed—'entice'. The tempter proceeds indirectly and flatteringly. Among his enticements are (1) increase of knowledge, (2) pleasure, (3) love of liberty, (4) nobody will ever know.

III. Resistance enforced—'Consent thou not'. There must not be a particle of 'Yes' in your 'No'. Say it at the right time and in the right way. Remember these two maxims as regards our moral actions: the necessity of choice in matters of conduct; and when conscience is clear let there be no further parley.

IV. The safeguard of holy memories—'My son'. Open the book of memory at the page where a father's solicitude and a mother's love is recorded for you.

V. This may be viewed as the utterance of God. He unfolds to us His Fatherhood in Christ, and beseeches us to resist sin.—W. M. TAYLOR, The Sermon Year Book, 1891, p. 354.

TEMPTATION

'My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not.'—PROVERBS I. 10.

If this book of Proverbs appeals so especially to the young, there is reason and justification for this. For the most part, youth has a decisive bearing upon after years. The principles must then be formed which shall govern the whole of life. Wisdom, therefore, makes an especial effort to rescue the young from danger, and to guide them into safety, peace, and life. There is appropriateness in dissuasion combined with precept.

I. Life a Scene of Temptation.—There are two things to be considered in order to understand this:—

1. The instigations to evil which from without beset and attack every human being, of whatever age and condition.

2. The natural inclination towards evil, which from within gives such force to the external invitations. The two, concurring and conspiring, render life an arena of moral conflict.

II. Youth Especially the Period of Temptation.—The wise man addresses his 'son,' sympathizing with the young, remembering his own youth, and anxious to deliver youthful pilgrims from the snares which abound in their path.

1. In youth the passions are strongest, by which human nature is often urged aside from the ways of wisdom and piety, of virtue and true happiness.

2. In youth the principles and habits are unformed.

3. In youth inexperience exposes to the arts of the crafty and the vile.

III. Evil Companionship a Powerful Means of Temptation.—Society is sought by the young, who look to this for much of their happiness. There is always danger lest they should be deceived by the speciousness of outward attractions, and should fail justly to estimate the character of associates. Thus they are liable to influence by—

1. The example of bad companions. 'Evil communications corrupt good manners.'

2. The actual invitations to sinful courses from those whose influence it is not easy to resist.

IV. Divine Grace should be Sought In Order to the Resistance of Temptation.—1. Temptation may be withstood. The excuse is sometimes made, 'The temptation was too strong for me'. But it is not the case that the temptation is too strong; rather is the tempted too weak. God with every temptation makes a way of escape, and men are not shut up to sin.

2. Watchfulness and prayer alone can preserve in the case of temptation. If the young set out upon their course relying upon their own wisdom and strength, they will surely fall. Divine strength alone can overcome; there is no other safety than that which lies in distrust of self and confidence in God.

REFERENCES.—I. 10.—W. Taylor, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 81. F. B. Cowl, Straight Tracks, p. 82. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth. I. 19.—Ibid. p. 44. I. 20.—Ibid. p. 49. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 147. E. A. Trench, God's Message Through Modern Doubt, p. 59. I. 20-33.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Eather, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 77. I. 23.—G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 56. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 55. I. 24-28.—Ibid. p. 59. I. 26.—N. D. Hillis, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 328. I. 30, 31.—F. B. Woodward, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 182. II. 1-5.—Harvey Goodwin, Parish Sermons, p. 239. II. 4, 5.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 66. II. 10, 11.—Ibid. p. 77. A. Maclaren, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 156. II. 12-19.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 72. II. 17.—Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. vii. p. 16. III. 1.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 77. III. 1-10.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Eather, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 84. III. 3.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 271. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 81. III. 5.—Ibid. p. 85. G. Salmon, Non-Miraculous Christianity, p. 218.

SELF-RELIANT OR GOD-RELIANT?

‘Trust in the Lord with all thine heart; and lean not unto thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths.’—PROVERBS III. 5, 6.

No one who reads the book of Proverbs can fail to see that its maxims are of the utmost value. We should truly be the poorer without its pithy, practical sayings, which bear upon almost every phase of life.

How much we need to remember the verses that I read as our text.

I. It is Often Considered a Fine Thing to be Self-Reliant.—Many men boast that they rely only on themselves. A man will point with pride to his prosperous business and say, ‘I worked all that up by myself from nothing’. Self-reliance is very good up to a certain point. It is all right if it does not make us forget God, from Whom all good things come, and in Whom we live and move and have our being. The man who trusts in God does not become slack and careless. He knows that if he is trusting in God for help in his daily work he must put forth his best energies in order to be worthy of God’s help. When we trust in God we are, as it were, admitting Him into partnership with ourselves. It therefore becomes necessary to try to live up to our high position. I want you to think of this as a message from God to you in the height of your prosperity, it may be, when all is going well with you. After all there is not much to be said for the man who only pretends to trust in God when he is in adversity, and as it were so far in a corner that he cannot help himself. It may be that he learns his lesson at such a time, and by finding what God can do for him then, learns to trust Him at all times. The trust that honours God, and which He desires, is that which is accorded to Him at all times, in the time of prosperity quite as much as in the time of adversity, for though we may not feel the need of His help then so much as we do in the time of adversity, it is quite true that our times of prosperity are just the times when we are tempted to forget God, and think we can do without Him.

We need to bear in mind the next verse.

II. Those who have not Really Tried it, sometimes Think that to have God always in our Minds must make them Dull and Weary.—They think that it is all very well for Sundays or for times of prayer, but to acknowledge God at all times, to be thinking constantly of Him, to be continually consulting Him, this they imagine would rob life of its freedom and its brightness. What a mistake they make! It is only when we take God into our lives that we are able to enjoy life to its fullest extent. For when we do that, we look at the world in a new light. Everything is transformed because it becomes to us part of God’s world. The beauties of nature are a thousand times more lovely when we see God’s handiwork in them, and there is a new attraction in our fellow-men, when we realize that they are children of the same heavenly Father as ourselves.

III. You need not Hold Back because you are afraid, if you try to act up to the exhortation of our text, and acknowledge God in everything, that you will be deprived of happiness and your life made gloomy. No, your joys will be multiplied a thousand-fold, and you will have God’s help in your work in times of difficulty and perplexity as well. And how much of our life is of this latter nature. We can see so little of what is before us that we often know not what to do. We are uncertain what course to take or what plans to make. But if it is our habit to acknowledge God in everything, to seek His guidance and to trust in Him, we have the assurance of His Word that ‘we shall not be disappointed’.

REFERENCES.—III. 6.—J. R. Crookes, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 170. III. 7, 8.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 89. III. 9.—Ibid. p. 91. III. 9, 10.—J. Silvester, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxix. 1906, p. 245. III. 11, 12.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 93. III. 11-24.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Eather, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 88. III. 13-15.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 99. III. 13, 19.—G. A. Chadwick, The Intellect and the Heart, p. 154. III. 14.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 252. III. 16, 17.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 102. III. 19, 20.—Ibid. p. 105. III. 26.—Ibid. p. 107. III. 27, 28.—Ibid. p. 111. III. 28.—S. A. Tipple, The Admiring Guest, p. 122. III. 33.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 115.

PROVERBS IV. 5, 7.

I MEAN to follow Solomon’s directions, ‘get learning, get understanding’. I find earlier days are gone by—I find that I can have no enjoyment in the world but continual drinking of knowledge.—KEATS to John Taylor (1818).

REFERENCES.—IV. 7.—J. T. Bramston, Sermons to Boys p. 152. A. E. Dunning, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii 1895, p. 12. U. Thomas, Ibid. vol. liii. 1898, p. 163. IV. 10, 11.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 117. 10-19.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 96. IV. 12.—Ibid. p. 101. IV. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1418. J. S. Mavor, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 318. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 119. IV. 14, 15.—F. W. Farrar, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. p. 344. "Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. v. p. 208. IV. 18.—Ibid. vol. ii. p. 141. G. Body, The Life of Justification, p. 175. J. Hamilton, Faith in God, p. 324. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 108. IV. 18, 19.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 121. IV. 23.—Spurgeon Sermons, vol. iv. No. 179. J. Thain Davidson, The City Youth, p. 213. W. G. Elmslie, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 465. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 116. E. Meyrick Goulburn, Three Counsels of the Divine Master, vol. i. p. 245. H. Harris, Short Sermons, vol. i. p. 202. "Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ix. p. 324. IV. 23-27.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 124.

THE KEEPING OF THE HEART

'Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life.'—PROVERBS IV. 23.

I. How is this law of life to be obeyed? How is the heart to be kept?

If we are going to keep our hearts we must have disciplined imaginations. The relation between the two is of the most intimate nature. Now what is the work of the imagination? The imagination does this. It takes of abstract things and presents them in concrete forms to the heart. It takes of ideas and turns them into pictures; and by presenting these ideas like pictures or images to the heart, it provokes in the heart certain feelings. If the pictures appeal to fear, they produce in the heart the spirit of revulsion. If the pictures appeal to that which the heart delights in, it appeals in the form of attractions.

A disciplined imagination is the condition of a heart rightly regulated and of a life rightly shaped.

II. I believe myself that it is impossible to explain the phenomenon of our spiritual lives unless you recognize the fact that there is an organized power of evil that acts upon us from without. Whatever theological difficulties there may be in apprehending this truth I could not explain the facts of my own spiritual experience unless I knew there was some power without me that had power to stir thought within me; because continually these things that come to my imagination and propose themselves to my heart have not been self-sought, they have come upon me entirely without my own will; it is as if I had been walking in a road, and a pistol shot comes to me and I feel its effect immediately within; immediately the imagination is stirred into such activity with such persistency, with such fascination, that which whilst to my highest self it is a positive agony, it is yet to my lower nature a positive thing of delight.

III. I must, in some way or another, get master of my imagination; and as I beat down my body into subjection I must bring my imagination into subjection. How are you going to do it?

1. Pray about it.

2. Take care what you read.

3. Do everything that you can that will supply to the imagination wholesome food.

There is only one way of really getting the peace of the imagination; and that is by living with the eyes of the imagination continually gazing upon the vision of the beautiful.—G. Body, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXIII. 1908, p. 196.

PROVERBS IV. 23.

RUSKIN says: 'For all of us, the question is not at all to ascertain how much or how little corruption there is in human nature; but to ascertain whether, out of all the mass of that nature, we are of the sheep or the goat breed; whether we are people of upright heart, being shot at, or people of crooked heart, shooting. And, of all the texts bearing on the subject, this, which is a quite simple and practical order, is the one you have chiefly to hold in mind. "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life."—Ethics of the Dust, p. 101.

REFERENCES.—IV. 25.—B. Wilberforce, The Hope that is in Me, p. 39. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2058. IV. 26.—R. Flint, Sermons and Addresses, p. 67. H. Davenport, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 374. V. 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 667. V. 11-13.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (4th Series), p. 481. V. 15.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 130. V. 21, 22.—Ibid. p. 134. V. 22.—Jesse Brett, The Soul's Escape, p. 33. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 123. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 915. VI. 6.—E. Fowle, Plain Preaching to Poor People (1st Series), p. 15. VI. 16-19.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 136. VI. 20-23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2406; see also Twelve Sermons to Young Men, p. 145. VI. 20-24.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 138. VI. 22.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 1017. VII. 6.—J. Thain Davidson, The City Youth, p. 3. VIII. 1, 14, 22, 23, 29, 30.—W. Alexander, The Great Question, p. 3. VIII. 10, 13.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 143. VIII. 14.—W. Alexander, The Great Question, p. 45. VIII. 15.—E. W. Bullinger, By Me Kings Reign, Sermon. J. Andrew, The Dundee Pulpit, 1872, p. 169. VIII. 17.—A. G. Deedes, Church Times, 1900, vol. xlv. p. 103. VIII. 18.—C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 408. VIII. 18, 21.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 146. VIII. 21.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 130. VIII. 22-31.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 148. VIII. 30, 31.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 136. VIII. 31.—G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 252.

SUPREME ACQUISITIONS

'For whoso findeth Me findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord. But he that misseth Me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate Me love death.'—PROVERBS VIII. 35, 36 (R.V.).

THIS striking contrast expresses the twofold universal classification of men—those who find and those who miss true wisdom in life.

I. Looking first at the darker side of the contrast we see sin revealed as being both a missing of the Divine purpose and also a process of self-destruction. For to miss Christ either by reason of engaging the heart's attention with other things, by the fatal power of careless inattention, or by engrossment in the search after the merely secondary things of life, is to fail in apprehending that for which creation and redemption alike have marked us out. And his folly is eternal who misses Christ for the sake of gaining any or aught other.

For at the same time he 'wrongeth his own soul'. Sin is but long-drawn-out self-destruction. It confuses those powers of spiritual apprehension by which we are enabled to determine the will of God and so to steer a straight course. It outrages conscience, violating that organ of moral sensitiveness until its approving or reproving voice is entirely hushed. Sin paralyses will-power, exercising a kind of moral hypnotism from which men often try to arouse themselves in vain.

It is, however, by robbing the soul of its only possibility of development that sin, which is in some shape or other a missing of Christ, wrongs it most. Just as everything in Nature needs its own proper element and environment in order to ensure the development of all its possibilities, so the soul of man needs Christ in order to reach its highest and truest life.

II. The brighter side of the contrast is bright indeed. 'He that findeth Me findeth life,' which is the very antithesis of sin's result. For life is power to be and to do. Its manifestations are as visible and recognizable as are those of the sin to which allusion has been made. For with life comes the gift of vision—power to see and to understand the will of God as the law of daily living. It brings, too, a quickening of conscience—power to judge in matters of personal moral import. It imparts a strength of will—power to purpose according to the knowledge received and judgment recorded. Above all, life is the true environment for development—power to grow. In short Christ transforms the water of mere existence into the wine of true life.

III. It remains to be noted that this His wondrous gift is only made to him that 'findeth Me,' which is of course to him that seeketh. The man who wants to see Christ is always the man whom Christ wants to see, and he who sets his heart to know the life which He bestows is never disappointed of his desire.—J. STUART HOLDEN, Redeeming Vision, p. 114.

GOD'S DEEPEST HORROR IN SIN

'He that sinneth against Me wrongeth his own soul.'—PROVERBS VIII. 36.

I. THIS is not the common mode of thinking about sin. The common mode is to regard God's horror of sin as resulting from a sense of injury to Himself. Here, on the contrary, the Divine horror of sin is said to consist in the fact that it is an injury to me. A father says to a child, 'Do not go near the fire while I am out; if you do, I shall be very angry'. The child probably thinks that his anger will lie in the fact of being disobeyed. It will not lie there at all; it will be stirred purely by the fear that in its act of disobedience the child may have hurt itself. And if he finds that the child has hurt itself, his anger will be transmuted into the most intense pain.

II. Now, take what we call hell-fire. The heavenly Father cries to His children 'I command you not to go near it lest you get scorched'. What is the ground of that command? Is it the wish to exercise a Divine authority? No; startling as it may seem, it is the wish to avert a Divine fear. You have heard the expression, 'The fear of the Lord'. When I am exhorted to cultivate the fear of the Lord, what does that mean? It means that I am to get into my heart that fear which dwells in the heart of God, that I am to have for my brother the same dread which the heavenly Father has for His children. The fear of the Lord is the fear that His sons and daughters will touch the fire.

III. You speak of God's sovereign decrees. God has no sovereign decrees; God's decrees are all paternal. The decrees of a despot are meant to clip the subject's wings; those of the Father are meant to expand the wings. Why are you forbidden to hate? Because hatred cramps the soul. Why are you forbidden to be jealous? Because jealousy narrows the soul. Why are you forbidden to be selfish? Because selfishness locks the soul. Why are you commanded to love? Because love is liberty. Why are you commanded to pity? Because pity is power. Why are you commanded to sympathize? Because sympathy is the heart's soaring. The commands of your Father break the cage and set you free. He prescribes faith that you may fly. He offers grace that you may grow. He enjoins kindness that you may kindle. He exacts brotherhood that you may bloom. He requires service that you may sing. He invites prayer that you may prophesy. Not in His honour, but in yours, does He ask the homage of your heart; the Father has no glory but the enlargement of His child.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 81.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 36.—W. L. Watkinson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 401. Rocliffe Mackintosh, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 379. IX. 1-6.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 151. IX. 3, 4, and 16.—A. Maclaren, Sermons Preached in Manchester, p. 326. IX. 7, 9, 12.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 154. IX. 10.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 239. C. S. Macfarland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. p. 235. IX. 13-18.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 159. IX. 17.—J. Leith, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 45. X. 1.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 164. X. 4.—Ibid. p. 167. X. 7.—Ibid. p. 168. Canon Bodington, Church Times, vol. xli. 1899, p. 630.—Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 73; see also vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 313. Hugh Black, University Sermons, p. 281. X. 8, 9.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 170. X. 11, 14.—Ibid. p. 172. X. 16.—J. Percival, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 401. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 175. X. 18-21.—Ibid. p. 180. H. Jeffs, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1906, p. 152.

THE ABSOLUTE GOOD

'The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich, and He addeth no sorrow therewith.'—PROVERBS X. 22.

THE ancients believed that the pyramids were so constructed that they cast no shadow; but few things in this world are wholly free from shadows. Well-nigh all circumstances and events, however propitious some may be, entail disadvantages. Absolute perfection is rare in any direction. Yet it is now our privilege to offer unqualified advantage, a gift without a drawback, a blessing that is an unalloyed joy. In its most definite sense the blessing of the Lord is the fullness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ; and we hope to show that a truly Christian life can bring men good, only good; that it implies no abatements whatever, but is a rich and an unadulterated blessing.

I. The influence of true religion upon character affords a proof of this. Here eminently 'the blessing of the Lord maketh rich'. On the banks of the Humber we have seen a vine growing in the open air. In the summer it put forth leaves, the fruit began to fashion, and one might have supposed that it was going to ripen into purple clusters; but it never came to perfection: the grapes remained paltry and green, withering on the tree. A vine planted in the open air in the North of England is always a pathetic spectacle. How different with the vine as it is seen growing in Italy. Its branches are flung abroad as though in conscious triumph, every leaf upon it is a poem, and the clusters gleam like purple constellations set in a firmament like unto an emerald. Here is the rapture of the poet, the dream of the artist, the joy of the vintner. Yet wide as is the distinction between the vine of the Humber and the vineyards of Italy, the difference is yet infinitely greater between character as it struggles in the chill air of secularism and as it ripens in the sunshine of Jesus Christ. 'I am the true Vine, and My Father is the Husbandman. I am the Vine, ye are the branches; he that abideth in Me, and I in him, the same beareth much fruit.' The true Vine is incomparable in the wealth and beauty of moral fruition; and the branches, sharing in His fatness, bear the richest fruits of holiness that ever ripened beneath the sun.

'And He addeth no sorrow therewith.' We are bold to maintain that the gain in character in Christ is attended by no drawback. It implies no sacrifice of strength; the active elements of mind and will are in nowise sapped by the passive. Our Master is foremost in the line of heroes, and He inspires His followers with His own strength and courage. The Christian character implies no sacrifice of tenderness. The passive qualities essential to the completeness of human nature are not invalidated by the active; multitudes follow in Christ's train who combine the tenacity of steel with the softness of silk. No sacrifice of self-respect is exacted. Whilst the Christian faith abases us for our sins, it assumes our greatness and respects our greatness at every step. No sacrifice of rationality is involved in Christian discipleship. No error is greater than to suppose that our faith puts any arbitrary limit to reason; the New Testament enlarges the human spirit without imposing upon it any narrowing or humiliating limitations. Nor are we called to make any sacrifice of practicability. Our aspirations are not mocked nor our strength wasted in the pursuit of unattainable standards. No sacrifice of individuality is implied. True piety destroys none of the charm of personality; on the contrary, it elicits, most fully, the special glory of the individual soul. And, finally, the moral ideal and discipline of the faith of Christ does not prejudice the humanness of its disciples. Whilst disclosing a higher world it does not forget that we are citizens of this, and members one of another. Looking to Jesus, and simply following Him, the integrity of our spirit can suffer in no respect or degree. In His own character is nothing defective or unbalanced; nor is there in the believer who is complete in Him.

II. The influence of true religion on society and its material conditions is equally benign. 'The blessing of the Lord' makes rich the community and its whole practical life. For generations the faith of Christ has purified public life; not a generation passes without some blighting thing passing with it.

III. The precious influence of the Christian faith on human experience is the last instance we will adduce of the truth of our text. Here 'the blessing of the Lord maketh rich'. The New Testament has little to say about the world we figure on the map, or the worlds around us with which astronomy is concerned; but it concerns itself largely with the world within us—the sphere of the spirit, the realm of thought, imagination, and feeling. As the ages progress this inner world, the world of self-consciousness, is ever seen more clearly to be the most important world with which we have to do. To enrich this world Christ came.

Nietzsche predicts that 'the religion of the future will be the religion of golden laughter'. The religion of the future, then, will be the religion of Jesus Christ. No better definition could be given of it. Laughter devoid of sorrow. That does not bespeak the vacant but the noble mind. That is without stain or folly. That is not like the crackling of thorns under a pot, but steady as a star. The laughter that comes last. Such are the peace and cheerfulness of the pure in heart.—W. L. WATKINSON, The Fatal Barter, pp. 213-27.

REFERENCES.—X. 22.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 183. X. 23.—J. Parker, Studies in Texts, vol. i. pp. 177, 187. X. 24, 25.—Ibid. p. 190. X. 26.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 194. X. 26, 27.—B. G. Hoskyns, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 115. X. 27.—W. C. Magee, Sermons at the Octagon Chapel, Bath, p. 302. X. 29.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 143. XI. 1.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 159. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. vii. p. 34. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 197. XI. 2, 3.—Ibid. p. 201. XI. 9, 13.—Ibid. p. 204. XI. 14.—G. Monks, Pastor in Ecclesia, p. 37. XI. 15.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 206. XI. 17, 18.—Ibid. p. 212. XI. 21.—J. H. Newman, Sermons Bearing on Subjects of the Day, p. 89. XI. 22.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 215. XI. 23.—Ibid. p. 218. XI. 24.—Ibid. p. 220. G. L. Richardson, Sermons for Harvest, p. 50. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 220. XI. 25.—Ibid. p. 223. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 626. XI. 26.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 226. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 642. XI. 28.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 229. XI. 30.—Ibid. p. 233. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 850; see also vol. xxii. No. 1292.

THE CHRISTIAN'S HIGHEST REWARD

'The righteous shall be recompensed in the earth'—

PROVERBS XI. 31.

I. I UNDERSTAND the emphatic words to be, 'in the earth'. There never had been any doubt about the final reward of the righteous; but there were evidently some who were beginning to say: 'It must be reserved for another world; this earth of ours is indifferent to moral distinctions'. The writer of this proverb cries, 'No; my reward will be here'. I do not think he meant that it must come in his present life. Remember, the Jew held that he was to come back to this earth again on the Resurrection morning. The whole point of the passage is that, either now or hereafter, either to-day or to-morrow, the righteous man will see the rectification of things below—the crooked made straight, the rough places made plain, the mountains abased and the valleys exalted. I doubt if a son of Israel would have thanked you for the fairest flowers and the loveliest woods in a world divorced from earthly memories; his whole notion of immortality was the future glorifying of his present actions.

II. And I believe that this is also the immortal hope of every Christian. Did you ever ask yourself, what is that recompense which a Christian saint desires? Is it a paradise in the seventh heaven which the tumult of earth will not reach? Is it a flight to regions unknown and at present unknowable? Is it the wearing of foreign purple and the hearing of foreign music and the engagement in foreign embassies? A Christian in the future life may occasionally have all these things; but he will deem none of them his recompense. What he wants is not a redemption from the past but a redemption of the past. He seeks a river clear as crystal; but he seeks it in the muddy haunts of time—'in the midst of the street'. He desires a tree whose leaves are life-giving; but he wants it for 'the healing of the nations'. He craves a song of exquisite melody; but its subject is to be the glory of a human cross—'worthy is the Lamb that was slain'. He searches for a precious emerald; but he does so in a rainbow of earthly tears. He longs to be able to cry, 'Who are these that are arrayed in white robes?' but the answer he would like to receive is this: 'These are they that came out of great tribulation'.—G. MATHESSON, Messages of Hope, p. 153.

REFERENCES.—XII. 1.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 235. XII. 1-15.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ether, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 155. XII. 4.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 232. XII. 10, 13.—Ibid. p. 240.

WASTED GAINS

'The slothful man roasteth not that which he took in hunting.'
—PROVERBS XII. 27.

I. By toil, by tears, by sharing in the toil and tears of others, our life is rich in gains. Trophies have fallen to our bow, and to the bow of the nation with which we are one, and to the bow of the Gospel we believe; and we have never roasted what we took in hunting. The gains are wasted; the trophies are unused.

1. I want to run that thought out into various spheres of life; and first, the wasted gains in bodily life. Take speech or sight. Compare the possibilities of sight with what you see. Contrast the possibilities of speech with what you say; and are not speech and sight terribly wasted gains?

2. There are wasted gains in our social life. Take friendship, for example. Think for a moment of the toil it cost to make a single friend. The tragedy is the passing of love's kindness; the sloth that lets us squander what we won; the waste of the sweet gains of golden days.

3. There are wasted gains in our public and our national life. Our privileges were bought for us at a great price. And oh, the pity of it, how we waste them!

There is our restful Sunday, and it was dearly bought. But every country road and country inn on Sunday is thronged with men who never think of God. There is the open Bible, and it was dearly bought, yet now it is every book before the Bible. There is our liberty of worship, and it was dearly bought, yet, come a rainy Sunday, and half the churches in the city are unfilled.

And there is our right of voting too, of moulding public life and sharing in it, and that was dearly bought. And hundreds of men and women are so careless that they will sit at home, or visit, or go to work, and never trouble to record their vote.

II. In our moral and spiritual life there is the same tale of wasted gains. Had we but used all we have learned; had we but held by all that suffering taught us; had we but clung to what we wrestled for, we should be nearer heaven. But we have squandered it like any prodigal, and flung it to the winds, and almost all the lessons are to learn again!

III. Squander your gains, and God will take them from you. Neglect your talents, and God will take your talents back. Misuse your sight, and God will rob you of the power to see. Despise your teachings, and God will not teach you any more.—G. H. MORRISON, Sun-Rise, p. 169.

REFERENCES.—XII. 27.—Archbishop Benson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 104. XIII. 7.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ether, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 163. XIII. 12.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 243. XIII. 13.—Ibid. p. 245. XIII. 15.—Hugh Black, University Sermons, p. 83. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 247. XIII. 20.—T. Barker, Plain Sermons, p. 178. J. Percival, Some Helps for School Life, p. 155. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 155. XIII. 23.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 173; see also Paul's Prayers, p. 287. XIII. 24.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 252. XIII. 32.—F. E. Paget, Plain Preaching to Poor People (7th Series), p. 61. XIV. 6.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 258. XIV. 7, 16.—Ibid. p. 262. XIV. 8.—G. Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 305.

SIN AND ITS MOCKERS

*Fools make a mock at sin: but among the righteous there is favour.—PROVERBS XIV. 9.

It is one thing to mock in such a fashion as that the sinning person shall say, 'This thing which the mirror holds up to me is base, contemptible, unprofitable, and I will henceforth abjure it'; and another thing to laugh in such a fashion as to make him imagine 'This thing is trivial, it is of no serious import whatsoever, and I will therefore conduct myself as I like. The first kind of mockery is the austere, if somewhat cynical, expression of moral indignation; the second is the light, flippant sneer of moral indifference.

I. And this scoffing indifference, this tendency to levity in men's views and speeches and whole mental attitude to sin, when and how is it manifested?

1. It is manifested in those who make a mock at the facts and realities of sin. This is the most obvious and direct shape which the temptation assumes, and it exhibits itself in various directions. Take, for instance, literature. Take conversation.

2. It is possible to manifest the same tendency by making a mock at the reprovers of sin.

3. Take another phase of the self-same tendency. It appears, does it not, in the case of those who mock at the fear of sin?

4. The kind of mocking that associates itself with the thought of the powers and the agencies of sin.

II. Note certain obvious reasons why those who mock at it are fools:—

1. They are fools because blind to their own real interests. Safety is at stake. Self-preservation is at stake. Those who mock at sin are most apt to become the prey of sin.

2. Because blind to the teaching of all observation and experience. Consider what sin has wrought, consider what sin is working still; and apart from the tremendous revelations of Scripture, you may see enough round about to make you tremble, rather than scoff.

3. The man who mocks at sin is infatuated not only because blind to the interests of self and blind to the teachings of experience, but because blind to the lessons of the Cross of Christ.—W. A. GRAY, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. II. p. 573.

MAKING LIGHT OF SIN

*Fools make a mock at sin.—PROVERBS XIV. 9.

WHEN we think of all the unhappiness sin causes, and of all the misery of which it is the parent, we might deem it to be a thing incredible that any person should make light of sin. Sin is the great power that makes for loneliness, as it is the power everywhere that makes for wreckage; and in the light of that knowledge, which is common property, to make a mock at sin might seem impossible. Still more might it seem to be impossible when we recall the teaching of our faith. If Christ has shown us what God thinks of goodness, He has also shown us what God thinks of sin. And the one fact that the Father gave the Son that He might die for sinners on the cross, might be thought to make such mockery incredible. Yet the fact remains that men do mock at sin. They treat it lightly and make a jest of it. They do not view it with that holy anger which is the constant attitude of God. Alive in a measure, as they all must be, to the handiwork of sin in human life, they are not moved by it as God is moved, nor stirred by it profoundly as was Jesus.

We see that, for instance, in the matter of confession, in the confession of our sins in prayer. No part of prayer is less real to most men than the part which voices the confession of sin.

Again we gather this prevailing lightness from the kind of way in which men talk of sin. They speak of it with a smile or with a jest, and cover it up under some pleasant name. When a man is dead in earnest in a matter you can generally infer it from his speech. When a man is dead in earnest in a matter it is then he begins to call a spade a spade. And the very fact that in men's common speech sin is not spoken of with such directness, is a straw that shows us how the wind is blowing.

Again we may gather how lightly men think of sin from the different standards by which they judge it. Sin is a very different thing in us, from what it is in the lives of other people.

Well, then, if that be the fact, can we discover the causes of that fact? There are some reasons which suggest themselves at once, and I shall mention one or two of them.

I. In the first place, men treat sin lightly just because they are so accustomed to it. It is so common that their hearts are hardened; so universal that they are never startled.

II. Again we are tempted to make light of sin because of its intertwining with the good. In deeper senses than the Psalmist thought of, we are fearfully and wonderfully made. If all that was bad in individual character stood by itself in visible isolation, then as we looked at a man and praised the good in him, we might feel the loathsomeness of what was bad. But human character is not constructed so, with separate stations for its good and evil: it is an intricate and inextricable tangle of what is brightest with what is very dark. Then I beheld, says Bunyan in his dream, and there was a way to hell from nigh the gate of heaven. I think that that is so with every man: his heaven and hell are never far apart.

III. Once more men are tempted to make light of sin because it veils its consequences with such consummate skill. Sin is the jauntiest of all adventurers, and sets its best foot forward gallantly. The certainty of sin is always this, that its to-morrow is a little worse. And so with consummate skill it hides to-morrow, and says in the very words of Christ to-day, and to-day is so exquisitely sweet and passionate that certainties of judgment are forgotten.

IV. Again, many make light of sin because no one knows sin's power till he resists it. It is a natural law in the spiritual world that power can be measured by resistance. Only when the life of grace begins, and a man awakes to all that life may be, does he learn the powerful swirl of that black river that flows in the dark places of his heart.—G. H. MORRISON, The Return of the Angels, p. 214.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 9.—C. Wordsworth, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 157. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 181. XIV. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxv. No. 2079. W. G. Rutherford, The Key of Knowledge, p. 15. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 266. XIV. 12.—Ibid. p. 268. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. vii. p. 50.

LAUGHTER AND SORROW

* Even in laughter the heart is sorrowful.—PROVERBS XIV. 13.

I. THE difference between outward and inward life.

Even in laughter, says Solomon, the heart is sorrowful. He is thinking of the duality of life.

You will not grasp the influence of Jesus, in all its wonderful impact on mankind, unless you bear in mind this strange duality. Under all outward seeming our Lord discerned the struggle of the heart; He was never misled by laughter or by speech; He never ignored all that we cannot utter.

II. Sorrow and joy are strangely knit together. Even in laughter the heart is sorrowful. There is a mystical union between our smiles and tears.

We see this in the lives of our greatest men, for instance. It is one of the lessons we learn from great biographies. The greatest are very seldom solemn, and certainly they are almost never joyless. True joy is not the mere escape from sorrow. It may be that the capacity for gladness is but the other side of the capacity for pain.

We find this also in our own greatest moments, when the fire of life flashes up in some fierce intensity. When the heart throbs, and feeling is enkindled, and every nerve is quivering with emotion, we scarcely know if we are sorry or glad. It is a master-touch of our master dramatist that in the very heart of his tragedies you will have some fool or jester. It means far more than a mere relief from the agony; it means that the light and the shadow are akin. There have come moments to every one of us, when sorrow and joy were strangely knit together.

And do you not think that is true of Jesus Christ? It is one of the mysteries of that perfect life. He was a Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; His soul was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death. Yet through it all, and in the midst of it, our adorable Lord is talking of His joy.

III. Sorrow lies nearer to the heart of life than joy. Even in laughter the heart is sorrowful: at the back of all there is the heart's unrest.

I think that even language bears this out; and language becomes very illuminative when we study it. We never talk about a heavy joy: we only talk about a heavy grief. Happiness bubbles up or ripples over; there is some suggestion of the surface in it. But sorrow is heavy, and what that implies is this, that when God casts it into the sea of life it sinks by its own weight into the deeps.

Unless this proverb of Solomon prove itself true, the cross is not life's true interpretation. In the centre of history stands the cross of Calvary, and the cross is the epitome of woe. And if life's deepest secret be gladness and not sorrow, if laughter runs deeper into the heart than tears, then the cross, that professes to touch the deepest depths, can be nothing but a tragical mistake. I do not think that we have found it so. I do not think that the cross has ever failed us. The deepest music that our heart ever uttered has blended and chimed with the sad strain of Calvary.—G. H. MORRISON, Sun-Rise, p. 43.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 13.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 187.

SELF-CONTAINEDNESS

* A good man shall be satisfied from himself.—PROVERBS XIV. 14.

'A good man shall be satisfied from himself.' Then there can be a noble kind of self-satisfaction. There is a self-satisfaction which is repellent, an offensive form of conceit. This species of self-satisfaction must be altogether removed from our minds when we seek the interpretation of our text.

I. It is a very natural expectation that kindness should meet with the return of gratitude. We say there is some satisfaction in doing kindnesses if they are received by grateful hearts. But oftentimes the gratitude is withheld, and we are profoundly dissatisfied. Let us take the counsel of the text, and when gratitude is lacking, let us retire into our own hearts, and find satisfaction in the kindness itself. An act is more and finer than its consequences. God 'is kind to the unthankful'.

II. It seems to be a most fitting thing that duty should culminate in comfort. But we are confronted with the fact that comfort is not always the crown of duty. There are many people who are scrupulous and conscientious, but their sky is overcast. Their way abounds in thorns. What is the meaning of it all? Is it not intended to throw us back upon the true wealth, to urge us to seek our satisfaction not in the comfort that duty may bring, but in the duty itself? That is a very elevated word of the Psalmist—'I delight to do Thy will'.

III. The great principle has other applications. Let this one suffice. If there be any who are workers for the Lord, and who are cast down and disquieted because of apparently fruitless toil, get back into the consciousness of honest work honestly done, and you shall find the brightness there. 'Light is sown for the righteous.' 'A good man shall be satisfied from himself.'—J. H. JOWETT, Meditations for Quiet Moments, p. 26.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 14.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 191. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 272. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1235. XIV. 15.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 275. XIV. 21.—A. Rowland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 300. XIV. 25.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 278. XIV. 26.—Ibid. p. 282. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1290. XIV. 30.—A. W. Hutton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 348. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 286. XIV. 31.—Ibid. p. 289. XIV. 32.—Ibid. p. 294. XIV. 34.—J. Ossian Davies, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 280. J. G. Greenhough, ibid. vol. lxiv. 1894, p. 314. J. Milne, ibid. vol. lxvi. 1904, p. 135. XV. 1.—H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 163. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 299. XV. 3, 11.—Ibid. p. 304. XV. 4.—Ibid. p. 313. XV. 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 177. XV. 13.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 318. XV. 14, 21.—Ibid. p. 323. XV. 16, 17, 27.—Ibid. p. 332. XV. 17.—B. D. Johns, Pulpit Notes, p. 123. XV. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1948. XV. 23.—H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 217. XV. 31.—Hugh Black, University Sermons, p. 199. XV. 33.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 328. XVI. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 849. W. C. Magee, Sermons at St. Saviour's, Bath, p. 184. A. W. Potts, School Sermons, p. 109. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 195. XVI. 2, 3.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 338. XVI. 6.—Ibid. p. 344. F. D. Maurice, Lincoln's Inn Sermons, p. 185. XVI. 7.—R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 1423. XVI. 9.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 348. XVI. 16.—Ibid. p. 357. XVI. 17.—Ibid. p. 360. J. Fraser, Parochial and Other Sermons, p. 208. XVI. 20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 392. XVI. 22.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 364. XVI. 22, 33.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 204. XVI. 32.—E. W. Attwood, Sermons for Clergy and Laity, p. 456. J. S. Swan, Short Sermons, p. 61. C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 36; see also ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 25. XVI. 33.—T. Templeton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 138. Ambrose Shepherd, ibid. vol. lxix. 1906, p. 249. XVII. 12.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 368. XVII. 15.—Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. vii. p. 67. XVII. 17.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 376. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 899. H. H. Snell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 344. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 179. A. E. Hutchinson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 358. R. Winterbotham, Sermons Preached in Holy Trinity Chapel, Edinburgh, p. 25. XVII. 20.—A. Jessopp, Norwich School Sermons, p. 210.

THE NEARNESS OF THE ESSENTIAL IN LIFE'S DISCIPLINE

'Wisdom is before the face of him that hath understanding.'—PROVERBS XVII. 24 (R.V.).

THE fool is he who despises the actual and possible, and longs for what is not; he is never where his eyes are. The text is, then, a warning against vain con-ceits and regrets, against frittering away life sighing for impossible conditions, whilst missing the glory before our eyes, the treasures at our feet, the prizes within our grasp.

I. Do not despise the familiar. The elements of happiness, sources of improvement, and opportunities for service and sacrifice are never far to seek. Really no folly is more egregious than that of looking high and wide for the essential gifts and blessings as though God had forgotten or denied them. Our star is in our brain, not in the sky; our ship of gold is at the quay awaiting its discharge, and not upon the high seas; our fortune is at our feet, not at the foot of the rainbow. Let us lay it to heart, there is nothing better for us in the wide universe than the set of circumstances which constitute the frame-work of our contemporaneous life.

II. Do not despise the mean. 'Wisdom is before the face of him that hath understanding.' The wise see great significance and taste rich satisfactions in what appears to the carnal eye poor and base, the bread-and-butter life is lighted up by the beatific vision; on the other hand, the fool hates the drudgery of duty, the weariness of work, the monotonousness of mere faithfulness, and takes refuge in day-dreams and fiction generally. Let us beware of scorning the grey, coarse, beaten pathway; for it is a section of the King's highway, despite its dreariness. Do not despise common positions; they require splendid souls to fill them: do not despise common tasks; it requires rare souls to accomplish them. Only God's jewels can worthily work out His great purpose in humble places and things; and in thus working out His purpose they are proved and polished against the great day of coronation. Do not weaken the soul with vain longings and idealizations. There is no victory like that of the commonplace life bravely lived.

III. Do not despise the small. 'The eyes of a fool are in the ends of the earth seeking great things,' whilst in the apparently insignificant close at hand reside most momentous possibilities. The wise accept thankfully the small sphere, the one talent, the few things. In the most restricted sphere every noble quality of human nature may be illustrated, every grand work wrought.—W. L. WATKINSON, Themes for Hours of Meditation, p. 86.

PROVERBS XVII. 24.

A DISTINGUISHED naturalist declares that the best bird-nester is the village simpleton. He starts on his quest without crediting the birds with any extraordinary subtlety, and at once lights upon their retreat; whilst other seekers, assuming an acuteness in the birds which they do not possess, waste the time in exploring hidden places, overlooking the nest right before their eyes. This is a parable of human life. Things of the greatest moment are being constantly overlooked because of the mistaken notion that whatever is of the first consequence is uncommon, hidden, and remote.—W. L. WATKINSON, Themes for Hours of Meditation, p. 86.

REFERENCES.—XVII. 24.—J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 195; see also vol. lxiv. 1893, p. 72. XVIII. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ix. No. 491. R. Winterbotham, Sermons Preached in Holy Trinity Church Edinburgh, p. 40. XVIII. 10, 11.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezra, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 210. XVIII. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ii. No. 97.

THE DEEPEST STAGE OF CALAMITY

'The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity; but a wounded spirit who can bear?'—PROVERBS XVIII. 14.

THE idea is that a calamity affects us, not according to the weight of the stroke, but according to the state of our thoughts. The spirit of a man is his mental state as distinguished from his outward circumstances.

I. The proverb says that an outward misfortune influences the life, not in proportion to its actual severity, but in proportion to the resources of the mind. I am profoundly convinced that this is true. Two men take a fever at the same time; one dies, the other recovers. The popular view is that in the former case the physical stroke was more powerful. Yet in itself it may have been weaker. The man who died may have succumbed to the fever because he was down in spirit when the fever seized him.

II. That which prostrates us and that which supports us is in every case, not a thing, but a thought. We speak of the 'ills which flesh is heir to'. I think we look for the black in the wrong direction; we should say, the 'ills which spirit is heir to'. All the crowning calamities of life are in the thinking—not in the striking.

III. The crushing wound comes ever from within. The friend who is separated from you by death may be really less removed than the friend who goes from you to a foreign country; yet between the two cases there is no comparison in the degree of your sorrow. Why is this? It lies in the thought. The foreign country has a name in your heart; the dwelling-place of the dead has as yet no name. It is the idea that makes the difference between separation and bereavement. Both equally for the time miss 'the touch of a vanished hand, and the sound of a voice that is still'; but in the one there is the hope of future communion, in the other there may be a cloud which obscures to-morrow's sky.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 141.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2494. XVIII. 17.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 383. XVIII. 19.—J. W. Mills, After Glow, p. 141. XVIII. 22.—W. M. Taylor, Outlines of Sermons in the Old Testament, p. 160; W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 387. XVIII. 24.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 120; A. E. Hutchinson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 368. XIX. 11.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 394. XIX. 15.—J. Marshall Lang, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1894, p. 58; W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 276. XIX. 22.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 398. XX. 1.—Ibid. p. 401. XX. 1-7.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezra, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 220.

THE SLUGGARD IN HARVEST

'The sluggard will not plough by reason of the cold; therefore shall he beg in harvest and have nothing.'—PROVERBS XX. 4.

I. FIRST, let us try to bring out the principles which are crystallized in this picturesque saying.

1. The first thought evidently is: present conduct determines future conditions. Life is a series of epochs, each of which has its destined work, and that being done, all is well; and that being left undone, all is ill. The mystic significance of the trivialities of life is that in them we largely make destiny, and in them we wholly make character.

2. The easy road is generally the wrong one. Never allow yourselves to be guided in your choice of a road by the consideration that the turf is smooth, and the flowers by the side of it sweet. Remember the sluggard would have been warmer, with a wholesome warmth, at the plough-tail than cowering in the chimney-corner. Fix it in your minds that nothing worth doing is done but at the cost of difficulty and toil.

3. The season let slip is gone for ever. Opportunity is bald behind, and must be grasped by the forelock. Life is full of tragic might-have-beens. The student who has spent the term in indolence, perhaps dissipation, has no time to get up his subject when he is in the examination room, with the paper before him. And life, and nature, and God's law, which is the Christian expression for the godless word nature, are stern taskmasters, and demand that the duty shall be done in its season or left undone for ever.

II. In the second place let me say a word—1. About the lowest sphere to which my text applies. This proverb is simply an inculcation of the duty of honest work, and of the necessity of being wide awake to opportunities in our daily work.

2. Let me apply the text in a somewhat higher direction. Carry these principles with you in the cultivation of that important part of yourself—your intellects. I should like all of you to make a conscience of making the best of your brains, as God has given them to you in trust. 'The sluggard will not plough by reason of the cold.' The dawdler will read no books that tax his intellect, therefore shall he beg in harvest and have nothing.

3. Again I may apply these principles to a higher work still—that of the formation of character. Nothing will come to you noble, great, or elevating in that direction unless it is sought, and sought with toil. In the making of character we have to work as a painter in fresco does, with a swift brush on the plaster while it is wet. It sets and hardens in an hour. And men drift into habits which become tyrannies and dominant, before they know where they are. Do not let yourselves be shaped by accident, by circumstance.

4. Let these principles be applied to religion, and teach us the wisdom and necessity of beginning the Christian life at the earliest moment.

5. But there is a more solemn thought still. This life as a whole is to the future life as the ploughing time is to the harvest, and there are awful words in Scripture, which seem to point in the same direction in reference to the irrevocable and irreversible issue of neglected opportunities on earth, as this proverb does in regard to the ploughing and harvests of this life.—A. MACLAREN, The Wearied Christ, p. 137.

REFERENCES.—XX. 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2766. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 409. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 226. XX. 5, 6.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 413. XX. 11.—S. Martin, Rain Upon the Mown Grass, p. 395. XX. 12.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 417. XX. 14.—W. Baird, Sermons, p. 13. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 125. XX. 17.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 236. XX. 18.—F. J. Jayne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 225. XX. 29.—D. Watson, Ibid. vol. xli. 1894, p. 166. J. Vickery, Ideals of Life, p. 31. XXII. 1.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 431. XXII. 2.—Ibid. p. 434. J. M. Neale, Sermons for Home Feast Days in the Christian Year, p. 402. C. A. Salmond, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 100. R. R. Dolling, Ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, p. 136. J. A. Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 159. XXII. 3.—T. Barker, Plain Sermons, p. 40. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 438. XXII. 6.—Ibid. p. 441. A. Murray, The Children for Christ, p. 170. E. W. Attwood, Sermons for Clergy and Laity, p. 388. XXII. 7.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 452.

'The slothful man saith, there is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets.'—PROVERBS XXII. 13.

In the text before us the slothful man is made to give the reason for his slothfulness. Of course it is easy to see that his reply is a mere excuse. He does not want to stir himself. He much prefers the comfort of his own fireside. Still he must show some reason for his conduct. This lion is simply the creature of his lively imagination. Yet in his judgment any excuse is better than no excuse at all, hence his words 'There is a lion without, in the streets'.

I. No man can close his ears to the call of duty from either real or imaginary dangers without a tremendous loss to himself. 'The slothful man saith, there is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets.' He refuses the call of duty in consequence. Does he remain the same as before? By no means. He is poorer in every way. He is poorer because he refuses that activity which is life to all created beings. It is a most instructive study to note how severely nature punishes all refusals to exercise that energy by which growth and progress are accomplished. What we call a freak in nature is, in almost every case, nature's punishment of the slothful. It is even so in the moral and spiritual world.

II. There is in that moral and spiritual world an universal duty relative to God on the one hand and man on the other. We are all brought face to face with a duty we owe to God, an obligation to worship Him in spirit and in truth. There is a call of His Spirit which comes to every man.

The slothful man knows full well that though the lion is but a mere excuse, the vain creation of his own imagination, yet there is involved in the call to action perils of a very real kind. The soul that arrays itself by the side of Jesus Christ, and in every thought, word, and deed, seeks to translate into its own life the spirit of the Lord, will find the lion without in the street.

The call of the human is as imperative and universal as the call of the Divine. God is calling us up in worship, and man is calling us out in service, and both unite in demanding that we should spend and be spent in the kingdom of Christ.

III. Let us consider the effect of the conduct of the slothful man upon himself. The path of the slothful endeth in death. He turns in upon himself, and feeds upon his own soul, and is as the camel in the desert who feeds upon its own hump, and when that is done dies. Christ has indicated the end of the slothful man. 'Whosoever shall save his life shall lose it.' His real danger is from within. He is his greatest enemy.—J. GAY, Common Truths from Queer Texts, p. 14.

PROVERBS XXII. 13.

THE greatest foe in Central Africa is the terrible sleep sickness. The victim gradually, but none the less surely, settles down into a sleep from which there is no awakening in this world. In its first stages at any rate activity is salvation. Slothfulness is a mental and moral sleep sickness. From its terrible end we may be saved if taken in time. But there is only one invariable effect. Its feet lead down to the valley of death. True life is the very opposite to the slothful, and is incompatible with luxury and ease.—J. GAY, Common Truths from Queer Texts, p. 23.

REFERENCES.—XXII. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1670. XXII. 22, 23.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 465. XXIII. 1.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Blessed Sacrament, p. 99. XXIII. 1-3.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 460.

THOUGHT

'As he thinketh in his heart, so is he.'—PROVERBS XXIII. 7.

THE capacity of thinking is a most wonderful thing. Here lies man's supremacy over all the visible world about him. All the mighty deeds that have blessed humanity were once thoughts. Before ever the angel's song was heard on the heights of Bethlehem Christ's atoning work was a Divine thought.

If such is the province and potency of thought, we see how the character of a man's thoughts determines the character of his life: for as he thinketh, so is he. His actions are inspired from within. The utterance of his mind is seen in the movement of his feet and hands continually.

I. Every product of the soul, whether it be an action or a purpose, is first a germ. There is not a Christian but owed his or her spiritual birth to the direct act of the Holy Ghost bringing home conviction to your souls. There was the first thought—I am a sinner; and the next thought—I need a Saviour, and the next—that Christ is the Saviour for me; and out of that comes your hope for this world and for heaven. It is not only true that every Christian life is a germ awakened by the Holy Spirit, but all after-actions and plans of that life have their origin there.

II. Sin lies in the soul in germs—in germs as well as in actions. And, as good thoughts are to be nursed and encouraged and carried out, so the moral success of life consists in killing evil thoughts. Every sin was once a little thought. The guilt lies not in having the thought; for fearful thoughts often come to the godliest people. The guilt lies in what? In opening the door and giving them house-room and heart-room. The real difference between good men and bad men is largely this, that one fosters a thought of evil and the other quenches it. Every sin was once a thought. The indulgence of wicked thought makes sinners. The acting out of the thought makes the transgressor. The time to kill the serpent is in the egg. Extinguish fire by putting out sparks. Keep thy heart bolted against evil thoughts. For 'as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he'. The miser's thought is all dwindled to a sovereign or a penny, and he cannot see God or eternity. Let me know what your soul turns to and thinks most about when left to itself, and I will determine your spiritual character before God. And at last such shall it be before the judgment.

III. There are few purer and richer pleasures in this world than the enjoyment of sweet thoughts, happy thoughts, holy thoughts.

The heart determines our everlasting destiny. A heart without holiness never shall see the Lord.

Christ is the one only purifier of the heart. He can change the fountain-head. He can make it to send forth not bitter water, but sweet, pure, refreshing water.—T. L. CUYLER, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. II. p. 93.

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 7.—J. Clifford, The Dawn of Manhood, p. 66. XXIII. 10, 11.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 465. XXIII. 15-23.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 240. XXIII. 15-35.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 473. XXIII. 17, 18.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvi. No. 2150. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 247. XXIII. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvi. No. 2152. XXIII. 19-23.—H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (4th Series), p. 368.

BUYING THE TRUTH

'Buy the truth, and sell it not.'—PROVERBS XXIII. 23.

I. LET us consider the two exhortations set before us as they stand. First, 'Buy the truth'. The expression is, of course, metaphorical; still, it enshrines a reality. The truth, if it is to be possessed by us, must be bought; it is not to be had for nothing. And we go further. We may notice that it is customary for pious persons of all schools of thought in the Church of God to speak of the whole body of things to be believed, experienced, and done in order to get salvation as, in the language of our text, 'the truth'. Now the truth that is to be possessed by us has to be bought, and it teaches us two lessons: First, that there are difficulties in the way of its attainment; and secondly, that, were it not so—were truth to be had cheap—like other things which cost little, it might be liable to be lightly regarded. We cannot but be reminded of two other portions of Holy Scripture, one in the Old and the other in the New Testament, which administer this counsel, 'Buy the truth'. The first is the prophecy of Isaiah. 'Ho, every one that thirsteth,' cries the prophet, 'come ye to the water, and he that hath no money; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price.' Truth, then (for the wine may be taken for the truth in its strength, and the milk for the truth in its simplicity), though it must be bought, is not, we see, to be purchased with wealth; no money can buy it. In respect of this it is as free to all as the very air that we breathe. 'No mention shall be made of coral, or of pearls: for the price of wisdom is above rubies.' The second portion of Holy Scripture which we may refer to is one of our Lord's own parables. He represents 'a merchantman seeking goodly pearls, who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had and bought it'. So here we see that the truth is not only to be bought, but that it may cost us dear. Something which, in some cases, it may be, means 'all that he hath,' has to be bartered or given in exchange for it. 'If life,' to quote an old saying, 'were merchandise which men could buy, The rich would live, the poor, alas! would die.' But this does not apply at all to the merchandise of truth. Here both rich and poor are on exactly the same level, and have, as a rule, to pay the same price; it is not money that buys truth. We must be prepared to sacrifice something for its acquisition and retention. We may be called upon to sacrifice popularity, ease, worldly honour, the support of the important, the good opinion of the powerful, the counsels of the learned, the goodwill of friends. The truth, if we buy it, may be of so high a price as to cost all this. And there are regions of truth, more especially of theological or moral or social distinction, which dawn, perhaps, upon only one noble mind in an age, and we find that such truths demand a high price. They who first promulgate them have indeed to pay a high price for them, as the lives of the prophets of old have shown. Great truths are dearly bought.

II. Let us now consider the selling of the truth. The possibility of its being sold is what we are here warned against. 'Buy the truth and sell it not.' Sell it not after that you have had to buy it and have had very possibly to pay dearly for it. How is this selling of the truth brought to pass? Why, in this way: A man in an evil hour may be tempted to look upon what he parted from in order to become possessor of the truth, and it seems to him that he has paid too dearly for it; he considers what his principles have cost him, and is disposed to think that his principles have cost him too much. Then there are not wanting those around him to represent to him how much happier, richer, more prosperous, more respected perhaps, he might have been in the world had he not been so particular, so scrupulous, so conscientious, so uncompromising. And then, again, that liar, who from the beginning abode not in the truth, helps him to see even so, and he is at length prepared to sell the truth. And what does he expect to get by the sale of it? To regain popularity, to regain ease, to regain reputation, to regain the honour, the support, the counsels, the goodwill that he had to sacrifice in order to buy it. But, as in other cases, so in this—buying is one thing, selling is another. In selling a thing you rarely receive what you gave for it; if you buy dear you sell cheap. You may sell the truth, but it is not certain that you will regain any one of those things which you had to sacrifice when you bought it.

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 23.—J. G. Greenhough, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 113. E. J. Miller, ibid. vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 133. XXIII. 26.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1995. F. B. Cowl, Straight Tracks, p. 124. A. F. Winnington Ingram, The Call of the Father, p. 133. XXIII. 29-35.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 256. XXIII. 32.—J. Watter, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 356. XXII. 34.—C. Jerdan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 272. XXIV. 1, 19, 20.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 184.

WISDOM THE BUILDER

'Through wisdom is an house builded; and by understanding it is established: and by knowledge shall the chambers be filled with all precious and pleasant riches.'—PROVERBS XXIV. 3, 4.

MEN everywhere are engaged in house-building. Some in dreamy castle-building; some in material fortune-building; all in inward character-building, building up, each one of them, the history of a life, the destiny of an eternity.

I. To begin at the bottom of the scale, let us glance at that kind of building which with so many people is the first and chief concern of life—the building up of their material fortunes.

While heavenly wisdom will not permit us to make material success, the pursuit of mere fortune, a chief end of life, it is nevertheless true that the possession and practice of this wisdom has much to do, both in the individual life and on a larger scale in society, with the building up of a stable, a durable prosperity. We know very well that for sound, stable, durable prosperity in a country, as in the individual, we must have as a foundation, before all else, character, honesty, probity, reliableness; strict, just, and honourable dealing between man and man.

II. Turn now from this outward building to that which is at first sight its very opposite. But you see how closely they are connected. From the building up of material fortune, I mean, to the inward building up of character.

Every man, by every thought he thinks, by the habits he acquires, the actions he performs, is building up a house for himself, a habitation for his soul, none the less real that he cannot just walk out of it and leave it behind him when he wills. The mind is its own place, and may become to its possessor a palace or a prison. You enter one soul: it is a foul, contracted, base, poison-laden chamber, the inlets through which one might enter into it are choked up. You enter another soul: it is a broad and spacious habitation. There is a lofty and noble outlook, towards heaven and upon earth. And whence this difference? Simply that the one has been building without this heavenly wisdom, and the other has been building with it.

III. Take now another step, and look for a moment at the building up of a house of knowledge and art. It might seem at first as if knowledge, and certainly art, were independent of character, or of the possession of this moral wisdom. But in reality it is not so. The keystone of all true knowledge is found in reverence for God.

IV. In church building also we need the reminder of our text. The more evils abound around us, and the more we think they abound, the more earnestly we should set ourselves to what is specially the duty placed before us by Divine Wisdom Himself, the work, the task, of building up the kingdom of God in the hearts of men and in the world.—J. ORR, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 134.

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 4.—W. Skinner, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 108. XXIV. 10.—J. A. Picton, Pulpit Discourses, p. 3. XXIV. 11, 12.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 263. J. Guinness Rogers, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 193. Mark Guy Pearse, Christian World Pulpit, vol. 1. 1896, p. 273. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 485.

PROVERBS XXIV. 12.

RUSKIN says: 'The plea of ignorance will never take away our responsibilities. It is written, "If thou sayest, Behold we knew it not; doth not He that pondereth the heart consider it? and He that keepeth thy soul, doth not He know it?"'

REFERENCES.—XXIV. 21.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 491. XXIV. 30, 31.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 269. XXIV. 30-32.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2027. XXIV. 30-34.—W. Gray Elmslie, Expository Lectures and Sermons, p. 178. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 498. XXIV. 31.—F. B. Cowl, Straight Tracks, p. 50. XXIV. 32.—J. Parker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 323. XXV. 1-5.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 500. XXV. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2838. XXV. 3.—J. B. Lightfoot, Ordination Addresses, p. 30. XXV. 11.—S. Cox, Expositions, p. 149. XXV. 13, 19.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 505. XXV. 21, 22.—Ibid. p. 509. XXV. 23.—Ibid. p. 515. XXV. 25.—Ibid. p. 519. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. 1. No. 2866. XXV. 28.—W. G. Rutherford, The Key of Knowledge, p. 117. A. L. Lilley, A Lent in London, p. 214. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 274.

THE LEGS OF THE LAME ARE NOT EQUAL

'The legs of the lame are not equal.'—PROVERBS XXVI. 7.

'THE legs of the lame are not equal:' so, says the wise man, 'is a parable in the mouth of fools'. That is to say, the parable in the mouth of fools is not equal; it fails of an all-round interpretation which will carry conviction concerning the truth which it seeks to emphasize and enforce.

I. Some very good people pride themselves on the open mind. They look upon any one who may, upon any subject, arrive at any definite conclusion, which will commit them to any definite opinion, as narrow minded. They are broad enough to receive anything. These people look upon this open mind as a virtue; consequently they have no settled conviction, they walk as a lame man. Their legs are not equal. Their actions are uneven and un-table.

This type of mind which, like the fool's parable is loose, disjointed, and unequal, should not be confounded with that willingness to entertain truth, come it from whatever source it may be, an essential of the healthy and growing mind.

II. As far as the Gospel is concerned, there is absolutely no need for a lame leg. Granted, as the book does, 'In the beginning God,' and the whole plan of salvation, the whole doctrine of the atonement with all that that doctrine involves, is so clear and demonstrable that the lame leg, the uneven foot, the undecided step, is surely inexcusable. If God is, then Sinai and Calvary are as natural as the daylight, and as orderly as the sun rising.

Consider the character which this Gospel has produced, and let the fruit bear witness of the life within. But first of all what is this Gospel? It is the proclaiming of a character. The Gospel is the glad news concerning Jesus Christ. We cannot say the Gospel produced the character of Jesus Christ; but we can most truly affirm that His character produced the Gospel. And what a character it was, so strong, so decisive. He certainly knew how to obtain a determination. There was no suggestion of a limp in His walk, no evidence of looseness in His parable.

III. But this Gospel does produce a character. It is the character of Jesus Christ which is produced in those who believe on His name. Christ is begotten in the heart of the believer. And when that is done the lame leg disappears, the loose, ill-considered, disjointed parable vanishes. There is obtained that determination, 'the first requisite and indication of a rationally decisive character'.

Look at this indispensable fact in the lives of some of that mighty host who have followed Him. Take the first disciples. They furnish a striking and remarkable contrast before and after the resurrection of Christ.—J. GAY, Common Truths from Queer Texts, p. 5.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 11.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 523. XXVI. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1670. XXVI. 23.—F. B. Cowl, Straight Tracks, p. 88.

JOHN BUNYAN'S APPLICATION OF AN OLD TESTAMENT TEXT

'There are seven abominations in his heart.'—PROVERBS XXVI. 25.

I. WHAT were the 'Seven Abominations' John Bunyan discovered in his heart?

The fatal list is before us in Grace Abounding.

1. 'Inclinings to unbelief.' Whether we define 'unbelief' as failure to subscribe to a body of truth or as lack of personal trustfulness it is yet an 'abomination,' and 'inclinings' to one or other form of unbelief are an 'abomination'—unfashionable though it be to avow it in these days.

2. 'Suddenly to forget the love and mercy that Christ manifesteth.' Bunyan accurately depicts spiritual experience when he describes this process of forgetfulness as setting in 'suddenly'. In a trice we fall into this error. Or ever we were aware we forgot Christ's 'love and mercy'. Beware of despondency which springs from lapse of memory! Despondency is a murderer of souls.

3. 'A leaning to the works of the law.' Bunyan refers in this phrase to a disposition to trust in his own good deeds as the ground of acceptance with God. We must all lean to 'the works of the Law' as moral directions, but never as the condition of eternal salvation.

4. 'Wanderings and coldness in prayer.' 'Wanderings.' The heart plays truant whilst the body is being schooled to prayer. Memory is a traitor despite the loyalty of the lips. How prayer loses its potency by being degraded into a formality! 'Coldness' perhaps even oftener curses our devotions. 'There is no glow in the petition because there is no glow in the petitioner.'

5. 'To forget to watch for that I pray for.' 'Watching thereunto' is one of Paul's great maxims of prayer. Yet it is a maxim often practically ignored. It shows a fearful lack of belief in prayer.

6. 'Apt to murmur because I have no more, and yet ready to abuse what I have.' What an affront this is upon the wisdom and love of our God. As if He did not know best what is 'convenient' for us. I murmur that I have not more light, yet I do not put to best use the light I have. I murmur that I have not more leisure, and yet I abuse the leisure I possess. I murmur that I have no more wealth, yet I often abuse the money I have.

7. 'I can do none of those things which God commands me, but my corruptions will thrust in themselves. When I would do good, evil is present with me.' 'Corruptions' is a technical term of Biblical and Puritan theology. It indicates the sins and sinful tendencies of human nature.

II. What was the Sevenfold Sanctification these Abominations wrought in John Bunyan?

1. 'They make me abhor myself.' Then by so much they were ordered for his good. All of the Pharisees must die out of us, and with the self-deprecatory publican we must range ourselves for all time. Repentance is a continual need of Christians.

2. 'They keep me from trusting my heart.' 'He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool,' and to that folly we are fearfully prone. But realize the innumerable evils of your heart and how can you trust it?

3. 'They convince me of the insufficiency of all inherent righteousness.' Inherent righteousness, or natural righteousness, can never meet the demands of the righteous and holy Lord. Seeing my abominations drive me to the ineffable and vicarious righteousness of Christ they abduce an immortal good.

4. 'They show me the necessity of fleeing to Jesus.' Only Jesus can deliver us from the guilt and dominion of our abominations. When I see my hurt I know my Physician.

5. 'They press me to pray unto God.' This has constantly been a fact of Christian experience. Our sinfulness drives us to God in prayer.

6. 'They show me the need I have to watch and be sober.' What provokes vigilance and gravity is a blessing in its result, however evil it may be in itself.

7. 'And provoke me to look to God, through Christ, to help me, and carry me through this world.'

If John Bunyan found that his various forms of indwelling sin provoked him to cast himself entirely upon God, through Christ, for help and guidance all his life long, then God had verily turned the curse into a blessing unto Him.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Enthusiasm of God, p. 174.

A THREEFOLD CORD ✓

(For the First Sunday of the Year)

'Thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.'—PROVERBS XXVII. 1.

THIS is not a commonplace. Nothing in God's Word is commonplace. Nothing inspired by the Holy Ghost could be commonplace. If you think it is a commonplace sentiment, I can tell you are commonplace. It is the deepest and truest philosophy of life. 'Thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.' And it is the very best philosophy by which to stimulate us Christians for the beginning of the new year.

First of all, there is the possibility that before the year is done you and I may have passed away. It may be in the sweet hope of the spring when everything is budding forth, or it may be in the brilliant summer-time, or it may be in the sad autumn. I do not know. It is far better that we should not know. While we breathe before God let us be happy men and women. We do not know what a day may bring forth, and it is very much better that we should not. But if we are uncertain about this, we ought to be certain about our God. No uncertainty there. You must know Him. You must know in whom you believe, and trust Him to the uttermost. You must have no uncertainty about God. Your mind must be sure and steadfast—made up. You must be able to say, like St. Paul, 'I am ready when the call comes. I have fought my own fight, I have kept my faith, and I am ready as He was ready'.

It is on the first Sunday of the year that we should look to the rock from which we are hewn and to the pit from which we are digged. We should make our calling and election sure. And having done all we can, let us stand upon our feet, and let the countenance of God shine on our face—uncertain about our days, but certain about our God. Look to-day straight up before the new year and say, 'O Lord, in Thee have I trusted; let me never be confounded'. And so I want to give you just a Scriptural cord to bind you to your God—a threefold cord, for it says a threefold cord cannot be broken.

I. The first part of the cord is this—Live by faith in the Son of God. You know where it comes from. Paul said, 'He loved me and gave Himself for me. The life that I live, I live by faith in the Son of God.' Then you become citizens, not of the moments, not of the hours, not of the days, not of the months, not of the years, not of the centuries, but citizens of Eternity. Live by faith in the Son of God, and the terrors of time will not affect you. Oh, how some men are terrified by the to-morrow! To them to-morrow is a terror; it whips and scourges them, holds them over the crater, and shows them the pit. To-morrow we may be ruined, our character gone. 'I cannot face it; I know not what it may bring forth.' What a mystery it is, this future! It is not only that God is a mystery, but you are a mystery, and a mystery to yourself. Live by faith in the Son of God, and then all things are yours—things past, things present, and things to come.

II. The second twist in the cord to bind you is this—Cast all your care upon God. Some of us hardly like to face the many cares. Civilization, instead of easing the burden of cares, only increases it. Then we have other cares which trouble us—the difficulties, for instance, of this war, the difficulties of the Church, the difficulties amongst us. It is all natural. But here is my second point—Cast all your care upon Him, for He careth for you. That is abandonment. The most beautiful thing you can say about death is this—abandonment. You know nothing about the state after death, but you give yourself up: 'Into Thy hands I commend my spirit'. And the most beautiful action of life is abandonment into the hands of God—casting all your care upon God. It is the beautiful abandonment of life which is the best preparation for the abandonment of death, because, finding that the everlasting arms are round you, and that your God has not deserted you, it becomes a matter of experience, and you are not afraid to go. That is the way to learn to die.

III. And now another cord to make it strong—'My times are in Thy hands'. Does God know what will happen to me this next year? Poor dear heart! of course He does. Does He know every little thing that will happen to me this new year? Yes, everything. There is no past or future with God. There is only one thing: the Eternal Now—'I am'. God can never say of Himself, 'I was and I shall be'. God is 'I am'. He is the Eternal Now. When did He begin? From everlasting. When will He end? Everlasting. 'From everlasting to everlasting Thou art God.' It is sweet to think that He Who brought me into the world, Whose hands made me, Whose heart redeemed me, settled the time when I should come into the world. I also want Him to settle the time when I go out.

Think of our Lord Himself. How did He speak of the future? Did He say, 'To-morrow at twelve o'clock?' No. Great minds use great words. He said, 'Hereafter'. That throws us forward right beyond temporal things. Sursum corda. Let your hearts go right up from the finite into the infinite Hereafter—out of time into Eternity. As the great historian begins his work: 'In the beginning God—' The Lord was never a pessimist. He could say to the people, 'Hereafter'. It was the same Lord who said to the poor snubbed publican, 'He is a son of Abraham'; the same Lord who said to the thief, 'To-day shalt thou be with Me in paradise'; and the same Lord who said, 'Hereafter ye shall see the Son of Man coming, and all the holy angels with Him'.

REFERENCES. — XXVII. 1.—G. Salmon, Non-Miraculous Christianity, p. 218. F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 231. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 527. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ii. No. 94. XXVII. 3.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Eather, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 279. XXVII. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1227.

THE WANDERING BIRD

'As a bird that wandereth from her nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place.'—PROVERBS XXVII. 3.

I. You will note that the whole point of the rebuke lies in the emphasis we put on wandering. It is not the flying, it is the wandering bird that reads us a lesson on our discontent.

To all men come times when we must forward. The Christ-filled life has got its own ambition. The waters of God are not a stagnant pool. But all that earnest pressing forward, seizing new opportunities, taking the cross up—all that stands separated as by the poles asunder from the fickle, restless, discontented spirit that is the spirit of the wandering bird.

II. Sometimes, of course, we do not know our place. I mean, we are almost certain this is not our place, and it is only afterwards we find it was. So when our dear Redeemer hung on Calvary, the whole world said, 'That is no place for God! And it has taken the centuries to teach us that the love of God came to its beauty there. It is not the place that makes the man: it is the man and his heart who make the place.'

III. I have two thoughts to give you:—

(a) That as a bird that never wanders from her nest, so Jesus never wandered from His place. Through sun and tempest, through censure and through praise, in youth and manhood, in agony and death, Jesus was true to His redeeming work.

(b) The true place of our deepest life is God. It is not self—we are growing tired of self. It is not the world—we can embrace the world; and ever, for the spirit, there is a beyond. It is when the roots of my being run down to the Divine; it is when, beneath all other facts for me, there lies the great fact of a living, moving God; it is when my life is hid with Christ in God, that my wandering spirit is in its proper place.—G. H. MORRISON, Flood-Tide, p. 262.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2627. J. H. Hitchens, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 108. XXVII. 17.—J. Duncan, The Pulpit and the Communion Table, p. 211. W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 533. XXVII. 18.—J. R. Popham, Sermons, p. 81. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1118; see also vol. xlv. No. 2643. XXVIII. 1.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 537. XXVIII. 13.—Ibid. p. 541. XXVIII. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 2971. C. J. Vaughan, Last Words in the Parish Church of Doncaster, p. 19. XXVIII. 28.—H. E. Manning, Sermons, vol. iii. p. 92. XXIX. 1.—W. Brooke, Sermons, p. 230. XXIX. 7.—J. Guinness Rogers, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 279.

THE VISION WHICH SAVES

'Where there is no vision, the people perish.'—PROVERBS XXIX. 18.

Of all the blessings for which we thank God, none are greater than the light and the powers of sight which we possess. Obvious as are the advantages of the powers of physical sight, they only emphasize a condition which is indispensable in the moral and spiritual sphere. The wise man is thinking of the catastrophes which await those who for any reason are blind to the truth about life and who are 'destroyed for lack of knowledge'.

I. History contains many sad records of such catastrophes from the wilful refusal to behold the vision of life and duty.

1. We remember in the history of Israel how the people could not wait in patience for the revelation God would make known to them through Moses.

2. Again, in the judgment that came upon Eli and his sons we are told significantly, 'The word of the Lord was rare in those days. There was no open vision.'

3. In the days of Isaiah, because of the iniquity of the people, the punishment which shall fall upon them is spoken of as a penal visitation of blindness.

4. So true is it that men, having eyes, see not; they will not look beyond the fleeting, changing scene which allures them, to the vision of unchanging eternal reality, and therefore they perish. The sad lament never rang more pathetically than when at last it was said of Jerusalem: 'If thou hadst known in this thy day the things which belong unto thy peace, but now they are hid from thine eyes'.

II. The gift of vision. The greatest gift of God to man has been the revelation of truth which has been vouchsafed in the person of the Eternal Son, Jesus Christ. The vision of truth and the meaning of life has been finally manifested to mankind in the intelligible form of a human life. God has vouchsafed the vision of truth, which is 'the Light of Life'; but He has also given power to take in the vision, insight into the veiled mystery of truth, discernment of the inner reality which lies behind the transitory shapes of things which meet our eyes. 'He hath given unto us His Holy Spirit.'

III. Such is the gift. Consider how its inexhaustible benefits are conveyed to mankind. The gift is for the enrichment of human life, that men 'may have life, and have it more abundantly'. The interpreters of Divine messages, whether through the medium of paint or marble, through intellectual pursuits or discovery, as men of action or as thinkers, have been men of vision, 'the seers,' and are among 'the goodly fellowship of the prophets'.

At every crisis in the world's or our nation's history salvation or destruction has depended upon the capacity of men to see beyond the present, and the resolution to pursue with inflexible determination the vision which had been revealed.—J. P. MAUD, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII., 1907, p. 55.

REFERENCES.—XXIX. 18.—Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. XLVIII. 1895, p. 170. A. E. Garvie, ibid. vol. LXV. 1904, p. 27. J. P. Maud, ibid. vol. LXXII. 1907, p. 55. J. Pulsford, Our Deathless Hope, p. 157. XXIX. 25.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 550. XXX. 1-9.—Ibid. p. 550. XXX. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. XXXVI. No. 2140.

GOD'S RIDDLE

'Who hath gathered the wind in His fists? who hath bound the waters in a garment? who hath established all the ends of the earth? what is His name, and what is His Son's name? Canst thou tell?'—PROVERBS XXX. 4.

'WHAT is His name? and what is His Son's name? Canst thou tell?'

It is God Almighty's great conundrum spoken out of eternity into time; it is the riddle propounded by the Supreme Intelligence to the heart and reason of every man born into the world.

I. 'Canst thou tell?' The history of humanity is little else than one long wrestle with God's infinite conundrum. And there are noble souls and able thinkers who never guess the riddle here, though who can dare to doubt that the solution comes to them hereafter? Never be a giver-up of God's riddles; work at them till you die. The position of a giver-up of God's riddle is dreary and paralysing; it declares that the riddle is unanswerable, and that the name of Him 'who holds the wind in His fists' is unknowable.

Is it unknowable? I believe that every man born into the world possessed once the solution of the riddle, when, 'trailing clouds of glory,' the immortal part 'came from God who is its home' into the prison-house of human birth.

It is a sweet legend of the Talmud that the indentation upon the upper lip of every man born into the world is a mark of the finger of God touching the mouth at birth and saying, 'Child, thou knowest, but thou shalt not be able to reveal that which thou knowest till thou hast learnt it by the things which thou shalt suffer in the infant school of human life'.

II. 'O our God, what is Thy name?' Canst thou tell? There are tens of thousands who can tell. The Divine Man of Nazareth is the Sacrament of God, He is the outward and visible sign of the heart of universal Fatherhood; and to know it with an intense spiritual conviction that is beyond expression is to know the answer to God's riddle about Himself. It is to give Him back the answer: 'We have found out Thy secret'.

No man can force another man to believe it, there is co-operation necessary between his volition and the power of the Holy Spirit; but to believe it is to view the world and its problems from that moment with new eyes. And, moreover, it is to learn a new motive for purity, watchfulness, self-control.

III. But this is not all the riddle. 'What is His name? and what is His Son's name? Canst thou tell?' Thy son's name, O God, is Man; the human family itself, in all ages and in all conditions, the sum total of human flesh and blood, illumined by its heroism, its nobility, its victories, weighted with its crimes, its brutalities, its degradations. O God, alienated humanity may be, but it is Thy son.

And do you not see that here, and here only, is the impregnable foundation of the eternal hope for the race? The inexhaustible and ultimately effectual remedy for human depravity is the central, indwelling, immortal, Divine sonship in man. The Divine spark is inextinguishable. The Jew of old would keep his feet from treading upon a morsel of paper, however soiled, lest the name of Yahveh might be written thereon. Keep thy foot when thou art tempted to trample on thy brother man! The name of thy Father is written on his heart.

But how intensely does this magnificent truth emphasize the obligations of human brotherhood! The 'solidarity of the race' which we talk about so glibly is not a German epigram, but a Divine truth. It is a truth that, in spite of all our glorious assurance, will cause yearning anguish to the heart that realizes it most. Upon such a heart 'the Lord lays the iniquity of all'. Only One so realized the unity of the race of which He was the Archetypal Representative, that every sin and God-defiance in the world thrilled through Him, and it broke His heart far more surely than the soldier's spear.—ARCHDEACON WILBERFORCE, Sermons Preached in Westminster Abbey, p. 15.

REFERENCES.—XXX. 8.—E. H. Eland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LX. 1901, p. 397. XXX. 8, 9.—H. Rix, Sermons, Addresses, and Essays, p. 135. J. J. Ingram, Christian World Pulpit, vol. XXXIX. 1891, p. 101. J. M. E. Ross, ibid. vol. LXII. 1902, p. 34. XXX. 24-28.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Apocalypse, etc., p. 324. XXXI.—Stopford A. Brooke, Christian World Pulpit, vol. XLIII. 1893, p. 241. XXXI. 1.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 568. XXXI. 10.—R. Glover, Christian World Pulpit, vol. XL. 1891, p. 379. F. Temple, ibid. vol. LVII. 1900, p. 232. XXXI. 10-31.—W. Arnot, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 571. J. Vickery, Ideals of Life, p. 239. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Esther, Job, Proverbs, etc., p. 288. XXXI. 11.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Apocalypse, etc., p. 191. XXXI. 11, 12.—G. Bainton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. XXXVIII. 1890, p. 234. XXXI. 12.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Apocalypse, etc., p. 201. XXXI. 13.—Ibid. p. 211. XXXI. 14.—Ibid. p. 220. XXXI. 15.—Ibid. p. 228. XXXI. 16.—Ibid. p. 237. XXXI. 17.—Ibid. p. 245. XXXI. 18.—Ibid. pp. 252, 258; see also Sermons Preached in a Religious House, vol. II. p. 401. XXXI. 20.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Apocalypse, etc., p. 275. XXXI. 21.—Ibid. p. 281. XXXI. 22.—Ibid. p. 287. XXXI. 23.—Ibid. p. 294. XXXI. 24.—Ibid. p. 303. XXXI. 25.—Ibid. p. 309. XXXI. 25, 26.—C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 72. XXXI. 26.—A. F. Winnington Ingram, The After-glow of a Great Reign, p. 48. XXXI. 28.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Apocalypse, etc., p. 317. XXXI. 28.—H. C. G. Moule, My Brethren and Companions, p. 81. XXXI. 29.—J. H. Hitchens, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 100. H. B. Hughes, ibid. vol. lix. 1901, p. 82. XXXI. 30.—G. Bainton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 122. XXXI. 30, 31.—H. Broughton Barnes, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 83. W. Arnot, Lawe from Heaven for Life on Earth, p. 578. XXXI. 31.—G. Bainton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 410.

P R O V E R B S

ECCLESIASTES

ECCLESIASTES

REFERENCES.—I. 1.—F. C. Finlayson, A Practical Exposition of Ecclesiastes, p. 13. R. Buchanan, Ecclesiastes: its Meaning and Lessons, p. 9. I. 1, 2.—A. W. Momerie, Agnosticism, p. 176. I. 1-11.—J. H. Cooke, The Preacher's Pilgrimage, p. 12. J. J. S. Perowne, Expositor (1st Series), vol. ix. p. 409.

THE VERDICT OF LIFE

'Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher; all is vanity.'—
ECCLESIASTES I. 2.

THE verdict of this book seems to be no hasty verdict, but a settled, deliberate conclusion. It is not due to a temporary fit of depression, or some passing adverse circumstance, but it seems the result of experience arrived at after mature thought. And there are plenty to-day who have arrived at the same conclusion. All is vanity. Life is hard and cruel and disappointing, and not worth the living. They tell you it is a weary struggle in which most fail. That the disappointed men in life are not to be found only in night shelters and casual wards, but in the Houses of Parliament, in the salons of society, in the mansions of Park Lane.

I. Now, is this the true Verdict of Life? Is it all emptiness and vexation? If so, it seems strange that God should have put us here at all. Let us look and see the circumstances under which it was given. It is a very significant thing, that this conclusion of life is not the outcome of trouble. It is not the verdict of a man dogged by continuous misfortune, or persistent ill-health.

II. The truth is, he was a disappointed man, and there are two sorts of disappointed men in life. There is the man who is disappointed because he does not get, and there is the man who is disappointed because he does get, and the latter is by far the worse of the two. The man who is disappointed because he has not got, may have still the fascination of his hopes before him. But the man who has got what he desires and is then disappointed, has pricked the bubble, and knows the meaning of emptiness and vexation of spirit. And the last was the disappointment of Solomon. The selfish man is always a disappointed man. What an utter selfishness this book reveals. Take this second chapter, it is all I, I, I—I made, I got, I did, I had, I sought, and this is the end of it all. If you want to know the best life has to give, live for others.—E. E. CLEAL, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXIV. p. 38.

'Vanity of vanities; all is vanity.'—ECCLESIASTES I. 2 f.

'THERE is an old Eastern fable about a traveller in the Steppes who is attacked by a furious wild beast. To save himself the traveller gets into a dried-up well; but at the bottom of it he sees a dragon with its jaws wide open to devour him. The unhappy man dares not get out for fear of the wild beast, and dares not descend for fear of the dragon, so he catches hold of the branch of a wild plant growing in a crevice of the well. His arms soon grow tired, and he feels that he must soon perish, death waiting for him on either side. But he holds on still: and then he sees two mice, one black and one white, gnawing through the trunk of the wild plant, as they gradually and evenly make their way round it. The plant must soon give way, break off, and he must fall into the jaws of the dragon. The traveller sees this, and knows that he will inevitably perish; but, while still hanging on, he looks around him, and, finding some drops of honey on the leaves of the wild plant, he stretches out his tongue and licks them.' After quoting this fable (translated, by the way, from Rückert, into English verse by Archbishop Trench, in his Poems, p. 266), Tolstoy (in My Confession) proceeds to apply it to modern life. He quotes the opening chapters of Ecclesiastes as an expression of this Epicurean escape from the terrible plight in which people find themselves as they awaken to the fact of existence. 'The issue consists in recognizing the hopelessness of life, and yet taking advantage of every good in it, in avoiding the sight of the dragon and mice, and in seeking the honey as best we can, especially where there is most of it. . . . Such is the way in which most people, who belong to the circle in which I move, reconcile themselves to their fate, and make living possible. They know more of the good than the evil of life from the circumstances of their position, and their blunted moral perceptions enable them to forget that all their advantages are accidental. . . . The dullness of their imaginations enables these men to forget what destroyed the peace of Buddha, the inevitable sickness, old age, and death, which to-morrow if not to-day must be the end of all their pleasures.'

THOMAS BOSTON of Ettrick closes his Memoirs with these words: 'And thus have I given some account of the days of my vanity. The world hath all along been a step-dame unto me; and wheresoever I would have attempted to nestle in it, there was a thorn of uneasiness laid for me. Man is born crying, lives complaining, and dies disappointed from that quarter. All is vanity and vexation of spirit.—I have waited for Thy salvation, O Lord.'

ECCLESIASTES and Proverbs display a larger compass of thought and of experience than seem to belong to a Jew or to a king.—GIBSON.

AFTER the fifth century the world lived on these words: Vanity of vanities . . . one thing is needful. The Imitatio Christi is undoubtedly the most perfect and attractive expression of this great poetic system; but a modern mind cannot accept it save with considerable reserve. Mysticism overlooked that innate quality of human nature, curiosity, which makes men penetrate the secret of things, and become, as Leibnitz says, the mirror of the universe. . . . Ecclesiastes took the heavens to be a solid roof, and the sun a globe suspended some miles up in the air; history, that other world, had no existence for him. Ecclesiastes, I am willing to believe, had felt all that man's heart could feel; but he had no suspicion of what man is allowed to know. The human mind in his day overpowered science; in our day it is science that overpowers the human mind.—RENAN.

REFERENCES.—I. 2.—E. W. Attwood, Sermons for Clergy and Laity, p. 428. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 20.

ECCLESIASTES I. 2, 3.

THE general drift of this book of Ecclesiastes is peculiar to itself. It gives us an estimate of life which, to a certain extent, reappears in our Lord's teaching, but which is generally speaking in the background throughout the Old Testament. Our text is the keynote of the book. The word 'vanity' occurs thirty-seven times in it, and it means properly speaking a breath of wind; and thus it comes to mean something fictitious and unsubstantial. The vanity of life, and of that which encompasses it, has been brooded over by the human mind under the influence of very different moods of thought. But it was neither subtle pride, nor weary disgust, nor a refined mysticism that prompted this language of Solomon.

The preacher does not ignore the circumstances and duties of this life, while he insists that this life does not really satisfy. The true lesson of the text before us is that this earthly life cannot possibly satisfy a being like man if it be lived apart from God. The reason is threefold.

I. All that belongs to created life has on it the mark of failure. Man is conscious of this. The warp and weakness of his will, the tyranny of circumstance, the fatal inclination downwards, of which he is constantly conscious, tell a tale of some past catastrophe from which human life has suffered deeply. And nature, too, with its weird mysteries of waste and pain, speaks of some great failure.

II. Life and nature are finite. The human soul, itself finite, is made for the infinite. God has set eternity in the human heart, and man has a profound mistrust of his splendid destiny.

III. All that belongs to created life has on it the mark of approaching dissolution. This is a commonplace, but commonplaces are apt to be forgotten from their very truth and obviousness. Personality survives with its moral history intact, all else goes and is forgotten. What profit hath a man of all his labour? The answer is, no profit at all, if he is working only for himself; but most abundant profit if he is working for God and eternity. Christ has passed His pierced hands in blessing over human life in all its aspects. He has washed and invigorated not merely the souls, but the activities of men, in His own cleansing blood. When death is near we read this verse with new eyes, and realize that this is a world of shadows, that the real and abiding is beyond.—H. P. LIDDON, Clerical Library, vol. II. p. 162.

REFERENCES.—I. 2-11.—C. Finlayson, A Practical Exposition of Ecclesiastes, p. 27. R. Buchanan, Ecclesiastes; its Meaning and Lessons, p. 22. G. G. Bradley, Lectures on Ecclesiastes, p. 29.

THE ETERNITY OF GOD

'One generation cometh and another generation passeth away: but the earth abideth for ever.'—ECCLESIASTES I. 4.

I. The Fleetingness of Human Life.—There are many now who are depressed by this sense of the premanency and power of the material world; when the earth receives, and reduces to itself, the frame which was once instinct with thought and will, man seems to be dethroned from his pre-eminence and life to be trampled out. There are some who resent the thought of passing away and being forgotten; it has been their ambition to leave on the face of the earth some permanent mark which should keep their name alive. The pyramids of Egypt have served this purpose; and yet what irony there is in that very success. We have new standards of glory, new ideals of government; to us these monuments speak less of the magnificence of the monarchy in the Nile Valley than of the oppression by which it accomplished its purpose. There is, perhaps, a deeper pathos when the works men wrought survive their memory altogether; those who look at the ruined cities of Mashonaland, or even at our own Dyke at Newmarket, can only guess dimly who planned these things, and what purpose they serve. The oblivion that has overtaken such great workers and builders demonstrates the fleetingness of human life and effort, and this may come home to us even more forcibly when we see the abandonment of great works that were meant to be of permanent and abiding use, and to serve purposes with which we sympathize. Yet in their very desolation and decay these things have a message of hope; at first sight it might seem that as the Preacher felt, all is vanity; that even the noblest aims and deepest devotion of human life pass into nothingness. But we have had deeper insight vouchsafed us; we can gauge better what remains, as the ages pass; the material embodiment of human purpose, however high and noble, is superseded and decays; but the endeavour, conscious or unconscious, to do God's work in the world has an undying worth. The things of sense are not, after all, that which really lasts; there is a glorious heritage of law and order, and welfare, and duty to God and man, to which each generation has been called in turn to make its contribution. That heritage remains while the jealousies and petty ambitions, like the fashions of yesterday, are done with.

II. God only is Eternal.—For, indeed it is God, and God only, that is eternal, that stays abidingly through all the changes of this mortal life, through all the coming into being of the great system of which our earth is a portion. He is the source of all good—of all earthly good—in the physical surroundings which form man's home; in the vigour of life and the faculties with which man is endowed; and above all, of all mortal and spiritual good, of those qualities and activities in which man can most closely ally himself to and most fully express the thoughts and character of God. To appreciate the good that God has given to and wrought through those who have passed away is to enter into the communion of saints, and to realize our union with those whom our eyes have never seen is the deepest and most abiding thing of life.—W. CUNNINGHAM, Church Family Newspaper, vol. LXXI. p. 536.

REFERENCES.—I. 4.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 297. J. Hamilton, Works, vol. vi. p. 484. J. Foster, Lectures (2nd Series), p. 117. I. 4-10.—H. Macmillan, Bible Teaching in Nature, p. 312. I. 4-11.—J. Bennett, The Wisdom of the King, p. 60.

THE DISCONTENT OF THE TIMES

ECCLESIASTES I. 7, 8, 9, 10.

THERE is in our time a widespread spirit of discontent which prevails widely among the sober and industrious classes.

I. What are the sources of this discontent?

(a) The wealth of all civilized countries has been immensely and rapidly increasing in recent years.

(b) They have suddenly become possessed of enormous wealth.

(c) There is a growing tendency to make wealth hereditary.

(d) The popular estimate of wealth has become enormously exaggerated.

II. There is a wide feeling that the industrial classes are not gaining their fair share of this enormous and rapid accumulation of wealth. Man, when he gains one level, wants immediately to attain a higher; it is the prophecy of immortality in him.

III. It is love, and not mere greed which is at the bottom of very much of the existing discontent. A man feels that if he is equal before the contemplation of the law when he stands beside others, equal before God the Creator and God the Governor, he must have equal rights in the world; not to the property which others have acquired, but to the opportunities to acquire such property for himself, to give his household the advantage of it.

IV. It is generically the same force which took our ancestral pirates and painted savages and built them up into a Christian Commonwealth. It is just his unsatisfied aspiration which God has planted in its element in the human soul, and to which He presents the hidden riches of the earth, which a man must work for that he may gain them, but which he can gain if he will patiently and courageously work.

V. Wealth if it comes is to be used honestly, nobly, beneficently, but that wealth is not the chief good of human life; it is only an instrument of that which is better and higher, and 'a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth'.—R. S. STORRS, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. III. p. 513.

REFERENCES.—I. 7.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 302. II. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Waterside Mission Sermons (2nd Series), p. 122.

ECCLESIASTES I. 8; II. 10, 11, etc.

WHEN I was a boy, I used to care about pretty stones. I got some Bristol diamonds at Bristol, and some dog-tooth spar in Derbyshire; my whole collection had cost perhaps three half-crowns, and was worth considerably less; and I knew nothing whatever, rightly, about any single stone in it—could not even spell their names; but words cannot tell the joy they used to give me. Now, I have a collection of minerals worth, perhaps, from two to three thousand pounds; and I know more about some of them than most other people. But I am not a whit happier, either for my knowledge or possession, for other geologists dispute my theories, to my grievous indignation and discontentment; and I am miserable about all my best specimens, because there are better in the British Museum. No, I assure you, knowledge by itself will not make you happy.—RUSKIN in Fors Clavigera.

SEE also the discussion of this in Bacon's Advancement of Learning, I. i-iii, and Ruskin's further apostrophe in The Eagle's Nest, 80.

CONSCIOUSNESS of happiness, above all, will not choose the intellect as a hiding-place for the treasure it holds most precious.—MAETERLINCK.

ECCLESIASTES I. 9.

WE marvel at the prodigality of Nature, but how marvellous, too, the economy! The old cycles are for ever renewed, and it is no paradox that he who would advance can never cling too close to the past. The thing that has been is the thing that will be again; if we realize that, we may avoid many of the disillusiones, miseries, insanities, that for ever accompany the throes of new birth. Set your shoulder joyously to the world's wheel; you may spare yourself some unhappiness if, beforehand, you slip the book of Ecclesiastes beneath your arm.—HAEVLOCK ELLIS.

COMPARE Jowett's Sermons on Faith and Doctrine, pp. 282, 283.

'Nothing new under the sun'.—ECCLESIASTES I. 9.

ALAS! this fame is the mockery of God, with which we are so familiar—that cruel irony which is ever the same. The blasé King of Israel and Judah said with truth 'There is nothing new under the sun'. Perhaps the sun itself is but an old warmed-up piece of pleasantry, which, decked out with new rays, now glitters with such imposing splendour!—HEINE.

If in a sense the whole beauty of art is an expression of the mood of Ecclesiastes, if the passion of the ways of the heart, and the light of the eyes, and the plenitude and magnificence of life beneath the sun, have most intimate and intense significance when discerned as in an interval of clear and sweet light between the lifting and the falling of darkness, it must be as the incentive to concentrated appreciation of opportunity that the fleetingness of life affects the thought of the painter. He is pledged to discern and express the beauty that can never fade into nothingness, to show life touching life with immortality. It is impossible for him, whose art is formal, for whom only formal beauty and impressiveness exist within the term of his art, to declaim the vanitas vanitatum of the Preacher to our minds, and yet preserve the appeal of beauty, that is his medium of reaching our sense.—R. E. D. SKETCHLEY, Watts, p. 58.

REFERENCES.—1. 9.—E. A. Bray, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 61. A. Maclaren Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 307.

'I was king in Jerusalem.'—ECCLESIASTES I. 12.

THE possession of a throne could never yet afford a lasting satisfaction to an ambitious mind. This melancholy truth was felt and acknowledged by Severus. Fortune and merit had, from an humble station, elevated him to the first place among mankind. 'He had been all things,' as he said himself, 'and all were of little value.'—GIBBON.

'I the Preacher was king in Jerusalem.'—ECCLESIASTES I. 12 f.

SEE C. G. Rossetti's poem, 'A Testimony'; also her verses on 'Vanity of Vanities,' 'Days of Vanity,' 'Cardinal Newman,' and 'The Heart Knoweth its own Bitterness'.

A word must be said about those exquisite gems of verse which are contained in the Greek Anthology. . . . The motto which is written on the pages as a whole is the same as that of the book of Ecclesiastes, 'Vanity of vanities,' and the dominant side of sadness deepens the farther we follow the poems into Roman times. Herodotus (v. 4) tells us of a Thracian tribe, whose custom it was to wail over the birth of a child, and to bury the dead with festive joy, as being released from their troubles. 'Let us praise the Thracians,' says a writer in the Anthology, 'in that they mourn for their sons as they come forth from their mother's womb into the sunlight, while those again they count blessed who have left life, snatched away by unseen Doom, the servant of the Fates.' One who had looked upon the course of the world and the treacherous ways of fortune is forced to exclaim: 'I hate the world for its mystery.'—S. H. BUTCHER.

ECCLESIASTES I. 12, 13.

To grow old, learning and unlearning, is such the conclusion? Conclusion or no conclusion, such, alas! appears to be our inevitable lot, the fixed ordinance of the life we live. 'Every new lesson,' saith the Oriental proverb, 'is another grey hair; and time will pluck out this also.' And what saith the Preacher? 'I, the Preacher, was king over Israel in Jerusalem. And I gave my heart to seek and search out by wisdom concerning all things that are done under the heavens; this sore travail hath God given to the sons of men to be exercised therewith.' Perché pensa? Pens- ando s'invecchia, said the young unthinking Italian to the grave German sitting by him in the diligence, whose name was Goethe. Is it true?

Nevertheless, to say something, to talk to one's fellow-creatures, to relieve oneself by a little exchange of ideas, is there no good, is there no harm, in that? Prove to the utmost the imperfection of our views, our thoughts, our conclusions; yet you will not have established the uselessness of writing.

REFERENCES.—I. 12.—A. W. Momerie, Agnosticism, p. 100. I. 12-14.—C. Kingsley, The Water of Life, p. 175. I. 12-18.—J. J. S. Perowne, Expositor (1st Series), vol. x. p. 61. R. Buchanan, Ecclesiastes, its Meaning and Lessons, p. 36. I. 13.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 317.

'All is vanity.'—ECCLESIASTES I. 14.

NATURE has furnished man with a rich provision of force, activity, and toughness. But what most often comes to his help is his unconquerable levity. By this he becomes capable of renouncing particular things at each moment, if he can only grasp at something new in the next. Thus unconsciously we are constantly renewing our whole lives. We put one passion in place of another; business, inclinations, amusements, hobbies, we prove them all one after another, only to cry out that 'all is vanity'. No one is shocked at this false, nay, blasphemous speech. Nay, every one thinks that in uttering it he has said something wise and unanswerable. Few indeed are those who are strong enough to anticipate such unbearable feelings, and, in order to escape from all partial renunciations, to perform one all-embracing act of renunciation. These are the men who convince themselves of the existence of the eternal, of the necessary, of the universal, and who seek to form conceptions which cannot fail them, yea, which are not disturbed, but rather confirmed, by the contemplation of that which passes away.—GOETHE.

SEEN ALL

'I have seen all the works that are done under the sun.'—ECCLESIASTES I. 14.

IN a certain broad, rough, superficial sense this is possible. It is ineffably disappointing; it is spiritually and fruitfully, poetically and morally, most suggestive. It is easy to see what the man has been looking at; he has, so to say, been counting the wrong things, or has been counting them in a wrong spirit, or has been longing for the end. There is a contentment that is mean, soulless, and utterly pitiable; there is a discontent that is ineffable, inspired, quick with holy ambition; not a foolish discontent, pining and whining, but a discontent which says, God meant me to see more and to be more and to do more, and I want to succeed in executing the full purpose of God. That is the Christian life, that is Christian prophecy, Christian discipline and Christian perfectness.

I. A sad thing it is for a man to think he has seen all the landscape which lies before his window. He wants change of scene, and no wonder, for he has seen nothing; he wants change of air, and what wonder, if the air has brought him no music from the organ of the morning? There are some poets who have not yet seen the whole of their little back garden; there is hardly room in it for another geranium, but that little back garden is a three-volume romance, is the beginning of Paradise Regained, is a history of faithful industry and hopefulness, and is a pledge that the rest will be paid at God's counter in God's time.

II. 'I have seen all the letters of the alphabet.' Can you read? 'No, but I have seen all the letters of the alphabet, and I know them one from another, and I can write every one of them in three different ways; I am absolutely perfect in the use of the alphabet.' Hear how this poor soul chatters about his alphabet! He has counted the alphabet, he has seen all the letters that are written under the sun: the one thing he cannot do is to put the letters together, and turn them into syllables and words and sentences and poems and philosophies. Are we to take the criticism of such a man as an estimate of literature? He is as perfect in his alphabet as Aristotle was in his. Aristotle could not teach this man anything about the alphabet that the man does not know already: the only thing is the man cannot read, cannot use his own alphabet, cannot employ his own tools.

III. I have seen a man have so much money that he had not enough. Let him stand before the tollkeeper of this turnpike; the charge for passing the tollgate is sixpence: can he pay the money? He cannot; hear him, for he hath a speech: 'Allow me to pass, or give me change for this note, value one thousand pounds; it is all the money I have at command'. He might as well hand a piece of blank paper to the tollkeeper, it is blank paper to that functionary; it is so much as to be too little, it fails on the negative side, the plus quantity becomes a minus quantity. Life is full of these contradictions and ironies and perplexities; we had better get down to the solid rock of common sense and know that a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth, and get to know that he who has one little loaf of bread is better off in the time of hunger than the man who has ten thousand acres which have not yet brought forth their harvest.

IV. There is no satisfaction in the finite. Why does not man find satisfaction in the finite? Because he himself is not finite in the same sense, he is finite in another and better sense, but man stands next to God in the great catalogue of names—'In the beginning God created man in His own image and likeness, in the image and likeness of God created He him'. The seen is meant to be an emblem of the unseen; the things we see are hints of the things we cannot yet discern; we are living in a region of beginnings; by the very greatness of our nature we claim to be immortal, by the very passion of our desires we know that no good power can have given us so much with the intention of finally disappointing us.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. VII. p. 80.

REFERENCE.—I. 14.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 339. C. D. Bell, The Name Above Every Name, p. 124.

'And I gave my heart to know wisdom, and to know madness and folly.'—ECCLESIASTES I. 17 f.

SEE Mozley's Parochial and Occasional Sermons (number xii.).

REFERENCE.—I. 18.—S. A. Brooke, Christ in Modern Life, pp. 230, 243. II. 1-3.—J. J. S. Perowne, Expositor (1st Series), vol. x. p. 165. II. 2.—H. Melville, Penny Pulpit, No. 2532.

ECCLESIASTES II. 4.

HE who watches winds that blow
May too long neglect to sow;
He who waits lest clouds should rain
Harvest never shall obtain.

Signs and tokens false may prove;
Trust thou in a Saviour's love,
In His sacrifice for sin,
And His Spirit's power within.

Faith in God, if such be thine,
Shall be found thy safest sign,
And obedience to His will Prove the best of tokens still.

—BERNARD BARTON.

ECCLESIASTES II. 4-6, 8, 11.

IF any resemblance with Tennyson's poetry is to be found in Ecclesiastes, it should be with the 'Palace of Art'.—SIR ALFRED LYALL.

SEE BYRON'S Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, canto I. iv.-vi., for the description of the dull satiety that follows self-indulgence.

REFERENCE.—II. 4-11.—J. J. S. Perowne, Expositor (1st Series), vol. x. p. 313.

'I withheld not my heart from any joy.'—ECCLESIASTES II. 10.

HE rushed through life. . . . He desired too much; he wished strongly and greedily to taste life in one draught, thoroughly; he did not glean or taste it, he tore it off like a bunch of grapes, pressing it, crushing it, twisting it; and he remained with stained hands, just as thirsty as before. Then broke forth sobs which found an echo in all hearts.—TALME on Alfred de Musset.

'Then I looked on all the labour I had laboured to do; and, behold, all was vanity.'—ECCLESIASTES II. 11.

ALL is vanity; that is the low cry of the tired heart when the buoyant strength of youth dies away, and when the brave shows of the glittering world, the harsh inspiring music of affairs, the ambition to speak and strive, to sway heart and minds or destinies, fade into the darkness of the end. Against the assaults of this nameless fear men hold out what shields they can; the shield of honour, the shield of labour, and, best of all, the shield of faith. But there are some who have found no armour to help them, and who can but sink to the ground, covering their face beneath the open eye of heaven, and say with Fitz Gerald, 'It is He that hath made us,' resigning the mystery into the hands of the power that formed us and bade us be. For behind the loud and confident voice of work and politics and creeds there must still lurk the thought that whatever aims we propose to ourselves, though they be hallowed with centuries of endeavour and consecration, we cannot know what awaits us or what we shall be.—A. C. BENSON.

REFERENCE.—II. 12-23.—T. C. Finlayson, A Practical Exposition of Ecclesiastes, p. 49.

'So I hated life.'—ECCLESIASTES II. 17.

MR. ARTHUR SYMONS, discussing Villiers, the French decadent, in his Symbolist Movement in Literature (pp. 56 f.), quotes the poet thus: "As at the play, in a central stall, one sits out, so as not to disturb one's neighbours—out of courtesy, in a word—some play written in a wearisome style, and of which one does not like the subject, so I lived, out of politeness": je vivais par politesse. In this haughtiness towards life, in this disdain of ordinary human motives and ordinary human beings, there is at once the distinction and the weakness of Villiers.'

SEE QUARLES'S Emblems, book i. 6, and Religio Medici, II. sec. xiv. (close).

ECCLESIASTES II. 19.

IN Cromwell's fourth speech to the Parliament of 1655, he discusses, towards the end, the pressing question of the government in relation to his own family. He declares that he has been ever opposed to making his office hereditary. 'I am speaking as to my judgment against making government hereditary. To have men chosen for their love to God, and to truth and justice; and not to have it hereditary. For as it is in the Ecclesiastes: "Who knoweth whether he may beget a fool or a wise man?" Honest or not honest, whatever they be, they must come in, on that plan; because the government is made a patrimony.'

'What hath man of all his labour?'—ECCLESIASTES II. 22 f.

WHAT a deal of cold business doth a man misspend the better part of life in! in scattering compliments, tendering visits, gathering and venting news, following feasts and plays, making a little winter-love in a dark corner.—BEN JONSON.

'To every thing there is a season.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 1.

How for everything there is a time and a season, and then how does the glory of a thing pass from it, even like the flower of the grass. This is a truism, but it is one of those which are continually forcing themselves upon the mind.—BORROW'S Lavengro, xxvi.

HE is a good time-server that finds out the fittest opportunity for every action. God hath made a time for everything under the sun, save only for that which we do at all times—to wit, sin.—THOMAS FULLER.

REFERENCES.—III. 1-8.—R. Buchanan, Ecclesiastes: its Meaning and Lessons, p. 92. Bishop Harvey Goodwin, Parish Sermons (3rd Series), p. 334.

'A time to plant, and a time to pluck up that which is planted.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 2.

THE second of these may describe the times of analysis which often succeed periods of creation. They are not necessarily bad, for they may detect things evil and hollow; but they are times of distrust and unsettlement, and they easily go to excess. Everything is doubted, and in some minds this leads to universal scepticism. We are in such a period now, and it gives the feeling as if the ages of faith were past, and bare rationalism lord of the future. This would resolve everything into dust and death.—DR. JOHN KEE'S Thoughts for Heart and Life, p. 153.

COMPARE J. S. MILL'S Autobiography, p. 137.

REFERENCES.—III. 2.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 57. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 323.

'There is a time . . . to laugh.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 4.

MEN thin away to insignificance quite as often by not making the most of good spirits when they have them, as by lacking good spirits when they are indispensable.—THOMAS HARDY.

IF cheerfulness knocks at our door we should throw it wide open, for it never comes inopportunely; instead of that we often make scruples about letting it in. Cheerfulness is a direct and immediate gain—the very coin, as it were, of happiness, and not, like all else, merely a cheque upon the bank.—SCHOPENHAUER.

'Don't tell me,' William Pitt once cried, 'of a man's being able to talk sense, every one can talk sense; can he talk nonsense?'

A SENSE of humour preserves all who have it from extremes. It warns away from the confines of the petty and ridiculous, and produces very often the same tolerant effects as magnanimity, revealing through laughter that reasonable line of thought which was obscured by logic.—Spectator, 27 May, 1905, p. 778.

'A time to mourn.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 4.

LAST July, at an evening concert in the Kursaal of Sestroretz, a fashionable seaside resort near St. Petersburg, a number of the audience loudly insisted upon funeral music being played in memory of those who had perished in the St. Petersburg massacres of 23 January. The demonstrators shouted, 'This is no time for pleasure'.

REFERENCES.—III. 4.—W. C. Wheeler, Sermons and Addresses, p. 56. W. Brock, Midsummer Morning Sermons, p. 118.

'A time to speak.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 7.

LUTHER begins the dedicatory letter to Amsdorf prefixed to his epoch-making 'Appeal to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation,' with these words:—

'The time for silence is gone, and the time to speak has come, as we read in Ecclesiastes.'

It was this treatise which, in 1520, first gave voice to the conscience of the nation

'A time to keep silence.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 7.

WHEN hearts are overfull they seldom run to speech. When sorrow has broken in on love, love left alone again, is hesitant and shy, more prone to look and kiss and hold than to mend his wounds with words.—KATHERINE CECIL THURSTON in The Circle.

THOUGHTS ON SILENCE

'A time to keep silence.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 7.

'SPEECH is silvern, silence is golden,' saith the proverb. But there are many kinds of silence. There is a silence that is trying, and another that is fearful: as also there is a silence that is wholesome, one that is acceptable, one that is instructive, and still another that is blessed.

I. There is a Silence which is Good and Wholesome, viz. when a man sets a guard over his tongue and keeps silence from idle, vain, hurtful words. It has been well said that he who would speak well must speak little. Silence is a most wholesome restraint, a most helpful discipline, especially for those who are much pressed with engagements and have little time to themselves.

II. There is a Silence that is Acceptable to God and Well Pleasing in His Sight.—When things go wrong; when people are careless, or stupid, or perverse; when we feel irritated or annoyed; when the cutting speech, or the angry word, or the impatient exclamation rises to our lips; then 'the prudent shall keep silence in that time; for it is an evil time'. Or when we are blamed unjustly; when our actions are misjudged, and our intentions misconstrued; when we have laid to our charge things that we know not; when we are maligned, insulted, or reviled; then is the time to keep silence. At such times let us strive to imitate our Blessed Lord, 'Who when He was reviled, reviled not again; when He suffered He threatened not'.

III. There is a Silence which is Sweet, Comforting and Blessed, and of which we read 'there was silence in heaven about the space of half an hour'. As though in the midst of the songs and praises and rejoicings of the Holy Angels the Lord God Almighty ordered silence, and bid them pause awhile that the prayers and cries and tears of men might the better rise up to heaven, and enter into His ears. Not that God is deaf or can ever be distracted. His piercing eye takes in everything at a glance. His loving ear is attentive to the faintest whisper of His children. But He condescends to our weakness and ignorance by speaking to us in the language of men. God hears the faintest whisper of His servants' hearts. His ear is always open day and night unto their prayers; nevertheless, at the crisis of a life, as in the last great crisis of the world's history—the opening of the Seventh Seal—silence is kept in heaven, that there may be help upon earth.

'A time to keep silence.' Whilst at times we keep silence before men, let us talk unceasingly to God and pour out our hearts before Him. Let us tell Him our wants, our weakness, our hopes, our fears, our desires, and never fear of wearying His all-loving, all-sympathizing ear.

'There is a time . . . to hate.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 8.

'AH, Sam!' said Carlyle once to Froude, apropos of Bishop Wilberforce, 'he is a very clever fellow; I do not hate him near as much as I fear I ought to do.'

COMPARE NEWMAN's lines on Zeal and Love.

'I BELIEVE,' said Prof. W. K. Clifford upon one occasion, 'that if all the murderers and all the priests and all the liars in the world were united into one man, and he came suddenly upon me round a corner and said, How do you do? in a smiling way, I could not be rude to him.'

REFERENCE.—III. 9-22.—R. Buchanan, Ecclesiastes: its Meaning and Lesson, p. 107.

ECCLESIASTES III. II.

'WHAT we mean to insist upon is, that in finding out the works of God, the intellect must labour, workmanlike, under the direction of the architect—Imagination. . . . "He hath set the world in man's heart," not in his understanding, and the heart must open the door to the understanding. It is the far-seeing imagination which beholds what might be a form of things, and says to the intellect, "Try whether that may not be the form of these things". So George Macdonald writes in his essay on The Imagination, which he concludes by quoting Ecclesiastes III. 10, 11, over again as 'setting forth both the necessity we are under to imagine, and the comfort that our imagining cannot outstrip God's making. Thus,' he comments, 'thus to be playfellows with God in this game, the little ones may gather their daisies and follow their painted moths; the child of the kingdom may pore upon the lilies of the field, and gather faith as the birds of the air their food from the leafless hawthorn, ruddy with the stores God has laid up for them; and the man of science—

May sit, and rightly spell
Of every star that heaven doth show,
And every herb that sips the dew;
Till old experience doth attain
To something like prophetic strain.'

'He hath set eternity in their heart.'—ECCLESIASTES III. IX.

So might we sum up the spirit of Israel. But the Jewish ideal simplified life by leaving half of it untouched. It remained for Greece to make the earth a home, ordered and well equipped for the race, if not indeed for the individual. Greece supplied the lacking elements—art, science, secular poetry, philosophy, political life, social intercourse. . . . Hebraism and Hellenism stand out distinct, the one in all the intensity of its religious life, the other in the wealth and diversity of its secular gifts and graces.

Thus the sharp contrasts of the Sculptor's plan
Showed the two primal paths our race has trod;—
Hellas, the nurse of man complete as man,
Judaea pregnant with the living God.

—BUTCHER, Harvard Lectures on Greek Subjects, pp. 42, 43.

'He hath set eternity in their heart, so that man cannot find out the work that God hath done from the beginning even unto the end.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 11.

'WITHIN me there is more.' So runs the fine device inscribed upon the beams and pediment of an old patrician mansion at Bruges, which every traveller visits; filling a corner of one of those tender and melancholy quays, that are as forlorn and lifeless as though they existed only on canvas. So too might man exclaim, 'Within me there is more': every law of morality, every intelligible mystery.—MAETERLINCK.

THE JUDGMENT

'God hath set eternity in the heart of every man.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 11.

I. SOME idea of 'Judgment' is practically universal. The reasons seem to be:—

(a) The intrinsic incompleteness of life.
(b) The fact that character continues to grow after faculties decline.

(c) The imperious clamour of the affections.
II. The prominent place of the idea in the teaching of Jesus.

(a) Its immediate expectation by the early Church.
(b) Chiliasm—'Millenarianism'—'Second Adventists,' etc.

(c) The popular notion that the record is incomplete for each individual at death.

III. Christ sets it much farther forward.

(a) The things which must first occur.
(b) That it will be a humane judgment.
(c) A perfectly correct judgment. 'The books opened'—all relevant facts exposed. If arbitrary this would not be emphasized.

IV. Whom He condemns—and approves.

'He hath made everything beautiful in His time.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 11.

'THE woods,' says Ruskin in Præterita, 'which I had only looked on as wilderness, fulfilled, I then saw, in their beauty the same laws which guided the clouds, divided the light, and balanced the wave. "He hath made everything beautiful in His time," became for me thenceforward the interpretation of the bond between the human mind and all visible things.'

'Everything beautiful in His time.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 11.

THE tree of life is always in bloom somewhere, if we only know where to look.—HAVELOCK ELLIS.

ALL THINGS BEAUTIFUL IN THEIR SEASON

'He hath made everything beautiful in its time.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 11.

THE sentiment of the beautiful is universal. The beautiful is much more than a mere gratification of the senses.

I. God's manifest delight in beauty. Beauty is essentially inwrought into God's works; every little flower, every blade of grass, every fitful shape, every vagrant twig, exemplifies it. Beauty is God's taste, God's art, God's manner of workmanship.

II. Beauty is the necessary conception of the Creator's thought, the necessary product of His hand; variety in beauty is the necessary expression of His infinite mind. Even decay, disorganization, feculence, have an iridescence of their own.

III. Beauty is part of our human perfection also. Unbeautiful things are defective things. Beauty is not intended to minister to a mere idle sentiment. It is a minister to our moral nature. It is the deeper, more pervading sense of God; it is the religious sentiment of the soul.—H. ALLON, Harvest and Thanksgiving Services, p. 17.

REFERENCES.—III. 11.—A. Maclaren, Sermons Preached to Manchester (3rd Series), p. 209. W. Park, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxviii. p. 259. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 334. III. 16-22.—T. C. Finlayson, A Practical Exposition of Ecclesiastes, p. 87. III. 14, 15.—J. C. M. Bellew, Christ in Life: Life in Christ, p. 237. III. 15.—W. R. Owen, A Book of Lay Sermons, p. 73. III. 19-21.—W. L. Alexander, Sermons, p. 238.

'All go unto one place.'—ECCLESIASTES III. 20.

AFTER all it comes to the same thing in the end, how we make our grand tour—be it afoot, or on horseback, or on board ship. We all arrive at the same hostelry at last—the same poor inn, whose door is opened with a spade—and where the appointed chamber is so narrow, cold, and dreary; but there we sleep well, almost too well.—HEINE.

'I considered oppressions.'—ECCLESIASTES IV. 1, 2.

COMPARE JOHN MORLEY'S Critical Miscellanies, I. pp. 84 f.

REFERENCE.—IV. 1.—A. W. Momerie, Agnosticism, p. 204.

'He hath neither child nor brother: yet is there no end of his labour.'—ECCLESIASTES IV. 8.

SEE QUARLES'S Emblems, II. 2.

'Two are better than one.'—ECCLESIASTES IV. 9.

'THE best things come, as a general thing,' says Mr. Henry James in his Monograph on Hawthorne (p. 81), 'from the talents that are members of a group; every man works better when he has companions working in the same line, and yielding the stimulus of suggestion, comparison, emulation. Great things of course have been done by solitary workers; but they have usually been done with double the pains they would have cost if they had been produced in more genial circumstances. The solitary worker loses the profit of example and discussion.'

HOPEFUL—I acknowledge myself in a fault, and had I been here alone, I had by sleeping run the danger of death. I see it is true that the wise man saith, Two are better than one. Hitherto hath thy company been my mercy.—BUNYAN.

REFERENCE.—IV. 9, 10.—R. D. B. Rawnsley, Sermons for the Christian Year, p. 512.

'Woe to him that is alone when he falleth.'—ECCLESIASTES IV. 10.

I DROWN the past in still hoping for the future, but God knows whether futurity will be as great a cheat as ever. I sometimes think it will. I tell you candidly, I am sometimes out of spirits, and have need of co-operation, or Heaven knows yet what will become of my fine castles in the air. So you must bring spirits, spirits, spirits.—COWDEN to his Brother.

'A threefold cord is not quickly broken.'—ECCLESIASTES IV. 12.

'We are three people, but only one soul,' said Coleridge, speaking of Wordsworth, Dorothy Wordsworth, and himself.

THE THREEFOLD CORD

'A threefold cord is not quickly broken.'—ECCLESIASTES IV. 12.

It is sometimes good to ask ourselves what are the real roots or foundations of our personal religion, apart from what we receive as revealed truth. The answer, if we can find it, will give us the contents of our natural religion, our faith apart from revelation and authority.

I. What are the marks or tests which give some of our experiences a much higher value than others, so that we feel that there is something Divine about them?

(a) They bring with them their own satisfaction. We feel that they are a positive, absolute value.

(b) They have a universal quality. They take us out of ourselves, out of the small circle of our private personal interests.

(c) They delight and uplift us in such a way that when they are gone we feel that we are still the better for having had them.

These are the three marks of what St. Paul calls the things of the Spirit—the higher and better world which is all about us and among us and within us, but which is not to be seen by everybody, nor by anybody at all times. The things of the Spirit are first precious for their own sake; they have God and not our little selves for their centre; and they bring us a peace and happiness which does not wholly perish when they are gone.

II. Now what are the experiences which have these qualities? They are of three kinds.

(a) First of all, contact with moral goodness has this character. So far as we are brought close to goodness, and especially goodness in the form of disinterestedness, sympathy, love, we feel that we have reached the heart of life, that we are lifted out of ourselves, and that we are enjoying a happiness which, come what may, will make us richer for life. This is one strand in our threefold cord.

(b) There is the love of truth—this is the second strand in our threefold cord. No matter in what field we are seeking the truth, we feel, when we have found it, that here is something which exists in its own right, which stands proudly aloof from our little personal schemes, and which we are permanently the better for having found.

(c) The third strand in our threefold cord is the appreciation of beauty. And surely this mysterious sense of beauty, which seems to serve very few practical uses in human life, in proportion to its strength and diffusion, must have been given us by God as a revelation of Himself. It has the three marks of spirituality which I have mentioned. It takes us out of ourselves, as pure affection, and pure seeking after truth take us out of ourselves; and it is, or should be, in its own degree a permanent enrichment of our life. There is then a sacredness about these three experiences, which we should all feel. The good, the true, and the beautiful, are attributes of God's nature, and we stand on holy ground when we are brought into contact with them.—W. R. INGE, All Saints' Sermons, p. 211.

REFERENCES.—IV. 12.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in a Religious House, vol. i. p. 156. J. Keble, Sermons from Ascension Day to Trinity Sunday, p. 395. V. 1.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 253. V. 1-9.—T. C. Finlayson, A Practical Exposition of Ecclesiastes, p. 125. V. 1-12.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 350.

'Let not thine heart be hasty to utter any thing before God.'—ECCLESIASTES V. 2 1.

To bind myself to diligence in seeking the Lord, and to stir me up 'hereto, I made a vow to pray so many times a day; how many times I cannot be positive; but it was at least thrice. It was the goodness of God to me, that it was made only for a definite space of time; but I found it so far from being a help, that it was really a hindrance to my devotion, making me more heartless in, and averse to, duty, through the corruption of my nature. I got the pain of it driven out accordingly; but I never durst make another of that nature since, nor so bind up myself, where God had left me at liberty.—THOMAS BOSTON.

'Be not rash with thy mouth.'—ECCLESIASTES V. 2.

'SUDDENLY and offhand,' says Köstlin, 'Luther was hurried into a most momentous decision. Towards the end of June, 1505, when several Church festivals fall together, he paid a visit to his home at Mansfeld in quest, very possibly, of rest and comfort to his mind. Returning on 2nd July, the feast of the Visitation of the Virgin Mary, he was already near Erfurt, when, at the village of Stotternheim, a terrific storm broke over his head. A fearful flash of lightning darted from heaven before his eyes. Trembling with fear, he fell to the earth and exclaimed, "Help, Anna, beloved Saint! I will be a monk!" A few days after, when quietly settled at Erfurt, he repented having used these words. But he felt that he had taken a vow.'

Do not accustom yourself to enchain your volatility with vows; they will sometimes leave a thorn in your mind, which you will, perhaps, never be able to extract or eject. Take this warning; it is of great importance.—JOHNSON to Boswell.

'Let thy words be few.'—ECCLESIASTES V. 2.

WHAT people call fluency, and the gift of prayer, is often delusive; it is mere excitement from the presence of others, and from the sound of our own voice.—F. W. ROBERTSON.

THERE is no need to say much to God. One often does not talk much to a friend whom one is delighted to see; one enjoys looking at him, and one says some few words which are purely matter of feeling. One does not so much seek interchange of thought as rest and communion of heart with one's friend. Even so it should be with God—a word, a sigh, a thought, a feeling, says everything.—FÉNELON.

REFERENCE.—V. 2.—J. T. Bramston, Sermons to Boys, p. 116.

If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of justice in a province, marvel not at the matter. For He that is higher than the highest regardeth; and there be higher than they.—ECCLESIASTES V. 8.

In describing the need for the reforms of Cæsar under the new monarchy, Mommsen (History of Rome, book v. xi.) declares that 'the most incurable wounds were inflicted as justice by the doings of the advocates. In proportion as the parasitic plant of Roman forensic eloquence flourished, all positive ideas of right became broken up. . . . A plain, simple defendant, says a Roman advocate of much experience at this period, may be accused of any crime at pleasure which he has, or has not, committed, and will be certainly condemned.'

For a tear is an intellectual thing.
And a sigh is the sword of an Angel king,
And the bitter groan of a martyr's woe
Is an arrow from the Almighty bow.

—BLAKE.

THERE are some persons of that rich of soul that they would like to live 250 years hence, to see to what height of empire America will have grown up in that period, or whether the English constitution will last so long. These are points beyond me. But I confess I should like to live to see the downfall of the Bourbons. That is a vital question with me; and I shall like it the better, the sooner it happens.—HAZLITT.

SEE LOWELL's poem, Villa Franca.

THE repugnance of man to injustice is with him an early and favourite topic of proof.—GLADSTONE on Butler.

REFERENCE.—V. 8.—A. W. Momerie, Agnosticism, p. 219.

'He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver.'—
ECCLESIASTES V. 10.

SEE RUSKIN's On the Old Road (IL sec. 162) for a comment on a 'lover of silver'.

'Riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt.'—ECCLESIASTES V. 13 f.

To acquire interest on money, and to acquire interest in life are not the same thing.—EDWARD CARPENTER.

REFERENCES.—V. 13-20.—R. Buchanan, Ecclesiastes: its Meaning and Lessons, p. 191. V. 15.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 358.

'Better is the sight of the eyes than the wandering of the desire.'—ECCLESIASTES VI. 9.

PERHAPS the inherent force of a nature is shown even more in its passive and negative than in its active and positive self-expressions. In its power of voluntarily limiting its own horizon; of setting itself arbitrary boundaries; of saying 'Thus far will I go, see, admit, and no further'. For it takes a lot of latent strength to sit, either mentally or physically, really still. Not to fidget. To 'stay put,' in short.—LUCAS MALET's Wages of Sin, book iv. v.

NOR until a man has rid himself of all pretension, and taken refuge in mere unembellished existence, can he gain that peace of mind which is the foundation of human happiness.—SCHOPENHAUER.

You may paddle all day long; but it is when you come back at nightfall and look in at the familiar room, that you find Love or Death awaiting you beside the stove; and the most beautiful adventures are not those we go to seek.—R. L. STEVENSON.

REFERENCES.—VI. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2462. VII. 1.—Ibid. vol. xxvii. No. 1588.

'It is better to go to the house of mourning.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 2 f.

WE are apt to blame society for being constrained and artificial, but its conventionalities are only the result of the limitations of man's own nature. How much, for instance, of what is called 'reserve' belongs to this life, and passes away with its waning, and the waxing of the new life! We can say to the dying, and hear from them things that, in the fullness of health and vigour, could not be imparted without violence to some inward instinct. And this is one reason, among many others, why it is so good to be in the house of mourning, the chamber of death. It is there more easy to be natural,—to be true, I mean, to that which is deepest within us. Is there not something in the daily familiar course of life, which seems in a strange way to veil its true aspect? It is not Death, but Life, which wraps us about with shroud and cerement.—DORA GREENWELL, Two Friends, pp. 38, 39.

COMPARE Sterne's famous sermon on this text:—

'So strange and unaccountable a creature is man! He is so framed that he cannot but pursue happiness, and yet, unless he is made sometimes miserable, how apt he is to mistake the way which can only lead him to the accomplishment of his own wishes,' etc.

'The living will lay it to his heart.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 2.

EVERY one observes how temperate and reasonable men are when humbled and brought low by afflictions, in comparison of what they are in high prosperity. By this voluntary resort unto the house of mourning, which is here recommended, we might learn all these useful instructions which calamities teach, without undergoing them ourselves, and grow wiser and better at a more easy rate than men commonly do. . . . This would correct the florid and gaudy prospects and expectations which we are too apt to indulge, teach us to lower our notions of happiness and enjoyment, bring them down to the reality of things, to what is attainable.—BISHOP BUTLER.

SORROW, terror, anguish, despair itself, are often the chosen expressions of an approximation to the highest good. Our sympathy in tragic fiction depends on this principle; tragedy delights by affording a shadow of the pleasure which exists in pain. This is the source also of the melancholy which is inseparable from the sweetest melody. The pleasure that is in sorrow is sweeter than the pleasure of pleasure itself. And hence the saying, It is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of mirth.—SHELLEY.

'It is better to hear the rebuke of the wise, than for a man to hear the song of fools.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 5.

It is the sinful unhappiness of some men's minds that they usually disaffect those that cross them in their corrupt proceedings, and plainly tell them of their faults. They are ready to judge of the reprover's spirit by their own, and to think that all such sharp reproofs proceed from some disaffection to their persons, or partial opposition to the opinions which they hold. But plain dealers are always approved in the end, and the time is at hand when you shall confess these were your truest friends.—RICHARD BAXTER, Preface to the Reformed Pastor.

A TRUTH told us is harder to bear than a hundred which we tell ourselves.—FÉNELON.

'As is the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 6.

Nothing serves better to illustrate a man's character than what he finds ridiculous.—GOETHE.

'During that time' (his agitation on behalf of Calas' descendants) 'not a smile escaped me without my reproaching myself for it, as for a crime.'—VOLTAIRE.

'Froude,' said Keble once to Hurrell Froude, 'you said you thought Law's Serious Call was a clever book; it seemed to me as if you had said the Day of Judgment will be a pretty sight.'

'The patient in spirit is better than the proud in spirit. Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 8, 9.

THERE is not a greater foe to spirituality than wrath; and wrath even in a righteous cause distempers the heart.—CHALMERS.

REFERENCE.—VII. 8.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 363.

PAST AND PRESENT

'Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not enquire wisely concerning this.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 10.

THE actual connexion of these words of the text is quite in keeping with the tone and temper of the writer of this book. He does not mean, at least as the chief purpose of this rebuke, to glorify the present with its opportunities and possibilities at the expense of the past. It would hardly be in accordance with the prevailing pessimism of the writer to strike here a hopeful and inspiring note. The whole trend of his teaching is that life is illusive, and a man should not build his hopes too high, and look for permanence in any source of joy. Moderation is the great secret.

I. It is a common infirmity of old age, but it is not confined to age, to disparage the present and to glorify the past. It is a merciful provision of our nature which makes us forget the pains and sorrows of the past, and when we do remember them sets them in a soft and tender light, letting us see some of the good which has come from them. And as the sorrows of the past seem diminished by distance, by a strange reversion the joys loom larger and finer. To a reflective mind the pleasures of memory are sweeter than the pleasures of possession or even the pleasures of anticipation. And this tendency seen in our everyday life is also reflected on a larger scale in history. All old institutions gain allies for their existence in sentiment and respect for what has displayed the quality of permanence. We judge of the past by what has come down to us of the past, and make unfavourable comparison of the present with it. We forget among other things the greatly extended sphere for human activity now; and we forget that with the treasures of the past which we possess time has weeded out much that was inferior.

II. It is a natural bias of the mind, and in many respects a very beautiful thing, to glorify the past. The danger of it comes in when it makes light of the present, and destroys the healthful faith that would save the present from despair. We must not let the past sit on us like an old man of the sea, choking us and fettering our movements. It is for this stupid purpose that the past is generally used by the ordinary laudator temporis acti. The underlying idea is that anything that now can be done must be feeble and not worth doing. Such an idea kills effort and robs life of dignity. It paralyses the present and mutilates the future. On the one hand we have ever with us the man whose attitude to life is summed up in the dictum, 'Whatever is, is right,' who opposes change of all sorts, and is quite content with the actual state of affairs. On the other hand, some adopt the opposite, and equally false, statement as a motto, 'Whatever is, is wrong'. Strange though it may appear, the two positions may be the fruit of the self-same spirit, and have their origin in the same point of view. In their essence they have both their cause in want of faith. The man who is content with the present does not see that it exists to be carried forward into a nobler future; and the man who disparages the present and glorifies the past does not see that the very same causes are at work, that the present is really the outcome and fruition of the past which he praises, and if he be right the poverty of the present stultifies the past he loves. And both attitudes, that of the unreasoning conservative who will not look forward, and that of the sentimental mediævalist who will only look back, deprive us of the hope and vigour to make our days true and noble.

III. To have the manly, hopeful attitude instead of the despairing one of our text, we do not need to believe in the perfectibility of the race; we only need to believe in its improbability under the right conditions. Our days are better than former days in this. But we have greater opportunities, to us have come the wisdom of the ancients, the ripe fruit of experience, advantages of knowledge, wider outlets for every gift. All this will be of none avail if we love not faith. Without faith we have no sure guarantee that will make effort purposeful, and we will sigh for a mythical golden age lying behind us as a race. The golden age is before us if God leads us on. With such faith we need not look back upon former days longingly, upheld in our own day by the thought of God's presence.—HUGH BLACK, University Sermons, p. 293

REFERENCES.—VII. 10.—C. Kingsley, The Water of Life. VII. 11-29.—Buchanan, Ecclesiastes: its Meaning and Lessons, p. 250.

'Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these?'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 10.

THE best gift that history can give us is the enthusiasm it arouses.—GOETHE.

BOTH in politics and in art Plato seems to have seen no way of bringing order out of disorder, except by taking a step backwards. Antiquity, compared with the world in which he lived, had a sacredness and authority for him; the men of a former age were supposed by him to have had a sense of reverence which was wanting among his contemporaries.—JOWETT.

AN obsolete discipline may be a present heresy.—NEWMAN.

SEE also BEN JONSON'S Discoveries, secs. xxi. cxxiii.

'CARLYLE,' said Maurice, 'believes in a God who lived till the death of Oliver Cromwell.'

THE GOODNESS OF GLADNESS

'In the day of prosperity be joyful.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 14.

I. WELL that, you say, we can very easily do. Our difficulty up to the present time has not been to be joyful when prosperity has smiled upon us, but to find that prosperity which should bring us joy. Is that true? Or is it not rather true, as Bishop Butler has told us in his solemn way, that 'Prosperity itself, while anything supposed desirable is not ours, begets extravagant and unbounded thoughts,' and that prosperity itself is a real and lasting source of danger. Is it not a matter of common observation that the danger which prosperity sets up is precisely this, the danger of discontent.

II. But literally this advice is, In the day of good be good! And perhaps that brings out the meaning to us better than a better reading would. If God gives you happiness, be happy in it; if light, walk in the light; if joy, enjoy it! We are sharers of the glorious Gospel of the happy God. People are too often afraid of happiness. And they are afraid of admitting that they have reason to be happy.

III. It would be nice to think that this only pointed to a modesty which was unable to boast of anything, even to God's good gifts. But it points to nothing of the kind. If we could trace it back we should find that it points away to the old notion about jealous Gods, and to the superstition that they were always waiting to pounce down upon you if things were going too well. God, the God of Love, Whom Jesus taught us to call Father, jealous of the deepest, highest virtue of our souls which makes us likest Him!—C. F. ARNOLD, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII, 1907, p. 110.

THE EQUIPOISE OF GOD

'God also hath set the one over against the other.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 14.

THE thought which occupies the writer's mind here is that of the compensations of experience. He has lit on the great truth that human life is very subtly and finely equalized. He is not preaching the doctrine of equality, as if there were no difference between man and man. He is too honest to assert, as Pope asserted, that whatever is, is right. But he is preaching that, in individual lives, there is such an exquisite balancing of things, that a man has little cause for discontent, or for murmuring at the providence of God.

I. The Balancing of Our Gifts.—Think, for example, of the gift of genius. Genius is one of the most god-like gifts that has ever been granted to the human family. It is more than ability. It is more than talent. Genius is talent with the lamp lit. Genius is insight—enthusiastic insight, that sees, and seeing loves, and loving, speaks. And yet this genius, so choice and rare a gift that there is never an ardent youth but covets it, wears a crown of thorns upon its head. Do not be envious of the man of genius. The man of genius is the man of sorrows. There are joys for you, there are quiet and happy blessings, to which the genius shall always be a stranger. He has his work to do, and he must do it, and the world will be nearer God because of Him; but God has set one thing over against the other.

II. The Balancing of Our Powers.—Take for example the power of an iron will. An iron will always commands respect. There is something in it we cannot help admiring. It is a gallant thing, that high persistence, which nothing can daunt or baffle or depress. And every valley is exalted for it, and every mountain is brought low before it, and it will cleave its path through thickest forest, and find a ford across the swiftest river. There is something godlike in that spectacle. It is a power that is largely coveted. And yet how often the man of iron will misses the best that life has got to offer! He misses all its sweetness and its kindness, and the love that lingers in the sunny meadow, and he is lonely when other hearts are glad, and pitiless where other hearts are pitiful. It is not all gain, that iron will. There is often a certain loss with all the gain. There is a loss of sympathy, of happy brotherhood, of the kindness which makes us glad to-night. Therefore do not be angry with your Maker if you can never be a determined person. He hath set one thing over against the other.

Or shall we take the power of imagination? That is one of the most blessed of our powers. It is a shelter when the blast is on the wall.

III. The Balance of Experience.—Consider the experience of prosperity. It seems so easy to be good when one is prosperous. It seems such a pleasant thing to be alive. It is so different from battling with adversity, and living always on the brink of failure. And yet I question if these battling people are not as a rule far happier than the rich. I question if they are not generally more contented than the man who has everything the world can offer. There are boys who were in school with me who have been so prosperous that I never meet them without saying, 'God pity you!' Everything fine and delicate and generous seems to have dried up and worn away. Prosperity does not always mean contentment. It does not always mean the singing heart. Without the heaven of the grace of God, it very generally means the opposite. And therefore the wise man does not fret himself over him who prospereth in his way. He knows that God sets one thing over against the other.—G. H. MORRISON, The Return of the Angels, p. 87.

REFERENCE.—VII. 14.—J. Bowstead, Practical Sermons, vol. i. p. 142. W. L. Alexander, Sermons, p. 215. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (8th Series), pp. 68, 74.

'There is a wicked man that longeth his life in his wickedness.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 15.

THE two main qualities for a long life are a good body and a bad heart.—FONTENELLE.

COMPARE M. ARNOLD's Mycerinus.

REFERENCE.—VII. 15-18.—T. C. Finlayson, A Practical Exposition of Ecclesiastes, p. 165.

OVER-RIGHTEOUSNESS

'Be not righteous over much.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 16.

THE words, righteous over much, are apt to be a good deal in the mouths of sinners when they are pressed by their own consciences, or their spiritual guides and advisers, to practise some unpleasant duty or reform some pleasant vice.

I. How far is this manner of speaking justifiable in the persons who use it? The text is oftener quoted in a mood half-sportive, and as a short way of silencing unpleasant discussion, than as a serious ground of argument. But the misery of it is, that men act on it quite in earnest. They cannot themselves believe that it will bear the weight they lay upon it, and yet they are not afraid to conduct themselves as if it were the only commandment God had ever given.

II. How far is it warranted by the general tenor of Scripture?

(a) This action of over-righteousness cannot stand with that precious corner-stone of our faith, the Doctrine of the Atonement.

(b) Another test is the doctrine of sanctification.

(c) Another great doctrine, which is utterly inconsistent with the vulgar use of the text, is the inequality of the future remarks of the blessed in heaven.

(d) When the analogy of faith, and the clear words of our Saviour, and the lives and deaths of all the Saints are against a doctrine, it is quite certain that any single expression which may seem to assert it must be wrongly interpreted.

III. The text was intended as a warning against the very error which it is so often and so unfortunately used to encourage. Nothing could be further from the Wise Man's intentions than that construction which the too subtle apologists of lukewarmness in religion are so ready to fasten on the text.—JOHN KEBLE, Sermons Occasional and Parochial, p. 1.

'Be not righteous over much.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 16.

THE book has been said, and with justice, to breathe resignation at the grave of Israel. . . . Attempts at a philosophic indifference appear, at a sceptical suspension of judgment, at an easy ne quid nimis (vii. 16). Vain attempts, even at a moment which favoured them! shows of scepticism, vanishing as soon as uttered before the intractable conscientiousness of Israel.—Literature and Dogma, II.

LET not the frailty of man go on thus inventing needless troubles to itself, to groan under the false imagination of a strictness never imposed from above; enjoining that for duty which is an impossible and vain supererogating. Be not righteous over much, is the counsel of Ecclesiastes; why shouldst thou destroy thyself? let us not be thus over-anxious to strain at atoms, and yet to stop every vent and cranny of permissive liberty, lest nature, wanting these needful pores and breathing places, which God hath not debarred our weakness, either suddenly burst out into some wide rupture of open vice or frantic heresy, or else fester with repressing and blasphemous thoughts, under an unreasonable and fruitless rigour of unwarranted law.—MILTON.

MAN is neither angel nor brute, and the misfortune is that whoever would play the angel plays the brute.—PASCAL.

As an aged man of the world, whose recollections went back into the last century, is reported to have said: 'When I was young, nobody was religious; now that I am old, everybody is religious, and they are both wrong'.—JOWETT.

No man undertakes to do a thing for God, and lays it aside because he finds perseverance in it too much for him, without his soul being seriously damaged by it. He has taken up a disadvantageous position. This is not a reason for not trying, but it is a reason for trying soberly, discreetly, and with deliberation.—F. W. FABER.

ALMOST everybody you see in Oxford believes either too much or too little.—PHILLIPS BROOKS.

RIGHTEOUS OVER MUCH

'Be not righteous over much; neither make thyself over wise: why shouldst thou destroy thyself? Be not over much wicked, neither be thou foolish: why shouldst thou die before thy time?'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 16, 17.

OUR text is characteristic of one of the lines of thought which run through this strange book. The book is autobiographical in the true sense, that it gives a record of personal thought and experience. The book is the fruit of the contact of a Jew with alien philosophy and civilization, the author had seen the world and had tried the different ways of life which have ever been possible to men. The book is full of world-weariness. The satiety which comes from such a life seems at first to have destroyed all serious earnest purpose; and he pronounced upon all things the verdict of vanity, that everything was equally worthless, and nothing counted much anyway. The withered world-weary life, so frankly revealed in this autobiography, is itself the most terrible sermon that could be preached from the book, of the vanity of a life lived apart from God.

I. The words of our text with their doctrine of moderation suggest a common thought in Greek philosophy. It might be called the very central thought of Aristotle's Ethics that virtue is moderation, not of course meaning moderation in indulging in anything wrong, but that wrong itself means either excess or deficiency. He defines virtue as a habit or trained faculty of choice, the characteristic of which lies in observing the mean. 'And it is a moderation firstly, inasmuch as it comes in the middle or mean between two vices, one on the side of excess, the other on the side of defect; and secondly, inasmuch as, while these vices fall short of, or exceed, the due measures in feeling and in action, it finds and chooses the mean or moderate amount.'

II. There is much to be said for this doctrine of moderation even in what is called righteousness, at a time like that in which the writer lived, when righteousness was looked on by most as external ceremonies and keeping of endless rules, rather than as spiritual passion. There is often much justification for the sneer at overmuch righteousness at all times, when the soul has died out of religion and the punctilious keeper of the law becomes self-complacent and censorious of others. It is, however, only in a very limited degree, and only when the true meaning of righteousness is obscured, that there is any truth in the cynical counsel. If righteousness is inward conformity to the holy will of God, then there can be no limitations set to the standard of righteousness. From this point of view the prudential policy of our text is really a terrible moral degradation. Our Lord pronounces this ineffable blessing upon the very men whom this worldly wisdom sneers at. 'Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness.' They may not have the success and popularity which the prudent trimmer achieves. They have not the pleasant satisfaction and easy contentment which come to the dulled soul. They are weighted by the consciousness of sin and are driven by a sense of spiritual want. They are tormented by a passion for purity, and they pine after holiness, and nothing but God can fill the aching void of heart. But how can there be blessing along with pining, with want, with hunger and thirst, with unappeased desire? Wherein are they blessed? In this way, that desire is ever a note of life. When life begins, need begins. Life is a bundle of want. And the higher the desire, the higher the life. The mind hungers and thirsts for knowledge; and when desire stops, mental development stops. The work of spiritual life is spiritual desire, a moral longing for conformity to the will of God.—HUGH BLACK, University Sermons, p. 20.

WISE OVER MUCH

'Neither make thyself over wise; why shouldest thou destroy thyself?'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 16.

HERE the doctrine of moderation is extended to the intellectual sphere, that the safest course is to avoid extremes and to do nothing in excess. The truth of this advice is seen more clearly if we translate the word 'destroy' a little more fully. The primary idea of the word is that of silence, being put to silence, and thus it came to mean to be laid waste or destroyed. But the root meaning is to be made desolate, solitary, and was sometimes used of a lonely solitary way. So that the question of the writer might be put, Why make thyself solitary? Why isolate thyself? The exceptional always isolates. The ordinary man of the street cannot see your far-away visions of truth or beauty or holiness. The thinker is lonely.

I. How pitifully true this is can be seen in the whole history of human thoughts. In loneliness, in sickness of heart, in despair of the unknown, has every inch of ground been gained for the mind of man. Further there is justification for it even from a moral point of view. As the temptation of the over-righteous is censoriousness and self-satisfaction, so the temptation of the overwise is what St. Paul calls the vainly puffed-up mind, a besotted conceit and pride, as if wisdom will die with them, and which looks down with contempt on the vulgar, unlettered throng.

II. But as censoriousness came not from too much righteousness, but from too little, so contemptuous pride is the failing not of real but of spurious wisdom when wisdom is supposed to be information. Knowledge of facts, knowledge of books, it lends itself to the puffed-up mind. But these things, scientific facts, literature, are not wisdom; they are only the implements of wisdom, the material with which wisdom works—wisdom is always humble, for it knows how little it knows. Quite apart, however, from the possibility of this mistake which gives a kind of colour to his sneer, the advice of Ecclesiastes appeals to us to-day because it fits in with our modern temper. Ours is a time when the supremacy of the practical over the speculative is complete. In politics we say that we do not want theories, and ideal reforms, and Utopian schemes; we want the practical, the thing that is expedient at the moment. In religion we are told that theology, opinions, beliefs, convictions do not count, but only the plain duties of life, the practical virtues, kindness, tolerance and such like. Even in science the speculative is ruled out, or must take a back seat.

III. It is true that in all these regions, in politics, and religion, and science, the test of the tree must be its fruit. But we are inclined to take too narrow a view of what the fruits are, and we can easily over-reach ourselves by our exclusive standard of what is practical. These practical things on which we lay so much stress do not arrive ready-made but are the results from a hidden source. In politics will the fruit of expediency not wither when the root principle is cut away from it? In religion will the plain moral duties remain when faith is dead? In science even the practical man can only apply the discoveries and ascertained truths acquired by the natural philosophers. In all branches of life, though it may not pay to be overwise, and though the secret of success may be to confine yourself to the narrow limits of practical things, yet the progress of the world has been due, and must always be due, to these very same eager, strenuous searchers after truth, to those who sought for knowledge as for hid treasure, to those finely tuned spirits who have followed truth though it led them into the wilderness.—HUGH BLACK, University Sermons, p. 32.

REFERENCE.—VII. 18.—J. Budgen, Parochial Sermons, vol. ii. p. 327. VII. 17.—J. Martineau, Endeavours After the Christian Life, p. 110.

'It is good that thou shouldest take hold of this; yea, also from that withdraw not thine hand.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 18.

OF little threads our life is spun, and he spins ill who misses one.—M. ARNOLD.

REFERENCE.—VII. 18.—T. C. Finlayson, A Practical Exposition of Ecclesiastes, p. 175.

'Take no heed unto all words that are spoken.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 21.

HERE is commended the provident stay of inquiry of that which we would be loth to find: as it was judged great wisdom in Pompeius Magnus that he burned Sertorius' papers unperused.—BACON.

THE LAW OF EQUIVALENTS

'For oftentimes also thine own heart knoweth that thou thyself likewise.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 22.

THE meaning would seem to be: Take no heed of tale-bearing; do not attach too much importance to words that are spoken in secret and not intended for thine own ear. Do not listen to servants talking about thee in the kitchen; do not be distressed by what men say about thee in the streets; do not judge thyself too much by thy nickname: 'for oftentimes also thine own heart knoweth that thou thyself likewise.'

I. This is the law of equivalents. Men hear what they have spoken. If you have sowed the air with pearly words, you will reap a pearly harvest. 'Be not deceived, God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.' Do not play the eavesdropper. Otherwise thou shalt hear no good of thyself. If thy servants curse thee, or speak unkindly of thee, think, for oftentimes also thine own heart knoweth that thou thyself likewise hast cursed them.

II. Now there is another application, and it is, that what we ourselves have done we should not condemn in others. Christianity is in this section of the Scriptures very practical. There is no hymn-singing down these dales, it is a cruel east wind that blows in our face.

Is there a Spirit in the air, in the speaking heavens, that takes record and note of what we are about? I believe there is, I am sure there is. Is there a Spirit that deals out a series of equivalents—as thou, so he; as he, so thou? Yes, we are not so ill-treated as we first thought; we did intend to get up a case against this man, a case of libel, and we, the plaintiff, may be the greater libellist of the two.

There is a great deal of negative ill. We do not tell lies, we act them. How awful a thing living is! Do not make remarks upon some other man, but scrutinize and sit in judgment upon thyself; be jealous about thine own integrity, and thou wilt be merciful to other men's infirmities. But where would be conversation? There would be none, until men learned to speak about great subjects, the very speaking about them cleansing the mouth and purifying the heart, the very eloquence of the tongue being as a baptism of the heavens. Let us get into great themes, noble contemplations, then we shall be advancing towards the pure heavens, with all their untold star jewels.

III. Every man sins according to his own peculiar infirmity, and every man cultivates some specific and favourite virtue. What we have to aim at is wholeness of character. We have a very imperfect vocabulary; but we are going to learn the vocabulary of God, and then we shall be able to say what our new feelings are like. I cannot see much now, but I believe it is there to be seen. That is the great faith that comforts and inspires us.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vi. p. 238.

'All this have I proved by wisdom.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 23 &

PERHAPS the best part of old age is its sense of proportion which enables us to estimate misfortunes, or what seem to be such, at their true proportions.—JAMES PAYN in Nineteenth Century, September, 1897.

THE REASON OF THINGS

'I applied mine heart to know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom, and the reason of things.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 25.

'I APPLIED mine heart to seek out the reason' is enough; 'of things' is a phrase put in by men who, with mistaken generosity, desire to assist inspiration.

I. He is a very foolish man who wants to pry too much into the reason of things. A good many things in life have to be taken just as they are and just as they come, and the Lord permits a ready simple reading of many things which might be so taken as to perplex faith and bewilder imagination. Men are in some instances made to pry; they cannot be content with what is known and visible and accessible; some men cannot live on the commonplace, some dainty souls could never live upon simple mother-made bread, they must have other things to eat, and they cannot get them, and in a vain futile endeavour to get these other things their souls wither and perish and pass away. Do not be too wise; be not righteous over much, neither make thyself over wise: why shouldst thou destroy thyself? These are the inquiries of the wise man himself.

II. We cannot, however, all avoid looking round and wondering at the marvellous structure and economy and intermixture and dramatic interplay of things. It is a right wonderful universe so far as we can see it, and that is a very little way and a very little portion; still, if things be so mysterious, at once so august and so abject within the little sphere that is visible or accessible, what may they be, what must they be, on the wider lines, on the complete outline, as God has figured and controlled it? For my own part, and this is a matter upon which personal testimony must be taken for what it is worth, I have come to the conclusion that there is no explanation of life, nature, and all things under the sun and above the sun that we have heard anything about that is so simple, so complete, and so satisfactory as that they were all made and are all under the gentle and mighty control of a living personal God.

Some of the reasons of things may be discovered almost immediately by a test which we call by the Latin word conduct. The reason is written upon the very face of the situation. That is very good up to a given point; that did not escape the keen eyes of Solomon, and he therefore says, 'There is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that longeth his life in wickedness'. That is the side that must be taken in if we would institute a complete and just purview of the conditions and issues of human life so far as they are known to us.

III. The religious explanation is to my own mind the largest and truest that has as yet been suggested. Certainly it leaves mysteries, but it also interposes this consideration, You are finite, God is infinite, you can see but a very small portion of any case or situation just now; by and by the clouds will be dispersed and God will accompany you over the whole line of His providence so far as you are concerned, and He will give you the explanation, the answer shall follow the enigma, the solution shall quickly ensue upon the problem, and one day you will be able to see and to say that God has even in the night-time been working for the culture and the final sanctification and uttermost benediction of human nature.

1. The religious conception of all these things is ennobling, it enables the soul to say, It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth good in His sight; it is the Lord, let Him turn my tears into telescopes through which I can see the farthest stars in His empire; it is the Lord, let Him tear me to pieces that He may build me up again a stronger, truer, and manlier man. These are the teachings of the Christian religion.

2. The Christian conception is not only ennobling, it is tranquillizing; one of the special miracles of the Gospel of Christ is that it works peace in the heart.

3. The religious conception is inspiring. Watchman, what of the night? He says, I see a quivering as of an awakening star. Again we ask, and he says, 'The dawn is already on the hilltop. Again, and he says, Awake and rise, for the sun is here, and to feel it claims your service and promises you a great reward.—JOSEPH PARKER City Temple Pulpit, vol. VII. p. 89.

'One man among a thousand have I found.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 28.

THERE are only two good men: one is not born yet, and the other is dead.—CONFUCIUS.

I BEGAN to . . . get an especial scorn for that scorn of mankind which is a transmuted disappointment of preposterous claims.—GEORGE ELIOT.

SEE LOWELL'S Sonnets, IV.

'A woman among all those have I not found.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 28.

CHARLES KINGSLEY objects to Fénelon's Télémaque, that 'no woman in it exercises influence over man, except for evil. . . . Woman—as the old monk held, who derived femina from fe—faith, and minus—less, because women have less faith than men—is in Télémaque, whenever she thinks or acts, the temptress, the enchantress.

'I wish,' writes Maeterlinck in The Treasure of the Humble, 'that all who have suffered at woman's hands and found them evil, would loudly proclaim it and give us their reasons; and if those reasons be well founded, we shall indeed be surprised. . . . It is women who preserve here below the pure fragrance of our soul, like some jewel from heaven, which none knows how to use; and were they to depart, the spirit would reign alone in a desert. Those who complain of them know not the heights whereon the true kisses are found, and verily I do pity them.'

'God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 29.

You have had false prophets among you—for centuries you have had them—solemnly warned against them though you were; false prophets, who have told you that all men are nothing but fiends and wolves, half beast, half devil. Believe that, and indeed you may sink to that. But refuse that, and have faith that God 'made you upright,' though you have sought out many inventions; so, you will strive daily to become more what your Maker meant and means you to be, and daily gives you also the grace to be.—RUSKIN, Crown of Wild Olive, Lect. III.

'EVERY one,' says Cervantes, 'is as God made him, and often a great deal worse.'

THE STATE OF INNOCENCE

'God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 29.

ADAM and Eve were placed in a garden to cultivate it; how much is implied even in this! 'The Lord God took the man and put him into the Garden of Eden, to dress it and to keep it.' If there was a mode of life free from tumult, anxiety, excitement, and fever of mind, it was the care of a garden. Adam was a hermit, whether he would or no. True; but does not this very circumstance that God made him such point out to us what is our true happiness, if we were given it, which we are not? At least we see in type what our perfection is, in these first specimens of our nature, which need not, unless God had so willed, have been created in this solitary state, but might have been myriads at once, as the angels were created. And let it be noted, that, when the Second Adam came, He returned, nay, more than returned to that life which the first had originally been allotted. He too was alone, and lived alone, the immaculate Son of a Virgin Mother; and He chose the mountain summit or the garden as His home. Save always, that in His case sorrow and pain went with His loneliness; not, like Adam, eating freely of all trees but one, but fasting in the wilderness for forty days—not tempted to eat of that one through wantonness, but urged in utter destitution of food to provide Himself with some necessary bread,—not as a king giving names to fawning brutes, but one among the wild beasts,—not granted a helpmeet for His support, but praying alone in the dark morning,—not dressing the herbs and flowers, but dropping blood upon the ground in agony,—not falling into a deep sleep in His garden, but buried there after His passion; yet still like the first Adam, solitary,—like the first Adam, living with His God and Holy Angels.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCE.—VIII. 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1697.

ECCLESIASTES VIII. 8.

COMPARE RUSKIN'S Time and Tide (Letter xxiv.) for an application of the words, There is no discharge in that war; also KIPLING'S The Five Nations, pp. 185 f.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 8.—S. H. Tying, American Pulpit of To-day, vol. i. p. 623. VIII. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 200.

ECCLESIASTES VIII. 11. Cf. VII. 7, etc.

SWIFT once asked Delany whether the 'corruptions and villainies of men in power did not eat his flesh and exhaust his spirits?' 'No,' said Delany. 'Why, how can you help it?' said Swift. 'Because,' replied Delany, 'I am commanded to the contrary—fret not thyself because of the ungodly.' That, like other wise maxims, is capable of an ambiguous application. As Delany took it, Swift might perhaps have replied that it was a very comfortable maxim—for the ungodly. His own application of Scripture is different. It tells us, he says, in his proposal for using Irish manufactures, that 'oppression makes a wise man mad'. If, therefore, some men are not mad, it must be because they are not wise. In truth, it is characteristic of Swift that he could never learn the great lesson of submission even to the inevitable. His rage, which could find no better outlet, burnt inwardly and drove him mad.—LESLIE STEPHEN'S Swift, pp. 165, 166.

COMPARE STERNE'S Sermons (No. XXXIII.).

REFERENCES.—VIII. 11.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 367. VIII. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 1487. VIII. 16.—A. W. Momerie, Agnosticism, p. 252.

'There is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked.'—ECCLESIASTES IX. 2.

It is verbally true, that in the sacred Scriptures it is written: As is the good, so is the sinner, and he that sweareth as he that feareth an oath. A man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, drink, and be merry, etc. But he who should repeat these words, and this assurance, to an ignorant man in the hour of his temptation, lingering at the door of an ale-house, or hesitating as to the testimony required of him in the court of justice, would, spite of this verbal truth, be a liar, and the murderer of his brother's conscience.—COLERIDGE, The Friend, v.

REFERENCES.—IX. 3.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 64. IX. 7, 8.—J. Keble, Sermons for Ascension Day to Trinity Sunday, p. 315. J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 334. IX. 8.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Common Life Religion, p. 117. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. ii. p. 228.

'Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of thy vanity.'—ECCLESIASTES IX. 9.

Do you know what it is to love and to be loved? Do you know—not by hearsay merely, but by experience—this absorption of the life of one human being in another, the one man in the one woman, the one woman in the one man? For the time they, each to each, alike the centre and the sum, the very end and purpose of creation; the rest vague, phantasmal—they, each to each, the only abiding reality. For the time they, each through the other, possessors and interpreters of all things; this immense universe a setting merely, the sights and sounds, the glory and wonder of it, but ministers to their delight in one another. For them stars rise and set, and the wheat waves under the summer wind. For them the sea grows white westward, at evening, meeting the sky in long embrace. For them all fair pictures are painted; all songs sung; and even common things become instinct with a strange sacramental grace. For them the oracles are no longer dumb, the mysteries lie open, they walk with the gods.

This is the crown and triumph of the riddle of sex; wherein, for the time, the long torment, shame, and anguish of it is forgotten, so that man's curse becomes, for the time, his most exquisite blessing—a blessing in which body and spirit equally participate.—LUCAS MALET.

It is not by renouncing the joys which lie close to us that we shall grow wise. As we grow wise, we unconsciously abandon the joys that now are beneath us.—MAETERLINCK.

SEE also MARK RUTHERFORD'S Autobiography, p. 8 (Preface to second edition), and R. L. STEVENSON'S lines on 'The Celestial Surgeon' (in Underwoods).

'I SHALL marry Charlotte, we shall live here together all our lives and die here,' thought Barnabas, as he went up the hill. 'I shall lie in my coffin in the north room, and it will all be over.' But his heart leaped with joy. He stepped out proudly like a soldier in a battalion.'—M. E. WILKINS in Pembroke.

THE LAPSE OF TIME

'Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest.'—ECCLESIASTES IX. 10.

LIFE is ever crumbling away under us. What should we say to a man, who was placed on some precipitous ground, which was ever crumbling under his feet, and affording less and less secure footing, yet was careless about it? Or what should we say to one who suffered some precious liquor to run from its receptacle into the thoroughfare of men, without a thought to stop it? who carelessly looked on and saw the waste of it, becoming greater and greater every minute? But what treasure can equal time? It is the seed of eternity: yet we suffer ourselves to go on, year after year, hardly using it at all in God's service, or thinking it enough to give Him at most a tithe or a seventh of it, while we strenuously and heartily sow to the flesh, that from the flesh we may reap corruption. We try how little we can safely give to religion, instead of having the grace to give abundantly.—J. H. NEWMAN.

ECCLESIASTES IX. 10.

NOBLE, upright, self-relying Toil! who that knows thy solid worth and value, would be ashamed of thy hard hands, and thy obscure tasks, thy humble cottage, and hard couch, and homely fare! Save for thee and thy lessons, man in society would everywhere sink into a sad compound of the fiend and the wild beast; and this fallen world would be as certainly a moral as a natural wilderness. But I little thought of the excellence of thy character and of thy teachings, when, with a heavy heart, I set out on a morning of early spring, to take my first lesson from thee in a sandstone quarry.—HUGH MILLER, My Schools and Schoolmasters, chap. VIII.

'Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work . . . in the grave, whither thou goest.'—ECCLESIASTES IX. 10.

I LIE down on my child's grave and fill my mouth with the clay, and say nothing. . . . But then, dear Mosley, do not think that I do not react under the stroke: I am not merely passive. This is my action. Death teaches me to act thus—to cling with tenfold tenacity to those that remain. A man might, indeed, argue thus. The pain of separation from those we love is so intense that I will not love, or, at least, I will withdraw myself into a delicate suspension of bias, so that when the time comes I may not feel the pang, or hardly feel it. This would be the economical view, and a sufficiently base one. But I am taught by death to run the fullest flood into my family relations. The ground is this. He is gone: I have no certain ground whatever for expecting that that relation can be renewed. Therefore, I am thankful that I actualized it intensely, ardently, and effectually, while it existed; and now I will do the same for what is left to me; nay, I will do much more; for I did not do enough. He and I might have been intertwined a great deal more, and that we were not appears to me now a great loss. In this, as in everything else, I accept the words of the Ecclesiast—'What thine hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for'—you know the rest.—Letters of T. H. BROWN, vol. I. pp. 88, 89.

'Do it with thy might.'—ECCLESIASTES IX. 10.

HIS career was one of unbroken shame. He did not drink, he was exactly honest, he was never rude to his employers, yet he was everywhere discharged. Bringing no interest to his duties, he brought no attention; his day was a tissue of things neglected and things done amiss; and from place to place and from town to town he carried the character of one thoroughly incompetent.—R. L. STEVENSON, The Ebb Tide, I.

SEE RUSKIN'S Lectures on Art, p. 86.

HERE on earth we are as soldiers, fighting in a foreign land, that understand not the plan of the campaign, and have no need to understand it; seeing well what is at our hand to be done. Let us do it like soldiers, with submission, with courage, with a heroic joy. Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might.—CARLYLE.

REFERENCES.—IX. 10.—Penny Pulpit, No. 1605, p. 239. W. Brock, Midsummer Morning Sermons, p. 155. H. M. Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 398. J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, vol. vii. p. 1. C. Bosanquet, Blossoms for the King's Garden, p. 125. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 259. Ibid. vol. xix. No. 1119. IX. 10, 11.—J. C. M. Bellew, Sermons, vol. iii. p. 35.

'The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong.'—ECCLESIASTES IX. 11.

BETWEEN unarmed men the battle is to the strong, where the strong is no blunderer.—GEORGE ELIOT.

BORROW, writing in Lavengro of his father's abilities and misfortunes, declares that, 'with far inferior qualifications many a man has become a field-marshal or general . . . but the race is not always for the swift, nor the battle for the strong; indeed, I ought rather to say very seldom; certain it is that my father, with all his high military qualifications, never became emperor, field-marshal, or even general'.

SEE JOWETT'S College Sermons, pp. 244 f.

THE RACE NOT TO THE SWIFT

'I returned, and saw under the sun, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong.'—ECCLESIASTES IX. 11.

I. ONE of the favourite words of Dr. John Brown—the gentle author of Rab and His Friends—one of the words that was often on his lips was the word unexpectedness. And as we look on the men whom we have known since childhood, and whose lives we have watched unrolling in the years, there are very few of us who cannot discern that unexpected element.

(a) We may trace our text through all kinds of achievement. You have but to think of the books by which we live, or of those lives of thought or action which are our richest heritage, to be face to face with the incalculable element which lies in the Divine method of surprise. There is a hand at work we cannot stay, and it hath exalted those of low degree.

(b) Our text has singular significance in that universal search, the search for happiness. It is not those who have most to make them happy who always prove themselves the happy people.

And this is conspicuously true of Jesus Christ, the Man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief. I like sometimes to contrast the Man of Nazareth with the Emperor who was reigning then, Tiberius.

(c) Our text applies to the spiritual life, for not many wise, not many mighty are called. God hath chosen the weak things of the world to bring to naught those that are strong in battle. I know no sphere in human life where the element of unexpectedness so largely enters as in the sphere that we call spiritual, and in the movements and changes of the soul.

II. Let me suggest to you some of the moral values of this truth: (1) It is mighty to keep us from discouragement, and to cheer us when the lights are burning dim. It gives a chance to mediocre people, to commonplace and undistinguished thousands, when above all might and brilliance is a power that has a way of working to unexpected ends. (2) It is meant to wean us from all pride, and to keep us watchful, humble, and dependent. (3) It clears the ground for God, and leaves a space to recognize Him in. If the strongest were sure of triumph in every battle there would be little room on the field for the Divine. Just because He reigns, the battle is not always to the strong. — G. H. MORRISON, The Wings of the Morning, p. 66.

REFERENCES.—IX. 11-18.—T. C. Finlayson, A Practical Exposition of Ecclesiastes, p. 213. R. Buchanan, Ecclesiastes: its Meaning and Lessons, p. 344. IX. 12.—S. A. Brooke, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 178.

'Yet no man remembered that same poor man.'—ECCLESIASTES IX. 14, 15.

HERE the corruption of states is set forth, that esteem not virtue or merit longer than they have use of it. —BACON.

SEE SPENSER'S Ruines of Time, p. 422 f. Also ADDISON in The Spectator (No. 464).

SCHOPENHAUER somewhere observes that 'people in general have eyes and ears, but not much else—little judgment and even little memory. There are many services to the State quite beyond the range of their understanding.'

REFERENCE.—IX. 14, 15.—J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 97. S. Baring-Gould, One Hundred Sermon-Sketches, p. 95. X. 1.—Ibid. p. 10. X. 7.—Spurgeon, Morning by Morning, p. 140.

FENCES AND SERPENTS

'Whoso breaketh an hedge, a serpent shall bite him.'—ECCLESIASTES X. 8.

ANY attempt to transgress the laws of life which God has enjoined is sure to bring out the hissing snake with its poison.

I. All life is given us rigidly walled up. The walls are blessings, like the parapet on a mountain road, that keeps the traveller from toppling over the face of the cliff.

II. Every attempt to break down these limitations brings poison into the life. Some serpents' bites inflame, some paralyse; and either an inflamed or a palsied conscience is the result of all wrongdoing.

III. All the poison may be got out of your veins if you like. When Moses lifted up the serpent the people had but to look upon it to be cured.—A. MACLAREN, The Freeman, 13 April, 1888.

REFERENCES.—X. P.—G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 345. A. MacLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 372.

'The lips of a fool will swallow up himself . . . and the end of his talk is mischievous madness.'—ECCLESIASTES X. 12 f.

No world, or thing here below, ever fell into misery without having first fallen into folly.—CARLYLE.

THE incendiary and his kindling combustibles had been already sketched by Solomon with the rapid yet faithful outline of a master in the art: The beginning of the words of his mouth is foolishness and the end of his talk mischievous madness. If in the spirit of prophecy the wise ruler had been present to our own times and their procedures; if while he sojourned in the valley of vision he had actually heard the very harangues of our reigning demagogues to the convened populace; could he have more faithfully characterized either the speakers or the speeches? Whether in spoken or in printed addresses, whether in periodical journals or in yet cheaper implements of irritation, the ends are the same, the process is the same, and the same is their general line of conduct. On all occasions, but most of all and with a more bustling malignity whenever any public distress inclines the lower classes to turbulence and renders them more apt to be alienated from the government of their country—in all places and at every opportunity pleading to the poor and ignorant, nowhere and at no time are they found actually pleading for them. —COLERIDGE.

I HAVE seen wicked men and fools, a great many of both; and I believe they both get paid in the end, but the fools first.—R. L. STEVENSON.

'A fool also multiplieth words.'—ECCLESIASTES X. 14.

A LARGE number of people seem to be conscious of existence only when they are making a noise.—SCHOPENHAUER.

REFERENCE.—X. 15.—A. MacLaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 381.

'Curse not the king, no not in thy thought; and curse not the rich in thy bedchamber: for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter.'
—ECCLESIASTES X. 20.

At Siena I was tabled in the house of one Alberto Scipioni, an old Roman courtier, in dangerous times. . . . At my departure for Rome I had won confidence enough to beg his advice how I might carry myself securely there, without offence of others, or of mine own conscience. 'Signor Arrigo mio,' says he, 'pensieri stretti ed il viso sciolto (thoughts close, countenance open) will go safely over the whole world.'—SIR HENRY WOTTON to Milton.

In The Life of a Scottish Probationer (p. 114) there is an extract from a sermon preached by Thomas Davidson to the troops at Aldershot, which opens thus:—

'Over the entrance of a very old house in an ancient Scottish town, I read, not long ago, the following inscription:—

Since word is thrall and thought is free,
Keep well thy tongue, I counsel thee;

that is to say, "Speech is liable to criticism, and may bring you into trouble; be wise and careful, therefore, in the exercise of it". The inscription, however, gathers additional significance from the fact that the house in question stands within a hundred yards of a royal residence, and must have been built at a time when a more stringent law of treason rendered it very dangerous to make very free, even in the most private of conversations, with anything appertaining to constituted authority.'

REFERENCE.—XI.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2264.

SOWING AND REAPING

'Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days.'—ECCLESIASTES XI. 1.

By general consent the primary reference of the text is to the Egyptian custom of scattering seed upon the oozy soil formed by the overflowing of the Nile. To the thoughtful mind there is a remarkable resemblance between the laws of the physical and the moral harvest:—

I. The Natural Harvest.—The golden grain once more gathered in reveals:—

(a) The power of God. Think of the vast machinery that He employs to produce our daily bread.

(b) The wisdom of God. The electric telegraph, the steam engine, and all the other wonderful inventions of men are clumsy when compared with the skill of God in rearing a stalk of corn.

(c) The goodness of God. Every autumn the race is within a month of starvation. But though so near the end of our food supplies we have never passed or even reached the verge of universal famine. Seed time and harvest have never failed.

II. The Spiritual Harvest.—We will look at the same three aspects of the Lord's work in the moral world:—

(a) The power of God. Never doubt who grasps the sceptre. 'The Lord reigneth.' Neither let us fret or despair because we think the kingdom of God is spreading slowly.

(b) The wisdom of God has its supreme manifestation in the plan of salvation. Christ is the only founder of a religious system who does not speak with a provincial accent, because he is a teacher sent from God. In Christ are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

(c) The goodness of God. He delighteth not in the death of the wicked. He will love all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth.

'Cast thy bread upon the waters. . . . Give a portion to seven and also to eight.'—ECCLESIASTES XI. 1, 2.

It is 'Cast thy bread upon the waters'. All we can do is to cast the bread. The waters run and sway to and fro, and swallow the bread. But we have nothing to do but to cast it. 'In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand, for thou knowest not which shall prosper.' And we have nothing to do but sow. Fifty years of preaching seems like fifty years of beating the air; yet every Truth has a vitality like a grain of corn. And though we never may know it, many a Truth strikes root.—CARDINAL MANNING.

REFERENCE.—XI. 1.—J. Hamilton, The Royal Preacher, p. 197. T. C. Finlayson, A Practical Exposition of Ecclesiastes, p. 239. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 325. E. A. Askew, Sermons Preached in Greystoke Church, p. 225. XI. 1-6.—R. Buchanan, Ecclesiastes: its Meaning and Lessons, p. 391.

'He that regardeth the clouds shall not reap.'—ECCLESIASTES XI. 4.

We ought to gather in souls as the farmer gathers under a lowering sky in autumn, believing that the storm may next day rush down upon his fields.—A. A. BONAR.

THE man who will not work becomes an astrologer.—ARABIAN PROVERB.

THERE is no greater impediment of action than an over-curious observance of decency, and the guide of decency, which is time and season. For, as Solomon saith, He that observeth the wind shall not sow: a man must make his opportunity as oft as find it.—BACON.

SEE also BACON'S Essays, LII.

WEATHER-WISE

'He that observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the cloud shall not reap.'—ECCLESIASTES XI. 4.

WORK was once the recreation of Paradise; it is now the stern necessity of daily life. It is the tax we pay for life.

I. The text exhibits the indolent and undecided.

(a) Inaction may spring from indolence.

(b) Spiritual idleness prevails.

(c) Excessive prudence—may apply to some churches, to spiritual prospects, to conversion of individuals.

II. Folly seen when we consider that the present alone is ours. God is frugal of time; gives but one moment at a time; does not give a second until He withdraws the first. The best way to prepare for the last moment is to use the present well.

III. Regularity of nature encourages the farmer, but it may mislead those who think that length of day must be theirs, that gracious opportunity must come with constancy of the seasons. God has a right to set bounds beyond which we cannot pass.—J. R. GREGORY, Harvest and Thanksgiving Services, p. 192.

THE FAULT OF OVER-PRUDENCE

'He that observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap.'—ECCLESIASTES XI. 4.

JUST as a man may fail through too much zeal, so may a man fail through too much prudence.

I. Apply our text to the important matter of our bodily health. If a man is always thinking of his health, the chances are he will have a sorry harvest. I am not speaking of reasonable care; I am speaking of morbid and worrying anxiety.

II. Apply our text to the difficulties that beset our daily work, for we may so fix our eyes upon these difficulties that all the strength is taken from the arm. Genius is prodigal, and scatters its pearls abroad; genius, like childhood, is equal to its problem. It is men of the one talent and mediocre mind who are tempted to the sin of over-prudence. I have known so many average men who failed, because they were waiting for an impossible perfection.

III. Apply our text to moral effort, and to the battles we fight against besetting sins. Sometimes in such hours we fail through recklessness, but far more often through some over-prudence. There are times when it is folly to observe the winds. There are times when it is madness to regard the clouds. Past failures—all that your friends may say—'What is that to thee? Follow thou Me.' In all high venture there is a glorious blindness—blindness to everything except the beckoning hand.

IV. Our text has notable application in the great work of national reform. A certain disregard of obvious difficulties, and all that would discourage lesser spirits, has ever been one mark of great reformers whether in the Church or in the State.

It is an easy thing to make fun of the enthusiast who is so terribly in earnest that he is not wise. But I will tell you the man who is a thousand times more fatal to any cause in Church and State than the enthusiast, and that is the man who always eyes the clouds and spends his days in shrinking from the wind.

V. Apply our text to the great matter of decision for Christ Jesus. Think of Peter when he walked upon the sea to get to Christ. 'Lord, if it be Thou, bid me come to Thee,' and Jesus across the water cried to Peter, 'Come'; whereupon Peter leaped out of the ship and walked upon the water to his Lord. Then he regarded the clouds—how the wild rack was flying! He observed the wind—how boisterous it was!—and so observing, he began to sink, and had to cry, 'Lord, save me, or I perish'.—G. H. MORRISON, The Wings of the Morning, p. 207.

Illustration.—When told that Duke George of Saxony was lying in wait for him, 'I would go,' said Luther, 'if it rained Duke Georges'. When told that the devil would catch him if he went to the diet, 'I would go if there were as many devils in Worms as there are tiles upon the housetops'. The winds were bitter and the clouds black as midnight, and Luther sowed and reaped because he disregarded them.—G. H. MORRISON, The Wings of the Morning, p. 218.

REFERENCES.—XI. 4.—J. Bateman, Sermons Preached in Guernsey, p. 223. J. L. Richardson, Sermons for Harvest, p. 76. H. P. Liddon, Old Testament Outlines, p. 163. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2264. XI. 6.—Spurgeon, Evening by Evening, p. 236. XI. 6-10.—Ibid. Sermons, vol. lii. No. 3001.

'Truly the light is sweet.'—ECCLESIASTES XI. 7.

BESIDE this passage one may set the conversation between Lavengro and Mr. Petulengro, the gipsy, in the twenty-fifth chapter of Borrow's Lavengro :—

'Life is sweet, brother.'

'Do you think so?'

'Think so!—There's night and day, brother, both sweet things; sun, moon, and stars, brother, all sweet things; there's likewise a wind on the heath. Life is very sweet, brother; who would wish to die? Wish to die, indeed! A Rommany chal would wish to live for ever.'

'In sickness, Jasper?'

'There's the sun and stars, brother.'

'In blindness, Jasper?'

'There's the wind on the heath, brother; if I could only feel that, I would gladly live for ever.'

'A pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun.'—
ECCLESIASTES XI. 7.

'A PLEASANT thing it is to behold the sun,' these first Gothic builders would seem to have said to themselves; and at Amiens, for instance, the walls have disappeared; the entire building is composed of its windows.—PATER's Miscellaneous Studies, p. 110.

THE great sunlit square is silent—silent, that is, for the largest city on earth. A slumberous silence of abundant light, of the full summer day, of the high flood of summer hours whose tide can rise no higher. A time to linger and dream under the beautiful breast of heaven, heaven brooding and descending in pure light upon man's handiwork. If the light shall thus come in, and of its mere loveliness overcome every aspect of dreariness, why shall not the light of thought, and hope—the light of the soul—overcome and sweep away the dust of our lives?—RICHARD JEFFERIES, Sunlight in a London Square.

REFERENCE.—XI. 7.—S. Gregory, How to Steer a Ship, p. 126.

'Let him remember the days of darkness.'—ECCLESIASTES XI. 8. DEAN STANLEY 'told me that except the phrase ἡλίου δύστρος αἰγροῖς he could hardly remember an instance in which a classical writer referred to the setting sun; the fact was, that they disliked the idea of sunset, and recoiled from the end of everything. Whether he was right—nay, whether he was quite serious in this opinion, I am not certain. At any rate, in modern as well as in ancient times, the finifugal tendency, as we may call it, is apparent. It takes manifold forms and disguises. It is especially noticeable in friends who, like Shelley, have a morbid abhorrence of wishing one good-bye; who feel this abhorrence strongly in proportion as they like one, and are fearful that they will never see one again; and who, though truthful in other matters, will resort to any evasion or artifice to throw dust in one's eyes as to the day of their departure.—TOLLEMACHE'S Safe Studies, p. 374.

'Let him remember the days of darkness. . . . For all these things God will bring thee into judgment.'—ECCLESIASTES XI. 8 f.

'Would you judge of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of pleasure,' she said, 'take this rule: whatever weakens your reason, impairs the tenderness of your conscience, obscures your sense of God, or takes off the relish of spiritual things;—in short, whatever increases the strength and authority of your body over your mind, that thing is sin to you, however innocent it may be in itself.' Well might Wesley consult upon such questions a mother who was capable of reasoning and writing thus. His father expressed a different opinion: 'All men,' he said, 'were apt to verge towards extremes, but mortification was still an indispensable Christian duty. If the young man will rejoice in his youth, let him take care that his joys are innocent; this, only this, remember, that for all these things God will bring him into judgment.'—SOUTHEY'S Life of Wesley.

THE old rigid order in Greece breaks down; a new power appears on the scene. It is the Athenian genius, with its freedom from restraint, its flexibility, its bold reason, its keen enjoyment of life. Well, let it try what it can do. Up to a certain point it is clearly in the right; possibly it may be in the right altogether. Let it have free play, and show what it can do. In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand; for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good. Whether the old wine is good, or the new wine, or whether they are both of them good, and must both of them be used, cannot be known without trying. Let the Athenians try, therefore, and let their genius have full swing. 'Rejoice; walk in the ways of thine heart and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.' In other words, your enjoyment of life, your freedom from restraint, your clear and bold reason, your flexibility, are natural and excellent; but on condition that you know how to live with them, that you make a real success of them.—M. ARNOLD (Speech at Eton).

'Rejoice, . . . but remember.'—ECCLESIASTES XI. 9-XII. 1.

WHEN I first entered Ranelagh, it gave an expansion and gay sensation to my mind, such as I never experienced anywhere else. But . . . it went to my heart to consider that there was not one in all that brilliant circle that was not afraid to go home and think.—JOHNSON to Boswell.

COMPARE Rasselas, xvi.

WE have got a new family life, which is infinitely genial and charming and natural, which gives free vent to the feelings, and cares liberally for culture and advancement in life. Only the sense of obligation, of duty to God, of living forward into eternity, has disappeared.—C. H. PEARSON.

SEE JOWETT'S College Sermons, pp. 133 f.

REFERENCES.—XI. 9.—J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 381. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 391.

'Remove sorrow from thy heart.'—ECCLESIASTES XI. 10.

WE are grateful to anyone who reminds us that there is nothing especially meritorious in gloom. Virtue will not be its own reward unless we have the honesty to admit that we have not given up anything much pleasanter for its sake. Un saint triste est un triste saint. (The nearest thing in English may perhaps be 'a sad saint is a sorry saint'.) Apparently, too, people are apt to forget that cheerfulness of mind is a habit which requires cultivation like any other.—From The Spectator, 27 August, 1904, p. 281.

COMPARE DANTE'S Inferno, VII. 121 f.

REFERENCES.—XII.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2264. Ibid. vol. I. No. 3001.

'Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 1.

SAMUEL RUTHERFORD, in some letters addressed to young Scotchmen, often enlarges on this idea. 'A young man is often a dressed lodging for the devil to dwell in.' 'I know that missive letters go between the devil and young blood. Satan hath a friend at court in the heart of youth; and there pride, luxury, lust, revenge, forgetfulness of God, are hired agents.' 'Youth ordinarily is a fast and ready servant for Satan to run errands.' 'Believe it, my lord,'—this in a letter to a young Scottish nobleman—'it is hardly credible what a nest of dangerous temptations youth is; how inconsiderate, foolish, proud, vain, heady, rash, profane, and careless of God, this piece of your life is. . . . For then affections are on horseback, lofty and stirring, and therefore, oh, what a sweet couple, what a glorious yoke are youth and grace, Christ and a young man! This is a meeting not to be found in every town.'

KINGSLEY, in North Devon, describing the wreck of a ship on the Hartland Cliffs, tells of the sad records found in her log-book. 'Notice after notice, "on this day such an one died," "on this day such an one was washed away"—the log kept up to the last, even when there was only that to tell, by the stern, business-like merchant skipper, whoever he was; and how at last, when there was neither food nor water, the strong man's heart seemed to have quailed, or, perhaps, risen with a prayer, jotted down in the log, "The Lord have mercy on us!"—and then a blank of several pages, and, scribbled with a famine-shaken hand, "Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth"—and so the log and the ship were left to the rats, which covered the deck when our men boarded her.'

'While the evil days come not.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 1.

I HAVE made a sketch of a golden twelve-rayed sun with the clock in the centre. The rays correspond to the hours, and in each of the golden points a word is painted in Gothic letters. Here they are as they stand in succession: I. we begin, II. we want, III. we learn, IIII. we obey, V. we love, VI. we hope, VII. we search, VIII. we suffer, IX. we wait, X. we forgive, XI. we resign, XII. we end. The advancing handle marks the hour and its word, and there is many a one we should like to pass quickly by, so as to tarry longer at others—but we must accept all the hours, the good and the bad ones, as they follow each other on life's inexorable great clock.—The Letters Which Never Reached Him, p. 206.

SEE JOWETT'S College Sermons, pp. 1 f.

REFERENCES.—XII. 1.—W. Brock, Midsummer Morning Sermons, p. 68. XII. 1, 2.—W. H. Simcox, The Cessation of Prophecy, p. 201. XII. 1, 6, 7.—J. M. C. Bellew, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 289. XII. 1-7, 13, 14.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ecclesiastes, p. 402.

'The clouds return after the rain.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 2.

THINGS are alive, and the life at the heart of them, that keeps them going, is the great, beautiful God. So the sun returns for ever after the clouds. A doubting man, like him who wrote Ecclesiastes, puts the evil last, and says the clouds return after the rain; but the Christian knows that One has mastery who makes the joy the last in every song.—GEORGE MACDONALD.

'The sound of the grinding is low.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 3, 4.

AFTER the water-skins a pair of mill-stones is the most necessary husbandry in an Arabian household. To grind their corn is the housewives' labour; and the dull rumour of the running mill-stones is as it were a comfortable voice of food in an Arabian village, when in the long sunny hours there is often none other human sound. The drone of mill-stones may be heard before the daylight in the nomad menzils.—DOUGHTY'S Arabia Deserta, II. p. 180.

'Man goeth to his long home.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 5.

SOLOMON saith, Man goeth to his long home. Short preparation will not fit so long a journey. O let me not put it off till the last, to have my oil to buy, when I am to burn it, but let me so dispose of myself, that when I am to die I may have nothing to do but to die.—THOMAS FULLER.

REFERENCES.—XII. 5.—E. A. Askew, Sermons Preached in Greystoke Church, p. 156. D. Swing, American Pulpit of To- day, vol. i. p. 205. J. M. Neale, Sermons for Some Feast Days in the Christian Year, p. 177.

THE INDIVIDUALITY OF THE SOUL

'The spirit shall return unto God Who gave it.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 7.

SURVEY some populous town: crowds are pouring through the streets; some on foot, some in carriages; while the shops are full, and the houses too, could we see into them. Every part of it is full of life. Hence we gain a general idea of splendour, magnificence, opulence, and energy. But what is the truth? why, that every being in that great concourse is his own centre and all things about him are but shades, but a 'vain shadow,' in which he 'walketh and disquieteth himself in vain'. He has his own hopes and tears, desires, judgments, and aims; he is everything to himself, and no one else is really anything. No one outside of him can really touch him, can touch his soul, his immortality; he must live with himself for ever. He has a depth within him unfathomable, an infinite abyss of existence; and the scene in which he bears part for the moment is but like a gleam of sunshine upon its surface. When we read history, we meet with accounts of great slaughters and massacres, great pestilences, famines, conflagrations, and so on; and here again we are accustomed in an especial way to regard collections of people as if individual units. We cannot understand that a multitude is a collection of immortal souls. I say immortal souls: each of those multitudes, not only had while He was upon earth, but has a soul, which did in its own time but return to God who gave it, and not perish, and which now lives unto Him. All those millions upon millions of human beings who ever trod the earth and saw the sun successively, are at this very moment in existence all together. . . . We may recollect when children, perhaps, once seeing a certain person, and it is almost like a dream to us now that we did. It seems like an accident which goes and is all over, like some creature of the moment, which has no existence beyond it. The rain falls, and the wind blows; and showers and storms have no existence beyond the time when we felt them; they are nothing in themselves. But if we have but once seen any child of Adam, we have seen an immortal soul. It has not passed away as a breeze or sunshine, but it lives; it lives at this moment in one of those many places, whether of bliss or misery, in which all souls are reserved until the end.—J. H. NEWMAN.

THE TWO RETURNS

'Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God Who gave it.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 7.

THE book of Ecclesiastes has been described as the 'confession of a man of wide experience, looking back upon his past life, and looking out upon the disorders and calamities which surround him'.

The subject of the paragraph is the wisdom of remembering God in youth. A lively picture is drawn of the infirmities and incapacities of old age, as the best of reasons why the great 'remembering' should not be deferred till that part of life. Let us consider the great end which is before each of us—an end in which each must be alone—an end which is also a beginning. The fact of death, the corporeal fact, is full of significance, and should never be frowned away. If this fact were pondered over, if it even were rehearsed to ourselves morning by morning, it would cause some alterations in the habits which we allow, and in the lives which we live. It is, however, the other half of the text which gives the chief solemnity even to this. If the whole of dying were just the getting rid of the mortal then there would be no positive 'sting' in death. But 'the spirit must return unto God who gave it'. It is commonly said that the Old Testament has no revelation of immortality. What can we say of the text? Is it consistent with the dream of extinction, of absorption, of annihilation? Why not say then at once, dust and spirit together shall return to earth as they were? This we say—that no saint of God from first days till latest was ever left destitute of the instinct of immortality.

I. The spirit. It is one half of us. It contains the 'willing' of which the body does the 'running'. This spirit is God's gift. Angel, I must be, or else devil, in virtue of this gift.

II. The return. The spirit has to go back to its Giver. It was not for Solomon to enter into niceties and subtleties such as those of the intermediate state, the Hades, between death and resurrection. Enough for him to see the 'return'.

III. The receiver. 'To God Who gave it.' That spirit as it came from God's hand was not necessitated to evil. In what state, of what colour does it return? Oh, to think of carrying all this filth into heaven! to think of going back to the Father of Spirits with that lie, with that lust black and hideous upon thee! It is this which frightens and confounds us. The Gospel of our Lord does not leave us in despair: 'Come unto Me,' I will save, My rod and staff shall support.—C. J. VAUGHAN, The Clerical Library, vol. II. p. 165.

REFERENCES.—XII. 7.—W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 1319. J. C. M. Bellow, Sermons, vol. III. p. 81.

THE PESSIMISTIC AND OPTIMISTIC VIEWS OF LIFE

'Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher, all is vanity.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 8.

'Jesus saith, I am come that ye might have life and might have it more abundantly.'—JOHN X. 10.

THESE two texts, one of the Old Testament and one of the New, mark very pointedly the eternal contrast between the two ways of life possible to man, the one way darkened with the riddle of an inscrutable mystery, the other brightened with the Gospel message of a coming King.

I. 'What is the plan of life,' men ask its purpose, its aim? And to that riddle of the Sphinx there are always two answers. 'There is no plan,' cries the old Jewish sceptic. 'Life itself, human life, is but a grim game of chance played by a silent angel who seems to play with loaded dice.' In the end the dust is laid upon us; we go down into the darkness of the tomb and all is soundless and silent. And on the other hand, there is the Gospel answer of joy and hope and victory. Christ has come that we might have life, and might have it more abundantly. God has a plan for the world in Christ, a great educational plan by which both the perfection of the individual and the perfection of the race is to be accomplished. To the dark riddle of life, which is the true answer?

II. There are few more tragic books in all sacred literature than the book of Ecclesiastes, in which the old Jewish sage preaches to mankind his sad and mournful sermon. We know how, in his later life, he had fallen from his great estate, and to gratify his passion and pride had outraged the most sacred ordinances, neglected the most sacred duties that can cluster round life. It is at that time, when the bloom of purity and grace had gone out of him, when his sin had made him blind to his blessings of nature, and home, and God, and his bad life had drawn bad men towards him and driven good men away, when his relation to women is such as to drive him from the presence of such pure and noble women as, thank God, never failed out of the world—it is then that Solomon is represented as writing his cynical estimate of God and nature, life and death, men and women. Some centuries after this first sad sermon upon the meaning of life was written, there came to that same land and people another teacher born, it was said, after the flesh of the same royal line as the first, and upon Him as upon His earthly ancestor long before it was laid to preach upon the same mighty theme. That sermon as you know is handed down to us, and the distance between the two sermons bridges the whole distance between the two great estimates of life taught on this side by Jesus and on that by Solomon. Take the kernel of each in a representative sentence. 'Vanity of vanities, all is vanity,' cries the first preacher. 'Blessed are the poor, blessed are the merciful, blessed are the frank and open-hearted, blessed are the hungry for justice, blessed are the forgiving, blessed are the pure, blessed are the peacemakers, blessed are the sufferers for right,' says the second.

III. It is possible of course to regard the teaching of Jesus under very many different aspects, but if you are studying it as a way of life and are putting it into comparison with some such philosophy as that to be found in the book of Ecclesiastes, there are two principles which by and by you will find fundamental in Christ's teaching, and which have absolutely no place in the scheme of the old Jewish sceptic and his modern representatives. Those principles are these: first God has a plan for the world, a great educational plan, by which both the perfection of the individual and the perfection of the race is to be accomplished; secondly God means man to co-operate with him in the working out of the plan.—C. W. STUBBS, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXII. 1907, p. 118.

REFERENCE.—XII. 8-14.—T. C. Finlayson, A Practical Exposition of Ecclesiastes, p. 267.

'He . . . set in order many proverbs.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 9.

THAT which the droning world, chained to appearances, will not allow the realist to say in his own words, it will suffer him to say in proverbs without contradiction. And this law of laws (i.e. Nemesis) which the pulpit, the senate, and the college deny, is hourly preached in all markets and workshops by flight of proverbs, whose teaching is as true and as omnipresent as that of birds and flies.—EMERSON.

REFERENCES.—XII. 9, 10.—R. Buchanan, Ecclesiastes: its Meaning and Lessons, p. 422. J. H. Jowett, Contemporary Pulpit, vol. vi. p. 204.

REQUIREMENTS AND DIFFICULTIES OF THE PREACHER

'The preacher sought to find out acceptable words,' etc.—ECCLESIASTES XII. 10, 11.

THE preacher's work is a serious business for three reasons:—

I. Because it is his duty to speak for God. He is an apostle, a man with a message. He preaches not in his own name. He is one who is sent to declare the counsel of the Most High God. A man may philosophize as much as he pleases, but when he preaches he must speak for God and keep within the horizon of that which is clearly revealed. He is an ambassador. With what fidelity and with what searching of heart, and communion with the Holy Spirit, he should declare in the words of man the counsel of God.

II. Preaching is a serious business, because it is speaking about the interests of the soul. That is a liberal definition of the objects of preaching. The preacher's duty is to convince men of sin and lead them to salvation from sin; and sin of whatever origin ends, unless it is cured, in death, and salvation, wherever it begins to work, brings the gift of God through Jesus Christ, which is eternal life. The preacher must serve His Master rationally, freely, carefully, speaking the truth in love upon every subject that has a bearing upon the welfare of the soul.

III. There are certain difficulties which ought to be remembered. For one thing, preaching has been going on in the world for a long time, and that is a fact which makes absolute originality difficult, if not impossible. And yet there are people who demand originality as if it were more important than the truth. Another difficulty that the preacher has to face is the intense competition of other claims upon the interests of the people. The real thing is the advance, the forward movement, and if it can be done with the joy and courage and inspiration and happiness within you, so much the better, so much the surer.—H. VAN DYKE, Homiletic Review, vol. LII. 1906, p. 461

'The words of the wise are as goads.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 11.

BENTHAM used to declare that his own thoughts were mainly excited by favourite aphorisms and proverbs, such as those of Bacon. These furnished the foundation for his arguments and the stimulus of his ideas and opinions.

SEE Walton's description of Andrew Melville as 'master of a great wit; a wit full of knots and clenches'.

'GIVE me,' says Thomas Fuller, 'such solid reasons whereon I may rest and rely. Solomon saith, The words of the wise are like nails, fastened by the masters of the assembly. A nail is firm, and will hold driving in, and will hold driven in. Send me such arguments.'

THOMAS LOWER also came to visit us, and offered us money, which we refused; accepting his love nevertheless. He asked us many questions concerning our denying the Scriptures to be the Word of God; and concerning the sacraments, and such like; to all which he received satisfaction. I spoke particularly to him, and he afterwards said my words were as a flash of lightning, they ran so through him. He said he never met with such men in his life, for they knew the thoughts of his heart, and were as wise as the master-builders of the assemblies, that fastened their words like nails. He came to be convinced of the truth and remains a Friend to this day.—GEORGE FOX'S Journal, 1656.

A COLLECTION of anecdotes and maxims is of the highest value to the man of the world, if he knows how to introduce the one clearly into his conversation at the proper moment, and to recall the other when occasion arises.—GOETHE.

THE WORDS OF THE WISE

'The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies, which are given from One Shepherd.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 11.

THE lesson we learn from our text is that God's words are meant to stimulate men and spur them on. In all circumstances of an outward kind men need to be excited into spiritual alacrity. In prosperity a man is apt to say, 'My mountain is strong; I shall not be moved,' as the flocks and herds would linger amid tufts of grass. In adversity, too, men need spiritual stimulus. Adversity is a powerful instrument in God's hands for the spiritual good of man; but in itself it only depresses and unnerves. God in His Providence often steps in and helps men in an outward way, bringing them down from prosperity on the one hand, raising them out of adversity on the other. But His chosen way is rather to spur them on in the midst of untoward circumstances than to remove these. God's favourite work is done in man's soul, and not on his outward path. His words are as goads.

I. Even in regard to intellectual activity, God's words act as goads. The very form of the Bible stirs men out of mental slumber. It speaks in history, prophecy, parable, paradox. It often needs great labour to understand it, to square it with known facts, to harmonize its own utterances. Men rail at this; but, meanwhile, the work intended is done. They are forced to think; and, as is admitted on all hands, the knowledge of the Bible and mental activity are at the present day co-terminous. And in anything like a true revival of religion, one which sends men to their Bibles, intense mental activity ensues.

II. God's words act on men's hopes and fears. They will not let men rest in the present. 'This is not your rest.' Earth is only a wilderness, with the Promised Land at the farther side, a race-course with the goal at the end, a warfare with victory or defeat as the issue. Will ye not be goaded on? This is the short spring in which we must sow. What a man soweth he shall reap. What will be in the end thereof?

III. God's words stir up men by witnessing to their corruptions. We are morally diseased. As the chambers in Ezekiel's vision showed greater and yet greater abominations, so do God's searching words lead us to ever-new and humiliating discoveries in our own heart.

IV. God's words goad on by providing a remedy for our corruptions. It needs the voice of the Deliverer to rouse a people from the base contentment to which despair has brought them. Christ's call is, 'Flee to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope'. Rise, He calleth thee, He Whose voice the very grave obeys. 'Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.'

V. God's words give rest to the soul. 'I will give you rest'—rest from fear; rest in Christ's finished work; rest in God's promises; rest here and for ever.

'Of making many books there is no end; and much reading is a weariness of the flesh.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 12.

Of making many books there is no end, complained the preacher; and did not perceive how highly he was praising letters as an occupation. There is no end, indeed, to making books or experiments, or to travel, or to gathering wealth. Problem gives rise to problem. We may study for ever, and we are never as learned as we would. . . . In the infinite universe there is room for our swiftest diligence, and to spare. It is not like the works of Carlyle, which can be read to an end. Even in a corner of it, in a private park, or in the neighbourhood of a single hamlet, the weather and the seasons keep so deftly changing that although we walk there for a lifetime there will be always something new to startle and delight us.—R. L. STEVENSON, El Dorado.

SOLOMON informs us that much reading is a weariness to the flesh; but neither he, nor other inspired author, tells us that such and such reading is unlawful; yet certainly had God thought good to limit us therein, it had been much more expedient to have told us what was unlawful than what was wearisome.—From MILTON'S Areopagitica.

Much reading deprives the mind of all elasticity; it is like keeping a spring perpetually under pressure.—SCHOPENHAUER.

COMPARE Religio Medici, l. sec. xxiv.

I HAVE never cared much for books, except in so far as they might help to quicken our sense of the reality of life, and enable us to enter into its right and wrong.—F. J. A. HORT.

MORE than thirty years ago I remember meeting on the Surrey downs a remarkable-looking man: one who has been thought to be, as perhaps he was, a great teacher of this and a former generation. Shall I tell you his name? It was Thomas Carlyle. He said to me, 'I am wearied out with the burden of writing, and I am just come to spend a day or two in walking about among the hills'.—JOWETT (in 1885).

It is an uneasy lot, at best, to be what we call highly taught and yet not to enjoy; to be present at this great spectacle of life and never to be liberated from a small, hungry, shivering self—never to be fully possessed by the glory we behold, never to have our consciousness rapturously transformed into the vividness of a thought, the ardour of a passion, the energy of an action, but always to be scholarly and uninspired, ambitious and timid, scrupulous and dim-sighted.—GEORGE ELIOT.

SEE EMERSON'S The American Scholar, II.

'Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 13.

SEE BUTLER'S Sermons, No. xv., at the close, and the last paragraph of Sterne's sermon on Psalm iv. 6, with his sermon (No. xxxix.) on this very text.

'Fear God.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 13.

I HAVE too strong a sense of the value of religion myself not to wish that my children should have so much of it (I speak of feeling, not of creed) as is compatible with reason. I have no ambition for them, and can only further say in the dying words of Julia, n'en faites point de savans—faites-en des hommes bienfaisants et justes.—W. RATHBONE GREG.

'GIL BLAS,' says Kingsley in his Lectures on the Ancien Régime, 'is a collection of diseased specimens. No man or woman in the book, lay or clerical, gentle or simple, as far as I can remember, do their duty in any wise, even if they recollect that they have any duty to do. Greed, chicanery, hypocrisy, uselessness, are the ruling laws of human society. A new book of Ecclesiastes, crying, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," the "conclusion of the whole matter" being left out, and the new Ecclesiast rendered thereby diabolic, instead of like that old one, Divine. For, instead of "Fear God, and keep His commandments, for this is the whole duty of man," Le Sage sends forth the new conclusion, "Take care of thyself and feed on thy neighbours, for that is the whole duty of man." And very faithfully was his advice—easy enough to obey at all times—obeyed for nearly a century after Gil Blas appeared.'

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

'Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter : Fear God, and keep His commandments : for this is the whole duty of man.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 13.

I. The Attributes of the Religious Life.

(a) Holy fear.—'God,' says the Psalmist, 'is greatly to be feared.' This is not a slavish fear, such, for example, as Felix had (Acts xxiv. 25), but a holy affection or gracious habit wrought in the soul by the Spirit of God on its conversion to God. Faith and love strengthen it, and it soon becomes the cardinal passion of the soul. There is no air of misery about it; it so reverences God that it would not displease Him, and hence He looks upon it with approval and delight.

(b) Constant obedience.—Though the soul be free from all condemnation, the moment faith is exercised in Christ, yet from that very moment the believer is bound by the strongest obligations to constant obedience. In fact, he has been freed from the bondage of sin that he might keep God's commandments. And when faith works by love, the duty of obedience is refined into a grace, and the Divine behests are exalted into privileges. Hence they are willingly obeyed; and this is according to God's mind.

II. The Importance of the Religious Life.

(a) Honour and happiness are secured by it.—A good man is 'the highest style of man'; he is one of 'the excellent of the earth,' one of 'a chosen generation,' one of 'a royal priesthood,' one of 'a holy nation,' one of 'a peculiar people'; nay, he is 'an heir of God, a joint-heir with Jesus Christ'. There is no honour equal to this in any world! And the good man is the happiest style of man also. True, he has days of cloud and sadness; but oft-times, when living in holy obedience, spring-tides of joy—'unspeakable and full of glory'—sweep over his soul, and he shares in the bliss of the skies.

(b) This life demands the entire being.—It is indeed 'the whole of man,' all his business on earth; and therefore he gives his full attention to it, consecrating body, soul, and spirit to its interests. It matters little or nothing to him whether he is rich or poor, high or low; but it is a point of transcendent moment with him to 'fear God, and keep His commandments'. This is his Alpha and Omega—his life and his all.

REFERENCES.—XII. 13.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, The Master's Message, p. 125. G. Salmon, Sermons in Trinity College, Dublin, p. 148. J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. I. p. 10. J. Thain Davidson, Talks with Young Men, p. 275.

'For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 14.

'This is the day,' writes Sir Thomas Browne, 'that must make good that great attribute of God, His justice; that must reconcile those unanswerable doubts that torment the wisest understandings; and reduce those seeming inequalities and respective distributions in this world to an equality and recompensive justice in the next. . . . This is the day whose memory hath, only, power to make us honest in the dark, and to be virtuous without a witness.'

REFERENCE.—XII. 14.—J. E. Vaux, Sermon Notes (1st Series), p. 4.

SONG OF SOLOMON

SONG OF SOLOMON THE UNUTTERABLE

'The Song of songs.'—SONG OF SOLOMON I. 1.

'THE Song of songs'—the Song that holds all other songs and makes them poor; the Song that has in it all the notes and all the gamut and all the instruments and all the vocal miracles, with something added. It is that plus quantity that puzzles the algebra of the Church.

I. Take an instance which goes well with 'Song of songs,' 'Holy of holies,' of which we read in Exodus xxvi. 33. In the Authorized Version it is 'the most holy,' in other places it is 'the Holy of holies' as 'the Song of songs,' the upper holiness, the holiest holiness, the holiness that has got rid of the flesh, dropped the accursed body into its proper place, the grave, and got away where every shining star is a chorister, and all the silent heavens are only silent because they have no medium worthy of the purpose of their music. Who can adequately express the holiness of holiness? Who can say beyond what is already known—a still whiter whiteness? There language dies, there the instrument is broken, for it cannot tell the music.

In the Bible language is often sorely put to it. There are many unfinished sentences as well as unfinished thoughts in the Bible. I have never known language, so as to say, so cruelly put to it as in the Bible. All the most musical language is in the Scriptures, yet here and there and again, yea, and oftentimes, language seems to beg the speaker not to drive at such a pace.

II. There are other cases which match 'the Song of songs' and 'the Holy of holies'; notably one in 1 Kings viii. 27—a word that has often lifted me up out of the dust—'The heaven and heaven of heavens'. They are not mere Hebraisms. When a man built his little pillar, we think he only put a number of stones together, but the Hebrew says he 'pillared a pillar'. It was a pillar before he began; there was a pillar in the soul before there was a pillar on the ground. And 'heaven and heaven of heavens' simply represents language at its weakest.

III. Then all is gathered up in the Christ—always. Did Solomon say 'The Song of songs'? I hear another voice greater than Solomon, saying, 'King of kings, Lord of lords'. And they mingle well, these great surges of song—Song of songs, Holy of holies, Heaven of heavens, King of kings, Lord of lords. And what voice was that I heard between? It was a voice that spake of 'joy unspeakable'.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. iv. p. 165.

REFERENCES.—I.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2469; see also vol. xliii. No. 2516. B. J. Snell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. p. 218.

THE KISS OF THE PRINCE OF PEACE

'Let Him kiss me with the kisses of His mouth: for Thy love is better than wine.'—SONG OF SOLOMON I. 2.

So it is that the Bride begins her conversation with that dear Lord: so it is that she utters the first words of that book, in which so many holy souls, now in the joy of their King, have found such singular sweetness and blessing.

And the Song of the Prince of Peace begins fitly: for it commences with the perfect sign of peace and love—namely, a kiss.

I. Notice that word 'Him'. How should we understand it? To whom should we apply it? There is nothing that goes before—nothing that can explain it—nothing, that is, save love. That has a knowledge of its own. That very word 'Him' implies a whole life of affection. It tells where all her thoughts were—it tells to whom it was natural that she should turn. There may come times when outward acts, when especial hours of prayer, are almost impossible. Then, as He would say Himself, 'Let not your heart be troubled; neither let it be afraid'. Only strive so to be His that, almost unconsciously, you are thinking of Him—that every act, whether formally or not, is dedicated to Him—and what matters all the rest? The Bride here makes no long opening—uses no formal words—encumbers herself with no laboured commencement. She is in the heart of her desires at once. 'Let Him kiss me with the kisses of His mouth.'

II. And how boldly she asks for the greatest of all blessings!

As holy men have delighted to remind us, the very mention of a kiss teaches us a great mystery. It implies, not one single motion, but the movement of both lips. And so here. It is because, having one Nature—that of the Godhead—from all eternity, He assumed the other in the womb of the Virgin, that He is able to raise us to the perfection of all blessedness. Able, both in what He did while He walked upon earth, and able in what He does now that He has sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on High. He took our nature, first of all, that He might be able to suffer. He wears it still, that He may be able to sympathize. He assumed it, first of all, because Divinity could not have been nailed to the Cross. He retains it still, that humanity may see itself exalted to the Throne.

III. It is because the Bride knows His love, that she comes before Him with such a petition as this.

What is that kiss for which she thus asks? If we take it as applying to this militant state, to what does it refer so well as to the Sacrament in which He gives you Himself?

But what, when He shall talk with us face to face, as a man talketh to his friend? What, when that Beatific Vision shall be accomplished, of which Satan once told a saint that, only to retain it for as long a time as a hand might open and shut in, he would willingly endure, to all eternity, the pains of all lost souls as well as his own?—J. M. NEALE, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 5.

REFERENCE.—I. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2459.

DRAW ME

(Rogation Sunday)

'Draw me, we will run after Thee. The King hath brought me into His chambers.'—SONG OF SOLOMON I. 4.

HERE is a Rogation text for Rogation Sunday. For now we are about to lose Him Whose presence with us after His Resurrection has been the cause of our Paschal joy. The Forty Days of His triumphal life on earth—of the Lent, if I may so speak, of our gladness—are drawing to an end; and the Church, for the first time, breaks in upon our Easter happiness by those three solemn days in which she listens to His voice—'Ask what I shall do for thee before I be taken away from thee'.

And the bride answers at once: 'Draw me, we will run after Thee'.

I. Notice that she makes no reservation of the manner in which she is to be drawn. 'Lord, if it be Thou, bid me come to Thee upon the water.' When your Lord seems to call you nearer to Himself by a way that is difficult and painful to flesh and blood, ought you not to rejoice in that very difficulty—to be glad of that very pain—because it gives you the opportunity of proving to yourselves and manifesting to Him that whatever it may cost, follow Him you will: that you care not how loud the storm is if He be but walking upon the water; you care not how hard the race is if He be but beckoning to you from the goal?

'Draw me, we will run after Thee.' And there see how beautiful is her humility. As though she were the most wavering of all His followers—the feeblest of all His lambs; as if about her only there was doubt; as if her greater infirmity needed a double portion of help.

II. And why does it continue, 'The King has brought me into His chambers?' Surely for this reason. It is as though she would say that, knowing in some faint degree the happiness of His presence, she longs for its perfection; and, remembering that He has already vouchsafed her an earnest of it, she trusts that He will one day give her its fullness.

III. And then notice that expression 'His chambers': as if here His graces were divided into different kinds, and bestowed in different ways: as if here there were the chamber of audience, when you kneel before Him in your own prayers; the chamber of pardon, when you draw near to Him in Confession; the chamber of His own more immediate Presence, when He gives Himself to you under the form of Bread and Wine. But there are no such divisions there, where He is All in All; where He, at one and the same time, gives Himself wholly; where He no longer in types and figures, under shadows and veils, bestows Himself fully. The chambers built round about the earthly temple were many and various: the temple itself, thus girt in with them, was one.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 19.

REFERENCES.—I. 4.—H. E. Manning, Sermons, p. 388. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2294; vol. xlii. 2461; vol. xlviii. No. 2794. Thomas Spurgeon, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 193. Sir G. R. Fetherston, A Garden Eastward, p. 42. I. 5.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 30. I. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 990; vol. xxxii. No. 1936. S. Martin, Westminster Chapel Sermons, p. 121.

TELL ME WHERE THOU FEDEST

'Tell me, O Thou Whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest, where Thou makest Thy flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of Thy companions?'—SONG OF SOLOMON I. 7.

I. THE title in the prayer shows us how we ought to pray. 'Tell me, O Thou Whom my soul loveth.' If we cannot call the Lord by that name, we cannot go on with the request.

II. What is the request? It is twofold. In the first place, 'Tell me where Thou feedest: in the second Where Thou causest Thy flock to rest at noon?'

1. Where Thou feedest.—That is, where, in the evening—that glorious evening, when, as the Prophet speaks, there shall be light—Thou feedest Thy sheep by the river of the water of life; where Thou foldest them in Thine eternal fold, the fold in which there can be no more danger and no more suffering. That is a request which will not be granted in this world. Therefore the Bride goes on to ask another question:—

2. Where Thou causest Thy flock to rest at noon?—This world—it is a hot, burning noon indeed; and we have to bear the burden and heat of the day in it. But yet here we learn that there is rest in it, if we only knew where to go for it. Rest only for one class—'Thy flock'; rest only in one way—'Thou causest'. For rest is one of those contraries which make up a Christian's life. Join these two texts, 'Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to resist the wiles of the devil. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers;' and 'Peace I leave you, My peace I give unto you'. 'Tell me, O Thou Whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest, where Thou causest Thy flock to rest at noon?' Thy flock—the flock that rests beneath the shadow of that great rock in a weary land. Call to mind how we, wearied, languid, discouraged with ourselves and this world, have such a shelter from the heat in Him Who, as at noonday, hung on the Cross for us. The shadow of that Cross is the place where His flock now rests—where you must rest, too, in the day of this world, if you would have your eternal rest in the glorious evening that remains.

III. It follows—'Why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of Thy companions?' We must not misunderstand the question. It is not, Why should I turn to the flocks of Thy companions, and leave Thine? No: wherever His companions are, there is He in the midst of them. If we join ourselves to them, we join ourselves to Him. But the question is, Why should I be the only one that turns aside, when such innumerable multitudes are following Thee?

'Tell me, O Thou Whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest.' We shall not always have to ask that question. If we have asked it in real earnest here, the time will come when we shall see that more beautiful flock which now lies down in quiet valleys, which now is in the immediate presence of its Shepherd.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 40.

REFERENCES.—I. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 338; vol. xi. No. 636. I. 7, 8.—Ibid. vol. xix. No. 1115. I. 8.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 565.

THE SPIKENARD OF THE BRIDE

'While the King sitteth at His table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof.'—SONG OF SOLOMON I. 12.

I. FIRST we think of that happy penitent who literally was thus privileged to honour the great King—who received Him into her house—who found her blessed station at His feet—who afterwards anointed those feet with the alabaster box of very precious ointment.

But the King still sitteth at His table, and that in more senses than one. That Eternal Marriage Feast has already, in its measure, begun: many happy guests have already entered in thereto, secure now of their own felicity, doubtful only and anxious about ours.

And what in the meanwhile for you? The Bride answers, 'My spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof'. She was not with Him in His immediate presence then; but she could do thus much for Him—thus much she could honour Him: the sweet perfume of her spikenard could rise where she herself could not enter.

II. And what is that spikenard but prayer? But prayer, and of what kind? The coal must be alive and glowing if the fragrance of the incense is to arise: love must be glowing and fervent also if the sacrifice of prayer is to come up before the Heavenly Altar with acceptance. The King was not always at His table. He did not sit down, any more than you can, till He had overcome; and, while He was still carrying on His labour, He left us an example how our spikenard should send forth its sweet savour. He Who, towards the beginning of His ministry, taught us how to pray as to words, and at the end of it taught us how to pray as to manner and thoughts—He Who was then so soon about to be pierced with Five Wounds for us men and for our salvation, in the same night in which He was betrayed, inflicted a five-fold wound on the great enemy by the fivefold virtue of His prayer in the garden.

1. That He was alone. That He shut out even those who were most dear to Him, when He was about thus to send up His prayers to the Father. 'Tarry ye here while I go and pray yonder.'

2. His humility—He fell on His face.

3. His perseverance. He went away again the second and the third time.

4. His earnestness. 'Being in an agony, He prayed more earnestly; and His sweat was as it were great drops of blood, falling down to the ground.'

5. His resignation.

And thus it was in the coldness and stillness of that night, amidst those olive trees in Gethsemane, while even then Judas and his band were issuing from the eastern gate of the city, and crossing the valley of Jehoshaphat, that the King, then about to enter into His last and greatest struggle, prayed for us. That same King, now seated in His glory at the Heavenly Table, would thus have you pray to Him. J. M. NEALE, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 49.

REFERENCES.—I. 13.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 58; see also Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 130. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 552.

RELIGIOUS SOLIDITY

'The beams of our house are cedar.'—SONG OF SOLOMON I. 17.

'The beams of our house are cedar' means that their house is solid and permanent, for, of all woods, cedar was esteemed most solid and durable. Christ says to the Church, 'The beams of our house are cedar'. This is the Church's ideal. Solidity is the great desideratum of life. Solidity is the necessity of religion.

I. Religious Solidity must be the Ideal of the Church.—The Church should be a noble illustration of solidity. We want a cedar-beamed house for our souls. This is now and always the problem of the Church. A house we need, and beams we must have; but they must be solid, for only the solid endures. Quality is the question. Sin, Atonement, Holiness, Eternity: are these the staple teaching of many Church teachers? If they are not, then 'The beams of our house are not cedar'.

II. Religious Solidity must be the Ideal of the Individual.—There is no true solidity in life if it be not religious, and there is no permanent security save in religious solidity.

1. Many life-houses are devoid of cedar beams. Can the atheist say exultantly in all weathers, 'The beams of our house are cedar'? Atheism is negation. You cannot uphold life upon negations. We need positive props for our house. There is no intellectual solidity about atheism. The moral solidity of atheism is equally dubious. Its whole character is unsolid.

2. Can the drunkard congratulate himself and his associates that the beams of their house are cedar?

Everything gives way under the drunkard. Has the voluptuary cedar-beams to his house? Pleasures give no solidity to life. Has the mere moralist a right to say, 'The beams of our house are cedar'? Morality without God is a horticulture of fruits without roots. Only as we trust in the living God revealed in Christ have we moral solidity and permanence.

3. It is cedar-beams which give solidity to the life-house. It is the supports on which life depends which make it solid or otherwise. Money is the only 'beams' of some houses. Money is not a cedar-beam for our life-house. Business similarly is insufficient.

What, then, are the great upholdings of a life? They are spiritual. Faith—which is not simply perception of God, but reliance upon God. Prayer, Bible study, reflection; these, and such as these, are life's abiding supports.

4. Life's experiences test the beams of our house. Let that consideration stir you to make religious solidity your ideal.

5. Religious solidity gives truest joy. The lover of my text rejoices with singing because the beams of his house are cedar. And it is a parable. Earthly qualifications do not give the clue to enduring joy. They joy greatly who can say, 'The beams of our house are cedar'.

6. As a final encouragement to making religious solidity our ideal, let me say that there is abundance of the best material to be had for the beams of our life-house. There is 'cedar' in plenty if we be willing to seek it.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, Unfamiliar Texts, p. 117.

REFERENCES.—II.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2485. II. 1.—Ibid. vol. xlii. No. 784; vol. xlii. No. 2472. II. 2.—Ibid. vol. xxvi. No. 1525. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 585. II. 3.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, pp. 70, 76. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1120. II. 4.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 85. C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 369. II. 7.—Ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 369. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxv. No. 1463.

THE WINTER IS PAST (Tuesday after Low Sunday)

'My Beloved spake, and said unto me, Rise up, My love, My fair one, and come away. For, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land; the fig-tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell. Arise, My love, My fair one, and come away.'—SONG OF SOLOMON II. 10-13.

I. 'My Beloved spake.' You must lay hold of that little word my: in it lies the chief virtue of love to God: it will be useless that He should be Chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely, unless it may be—my Lord and my God. But it is more than this here. 'My Beloved spake:' so He does in a thousand different ways, and with a thousand different voices. But that is not enough. 'My Beloved spake, and said unto me.' That is the joy of all joys, if He will but do so! If He will but speak to each of you, it need be but one word, it need be but by your own name. As of old time, 'Jesus said unto her, Mary! She saith unto Him, Rabboni, which is to say, Master.'

II. And what are His first words? 'Rise up.' Is it possible that you should not? Rise up from all lower love, from all lower desires, to Him Who only is worthy of perfect love—to Him Who alone, when we awaken up after His likeness, can make us satisfied with it.

'My love!' And in what words are we to speak of that condescension of our dear Lord, which thus applies to you the nearest and dearest term of earthly affection? The term which speaks of perfect nearness, perfect confidence, satisfied love, common hopes, a common home, a union which God has made, and which man cannot unmake.

But still He speaks. 'Rise up, My love, My fair one.' So much done that ought not to have been done, if you are to shadow out His Image, and still, 'My fair one!' So much left undone that ought to have been done, if you would show forth the likeness of the King, and still, 'My fair one!' So much infirmity and irresolution of purpose, so much despondency, so much self-indulgence, so much temper that is not His temper, and still, 'My fair one!' But He has said it. And why? Because, beyond and above all things else, He looks to love. It is that which is fair in His eyes.

'And come away.' From what? Still further and further from everything that is opposed to Him—that is not stamped with His Image—that is of His enemies—that belongs to the world. Daily come apart from every little thing that keeps you in the least away from Him. What they fable of the fish called the remora is, at all events, true enough in the Christian life—how being very small, it attaches itself to the keel of great ships, and so impedes their progress that in vain are the sails spread—in vain is the breeze favourable: they are sore let and hindered by this one little obstacle.

'For lo, the winter is past.' Nature itself tells us that now: the Church tells the same thing. we know that we have passed from death unto life: from the death of snow and frost to the life of green leaves and budding flowers. From the death of Lent and Passion-tide to the new and everlasting life of Easter. 'The rain is over and gone:' not now have we to remember the strong crying and tears which He offered up to Him that was able to save Him from death, and was heard in that He feared: the tears of His dear Mother when the sword passed through her own heart also: the tears of the faithful ones who stood by the Cross, and watched Him as He yielded up His most blessed Spirit into His Father's Hands. 'The flowers appear on the earth'. All those are glorious consequences of His Resurrection. It is well said, 'On the earth': when it was by His sleeping in death that He so hallowed the whole face of this world, that He asserted in a new and higher sense that which was written long before, 'The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof'; when He gave promise that some day or other, in a time known to Him, 'the little hills,' namely, the graves, 'should rejoice on every side'. 'The time of the singing of birds is come.' What else but every answer, every response, every antiphon, every hymn, which speaks of our Paschal joy? But they only can sing who, like the birds, rise above this earth: who, like the birds, rise above this earth by means and in virtue of the sign of the Cross: and that, not without labour, not without opposition and buffeting by the winds of temptations; but still rise, and, like Noah's dove, find no rest for the soles of their feet in the crowd and the turmoil of this world. 'And the voice of the turtle is heard in our land.' Till the Conqueror of Satan rose in triumph, the Giver of all good gifts could not come down in glory. Till the winter of our Lord's sufferings was over, the voice of this Heavenly Dove could not be heard elsewhere than in His Own Land.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 92.

REFERENCES.—II. 10.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 217. J. R. Popham, Sermons, p. 242. II. 10, 11.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 873. II. 10-13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. viii. No. 436.

THE SOUL'S SUMMER

'The winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come.'—SONG OF SOLOMON II. 11, 12.

EVERY period of the year has its charms. The spring has: fresh, flowery, green, sweet; summer has; autumn has; so has winter. We do not recognize the charms of winter as perhaps we might. The cause of the winter, the properties of the winter, the effects of the winter, all combine to give the winter a bad name. And yet the winter is not only necessary and God's ordering, but it has its uses, and even its blessings. It kills weeds; it freezes out disease; it builds up vegetable life in its hidden parts. And not only has winter its uses but it brings real blessings.

I. God's winter gifts. Think of one or two of God's winter gifts which are distinctly inconvenient and unpleasant, but really bring blessing. Here is one. I quote the actual Word of God, 'He giveth snow like wool,' bleak as it is it warms the soil and nourishes the earth and incubates the seed which is underneath it. Or again, from the same Psalm, 'He scattereth the hoar-frost like ashes,' to cleanse the ground, to purify the soil, to rid the fields and gardens of the hundred pests that swarm and creep and devour vegetable life.

II. When God sends a winter into our heart, or, perhaps withdraws a sense of His presence, there is always a purpose, intention, blessing—'snow like wool,' 'hoar-frost like ashes'. And there are limitations to His severity—'He casteth forth his ice, but only like morsels,' perhaps that we may grow at the roots, perhaps to purify, to cleanse, to eat up that which would otherwise destroy our spiritual union with the Lord. But it happens sometimes that we make our own winter—God does not always get away from us; we sometimes get away from Him. The simple reason why we are chilled in winter is because we are where we cannot receive the full rays of the sun; and as an American writer says, often the reason why we are cold and prayerless and faithless is that we have 'swung away from God'.

III. The opportunities of summer. What shall we do in life and work if our spiritual winter is past? But is it past? Is the summer come to our soul? The summer comes when the Christian enjoys Communion with Christ wherever he is; when he increasingly loves his Bible, and is spoken to in it; when he is blessed with the outward privileges of the Gospel, and is satisfied with inward peace. And if it is thus with you and me, what shall we do?

1. Improve your summer opportunities, outdoor opportunities of doing good ought to be seized on. I believe in outdoor preaching. Jesus Christ did.

2. And in our experience and life are work. Look for the summer fruit. The prophet Amos speaks of a basket of summer fruit. Look for the flowers; look for the figs even if they are only green; for the grapes even if they are only tender. Look for some spiritual habits, feelings, aspirations, which flesh and blood cannot produce, but God's grace can.

REFERENCES.—II. 11, 12.—Stopford A. Brooke, The Fight of Faith, pp. 324, 337. T. A. Gurney, The Living Lord and the Opened Grave, p. 176. II. 11, 12, 13.—S. Thornton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxix. 1906, p. 347.

THE SINGING TIME

(For Easter)

'The time of the singing is come.'—SONG OF SOLOMON II. 12.

SPRING is a season enjoyed by all. It speaks to us of life, of hope, of plenty; of bright skies instead of leaden ones, of greenness instead of grey bareness, of days growing warmer and longer, and sweeter with the perfumes of flowers, and gladder with the songs of birds.

I. Singing Suggests the Resurrection of Hope.—'Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away.' So Christ says to His Church, and the Church responds and 'returns with singing and everlasting joy upon her head'. There was much singing in connexion with our Lord's Advent. (Canticles, Benedictus, Magnificat, Nunc Dimittis, the Songs of the Angels.) We do not read of angels or men singing at His Resurrection. It is in another sphere. The book of the Revelation tells us of the great multitude whom no man can number singing, 'Amen, blessing and glory and honour and power,' and the harpers singing the song of Moses and of the Lamb. And here on earth the Church sings. We celebrate the Resurrection of our Lord with songs of holy gladness, and though at times our songs go into the minor, yet even when we commit our loved ones to the tomb we do so in sure and certain hope of the resurrection of the just. Yes, for the Church 'the time of the singing is come'. Our Lord hath broken the bars of the prison of death, and 'them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him.' So also, there are songs of hope as regards our own resurrection and future life. Singing is the expression of joy, and we rejoice in hope of the glory of God.

II. Singing Expresses the Joy of Life.—It is hard to sing in sorrow. In captivity Judah hung her harp on the willows. But when the door of hope should be opened in the Valley of Achor the prophet tells her she will sing there. The two disciples journeying to Emmaus were sad. Yet their sorrow was turned into joy. Why? 'Then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord.' Not these two only, but all the disciples. The indisputable and certain fact of our Lord's Resurrection turned their sorrow into joy. So the true joy of life to the Christian is the radiancy which flows from our Lord's risen body, and as when the sun shines after rain the air becomes vocal with the songs of birds, welcoming its genial rays, so when the Sun of Righteousness arises the heart of the believer sings with joy. The night is past; Gethsemane, with its dark shadows, Calvary with its blackness, are things of the past. The Easter of glorious Resurrection is with us. Rejoice therefore. Christ is Risen.

III. Singing Means Victory—the victory of faith. Satan's power is great, for he hath the power of death. But Christ, the risen Christ, 'destroys him that hath the power of death, that is the devil'; and further, 'delivers those who through its fear are subject to bondage'. Hear the testimony of some dying saints. Dr. Goodwin: 'Ah! is this dying? How have I dreaded as an enemy this smiling friend!' Another: 'I have so learned Christ that I am not afraid to die'. Another: 'Let my people know that their pastor died undaunted, and not afraid of death'. Fletcher: 'God is love! love! love! Oh that a gust of praise might sound throughout the earth.' Such could rejoice even in death. It was the time of singing to them. Christ gave them songs in the night, even the night of death. But the song of faith is not for the dying alone. It is for the living. It is like singing the battle-song of victory as the troops enter the field of battle, the song of anticipated triumph. Let us have stronger faith and we shall have sweeter songs.

IV. Singing Suggests the Tunefulness of a Consecrated Life.—There is the melody of one pure life of single aim; there is the unison of souls in Christian brotherhood, and there is the harmony of the Divine and human wills, when the latter is fully surrendered to God. The Resurrection of our Lord strikes the keynote of all soul-singing. The life that is holy is holy because it is attuned by Him, the love of the brethren is love that finds its one centre and meeting-place in the heavenlies, whither He has gone before. Self and pride must be humbled to bring us into tune with God. The proud heart cannot sing.

REFERENCES.—II. 12.—A. Macrae, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 364. T. Sadler, Sermons for Children, p. 164. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 146. II. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2480. II. 14.—C. G. Clark-Hunt, The Refuge of the Sacred Wounds, p. 1

CHRIST WAITING AT THE GATE

SONG OF SOLOMON II. 15.

DID you ever hear, not of a Maud, but a Madeleine, who went down to her garden in the dawn, and found One waiting at the gate, whom she supposed to be the gardener? Have you not sought Him often; sought Him in vain, all through the night; sought Him in vain at the gate of that old garden where the fiery sword is set? He is never there; but at the gate of this garden He is waiting always—waiting to take your hand—ready to go down to see the fruits of the valley, to see whether the vine has flourished, and the pomegranate budded. There you shall see with Him the little tendrils of the vines that His hand is guiding—there you shall see the pomegranate springing where His hand cast the sanguine seed;—more: you shall see the troops of the angel keepers that, with their wings, wave away the hungry birds from the pathsides where He has sown, and call to each other between the vineyard rows, 'Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines, for our vines have tender grapes'. Oh—you queens—you queens; among the hills and happy greenwood of this land of yours, shall the foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests; and in your cities shall the stones cry out against you, that they are the only pillows where the Son of Man can lay his head?—RUSKIN, Sesame and Lilies, §§ 94, 95.

REFERENCES.—II. 15. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 106. T. Teignmouth Shore, The Life of the World to Come, p. 213. S. Martin, Rain Upon the Mown Grass, p. 36. E. Browne, Some Moral Proofs of the Resurrection, p. 77.

MY BELOVED IS MINE

'My beloved is mine, and I am His: He feedeth among the lilies. Until the day break, and the shadows flee away.'—SONG OF SOLOMON II. 16, 17.

If there be one happy, peaceful verse in the Bible, thoroughly happy, thoroughly peaceful, this is it.

I. Beloved, indeed, He ought to be, Who wrote such a large letter of love to us with His own Hand: Who for us, but without us, bore the burden and heat of the day: Who for us endured the Mocking and the Crown of Thorns, and the Scourging and the great Nails and the Cross.

But the word Beloved is not enough. It is my Beloved. If we were not so familiarized with it by custom, it would be a wonder beyond all wonders, that expression, my God. It was Jacob who first said, 'Then shall the Lord be my God'. And in the New Testament he that was the first so to speak was none other than Thomas, making up the failure of his faith by the boldness of his confession: 'Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord and my God'.

It goes on—'And I am His'. In a certain sense, this is true of every one: 'we are His people, and the sheep of His pasture'.

II. It follows—'He feedeth among the lilies'. It is written of Behemoth, the type of Satan in the book of Job, that 'he lieth under the shadow of the tall trees'. But this spotless Lamb chooses no such lofty places. And what are these lilies among whom He feeds? Surely the pure in heart. The straight stalk standing up erect from the earth, its flowers as high from the ground as possible—do not they tell us of heavenly mindedness? Do they not seem to say, 'Set your affections on things above, not on things of the earth?' And, if the spotless snow of the leaves teaches us of the grace, then the gold of the anthers tells us of that crown which shall be the reward of the grace. He feedeth among the lilies, then, here: but, in a more full and glorious sense, He rests among them in that land where these lilies thrive best.

III. 'He feedeth among the lilies.' Till when? 'Until the day break, and the shadows flee away.' The eternal day to which we are all looking forward: the day of which the promises of God are like the grey clouds that gather over the place where the sun is about to arise speaking, but still very faintly, of His coming glory. It follows, then, that through the night in which we now are, we have our Lord with us. It is as if He said to us, 'That darkness in which you now are, O my true servants, I also was in: according to that saying of My Prophet, I walked in darkness, and had no light: but I will not leave you so: I will be with you till the day break'.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 118.

REFERENCES.—II. 16.—H. E. Manning, Sermons, p. 411. C. Bickersteth, The Shunammite, p. 71. J. Duncan, In the Pulpit and at the Communion Table, p. 159. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 374; vol. xx. No. 1190; vol. xxvii. No. 1634; vol. xli. No. 2442.

DONEC ASPIRET DIES. ADVENT

'Until the day dawn, and the shadows flee away.'—SONG OF SOLOMON II. 17.

HOPE is the flower of the root Penitence: and so the season of the expectation of Christ is a penitential season.

I. The whole meaning of Advent is the expectation of Christ.

But this hope of Christ's coming is no vague, natural poetry in us, like our blind longing for the first signs of spring coming after winter. It is an energy of conscience, reason, and will, set upon things above, seeking the highest and the loveliest; yes, an energy of our highest faculties, and of all of them, even of our earthly body, because we know that we are not created only to think of what is highest, but to suffer and strive for it, attain, and possess it.

And the expectation of God proves to be the only expectation in which man can never hope too much, and can not be disappointed; because man is made for God, and in God is all perfection.

II. This expectation of God gives the specially Christian character to a man, and to all that he does. Each act of his has a true purpose and principle in it; it is not done for the moment; it has secret relations with eternity. It may be a mere act of ordinary duty, but that means for him an act of fellowship with God. Or if it is some heavy loss, or great pain which he has to bear, it is the same; it is not merely external evil, crushing a man to earth; here is the man's love welcoming God's will in the pain—making the pain his own treasure, and lifting it up to God in sacrifice, that is, something offered as a means of union with God.

But this expectation of God which characterizes all Christian life implies penitence, self-mastery, humility of mind, patience, self-renunciation. There must be a breaking of bondage to the unreal, temporal good if there is to be a sincere reaching forth in desire to win the eternal.

St. Peter the Penitent is the Apostle of Hope. When he is converted he strengthens his brethren, he teaches them to 'hope to the end'.

III. And then if out of our penitence expectation of Christ grows, and makes everything we do and suffer a seed of hope for ourselves and others, this new energy has a natural development and expression in prayer. A life that becomes full of hope is a life in which prayer overflows the stated hours of prayer, a life which becomes prayerful. And that is the essence of the dedicated life. In Advent we are not waiting drowsily for Christ as a nurse waits through the night for the inevitable crisis in the sick-room. Our waiting for Christ is the silent cry of hearts that are awake and seeking Him.—G. CONGEEVE, The Spiritual Order, p. 59.

REFERENCES.—II. 17.—T. T. Munger, The Freedom of Faith, p. 379. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2477.

SEEKING THE BELOVED

'By night on my bed I sought Him Whom my soul loveth: I sought Him, but I found Him not.'—SONG OF SOLOMON III. 1.

WE so often ask and do not receive: we so often seek and do not find. And yet our Lord, the Eternal Truth and the Eternal Wisdom says, 'Every one that asketh, receiveth, and he that seeketh, findeth'. How can these things be?

I. The very words of the Bride here will help us. When did she seek? 'By night:' that is, in the time of affliction. 'By night:' that is, not before the night. When everything then went well and smoothly, she did not seek: when fearfulness and trembling came upon her, and a horrible dread overwhelmed her, then, as the Psalmist says, 'In her trouble she called unto the Lord, and complained unto her God' Well: and it is much to do that; but it is not the highest kind of seeking. No; it was not seeking her Lord early; and, therefore, no wonder that He did not answer early.

II. But we go on. 'By night on my bed I sought.' There we get the true answer. This idle, half-hearted seeking—this seeking which is without trouble—this seeking which is not seeking: this will never find! And yet how apt we all are—you know it in your own consciences—to fall into this! To take a little trouble when only the greatest will do: like King Joash, to smite three times and then to stop.

III. How does it go on? 'I will rise.' The very exact thing that has to be done. 'Awake thou that asleep, and arise from the dead, and CHRIST shall give thee light.' You must set about your work in real earnest; pray, if not oftener, at least more heartily; search and try your ways more carefully; and, mind—I will rise by and by will not do. I will rise now, the Bride says. This is the excellent determination; and now, I dare say, we shall find it crowned with success.

Let us see: 'I will rise now, and seek Him Whom my soul loveth. I sought Him; but this is strange, too; for the verse ends: 'I sought Him, but I found Him not'. This is more perplexing than the other. Let us try and make out how it is.

First—I sought Him—where? 'I will go about the city, in the streets, and in the broad ways, I will seek Him Whom my soul loveth.' Ah, that is not where He is to be found! The cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches and the lusts of other things—we know what they do: they choke the word. You know how one of the greatest saints has told us that we are to seek for our Lord:—

I seek for Jesus in repose
When round my heart its chambers close.

See how Hezekiah, in the time of his distress, found God. When Isaiah came unto Him and said—Thus saith the Lord, set thine house in order, for thou shalt die and shalt not live. What did he do? Two things. In the first place, he turned himself to the wall; he shut out all cares, thoughts, business, but that of prayer; and, then, he wept sore. Retirement and repentance—that was how he gained what he sought—that is how we must gain what we seek.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 127.

REFERENCES.—III. 1-5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2516. III. 4.—Ibid. vol. xlii. No. 2485. III. 4, 5.—Ibid. vol. xviii. No. 1035. III. 6-11.—Ibid. vol. viii. No. 482. III. 7, 8.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 137. III. 9, 10.—Ibid. pp. 151, 364. III. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1134. III. 11.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iii. p. 311. Talbot Greaves, The Joy of Jesus, Sermons, 1655-1884. IV. 6.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, pp. 159, 172. A. G. Mortimer, Life and its Problems, p. 13. IV. 7.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. i. p. 561. IV. 10, 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 282. IV. 12.—Ibid. vol. xxxiii. No. 1957. IV. 12 and 15.—Ibid. vol. viii. No. 431. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 184. IV. 14.—J. Pulsford, Infoldings and Unfoldings of the Divine Genius, in Nature and Man, p. 1.

SOLOMON'S GARDEN

'A garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed. Thy plants are an orchard of pomegranates, with pleasant fruits; camphire, with spikenard, spikenard and saffron; calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense; myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices.'—SONG OF SOLOMON IV. 12-14.

THERE is one advantage in speaking about a garden—the preacher at once enlists the interest of his hearers. The love of plants and flowers is almost universal. Our greatest English essayists have written upon gardens. The father of inductive philosophy had an intense love for the beauties of nature. He says: 'God Almighty first planted a garden; and indeed it is the purest of pleasures'. Abraham Cowley, when dedicating his poem, 'The Garden,' to John Evelyn, the well-known author of Sylva, writes: 'I never had any other desire so strong and so like to covetousness, as that one which I have had always, that I might be master at last of a small house and a large garden, and then dedicate the remainder of my life only to the culture of them and the study of nature'. Only to give one other instance, Sir William Temple says: 'A garden has been the inclination of kings and the choice of philosophers; the common favourite of public and of private men; the pleasure of the greatest, and the care of the meanest; an employment for which no man is too high or too low. If we believe the Scriptures, we must allow that God Almighty esteemed the life of man in a garden the happiest He could give him; or else He would not have placed Adam in that of Eden.'

We cannot read the Bible without seeing that the Jews were a people who delighted in flowers and green fields, in groves and plantations, in orchards, and gardens. The fact that 250 botanical terms occur in the Bible, in a work not professedly treating on horticulture, proves this. Gardens were the sacred retreats of Hebrew life; in them they prayed, held their family festivals, and at last buried their dead. Prophets, as well as poets, enriched their imagery from the same fertile theme. Isaiah compares the kingdom of Messiah to 'a well-watered garden,' whilst he likens Zion in her national decadence to 'an oak whose leaf fadeth,' and to 'a garden that hath no water'.

Solomon, the wise king of Israel, sought retirement from the exactions of his court and from the business of empire in his wonderful gardens at Etham. He was a botanist, and knew the habits of every plant, from the lowly hyssop to the mighty cedar. In the book of Canticles, as Delitzsch observes, we have the names of no fewer than eighteen different plants.

The book from which I have selected the verses at the head of the chapter is an exquisite allegory. Beneath its types and symbols we see the foreshadowings of Incarnate love, the marriage of Christ and His Church, the glories of the Bridegroom, and the graces and privileges of the Bride. The Song of songs has been called 'the enigma of the Old Testament, as the Apocalypse is of the New'. It is a book which has ever been dear to devout souls. It was as precious to Leighton and Taylor, to Bunyan and Gill, as to Bernard and Catherine of Siena, to Bossuet and Dr. Neale. This book is not the strain of a 'Hebrew Swinburne,' as M. Renan would have it; but it is the breathing of the Holy Spirit, setting forth the mystical union which is betwixt Christ and His Church. The historian Niebuhr once said: 'For my part, I should think there was something wanting in the Bible if we could not find in it any expression for the deepest and strongest sentiment of humanity'. In the words of my text, Christ, the Bridegroom, compare the Church, the Bride, to a garden. This image is quite in harmony with other portions of Scripture, where the children of God are compared to palms and cedars, to olives and fruit-trees, to plants and flowers. The Church is the Lord's Paradise or garden, because a garden speaks of care and culture, of digging and dunging, of planting and pruning, of fragrance and fruitfulness.

I. Observe, first, that the garden is 'enclosed'.

The garden of the Church is enclosed (1) by God's electing love; (2) By God's sanctifying grace; (3) By God's providential care. In all ages God's all-watchful eye and all-powerful arm have encompassed the Church.

II. We have here a remarkable prophecy of the kingdom of the Messiah, which was to include the Gentile as well as the Jew, 'that they might be called trees of the Lord's planting'.

The great Husbandman delights in every fresh accession; and a greater than Solomon knows every plant of His garden, from the lowly hyssop to the majestic cedar. He knows their habits, and cares for each. He especially delights in the young—'those who are planted in the house of the Lord,' and who 'flourish in the courts of our God'.

III. We see in this symbolic garden an illustration of the variety of character to be found in the Church of Christ.

IV. We see in this garden the variety of graces to be found in the heart of each believer.

Dr. Littledale, in his Commentary on the Song of Songs, quotes an old Dutch hymn which is quaint and beautiful. The writer, when naming some of the flowers as emblems of the graces of a believing soul, says:—

The Lily white that bloometh there is Purity,
The fragrant Violet is surnamed Humility.

The lovely damask Rose is there called Patience,
The rich and cheerful Marigold Obedience.

One plant is there with crown bedight, the rest above,
With crown imperial, and this plant is Holy Love;

But still of all the flowers the fairest and the best
Is Jesus Christ, the Lord Himself, His Name be blest.

O Jesu, my chief good and sole felicity,
Thy little garden make my ready heart to be!

It was said of a great horticulturist that he could hardly sleep, whenever he heard of some fresh plant introduced into this country, until he had secured a specimen. As we study the character of Christ, and see the perfections of His varied graces and the exquisite harmony of His life, we ought not to rest until His graces become ours. Are we conscious that we lack humility? We ought to pray, and pray continually, to learn of Him who was 'meek and lowly in heart,' and so find rest to our souls. In a day of so much profession, let us earnestly strive to become fruit-bearing Christians, recollecting all the time that the fruit is His. 'Let my Beloved come into His garden and eat His pleasant fruits.' May the prayer of St. Paul be fulfilled in the experience of each one of us: 'That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing; being fruitful in every good work . . . strengthened with all might, unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness.'—J. W. BARDLEY, Many Mansions, p. 181.

LIFE TRANSFIGURED. ITS NECESSITY—FOR THE CHURCH

'Awake, O north wind; and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out.'—SONG OF SOLOMON IV. 16.

THE Lord Christ loves, has ever loved a garden. He oftentimes resorted to the Garden of Gethsemane, before His Passion, with His disciples, and He was once Himself mistaken for a gardener. No such serious mistake after all, for He is the Gardener, the Protector, and the constant gracious Supervisor of the Church, which is His garden.

The Church of Christ is fitly compared to a garden:—

I. In its Design.—A garden is intended to give pleasure to its owner. When we are weary, or need a quiet time for meditation, how pleasant, if we have a garden, to retire into it and be refreshed. And Christ desires to find His rest and His pleasure in His people.

II. Its Derivation.—A garden is frequently reclaimed from a desert waste. Wonderful transformations have been effected by human skill, but they all fade into insignificance when compared with the transformation of the garden of the Church.

Fabulous prices have been paid before to-day for gardens such as, e.g. the gardens of Magdalene College, Oxford, where Addison used to walk. The Hanging Gardens of Babylon. But no price paid for earthly gardens can be compared with the cost at which this garden has been reclaimed. The precious drops of Emmanuel, God with us, must be shed before this garden could be secured by its Owner. What must that love have been which shrank not from such a cost as that. When the Owner takes full possession the result is always the same, He makes the 'wilderness rejoice and blossom as the rose'.

III. Its Dangers.—A garden is exposed to dangers from without and dangers from within.

A garden needs watching and tending, as well as sowing and planting and pruning, for the soil that grows good seed will grow bad also, and, as it was of old—'While men slept the enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat and went his way'—so it is still. Pride, jealousy, resentment, the roots of bitterness—what ill weeds are these, and how rapidly they grow! We might well be in despair were it not that the Heavenly Husbandman Himself undertakes our cause. He can make short work with the weeds if we will let Him.

IV. Its Diversity.—Diversity and unity characterize all the works of the great Creator. And as it is in nature so it is in grace. Do not criticize your brother because he works in a way of his own. Give him room to develop after his own pattern. There is a regularity which is fatal to growth.

V. Its Dependence.—If a garden is to flourish it must be well watered. How dependent is the garden upon the dews of heaven and upon the breezes of heaven that play over it. If the Church is to be a fruitful garden it must have the fountain always in the midst. Many a Christian has not yet received in its fullness the wondrous truth that there is to be a fountain open for sin and uncleanness in the midst of the garden, yea, in the midst of the individual soul.

And upon the breezes of heaven, too, the garden must depend. The north wind is wanted as well as the south. Convicting power is needed as well as comforting grace, adversity as well as prosperity, the chilling, biting blast as well as the gentle, melting summer breeze. If the Lord seems to blight your prospects and write death upon your hopes, still believe that He does all things well. In a weather vane on a church in Kent are cut the words, 'God is Love,'—that is, whether the wind blow east or west, north or south, we have to learn that 'God is Love'.—E. W. MOORE, Life Transfigured, p. 45.

Illustration.—I have read somewhere an Eastern fable: 'Two men were equally desirous for the growth and nurture of the palm. One, so the story runs, obtained permission from God to have for his palm-tree whatsoever wind or weather he desired. So, when he wished for sunshine he prayed and it was granted; when he thought the rain was needed he prayed and the rain descended. Thus he took the direction into his own hands. Days and weeks passed by, but the tree to which he devoted so much attention drooped and drooped, until at last it died. In his distress he went to his friend at a distance, and found his tree blooming and vigorous. 'How is this,' said he, 'my tree is dead?' 'What didst thou do to it?' asked his friend. 'I asked for sunshine, and I had it; for rain, I had it; I managed it myself, but in spite of all my care it perished.' 'Ah, was the reply, you should have let God manage it. I left mine in the hands of God, and the result is that it flourishes to-day.'—E. W. MOORE, Life Transfigured, p. 62.

REFERENCES.—IV. 16.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 195. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1941; vol. xlii. No. 2475. V. 1.—Ibid. vol. xvi. No. 919; vol. xxxiii. No. 1943. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 205. H. W. Webb-Peploe, Calls to Holiness, p. 197. V. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvi. No. 1561; vol. lii. No. 3013. V. 2-8.—Ibid. vol. xiv. No. 793. V. 3.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 371. V. 4.—Ibid. p. 217. V. 5, 6.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 230. V. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ix. No. 539.

THE INCOMPARABLENESS OF CHRIST

'What is thy Beloved more than another beloved, O thou fairest among women? What is thy Beloved more than another beloved, that thou dost so charge us?'—SONG OF SOLOMON V. 9.

'WHAT is thy Beloved more than another beloved? Wherein is Christ incomparable?'

I. Christ is Incomparable in the Inquiries He Excites.—There must be something in our Beloved that is more than another beloved when such interrogatories are urged upon us. Commonplaceness does not arrest attention. Mediocrity does not challenge comparison. Ordinary personalities do not normally create extraordinary excitement. But our Beloved is much inquired about. Christ's people are always being inquired of concerning their Beloved. The world is intensely interested in the Saviour. He has been lifted up, and through the reluctant centuries He is drawing all men unto Him.

The repeated inquiry in this text arises from the testimony the lover has borne to the Beloved. The Beloved has so captivated the Bride that she has made no secret of her love.

II. Christ is Incomparable in the Love He Evokes.—Note the epithet, 'thy Beloved'. Note that it is twice repeated. Note also that it is often used in this book. There is no designation by which Christ can be more suitably spoken of. Christ draws out love as none other can. He dominates love as He dominates everything. Others evoke love; there are many beloveds; but this Beloved is 'more than another beloved,' for none lay up such wealth of love as He. 'This is His supremacy. As Napoleon said, 'Jesus alone founded His empire upon love'. And so His empire outlasts all other empires and outlasts the universe.

III. Christ is Incomparable in the Beauty of those who Follow Him.—The loveliness of the Bride appeals to those who inquire of her and they exclaim, 'O thou fairest among women'. It was largely by reason of her loveliness that bystanders and friends challenged her concerning her Beloved. They felt that He must be glorious after whom so beautiful a being followed. And it is generally the beauty of Christ's followers which leads men and women to inquire after Him. These beautiful followers of Jesus are supremely fair in all eyes but their own. Perfect loveliness is ever unconscious of itself.

IV. Christ is Incomparable in the Earnestness which He Inspires.—Christ's follower is represented by those around her as charging them. The Revised Version reads, 'that thou dost so adjure us'. Adjuration is an intense and solemn charge. This is typical of Christ's followers—they adjure the world and they adjure one another.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Crimson Book, p. 124.

REFERENCES.—V. 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2469. J. Richardson, Penny Pulpit, vol. xiv. No. 817, p. 217. V. 9, 10.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 239. V. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2478. V. 13.—Ibid. vol. xlii. No. 2479. V. 16.—Ibid. vol. xvii. No. 1001; vol. xxiv. No. 1446. A. G. Brown, Penny Pulpit, No. 801, vol. xiv. p. 97. VI. 2.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 252. VI. 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 984. VI. 5.—Ibid. vol. xlii. No. 2486. VI. 10.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 261. VI. 11.—Ibid. p. 275. W. Robertson Nicoll, The Garden of Nuts, p. 81. R. Collyse, Where the Light Dwelleth, p. 19.

SPIRITUAL TRANSPORTS

'Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib.'—SONG OF SOLOMON VI. 12.

WHAT is the meaning of 'the chariots of Ammi-nadib'? It may perhaps be best regarded as a pro-verbal expression by which swift and splendid chariots are described. The rendering of the Revised Version doubtless gives us the substantial idea of the comparison: 'Or ever I was aware, my soul set me among the chariots of my princely people'. Whatever the immediate reference may be, it is a remarkable description of the mystical experiences of a soul.

I. The Christian Believer has Transports.—The religion of the Bible is a religion of transports. All deep and spiritual religion is emotional. Beware of a piety so severely 'practical' that it has no experience of the transport comparable to 'the chariots of Ammi-nadib'. A Christianity that does not transport the soul is certainly not ancient Christianity. A faith which never flashes into ecstasy is surely not the faith of the Scriptures.

II. The Christian's Transports are Spiritual.—'My soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib.' It is the soul that was thrilled. The natural man cannot understand the spiritual; it is still 'foolishness' to him. But 'he that is spiritual judgeth all things,' and he knows how truly spiritual his rapturous experiences are. He can differentiate between the emotionalism of the flesh and of the soul. And these transports make the soul for the time being dominant.

III. Spiritual Transports are often Sudden.—'Or ever I was aware.' Before I had realized, I was borne as on Ammi-nadib's chariots. This is, indeed, a parable of what often happens in the life mystical. How sudden our transports are wont to be! God delights to surprise His children.

IV. Spiritual Transports are very Glorious.—They are likened to 'the chariots of my princely people'—splendid, exhilarating, every way delightful. Unutterableness and transcendency are ever notes of Christian experiences.

V. Spiritual Transports Assume Many Forms.—How many chariots were there? No one knows. The chariots, doubtless, were very varied. Verily there is no monotony in the soul's transports.

Sometimes we have had a transport in Bible reading. Often a transport of prayer delights the believing suppliant. There are transports of meditation. And are there not transports of reading? So it is at times in public worship.

VI. Spiritual Transports Demand a Preparative State.—'I went down into the garden' and there 'or ever I was aware, my soul set me among the chariots of my princely people'. 'The garden' is often the sphere of and the preparation for the transport. It is the quietude, the meditative, the seclusive, that is the essential preparative for transportive spiritual experiences.

VII. Spiritual Transports should be Testified to.—The singer in this drama recounts to all generations this great experience. It is true modesty, if you have had great transports of soul, to glorify God by recording those experiences. Your testimony will have evidential worth. It may be an apologetic.

Conversion may be a sudden transport. What men call death is a transport to the Christian.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, Unfamiliar Texts, p. 54.

REFERENCES.—VI. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 1155. S. Baring-Gould, Sermon Sketches, p. 51. VI. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 593; vol. xxx. No. 1794. S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. ii. p. 256.

I SAID, I WILL GO UP TO THE PALM-TREE (Palm Sunday)

'I said, I will go up to the palm-tree, I will take hold of the boughs thereof.'—SONG OF SOLOMON VII. 8.

It is worth while noticing how often expressions of faith, and hope, resolution, and penitence, begin with that—'I said'. We begin by saying—the doing is a very different matter. Our Lord's was doing first, and saying afterwards: 'the former treatise have I made of all that Jesus began both to do and to teach'.

I. 'I said, I will go up to the palm-tree.' None ever doubted that by this palm-tree is meant the Cross. It is as though the faithful soul had, at the first commencement of her true service of her Lord, looked on the Cross as the sign of all victory, the form of all glory, the crown of such innumerable triumphs. But she forgot that it was something else besides all this—that the struggle preceded the victory, that the wilderness came before the Promised Land, that the Cross came first and then the palm.

This true and living palm, this Cross, with its precious fruits, is set before us, and we must go to it; go up to it, mind: for up-hill work it is, as we all know, as the more we have tried to draw near to it, the better we know. Like that palm, it flourishes best in barren and dry lands where no water is: the heavier weights it has to bear, like the palm, it grows the better.

II. 'I will take hold of the boughs thereof.' And how? Surely, in the first place, by clinging to them as the only firm hold in the evil day. We have all read of shipwrecked men, when washed by some enormous wave on the shore, how they have grasped at some rock or stump, and held on to it as for very life during the recoil of the wave. So it is that, in the shipwreck of this world, we must cling on to the Cross: no one ever perished there yet: the thief was saved that grasped it in the very last hour: Judas would there have been saved if he had cast Himself at the foot, and had cried to Him that hung thereon, 'I will not let Thee go, except Thou bless me'.

III. But why are we to apply this verse to ourselves, and think of our own poor sayings, when the very time would rather have us refer them to our Elder Brother, the voice of Whose Blood will so soon cry from the ground: 'I said, I will go up to the palm-tree, I will take hold of the boughs thereof'. And so He did twice. Once, when He took them up in His arms to carry them to the top of Calvary; lastly, when with a still firmer and more painful grasp, a grasp which nothing but death could loose, He took hold on them there. Had He let them go, He had let us go along with them; but seeing it is written, 'My FATHER which gave them Me is greater than all, and no man is able to pluck them out of My FATHER's hand'; therefore, He still held them fast, not willing, even in the act of death, to be separated from them.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 291.

REFERENCES.—VII. 8.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 286; see also p. 301, and Sermons Preached in Blackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 224. VII. 11-13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 605; vol. xviii. No. 1066. VII. 12, 13.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 307.

THE FIRST AND GREATEST COMMANDMENT

'His left hand should be under my head, and His right hand should embrace me.'—SONG OF SOLOMON VIII. 3.

I. SEE how every power of the mind is embraced by, and concerned in, this love: how the head and the heart, knowledge and feeling, the understanding and the will, are all swallowed up by it. And yet, the very text tells us which is of more value in the Lord's sight. Just as the Seraphim, that are on fire with love, hold a more exalted estate than the Cherubim, that are perfect in knowledge—so here 'His left hand should be under my head, and His right hand should embrace me'. Every power of yours, of knowledge as well as of love, must be His; but oh, how infinitely of more value in His eyes the love than the knowledge!

II. Notice this. He thus shields the head, He thus protects the whole form of His Bride. How was His head shielded: how was His most blessed form embraced? It was no gentle hand which supported His head in those the last hours of His earthly life: the long sharp thorns were driven into that; and thus, out of the infinity of His goodness, He returns good for evil. The embrace He received was that of the Cross itself, the bitter and hard bed of His last sufferings: the rough handling of the four soldiers that nailed Him thereto: the piercing of the nails themselves: that was the embrace given. What is that which He gives? Think of that right hand—first, how it was prefigured in the ancient days, in the generations of old. This was the hand that had healed the poor leper with those words of love—'I will: be thou clean'—that had held up Peter from sinking when his faith failed in the great wind and the surging waves—that had written in the sand, before the gracious sentence, 'Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more'—which had anointed the eyes of the blind man so that he received his sight—which had been stretched forth, as it were, towards the penitent thief, giving effect to those words of inestimable joy, 'Verily, I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise'; which will, at the latter day be held out to the righteous with, 'Come, ye blessed of My FATHER, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world'.

III. But then, remember this. That right hand did not become glorious in power—that right hand did not dash the enemy in pieces till it had been nailed to the Cross. That which befell the Captain must befall the soldiers also.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 321.

COMING UP FROM THE WILDERNESS

'Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her Beloved?'—SONG OF SOLOMON VIII. 5.

I. Who is it that asks the question? The very form of it tells us. 'Who is this?'—not that goeth, but 'that cometh up from the wilderness leaning upon her Beloved?' Then they who put it are delivered from the wilderness themselves. They may well ask with joy as they see another and another and another guided safely through it—'Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness?'

Nevertheless, as the very words show us, it is a struggle to get out of the wilderness. 'Who is she that cometh up?' A perpetual ascent: a constant striving upward: if 'the hill of Zion is a fair place and the joy of the whole earth,' it is a lofty place too, and not to be attained without a life-long effort.

II. She is coming up from the wilderness, but she is not alone. He, Who in the days of His Flesh tabernacled in the same wilderness, knew all its wearisomeness, conquered all its dangers, He will not leave her comfortless in it—He will come unto her, and having come He will walk with her. But more, far more, than that. It is not—Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness with her Beloved—but leaning on her Beloved. No fear of tiring Him, for He is the Everlasting God—no fear of want of sympathy in Him, for He is True Man. She is now to lean on that arm which for her was stretched out on the Cross; she is now to be drawn near to that heart which for her was pierced with the spear. 'So they two went on together:' in what nearness and dearness of love, in what intimacy of conversation—she receiving all, He giving all: she rejoicing to have nothing that does not come from Him—He unwilling to have anything which He is not ready to bestow on her.

III. See if it is so with you. The wilderness you are passing—so you know and feel: but the question is, whether leaning on Him? This also you know, that on nothing else can you lean: those broken reeds not only give way but pierce the hand that would trust them. But this is the feeling that you may, that you ought to have: that any additional discomfort, any especial trial, only give you the right to throw more of your burden on Him. That arm on which you are leaning has raised so many sinners from spiritual death: has been thrown round so many penitents to hold up their goings in His ways that their footsteps slipped not: has wiped so many tears from so many eyes. And there it is for you to rest on: there it is to shield you, to guard you; finally, to crown you.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 334.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 5.—R. A. Suckling, Sermons Plain and Parochial, p. 235. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 677.

BIBLE SEALS

'Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm.'—SONG OF SOLOMON VIII. 6.

'He that hath received his testimony hath set to his seal that God is true.' How often does that word seal occur in the whole Bible? What does it mean?

All things have significance. The value is often wholly in the meaning. The thing itself may be small enough, so small as to be almost beneath notice, if the question be one of magnitude and appraisal. We must look at the Biblical seals just as they come and go; we must as commentators have much licence in the matter of accommodation. Some of the meanings are obvious; some are implicit, they have almost to be dug out as if men were searching for silver and for hidden silver.

I. In choosing this as our text we are not making vivid—a process which is often allowable in pulpit exposition—a peculiar or distinctive word; we are engaged upon the unfolding and expansion of a long golden chain. This is a text of links, this is a polysyllable of love, this the endless word, because pointing to the endless life. Would you hear a little of the drip, drip of the music of the sealing? Why, I could begin anywhere, but we might begin in Job: 'He commandeth the sun and sealeth up the stars,' as if they were quite little morsels of jewels, and He gathered them into one slender batch and tied some jewelled seal to them, and said, These are my jewels, to be gathered up on a given day. Or Isaiah: 'Seal the law among my——' and then comes a New Testament word. The New Testament in Isaiah? Why, certainly. The New Testament is in Genesis. What is that completing word in Isaiah? Read the text again, and we will conjecture, now that you have given us the key, that the word is in the New Testament and in the very first part of the New Testament: 'Seal the law among My disciples'. We are familiar with the word; when we first read it we did not know the meaning of it, but we read on through Isaiah and Jeremiah and Ezekiel and Daniel, and right away through into Matthew, and there the word disciples occurred, and then it often occurred, and then we thought we had always known the word—so ungrateful is man.

II. Wonderful wearing of a seal is this in the Song of Solomon VIII. 6—'Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm.' The whole idea of the gospel bondage—sweet, sweet slavery!—is in that symbolism.

1. Where must the seal first be? 'Upon thine heart.' Begin at the heart if you would begin wisely; begin metaphysically, begin a long way from the visible, the concrete, and what is called the practical—poorest, meanest of the little heaps of dust that gather around the feet of our pilgrimage! Begin far away. We must have Christ in the heart, a great secret, a solemn yet joyful silence. Christ and the heart must have tender communion; they have festive times that are not marked on the calendar; they muse together, they ask questions of one another, then come more nearly near; in the soul there is a mystic wedding without which any other wedding is blasphemy, an oath broken at the altar.

2. Then set thy seal upon mine arm or thine arm: there is a time for protest, confession, public profession of the Eternal Name; there is a ministry of symbolism, there is a way of walking that means that the pilgrim has a sanctuary in view; there is a mysterious influence upon the attitude, the figure, the dress, the whole tone and speech of the life. What is it? We often call it the profession of the name of Christ. Some of us would perhaps under certain circumstances turn our clothing so that we could conceal the seal from everybody; and there is a way to be equally detested, and that is an opening and showing the seal as if making an investment and testimonial and credential of it. There is another way, the way of true modesty, gentle but invincible love that is not ashamed of Jesus or ashamed of the Christian seal.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. III. p. 127.

SET ME AS A SEAL UPON THINE HEART

(Tuesday in Holy Week)

'Set me as a seal upon Thine heart, as a seal upon Thine arm: for love is strong as death; jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame.'—SONG OF SOLOMON VIII. 6.

I. Set Me as a Seal Upon Thine Heart, as a Seal Upon Thine Arm.—If the Bride had followed the order of time, she would have reversed the two petitions; but thinking of those two greatest and most blessed sacraments, prefigured in the Blood and Water that flowed from the Side of her Lord, and which must be the source and origin of every action, she puts the seal on the heart first. A cruel engraving, indeed, though exercised on a lifeless body; and yet, such virtue then went forth from that wound, opened by the spear, that the soldier who inflicted it became himself a good soldier and martyr of Jesus Christ.

A seal bears the resemblance of that to which it belongs, and our resemblance there is, indeed, in these wounds. We know what we were when He came to seek and to save us. We know how, 'from the sole of the foot even unto the head, there was no soundness in it, but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores'. Himself, therefore, took our infirmities and bare our sickness: Himself impressed our likeness on His hands and on His side, binding us then by the nearest and dearest of ties, graving us as He Himself says, on the palms of His hands.

II. 'For Love is Strong as Death.'—His love, indeed, was stronger than the most fearful death; than a lingering, shameful death; than a forsaken lonely death; than a death from which the Eternal Father hid His face; than a death brought to pass by the treachery of one disciple, and accompanied by the cowardice of all. Such love as His met such a death as His. But apply that same saying to us—can there be a bitterer satire on what we do, and on what we do not do? Our love strong as death! It is well if it be strong enough to triumph over the next temptation that assaults us. Our love strong as death! Why, sometimes it hardly seems to exist at all. We feel too powerless and helpless and listless to care about anything, to wish for anything, to long for anything—and can we love?

III. Jealousy is Cruel as the Grave.—And how? Jealousy not of, but for, the beloved thing or person. Not that we should not be loved by Him so well as others are, but that He should not be loved by others—lest He should not be loved according to His deserts.

IV. The Coals Thereof are Coals of Fire.—This was the fire wherewith our Paschal Lamb was offered: this it was—not the nails, not the scourge, not the Cross—which sacrificed Him for the sins of the world. This was, indeed, the returning of the good for evil which has heaped coals of fire on our heads.

V. And yet here is our Comfort.—On that heart, on that arm, you are set as seals. You cannot be forgotten—you cannot be overlooked. If He died for you, no fear that He should not remember you. If He suffered for you, no fear that He will not suffer with you. And then I might tell you to remember how a seal is made and of what: the work of a cunning artificer: little by little: bit by bit:

here a grain of stone, there a grain of stone: every mite adding to the true figure—every sculpture indelible. Cut out, too, with sharp instruments—with different sharp instruments, but when once cut out in a gem, never to be effaced. You may destroy the jewel, but, keeping that undestroyed, the seal impressed there must remain there.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 345.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 6.—W. J. Knox-Little, Labour and Sorrow, p. 313. T. T. Carter, Lent Lectures, 1860-1866, p. 136. J. Vaughan, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 166. J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 127. VIII. 6, 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 364. VIII. 7.—Ibid. vol. xlii. No. 2466. VIII. 11.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 356. VIII. 11-14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2480. VIII. 12.—Ibid. vol. xlviii. No. 2785. VIII. 13.—F. W. Atkin, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1904, p. 183. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxix. No. 1716. VIII. 13, 14.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Song of Songs, p. 378. VIII. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xl. No. 2360.

ISAIAH

ISAIAH

REFERENCES. — I. XXXIX. — Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 68. I. 1. — S. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 58. I. 1-9; 18-20. — A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 1. I. 1-15. — V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 6. I. 1-20. — Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lx. No. 2351; vol. xlix. No. 2819; vol. xlvi. No. 2685.

THE DUTY OF THANKSGIVING

‘Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth: for the Lord hath spoken, I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against Me. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master’s crib: but Israel doth not know, My people doth not consider.’—ISAIAH I. 2, 3.

As a statesman and a patriot, Isaiah ranks among the foremost of the prophets, and to understand as much as we can of the few words of our text it will be well, perhaps, for us to try to see what the state of affairs was at the time of their utterance. For some years things had been improving, and some of the kings of Judah had made reformation of a kind, but at such a time as that of prosperity a nation is frequently called upon to make its choice either for better or worse. What do we find? A very dark future which Isaiah draws of the decline of men and morals. At a period when everything outwardly looked so prosperous, we are told that although people flocked to God’s house, penitents were few, the strong oppressed the weak, there was no heart whatever in the nation’s religion, drunkenness had increased to the extent of almost a national sin, and matters seemed about as bad as they could be. And what brought about such a state of thing as this? I think the words in our text give us a very fair idea—ingratitude, base ingratitude, ingratitude in its worst form, so that the very brute creation is held up to the people almost as an example. ‘I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against Me.’ How much these few words mean! Those who have brought up children in the fear and nurture of the Lord have borne with them in all their childish troubles, helped them to say their prayers, formed and fashioned their characters as well as they could, taught them to be God-fearing and honest citizens, will best understand them. What had God’s people done for it all? ‘They have rebelled against Me.’ How many instances we find as we trace through the earlier books of the Bible of the ingratitude of these people! We are almost astounded sometimes as we read of it all! God cared for them all through, but ingratitude seems to have been one of the principal sins of their lives. They rebelled against God. ‘Israel doth not know, My people doth not consider.’

I. We, too, have been nourished and brought up by God; we, too, have been ungrateful. It is so easy for us to turn over these pages and say: ‘I can see just where the fault was in that nation, that person’. We do not, however, think of ourselves, of the way in which we are ungrateful to God.

Let us look at just a few facts in our everyday life. If my heart were to stop beating but for a few seconds I should drop lifeless. Who am I that this should not happen? I see an ambulance coming round, some poor person being hurried to the nearest hospital. He has met with some horrid accident or other. Who has preserved me? I see people all round me suffering from disease, and so on, infirmities, bad health. Who has given me health? Then, perhaps, some of us have to be thankful to God that we are in a good situation. We can look round and find so many out of employment because circumstances are against them. We most of us have energy and strength for our daily work. How many thousands in this land of ours have to bemoan shattered health! It is not laziness; their hearts would be in their work, if they might do it, but it has pleased God to afflict them. Then, we most of us have happy homes. We can look round and see others whose homes are very far from happiness indeed. We all of us, even the poorest, enjoy some of God’s gifts. Who are we that God should not take them away from us and give them to some one else, perhaps more deserving of them? We beg of God the first time we want anything. We are always asking for something or other, but how many of us think of thanking God for all He has done for us? We most of us have a great many blessings indeed. God has again and again answered our prayers.

II. Has our thanksgiving been in proportion to our asking and craving? I think that many times it has not. How many of us think of giving God a little service of praise apart from the public services of the Church? There are many ways, for instance, the Te Deum gone through now and again, one of those joyful Psalms we come across, a hymn or two out of our book which is so full of them. I am afraid that what was true of those Israelites is true of us. We do not think, we do not consider. We are not ungrateful to our fellow-creatures. As a rule, when any one does us a good turn and is kind to us, most of us would be willing to go even out of our way to do something in return. None of us likes to be thought ungrateful, but our behaviour towards God, our Father, the God Who loves us, Who has preserved us from harm, danger, accident, illness, or loss, is nothing less. We are so in the habit of taking God’s gifts as a matter of course that we fail in our duty of rendering Him the thanks which are His due. God has showered blessings upon us, even more than we have asked for, and we have not been thankful for them. It is a thing that we can remedy. It only wants a little thought, a little consideration. If we would think, if we would consider, it might all be remedied, and our hearts take their part in the worship of thanksgiving which is God's due.

REFERENCES.—I. 2-19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xl. No. 2378. I. 3.—R. Gordon, "The Prophet Prepared for His Work," Christ as Made Known, etc., vol. iii. p. 65. Dean Goulburn, "The Service of Seraphim, etc., Sermons, p. 77. Hole, On the Liturgy, vol. i. p. 190. J. H. Newman, "Peace in Believing," Parochial Sermons, vol. vi. Simeon, Works, vol. vii. p. 504. Maurice, Prophets and Kings of the Old Testament, Sermon xiii. Dr. Cox, Expositor (2nd Series), vol. ii. pp. 18, 81, 271. P. Thomson, "The Call and Commission of Isaiah," Expositor (1st Series), vol. xi. p. 119. Melvill's Lothbury Lectures, p. 149. Knox-Little, "The Cry of the Creatures," in Expository Sermons on Old Testament, p. 268. Godet, Homiletic Quarterly, vol. iv. p. 110. Strachey's Jewish History and Politics, p. 77. Stanley's Jewish Church, vol. ii. p. 381, etc. Geikie's Hours with the Bible, vol. iv. p. 287. Maclaren in Outlines on Old Testament, p. 169. Jacob's Building in Silence, p. 62. In the Christian World Pulpit: Forrest, "The Trinity in Unity," vol. i. p. 492. Canon Driver, "The Divine Nature," Anglican Pulpit of To-day. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 7. R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 311. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xviii. No. 1059. I. 7.—J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 156.

THE SUM TOTAL OF LIFE

(Advent Sunday)

'Cease to do evil; learn to do well.'—ISAIAH I. 16, 17.

I. OUR life, so far as its spiritual side is concerned, falls into two great divisions. There must be the negative work of repentance; the giving up of habits of sin, the resisting of temptation, all of which falls under the clause Cease to do evil. And this is, of course, of the greatest importance, for without it we can make no progress whatever.

In building a house, the most important thing is a good foundation. If there be a flaw there, the house will never be safe. Some few years ago one of the towers of a great cathedral began to settle and to show signs of falling. On examining the foundation it was discovered that it rested upon a stone coffin which had collapsed and thus caused the settlement of the tower.

The first clause of our text requires, not merely that we should cease to do evil, but that we should repent of the evil which we have done.

There is only one Fountain in which we can wash and be clean, the precious Blood of Jesus Christ.

II. Learn to do well. God did not create you and give you all the great talents you possess that you might do no harm, but that you might be of some use in the world. No one ever made any instrument merely that it might do no harm, but that it might accomplish the purpose for which it was made; and if it is useless, it is generally destroyed because it is useless. In all our Lord's parables of judgment there is not one which speaks of a soul being lost by positive sin. The cause of its loss is always the neglect of opportunity to work.

Then, too, we have to form habits of virtue. And habits are only formed gradually, whether they be good or bad habits. Take the habit of prayer. What is prayer? It is the language in which the soul speaks to God. It takes time and labour to learn a new language. If you were to devote an hour a day for two or three years, with real concentration of mind, to your prayers, how wonderful would be the result! You would acquire the habit of prayer. And prayer would transform your whole life; you would 'cease to do evil'; you would 'learn to do well'.—A. G. MORTIMER, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part i. p. 1.

REFERENCES.—I. 16-19.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 10. J. Keble, Sermons for Advent to Christmas Eve, pp. 424, 435, 446.

PROPHETS OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

'Come now, and let us reason together.'—ISAIAH I. 18.

So the greatest of the Hebrew prophets addresses his compatriots at the beginning of his prophecy. The prophet's call is to a reasonable consideration of the message he brings, and he was one of a group, or succession of men, who might fairly be described as perhaps the greatest teachers of political righteousness whom the world has ever seen, teachers who sprang out of the heart of the people, who represent in their turn every section of it. Isaiah himself, if we are to believe tradition, was a man of high social rank, a member of the governing class, and of the royal house. His colleague, or brother prophet, or forerunner might be, like Micah, a man of the people, or, like Amos, a herdsman and a gatherer of sycamore fruit. Thus they represent every class, and they stood before their contemporaries, before kings, or nobles, or common people, before all alike, speaking the words of Divine inspiration and conviction. Their mission was simply to hold aloft, without fear of consequences and without thought of personal interest, the ideal national life of a God-fearing people. They were seldom popular. Yet these national and political idealists were the men who made Israel truly great, and such men are always needed, because if their moral idealism fails in any nation, or at any period, the higher life of that people stagnates or decays.

I. What is it that, humanly speaking, gave the Jews their Unique Place among the Nations and differentiated them so remarkably from any other Oriental people, indeed, which has sent them floating down the tide of history surviving every storm? Was it not the sense, growing and deepening out of every generation, of their being a people called of God to work out His purposes and His righteousness? And the men who kept alive and transmitted this sense of a high calling with its inspiration to personal duty from age to age were these men, of various types and of every rank of life, whom John Stuart Mill described as 'the inestimably precious unorganized institution, the order, if it might so be termed, the order of the prophets'. Accordingly, as he reminds us, the Jews, instead of becoming stationary like other Asiatics, were, next to the Greeks, the most progressive people of antiquity, and, jointly with them, have been the starting-point and the main propelling agency of modern cultivation. It is therefore, assuredly, a matter of some regret that we have given, most of us, so little serious attention to these prophets, and have done so little to cultivate the true prophetic spirit, either in our reading of our Bibles for personal instruction or guidance, or in our teaching of our young men for their inspiration and citizenship, or in the training of our clergy for their calling, or yet again that we have thought so little about applying the spirit of these national teachers to the conduct of our own national affairs. To this neglect may fairly be attributed, in some degree at any rate, some of the most glaring inconsistencies of our national Christian life.

II. Why was it that Isaiah cried so vehemently, 'Come, let us reason together'? It was not because the people around him were irreligious people. It was because of the contradiction and inconsistencies of their professedly religious life. The mission of the Prophet was to sweep out of the life of these people these contradictions between religious profession and habitual practice. The Hebrew prophet is above all things the preacher of reality in personal religion, of consistency in personal conduct, and of righteousness pervading every department of national life.

III. Looking at the Life of our Time, one of the greatest of our English philosophers of the last generation has said of us that we seem to have two religions—one for Sunday observance and Sunday worship, and the other for the market or the Stock Exchange, for the city or for Parliament, or for international or diplomatic use, in other words, for all our various and varying standards of social or political conduct. On Sundays our talk is all of brotherhood, our allegiance to Jesus, the Revealer of the one Fatherhood, the Prince of Peace, and to the virtues which He preached, virtues of Christian charity and good service. On other days, in all the various fields of man's activity, the accepted Gospel seems rather to be a gospel of pride and power, of perpetual antagonism and rivalry, of destruction, or jealousy between classes and nations alike. Dare we say, as we look around us, that this modern philosopher was mistaken in his estimate? Amongst the strangely inconsistent and contradictory phenomena of our complex Christian society, contradictions and inconsistencies seem, indeed, to meet the most thoughtful observer at almost every turn. In almost every country of Europe men's profession, both individual and national, is the religion of Christ, and that profession, as our Baptismal Service continually reminds us, is to be following the example of His Spirit, and to be made like unto Him. But in many departments of our Christian life—say, for instance, in some of our own political and national, and in almost all international, affairs—we hardly ever hear of an appeal to Christian obligation. At such a time, and amid so many dangerous entanglements, we need, above all things, political leaders in every country endued in some degree with the illuminating and strengthening inspiration of these Hebrew prophets, those prophets of national righteousness, to purify the air of national and international relationships; to bid us remember that in our public as in our private affairs our duty is to take care that our rules of conduct be in accord with the Gospel of Christ.

REFERENCES.—I. 18.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 366; vol. xxii. No. 1278; vol. xl. No. 2354; vol. xlix. No. 2816. W. J. Knox-Little, Manchester Sermons, p. 1. J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 282. W. Perkins, ibid., vol. lii. 1897, p. 19. I. 19.—F. B. Meyer, Christian Living, p. 62. R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 248. I. 20.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 1. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2013. I. 21-23; III. 1-3; IV. 2-6.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 25.

REDEMPTION BY JUDGMENT

(Advent)

'Zion shall be redeemed with judgment, and her converts with righteousness.'—ISAIAH I. 27.

I. THESE prophecies of Isaiah are excellent lessons for us when we are passing through the season of Advent. Advent contains the promise of approaching Christmas, in other words, the promise of the coming of the Prince of Peace. But Advent also is the season which speaks to us of Christ the Judge, who is now and always weighing all our doings in the balance and executing vengeance, swift or slow, upon those who are found wanting; and who will one day appear again to judge the whole world.

And here Isaiah comes in to help us. He shows us the kind of preparation which we need for meeting the coming of the Lord, because his prophecies themselves contain the preparation by which God sought to turn the hearts of the Jews in his days.

II. If we take Isaiah's account of his own people and apply it to ourselves, it is no great wonder if we are unwilling to confess any likeness.

Twenty-six hundred years have not availed to make impossible just such miseries as fell on the countrymen of Isaiah. The sword, the famine, and the pestilence have not yet vanished from the earth or lost their power to slay. I do not say these things to frighten you. What ought really to frighten us is the sin which we cherish and indulge in our own selves. Where that is, then we know there must be judgment; if not by the sword or famine or pestilence, then in some other way. This was the message which Isaiah had to bear to his people; and most surely it has not grown stale and out of date since then.

III. When we receive the message, we call it hard and cruel: we complain that God will not let us alone: we ask what has become of His much talked-of love. It is not hard and cruel: God will not let as alone, just because His name is Love. We by our perverseness have made it impossible to bring us back to our own heavenly home by any dealings less severe: therefore God will not shrink from using them, for all our fretful cries. He knows what we so easily forget, that there is no peace for us but in Him.

And so the darkest day of judgment has always a yet brighter day shining beyond. Through Advent we rise to Christmas. But Christmas will bring no blessing to those who have thought Advent to be only a curse.—F. J. A. HORT, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 1.

REFERENCES.—I. 30, 31.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 9. II. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. li. No. 2922. II. 1-4.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 15. II. 1-5.—W. L. Watkinson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 313. II. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 249. J. H. Newman, Sermons Bearing on Subjects of the Day, p. 245. II. 2, 3, 4.—Sinclair, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 389. D. S. Govett, ibid. vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 358. II. 3.—Brooke Foss Westcott, Village Sermons, p. 13.

SPIRITUAL TRANSFORMATION

'They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks.'—ISAIAH II. 4.

WHEREVER Jesus reigns, this is one of the fruits of His sovereignty. The sword is converted into a plowshare, and the spear into a pruning-hook. The sword is not destroyed. It is transformed.

I. This is the method of Jesus. When I enter the Kingdom of God, and become a member of the pledged and aspiring host, I pass under the active and liberal influence of grace. I bring with me all the powers which I have been exercising in the ways of the world. I bring with me this or that faculty, possessed of so much power. How does the work of grace operate upon me? Does the great King denude me of my powers, and do I remain in the world emasculated, with the compass of my being diminished, and the totality of my energies decreased? Jesus Christ our Lord never diminishes our power. Whatever powers I bring to Him I retain, only I retain them converted and glorified. He takes my swords, and He hands them back to me as plowshares. He takes my spears, and returns them as pruning-hooks.

II. How does the good Lord find us? He finds us with plenty of force in our beings, but it is a force perverted, and, therefore, destructive force. That is how the Lord found Zacchæus. Zacchæus was not a weakling. His force of character was abundant. He was shrewd, cute, enterprising, firm, decisive. He had force enough, but it was the force of a sword, and was being used in self-destruction. When the Lord laid hold of Zacchæus, He did not destroy his shrewdness and despoil him of his foresight and enterprise. The redeemed Zacchæus was just as shrewd as the unredeemed Zacchæus, but the shrewdness had been transformed. It was no longer a poisoned sword; it had become a plowshare used in the general welfare of the race.

III. Redemption does not mean power maimed or power abolished. Redemption means conversion, transformation. Converted force is force with the destructive element extracted, the sword changed into the plowshare and the spear into the pruning-hook.—J. H. JOWETT, Meditations for Quiet Moments, p. 94.

ISAIAH II. 4.

'I BELIEVE,' said John Bright at Edinburgh in 1853, 'that we shall see, and at no very distant time, sound economic principles spreading much more widely amongst the people; a sense of justice growing up in a soil which hitherto has been deemed unfruitful; and, which will be better than all—the churches of the United Kingdom—the churches of Britain awakening, as it were, from their slumbers, and girding up their loins to more glorious work, when they shall not only accept and believe in the prophecy, but labour earnestly for its fulfilment, that there shall come a time—a blessed time—which shall last for ever, "when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more".'

ISAIAH II. 4.

I CANNOT utter to you what I would in this matter; we all see too dimly, as yet, what our great world duties are, to allow any of us to try to outline their enlarging shadows. . . . Reflect that their peace was not won for you by your own hands; but by theirs who long ago jeopardized their lives for you, their children; and remember that neither this inherited peace, not any other, can be kept, but through the same jeopardy. No peace was ever won from Fate by subterfuge or agreement; no peace is ever in store for any of us, but that which we shall win by victory over shame or sin;—victory over the sin that oppresses, as well as over that which corrupts. For many a year to come, the sword of every righteous nation must be whetted to save or to subdue; nor will it be by patience of other's suffering, but by the offering of your own, that you will ever draw nearer to the time when the great change shall pass upon the iron of the earth;—when men shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; neither shall they learn war any more.—RUSKIN, The Two Paths, §§ 195-96.

REFERENCES.—II. 4.—J. Parker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 376. R. F. Horton, ibid. vol. lxxvii. 1905, p. 6. E. W. Attwood, Sermons for Clergy and Laity. II. 4, 5.—J. Clifford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 378.

THE LIGHT OF THE LORD

'O house of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord.'—ISAIAH II. 5.

A VISION, great and splendid, had passed before the Prophet's mind. Jerusalem, lying low amidst the hills, and overshadowed by the mountains of Moab, became exalted above them all, and towered in grandeur towards the skies. Thus exalted, she is a sign and centre to the nations, and along the highways and up the slopes are seen marching, not the tribes of Israel only, but also the peoples of the world, who are hastening to seek instruction from the God of Israel, and to submit themselves to Him as supreme Arbitrator and Ruler. Under His universal sovereignty divisions are healed, and strife ceases, and peace covers the world. The weapons of war are no longer needed, and are applied to peaceful uses. As the glorious scene unfolds itself, God's kingdom, supreme and universal, the nations gathered into it, the Prophet turns to his countrymen to whom God's kingdom had first appeared, and cries, as he points to the coming glory: 'O house of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord'. The earthly Jerusalem was the type of a higher power, the sign of a greater kingdom to be set up in the world. The vision is a picture and prediction of the triumph of Christianity.

I. Come 'Ye'.—The true method of extending Christianity is found in our personal submission to its sway. If we would contribute to its spread and share in its triumph we must begin with ourselves. Here lies the simple path of duty for every man who believes in Christianity, and sees in it the hope of his race.

Christianity ruling in the world is a more pleasant subject to men than Christianity ruling in the sphere of one's own nature and life. The Prophet's countrymen were quite willing that the kingdom of God should be supreme over men, and gloried in the prospect, but were most unwilling that it should be supreme over themselves. Christianity, giving peace to the world and bringing in the happy time when 'the lion shall lie down with the lamb,' is exulted in by many who have no idea of its power on themselves, subduing evil tempers, silencing angry words, and making their lives bright with tenderness and compassion.

Practical Christianity is described as 'walking in the light of the Lord'. Christ must become to us the law of our lives. (1) Life must have constant reference to His stupendous sacrifice. (2) Life must be ruled and directed by the example of Christ. (3) Life must be ennobled and sustained by the fellowship of Christ. 'If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another.'

II. Christianity and Humanity.—The motive to practical Christianity is found in the blessedness for man of universal Christianity. The appeal is inspired by the glory and peace and blessedness the world shall know when it has become the kingdom of God's Son. Therefore, if we are vexed and moved by the woes and evils that oppress humanity, let us ally ourselves with that mighty and beneficent power which shall bring them to an end. If we sigh for the golden age of peace and brotherhood, let us yield ourselves to the sway of Christ's Gospel of love. This is the test of our sincerity. Christianity is all that humanity needs for its true happiness.

III. Christianity as it shall be.—Christianity must be considered in its real and inherent tendencies, and in its ultimate condition, not in its present aspects. We must encourage ourselves, and refute the objections of men, by Christianity in its own nature and purpose, and as it shall be when its triumph is won, and not as it now is, mixed up with the superstitions, the mistakes, the weaknesses, the sins of men. The stately edifice must be judged, if we would know its real character, not while the building is going on, with the scaffolding standing, and heaps of rubbish lying around; with the shouts of the workmen, the noise of the tools; with losses and injuries caused at times by the errors of the builders and by the storms that come; we must look at it and measure it by the design of the great Architect, by its completed proportions, as we have them in the Word of God.

IV. The Importance of Practical Piety.—(1) It is free from any element of doubt and uncertainty. Many objections are taken to Christianity. Men are disputing and wrangling over its doctrines, its modes of worship, its history, and other matters belonging to it. To plunge into controversy cannot but bring unrest to the soul. Concerning practical godliness there can be no dispute. We cannot be wrong in 'doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with our God'. (2) It is the mightiest and surest method of extending Christianity. The glory of the latter days shall shine upon the world, not as the doctrines of Christianity become more accurately formulated, not as its ecclesiastical system becomes perfected, but as its transforming power, purifying the hearts and lives of men, becomes more widely felt and seen. 'O house of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord.'

REFERENCES.—II. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2713. W. J. Knox-Little, Sunlight and Shadow, p. 106; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 126. H. P. Liddon, Advent in St. Paul's, p. 37. J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 371. II. 5-22.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 21. II. 7, 8.—J. H. Jowett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 353. II. 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. li. No. 2922. F. D. Maurice, The Prayer Book and the Lord's Prayer, p. 15. J. Keble, Sermons for Advent to Christmas Eve, p. 279. II. 12.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 1. II. 17.—Hugh Price Hughes, Essential Christianity, p. 233. II. 22.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 9. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1984. III. 3.—J. Parker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 322. III. 4; IV. 1.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 30. III. 10, 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 729. W. Brooke, ibid. p. 207. IV. 5.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 12. R. Ellis, The Church in the Wilderness, p. 45. IV. 6.—R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1904, p. 81. V.—C. Gore, ibid. vol. lxix. 1906, p. 182. V. 1.—T. Arnold, Sermons, vol. iv. p. 289. V. 1-2.—R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 322. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, vol. i. p. 15. V. 1-7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2480. V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 34. V. 2.—A. H. Bradford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 171.

THE RETURN TO CHRIST'S LOVE

(Good Friday)

*And now, O inhabitants of Jerusalem, and men of Judah, judge, I pray you, betwixt Me and My vineyard. What could have been done more to My vineyard, that I have not done in it? Wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes?—ISAIAH V. 3, 4.

CONSIDER the return made to that love of our Redeemer; the return made by the multitudes—the return made by His enemies—the return made by His special and familiar friends, and, lastly, the return made by the world which He has redeemed.

I. What was the Return Made by the Multitudes?—the multitudes who had seen His mighty works, who had been for the time so struck and impressed by His words. When they saw Him in the hands of His enemies they changed their minds about Him, and were ready to believe those who told them that He was a false Prophet and an impostor. It was they—these foolish, thoughtless, ungrateful multitudes—who were made the instruments of His Crucifixion.

II. What was the Return Made by His Enemies for that sincere and unfeigned love that sought to open their eyes, and hold them back from the wickedness on which they were bent—that love which, if it could not alarm their consciences by the awful vision of the truth which it had disclosed to them, was yet ready to forgive them, ready to die for them? From these there was only one return to be expected. For the truth which He had told them they paid Him back with a double and intenser hatred. For the way in which He had proved His own innocence, and goodness, and wisdom, against their plausible and ensnaring attempts to find it at fault, they resolved all the more that the holier and more unblameable He appeared, the more obstinately would they refuse to acknowledge Him, the more certainly should He perish.

III. But what Return for His Love was Made by those Friends on whom He had lavished the treasures of a love and tenderness without example? Where were they, and what were they doing, when the hour came to try their faithfulness, their constancy, their promises of standing by Him to the last? 'Then all the disciples forsook Him, and fled.' At the first approach of danger all their brave speeches were forgotten. All the great things which they would dare in His company, and for His sake, shrink into selfishness and panic fright. In the Apostles we but see the reflection of our own doings towards our Master.

IV. How has the World Repaid the Love by which it was Redeemed?—It has bowed before Him. It has accepted His Gospel. It has made His Cross the most honourable of its emblems and badges, and placed it, sparkling with jewels, on the crowns of kings. But was this outward earthly honour what Christ sought in return for His love to men? What He suffered for was to make men better. And how has the world learnt the lesson? Is the face of it changed since His coming? Have those multitudes, for whom He died, left off their sins? Think of that dreadful truth, the wickedness of the world: think of the hardness and boldness of the bad, the weakness and imperfection of the good. And, according as we are able to take in the vastness and depth of the fact itself, we shall be able to measure the return which mankind has made to that infinite love of Christ, which stooped from heaven as low as to shame and death, to raise up the souls of His creatures from their self-chosen misery and sin.

V. What Return are we, Personally, Making to our Redeemer's Love?—We know the only return He cares for—a life which helps, so far as it goes, to make this world really His kingdom—a life which follows Him, trying to reproduce in its own course some shadow of His love, His tenderness, His godliness, His humility, His mercy, His hatred of sin, His courage for the truth—a life in which He lives again in the souls of His servants and followers—a life in which the Cross is set up, for our pride, our unkindness, our selfishness, to be nailed to—a life in which we are neither ashamed, nor afraid, to have our portion, to risk our all, with Christ.—R. W. CHURCH, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 122.

REFERENCE.—V. 3, 4.—R. Waddy Moss, The Discipline of the Soul, p. 105.

WILD FLOWERS—THE THYME AND THE DAISY

ISAIAH V. 4.

THE one, scented as with incense—medicinal—and in all gentle and humble ways, useful. The other, scentless—helpless for ministry to the body; infinitely dear as the bringer of light, ruby, white, and gold; the three colours of the Day, with no hue of shade in it. . . . Now in these two families you have typically Use opposed to Beauty in wildness; it is their wildness which is their virtue;—that the thyme is sweet where it is unthought of, and the daisies red, where the foot despises them; while, in other orders, wildness is their crime,—'Wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes?' But in all of them you must distinguish between the pure wildness of flowers and their distress. It may not be our duty to tame them; but it must be, to relieve.—RUSKIN, Proserpina, ch. vii., §§ 1, 3.

REFERENCES.—V. 8.—D. Graham, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 135. H. R. Heywood, Sermons and Addresses, p. 163. V. 8-24.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 39. V. 8-30.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah I.-XLVIII. p. 13. V. 18.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxi. No. 1821. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 12. W. W. Battershall, Interpretations of Life and Religion, p. 155. V. 18, 19.—H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 394.

PERVERSIONS OF CONSCIENCE

'Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness.'—ISAIAH V. 20.

I. WE are all liable to call evil good, and good evil. Not intentionally, of course, but from ignorance. A pure and enlightened conscience is indeed a moral instrument of extraordinary delicacy and precision.

It is an open window which transmits the very light of God Himself. In the very act of obeying that light we are brought nearer to Him whom conscience reveals to us as the All Holy and the All Pure. But all men's consciences are not pure and enlightened. In every one of us the moral sense needs to be educated before it can reflect with any accuracy the holy law of God.

Jesus, the Saviour of the world, 'came to His own, and His own received Him not'. The men among whom He went about doing good, called His good evil, and loved their own darkness better than His God-given light.

II. What, then, is the lesson from it?

The moral of Christ's rejection by the Jews is not that conscience was dead in them. On the contrary, conscience was alive, it was active, energetic, but its judgments were strangely perverted by prejudice and party spirit. Even though we may demur to the commonly received notion that it was our sin that nailed Christ to the cross, it was certainly the sin of human beings like ourselves—a sin of which average human nature is not incapable. The obstinate blindness, the furious animosity of those Jews of old, are among the mainsprings of action which the average man among us recognizes in the world around him, and finds slumbering in the depths of his own heart.

Does not our own experience teach us how hard it is to do even common justice to those who do not adopt our shibboleths, and whose teaching and action we think to be mischievous? So inextricable is the moral confusion that sets in when men once let their passions and their prejudices decide for them, instead of that dry light of conscience which judges men and things according to the eternal standards of heavenly truth. Considerations of this kind should help us to appreciate and to account for the atrocious calumnies that were levelled at our Lord by the Jewish authorities of His day.

III. There is truth of a certain sort in the most malignant caricature. Malice, as a rule, does not invent; it finds it easier to distort and to pervert some recognizable features of the person whom it is desirable to write down. Hence it was that the libels upon Jesus found a certain currency, and they were even adopted by men who ought to have known better, had not the light that was in them been obscured by darkness. For when His enemies taxed Jesus with being a Sabbath-breaker, when they called Him a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber, the friend of publicans and sinners; when they accused Him of deceiving the people; when they taunted Him with being a Samaritan, these were not so much malignant lies as slanders, in the sense in which moral caricatures are always slanders.

As taunts those words died eighteen hundred years ago. But as a deep moral lesson, and as a striking illustration of the blinding, perverting power of hatred and prejudice, they are alive, and they speak to us this very day.—J. W. SHEPARD, Light and Life, p. 38.

REFERENCES.—V. 20.—J. Addison Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 568. VI.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2304. A. B. Davidson, The Called of God, p. 187.

REDEEMING VISION

'In the year that King Uzziah died, I saw also the Lord.'—ISAIAH VI. 1.

In all life's necessary contact and inevitable contest with reality, nothing is more needed than the uplifted eye with its power of vision, which is the power of purity. To see 'also the Lord' is alike the secret of steadfastness and the guarantee of that knowledge in the midst of perplexity, which alone liberates from fretful anxiety and unbelief, and leads to right choice and wise action.

I. In connexion with duty, how indispensable is the sight of the ever-present Lord. The supremacy of duty is one of the insistent facts of life. Its calls are clamant and will not be denied, and its claims are often tyrannous. As the sunlight falling upon common objects gilds them with a beauty not their own, so the knowledge of God's purpose transmutes the base metal of an ordinary life into the gold of His glory and transforms duty into delight. For to see Him thus as the Lord of all duty is to see Him also as the Lord of all power. He has appointed you. He is hence committed to the responsibility of equipping you with strength both to endure and to do.

II. Again, with regard to the discipline by which alone any one can be made holy, we need to see 'also the Lord'. Otherwise the providences by which He seeks to teach and bless us will be misinterpreted, and we shall lose their value. The cup of bitterness is only acceptable when we know that it is 'the cup which my Father hath given me to drink'. To see Him as the Lord of love and wisdom, and to know that 'He doth not willingly afflict the children of men,' will alone serve to interpret His doings to the stricken heart and give 'songs in the night'.

III. In our joys, too, we need to see 'also the Lord,' or we are almost certain to be led astray by means of them into mere selfishness. All that is bright and beautiful in the world is one's to use and to enjoy, and its withdrawal is only made necessary when absorption in the gift disturbs our relationship with the Giver.

IV. The same need of seeing 'also the Lord' is obvious also in the realm of our desires. What a gulf there often is between our intentions and our attainments. The desire for holy living may possess us while the power for its realization is lacking, and consequently action is paralysed. He Who works in you 'to will' also works in you 'to do' of His good pleasure, and your desires are hence not weights but wings.—J. STUART HOLDEN, Redeeming Vision, p. 1.

ISAIAH'S VISION

'In the year that King Uzziah died I saw also the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and His train filled the temple.'—ISAIAH VI. 1.

THERE was a political crisis in Israel at this time. After years of privacy and suffering King Uzziah died of leprosy, and a royal funeral had just taken place. Jotham, his son, was elevated at once from the regency to the throne, and swayed his sceptre over the temporal destinies of Israel. It was at this juncture that the magnificent vision described in this morning's lesson was vouchsafed to the Prophet. The design of it was that the Prophet should reveal it to the people.

1. The Vision.—There are three things about the vision which passed before the Prophet that we may well ponder.

1. It transpired in the temple. Isaiah knew that, according to His covenant pledge, God would be there to meet him at this critical period. Nor was he disappointed. As he stood by the altar, and poured out his full soul, he heard the Divine voice, and his cares were at once removed. 'It is good to draw nigh unto God at all times,' but especially when the shadow of a great trial clouds the soul; for then God not only scatters the darkness, but causes the sunshine to come in its stead. Yet anxious souls are sometimes exceedingly reluctant to go in their sorrow to the temple, to meet and talk with God concerning it.

2. It revealed the Lord. As the Prophet remained by the altar—only a mortal and sinful man—the veil of the Holy of holies was drawn aside, and he beheld a throne of burning splendour, the seat of authority, from which the laws of the universe issued and its interests were administered. It was 'high and lifted up,' indicating its pre-eminency over all other thrones. And on it 'the Lord' was seated in calm, sublime majesty, as a monarch to govern and a judge to condemn or approve. His retinue was great and glorious, consisting of all ranks of celestials—seraphim, and other holy and happy spirits. And 'His train' corresponded with His throne and attendants. Whatever its textures, the robe was of unsullied purity and dazzling effulgence, such as became the perfection and dignity of the wearer. But who was He? Jesus—the Second Person of the adorable Trinity (St. John xii. 41).

3. It inspired the angels. As they flew and clustered round the throne, and saw, with the Prophet, the glory of the Lord of the throne, they rendered befitting homage to Him; they covered their faces with their wings in adoring reverence, and seraph responded antiphonally to seraph—'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of His glory!' Thus rapturously they sang, until the whole temple was one mighty wave of harmonious praise, and its pillars trembled with the sound of their voices. More 'the house was filled with smoke'—the symbol and proof that Jehovah-Jesus was there. Such worship is in the temple above the stars (Rev. iv.); and in this we hope one long and blissful day to take our part (1 Peter i. 3-5; Rev. vii. 9-17).

II. Its Effect on the Prophet.—1. He was overwhelmed with fear. No wonder: like as Moses did, he was looking on God. Such fear was natural. It was like that which Moses felt; but we ought never to feel it (Heb. xii. 18-24).

2. He was conscious of defilement. The splendour and excellency around the Prophet led him to introspect himself, and as he beheld the awful contrast between his inner self and that outer glory he exclaimed, 'Woe is me! for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips; for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts'. The lips of the seraphic choristers were clean, because their hearts were clean; and Isaiah felt that he and Israel needed lips and hearts pure as theirs before he and they could praise God as He was then being praised. So he despaired; and yet his very despair, arising from an overwhelming sense of his own and his people's defilement, showed that he had a God-enlightened mind (1 Cor. ii. 9, 10).

3. He was restored to purity. For a little while he was 'in heaviness,' until, indeed, one of the seraphim took a live coal with his sacred tongs from off the altar, and laid it on the lips which had confessed their uncleanness, and, as God's representative, said unto him, 'Lo! this hath touched thy lips, and thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin purged'. That moment salvation was his, and heaven too! So now: no sooner is the precious Blood of Jesus brought by the Holy Spirit into touch with the soul of the penitent believer than all its defilement is cleansed, and it becomes whiter than snow.

REFERENCES.—VI. 1.—J. E. Macfadyen, The City with Foundations, p. 107; J. H. Jowett, Meditations for Quiet Moments, p. 125: see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 81. J. E. Roberts, Studies in the Lord's Prayer, p. 47. C. H. Wright, The Unrecognized Christ, p. 157. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 24.—VI. 1-3.—Hugh Price Hughes, Essential Christianity, p. 217. W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 156. R. C. Trench, Sermons New and Old, p. 98. W. J. Hocking, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 86. VI. 1-7.—W. M. Punshon, Isaiah's Vision, p. 527. W. Baxendale, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 187. V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 43.

THE DISCIPLINE OF AWE

'In the year that King Uzziah died I saw the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and His train filled the temple. Above Him stood the seraphims: each one had six wings; with twain He covered His face, and with twain He covered His feet, and with twain He did fly. And one cried unto another, and said, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts: the whole earth is full of His glory. And the foundations of the thresholds were moved at the voice of Him that cried, and the house was filled with smoke. Then said I, Woe is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips: for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts. Then flew one of the seraphim unto me, having a live coal in his hand, which he had taken with the tongs from off the altar: and he touched my mouth with it, and said, Lo this hath touched thy lips; and thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin purged,' etc.—ISAIAH VI. 1-8.

We cannot contemplate the spectacle which Isaiah describes—if we deal truly with ourselves—without feeling our eyes grow dazzled and our hearts tremble. But the description is given to us for this very purpose. We all need the discipline, the inspiration of awe. Wonder—this fear of the Lord—is always the beginning of wisdom. And we specially need the discipline, the inspiration now.

I. There is, I think, great danger lest the realism, the externality, the earthliness which have spread over modern life and thought should dominate our religion. We are tempted to treat Divine things with a strange familiarity, to use human modes of conception and feeling and representation not only as provisional helps towards the formation of spiritual ideas, as we must, but as the measures of them. We draw sharp outlines which can have no existence in the brightness which is about the throne. So it comes to pass that symbols, outward acts, formulas, the Holy Sacraments themselves in many cases, tend to confine and narrow the devotion which they were designed to elevate and enlarge. But we cannot rest with impunity in that which is of this world. So to rest is to lose the highest. To pierce through the outward is to find a new world. Isaiah felt this when the eyes of his heart were opened. The whole aspect of the temple service, august as it was, was changed for him. When the veil was withdrawn, he saw not what he looked for—the Ark and the carved cherubim, and the luminous cloud—but the Lord in His kingly state, and angels standing with outstretched wings ready to serve, and the earth full of His glory as an illimitable background to the marvellous scene. Something like this it is which we must strain the eyes of our heart to see, and having seen to interpret to our people. For the Incarnation, which is our message, has made the prophetic vision permanent.

II. No one of us would question in words our Lord's immutable Deity. No one would question that He came to us in the Father's name, to reveal the Father to us. Yet is it not true that we are tempted to substitute Him for the Father to whose presence He leads us? Is it not true that our faith in consequence is in peril of becoming unmanly, sentimental, fantastic, unbraced by the generous discipline of reverence, unpurified by the spiritual fire of awe? Such questions cannot be answered hastily. But at least they may lead us to try ourselves. Let us cling, cling to the last, to the true humanity of our Saviour and our Advocate, but let us follow Him in reverence where He is, follow Him to the glory which He had before the world began, follow Him to the throne of the Father, His Father and our Father. So will a holy fear—the most elevating of all emotions—mingle with adoration as we bow ourselves before the One only God, seen, as Isaiah saw Him, in His glorious majesty.—B. F. WESTCOTT, Peterborough Sermons, p. 267.

REFERENCES.—VI. 1-8.—R. J. Campbell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 273. R. S. Candlish, Sermons, p. 86. A. B. Webb, Principles of Missions, S.P.C. Tracts, 1897-1904. VI. 1-13.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 18. VI. 2.—Ibid. p. 29. VI. 3.—S. R. Driver, Sermons on Subjects Connected with the Old Testament, p. 28; see also The Anglican Pulpit of To-day, p. 456. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part iii. p. 38. J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 387. E. H. Eland, ibid. vol. lxx. 1904, p. 375. B. F. Westcott, The Anglican Pulpit of To-day, p. 234. J. Baines, Twenty Sermons, p. 241. C. Hargrove, Our Reasonable Service, p. 3. J. Keble, Sermons for Ascension Day to Trinity Sunday, p. 364. VI. 4.

—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. II. p. 33.

THE VISION OF GOD

'Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of Hosts: the whole earth is full of His glory.'—ISAIAH VI. 3.

I. The Vision of God is, the Call of the Prophet.—Nowhere is the thought presented to us in the Bible with more moving force than in the record of Isaiah's mission.

II. Isaiah's Vision, Isaiah's Call, are for Us also, and Await from Us a Like Response.—What Isaiah saw was, St. John (xii. 41) tells us, Christ's glory.

III. The Prophet's Teaching Must be the Translation of His Experience.—He bears witness of that which he has seen. His words are not an echo but a living testimony. The heart alone can speak to the heart. But he who has beheld the least fragment of the Divine glory; he who has spelt out in letters of light on the face of the world one syllable of the Triune Name, will have a confidence and a power which nothing else can bring.

IV. The Vision of God is the Chastening of the Prophet.—B. F. WESTCOTT, The Contemporary Pulpit, vol. v. p. 363.

ISAIAH'S VISION

(For Trinity Sunday)

'Mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts.'—ISAIAH VI. 5.

ISAIAH was worshipping in the temple court; and as he knelt he beheld in ecstatic vision the way lying open to the Holy of holies.

The temple on earth became the miniature of the temple in heaven. A wonderful access to God was granted to the Prophet.

Other worshippers saw the outward ritual, the Shekinah, the carved figures of the angels, the vapour of the incense; he saw what their eyes could not see, the King of Glory clothed in His Majesty, the row of adoring seraphim, the future intercession of the Redeemer, and the prayers of the saints in His Name.

I. The effect of the vision on the Prophet. Not what we might have expected—not joy, or satisfaction; but, at first, consternation, a sense of his own sinfulness. (So St. Peter, 'Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord'; and St. Paul at Damascus.) Isaiah sees his own sinfulness and that of others, as he had not seen it before; and the cry of anguish is wrung from his heart: 'Woe is me! for I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips; for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts'.

And then there came to the humble and contrite spirit the message from the altar of Divine Love, the live coal touching his lips, the assurance of mercy and pardon: 'This hath touched thy lips, thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin purged'.

He is ready now to go forth in obedience to the will of God. To him there came the call to work: 'Whom shall I send, and who will go for Us?' It is the voice of the King. Isaiah asks no questions about the mission; he hesitates not; he is ready for instant service. 'Here am I; send me; ready to speak Thy word; to do Thy work.'

II. What does this vision say to us to-day?

It speaks to us of a new view of life, a new view of truth, presenting a new ideal.

(a) Our lives are shaped by the ideal which presents itself to us; and there are many ideals.

With some, the ideal is the life of pleasure—self-indulgence is the keynote of their lives.

With others, the ideal of life is ambition. To rise, that is the point: to rise in social position, in influence; to make a good marriage; to belong to a smart set.

With others, the ideal of life is gain. Everything is made subservient to this—to the acquisition of something they can touch, and hoard; it involves one advantage, hard work; but the result is the same—self is the centre.

Others have no ideal at all, but are simply drifting through life; acting only on the impulse of the moment: whose lives begin, continue, and look as though they might end, in nothing.

Others have indeed set before themselves an ideal, a high one, which they have struggled to attain, but fallen far short of their aspirations; their efforts futile, their lives anything but lofty; and they have been tempted to abandon the effort.

(b) What shall arouse us from these false, degrading, and selfish ideals? One thing only—a new view of life; a vision of some great truth hitherto hidden, now borne with overwhelming force upon the soul.

This was the turning-point in Isaiah's career; one moving idea possessed and stirred the depth of his spirit: 'Mine eyes have seen the King'. Henceforth all is changed. New aims, objects, desires, rise to beckon him on; he is transformed; the old self dies; he is a new man.

So it will always be with the man who sees the true vision. In his unrenowned state he owns no supreme ruler, he follows natural impulse, he obeys his lower nature. But when once truth, the light of God, dawns upon his heart, his eyes are opened; he learns that earthly hopes die down, earthly pleasures fail to satisfy; that man is small, that God is all in all; that 'life is real and earnest'; that henceforth his life shall be ruled by a Personal Will—a Will that has claims on his soul's best affections.

III. 'Mine eyes have seen the King.' St. John tells us that it was the glory of Jesus Christ: 'These things said Esaias when he saw His glory'—the glory of the enthroned Christ.

What he saw in shadow we have seen in historic presence. God has entered into fellowship with humanity—lived, toiled, and suffered here; now He reigns in Human Form on high. When this truth permeates the heart, heaven is opened and religious truth becomes real. We see that God has a plan laid down for us; that Christ's will should be our law; that He has a personal knowledge of, love for, and claim upon, each of us.

The effect of the 'vision,' of religious conviction, will be—

1. A personal sense of sin—moral failure: 'I am a man of unclean lips'; the lips symbolizing the inward life, which needs purification. The conviction of failure and sin is sure to force itself upon the man who can say 'Mine eyes have seen the King'.

2. Unhappiness about others. We are all members of one another; so we read and think and profess, though we do not always act up to the truth. It is impossible not to become more or less alive and sensitive to the moral tone of others; the personal is bound up with the social sense of sin: 'I dwell among a people of unclean lips'. This lies at the root of all missionary and philanthropic effort. If a man has seen the 'King,' the sense of others' wretchedness cannot but press upon his heart.

IV. The call to service, and the response.

After the vision of enlightenment, and the fire of love, came a voice: 'Whom shall I send, and who will go for Us?' The voice is sounding now; all about us, at home, abroad. Who will go? It appeals to all, but especially to the young and richly endowed, to stand out as witnesses for Christ and the Truth.

This is the great present-day need—a new, higher, nobler, purer view of life, its meaning, destinies, ends. May God open our eyes to see things as they are; may He kindle in us love for Christ, that we may count it all honour to serve Him in serving the brotherhood.

REFERENCES.—VI. 5.—Archbishop Thomson, Lent Sermons, 1868, p. 55. W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 151. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 36. VI. 6, 7.—G. Body, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 161. R. J. Campbell, ibid. vol. lvi. 1899, p. 360. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 17.

THE DIVINE CALL

'Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? . . . Here am I; send me.'—ISAIAH VI. 8.

I. If there be in faith, in work, in character, a living response to God's love and truth, life becomes a lesson of His teaching, an interpretation of His will, a reflection of His love to the age in which we live, to those for whom we are called to work. The call, the appointed work, will not be the same for all. 'There are . . . many kinds of voices in the world,' each with its own signification, each with its own power to tell out the praises of God; if one be silent, God's self-revealing is less than perfect.

II. Consider some of those through whom God's purpose of the ages has had its fulfilment. We may learn helpful lessons of life from them.

Abraham, accepting his high vocation with a courageous faith that made him 'the friend of God'.

Moses at the Bush, conquering his fear and hesitation, and proving worthy to stand alone as the one prophet 'whom the Lord knew face to face'.

The child Samuel answering the Divine voice, 'Speak, for Thy servant heareth,' and through his innocent-hearted obedience becoming 'established to be a prophet of the Lord'.

Isaiah, gazing upon his glorious vision, hearing a call that was in itself a revelation of highest truth, and answering in all humility, 'Here am I; send me'.

The Blessed Virgin Mary, receiving with all womanly modesty, humility, and self-surrender, the annunciation of the honour and the mystery for which she is for ever called blessed.

St. John, living his loving life under the control and by the inspiration of the eternal truth that 'God is Love'.

St. Paul, blinded by the glory which shone from the presence of the Risen and Ascended Christ, crying, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' and yielding himself to do and to suffer with a lion-hearted courage and a quenchless faith.

III. Consider the facts and truths which have been in the past the vehicle or the interpretation of God's call to ourselves.

What directed us to our work? How were we called? Had we a strong unmistakable call such as those we have just now considered? Most of you have had no such call.

What we call the accidents and commonplace things of life are generally the vehicle, or the interpretation of a Divine call. Did your work lead to a discovery in yourself of power or capacity before unknown? Did it show you ways of glad usefulness, of wondrous self-realization, of sweet rewards? While it brings out your individuality, does it also make higher calls upon your being? Then God is calling you, through your work, to that ministry in which you may best glorify Him, and develop each your own peculiar baptismal gift.—G. BRET, Fellowship With God, p. 3.

REFERENCES.—VI. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 687; vol. xxiii. No. 1351. F. W. Farrar, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 328. T. Allen, ibid. vol. lix. 1901, p. 315. H. H. Montgomery, ibid. vol. lxi. p. 281. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Holy-Tide Teaching, p. 218. A. Maclaren, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 169. VI. 8, 9.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 48.

HOW LONG?

'Also I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Then said I, Here am I; send me. And He said, Go, and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not. Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed. Then said I, Lord, how long?'—ISAIAH VI. 8-11.

I. The Wall of Obstruction.—There is the terrible discipline of God's messenger! To be the bearer of a Divine mission is to find yourself, at once, faced by a blind wall of obstruction. It is so fixed and strong that there is nothing you can do against it. What appeal can you make to hearts that are too gross to be stirred, and have no faculties wherewith to understand?

The late Lord Salisbury came back from Constantinople, in the old days of black disaster in the East, to tell us why he had failed to achieve a single reform.

'The Turkish officials,' he said, 'simply have not the capacities to understand what we mean.' There is no getting over the preliminary difficulty. If the capacities to understand what we mean are not there, we had better go home at once.

And this was to be the bitter result, to Isaiah, of being sent by God. And worse. He was to find that it was his own message which deepened the damage. Man shuts up at the touch of the Divine message just as strange creatures that we find on the seashore withdraw their tentacles and feelers at our touch and disappear into the silence of their shells. Nothing now can get at them, or tempt them forth into the open again. If we had not touched they would be still open and visible. It was the touch that was fatal. So with the prophetic message.

If man is free, then of sheer necessity Divine manifestations cannot be made without giving him, without forcing upon him, a moral judgment. The tenderness of Jesus had to endure the sting of the dread confusion: 'For judgment I am come into this world'. 'If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin; but now they have no cloke for their sin.' We shudder at the moral truth.

II. The Light Beyond the Blackness.—I want you to recognize the effect on the Prophet of recognizing that at which we shudder. Just because it is so hard, so terrifying, so black, therefore he knows that it is not all. The misery of such a disaster as that which has been portrayed would of itself prompt God to further action. The Prophet is utterly sure of this; sure of it by premonitory instinct; and, therefore, the dreadful result that is to follow his mission does but draw from him the expression of an unconquerable hope. Lord, how long, how long? Night bears in itself, as it were, the verdict of its vanishing. Through the darkness of the night we know what it is that we miss; and what we miss God will bring us. That is what the Jew in his prophetic optimism never ceased to assert. The fact that we miss it is a proof that it will come. Therefore, we have hope under the night.

III. So he spoke; and he was right. He had read God's mind. There was a secret behind, a secret hope. True, the immediate interval of judgment, he was told, was to be sharp and sweeping. Cities would be wasted, the land utterly desolate. There would be a great forsaking, but underneath all this fierce wrath the good residue would be saved; would be sifted out; would be disciplined; would be perfected. Underneath and behind the terror the Divine compassion would be at work securing the true seed.

'Lord, how long?' We are to utter these words in the face of all disasters, in the teeth of every storm.—H. SCOTT HOLLAND, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXXIII. 1908, p. 40.

REFERENCES.—VI. 9-13.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 52. VI. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 121. VII. 1-9.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 57. VII. 1-16.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2305. VII. 4.—W. L. Watkinson, Christian World

Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 218. VII. 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2305. J. E. Roberts, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1807, p. 321. VII. 9-14.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 61.

GOD WITH US

(Sunday after Christmas)

'And shall call His name Immanuel.'—ISAIAH VII. 14.

I. We may well say first, that all our best Christmas thoughts are summed up in this word. We think of the Holy Child not simply as heaven's gift to the world, but as the coming down of heaven itself into the world. 'Lo, I am with you alway,' is the alpha and omega of the Incarnation. 'Immanuel, God with us!' That is the very meat and drink of our faith. The gift that came to the world that first Christmas morning has never been withdrawn for a moment. It is perennial and inexhaustible, new every morning, fresh every evening.

II. The word comes to us with equal appropriateness as we consider the approaching close of the year. It comes laden with suggestions of gratitude, and musical too with prophetic voices of glad and assuring promise. You have often been conscious of the Divine hand upon you, and a thousand times when you were not conscious you have discovered afterwards that it was most surely there. He who has been as the shadow of a great rock behind, as a covert from the tempest, as a guiding and protecting pillar of fire; He whose angel presence has journeyed with us through many a wilderness, and across many a divided sea, will just repeat Himself in the story which has yet to be written before our lives reach their final rest. Immanuel! there is no word like that. God with us. That is the best of all, it leaves nothing wanting.

III. And that is what we feel not only about ourselves but about the world at large. We might despair if we thought that God came and went, that Christ lived and died and vanished. But no thoughts of fear can ever disturb those who believe that the Incarnation meant a perpetual fact, a gift never recalled, a power that never ceases to work, a promise that is always hastening to its fulfilment. There can be no doubt about the future of him whose faith is planted deep in and girded round by this truth of truths, 'Immanuel, God with us'.—J. G. GREENHOUGH, Christian Festivals and Anniversaries, p. 238.

REFERENCES.—VII. 14.—"Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ix. p. 91. Canon Ainger, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 12. VII. 14, 15.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xl. No. 2392. VIII. 6.—W. A. Gray, The Shadow of the Hand, p. 48. VIII. 6, 7.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 45. VIII. 11-20.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 69. VIII. 17.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 4. A. Murray, Waiting on God, p. 84. VIII. 18.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xx. No. 1194. VIII. 20.—J. H. Blake, Penny Pulpit, vol. xiv. No. 810, p. 166. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 172. VIII. 22.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 73. IX. 1.—

C. S. Robinson, Simon Peter, p. 89. IX. 1, 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvi. No. 2163. IX. 2.—A. MacLeod, Days of Heaven Upon Earth, p. 262. W. H. Lyttelton, Missionary Sermons at Hagley, p. 13. IX. 2-7.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 48. IX. 3.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2265. W. Michell, Plain Preaching to Poor People (5th Series), p. 1. J. Weller, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 260. IX. 5, 6.—Lyman Abbott, ibid. vol. xlix. 1896, p. 20. A. P. Stanley, Sermons on Special Occasions, p. 34.

THE GIFT OF PEACE

'The Prince of Peace.'—ISAIAH IX. 6.

'There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked.'—ISAIAH LVII. 21.

WHAT a contrast these two texts present! The wicked—those living apart from God—have no peace; but to those who know the Incarnate Son of God to be their Saviour, He is their Peace—the Prince of Peace. Let us look at Him, and then at the great inward gift that He comes to convey to us.

I. Peace inherent in Christ's Nature.—Whatever Christ is, He is by nature, not by circumstance. If He is a King, He is so by nature; if He is the Redeemer, it is because He has willed it with His Father and the Holy Spirit; if He is a Saviour, He is the only Saviour, none other can save us; and so when we speak of Him as 'the Prince of Peace,' we see that that peace is inherent in Himself. When He took our nature, He took it into union with His Godhead. We know that He was tempted in all points; we recognize His physical suffering, and, what is more, and much worse, the agony of mind and heart, the iron entering into the very soul. We cannot understand how that is consistent with His abiding in perfect peace, yet we know that it was so. He is the Prince of Peace because He possessed peace in Himself. Peace rests in the Christian's heart just because it belongs to Jesus Christ. What Christ is in other natures that He conveys, and He conveys it by necessity.

II. The Gift of Peace.—He brings, then, peace!

(a) He has made you at peace with God. The punishment of our sins has been bought by His satisfaction of the justice of God.

(b) He has given you His peace. You remember His own words that seem to sum up all He can possibly do. They are the last, and so, as is usual with Him, the best. Listen to them: 'Peace I leave with you, My peace I give unto you'. And He places His peace, if you will have it, right down in your inmost soul. In these last words He was careful to point out 'Not as the world giveth, give I unto you'. When one of us gives some small pledge or present to a friend, a moment before it belonged to the giver, the next it has passed with affection to the receiver. It has ceased to be the property of the one, and has become the possession of the other. Not so Christ! He does not give in that way; His peace remains His own, not merely because He has parted with none of it, but for a deeper and better reason. The gift which passes between you and me marks our separateness, but the gift that is possessed by you and by Jesus Christ testifies to our union with Him. It is in Him that it is enjoyed, and in Him alone.

III. The Character of Peace.—There is peace and peace! Some persons make a wilderness, burn the towns, sweep the crops, kill the men, and then set up an inscription that they have made peace! There is peace which is a name only. There is a peace which is an end, and there is a peace which is unworthy, and a peace which is crushing. It is not the peace of Jesus Christ. The peace He enjoys, and that He conveys, is the peace of God. It is consistent with the completest and most tremendous activity. No saint ever lived without peace as the rule of his life, but no saint ever found in peace his end. The more that the Prince of Peace dwells in our hearts the greater will be our desire and our capacity to serve Him.

REFERENCES.—IX. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 214; vol. iv. No. 215; vol. v. No. 258; vol. vi. No. 291; vol. xii. No. 724. F. W. Aveling, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 249. II. Hensley Henson, ibid. vol. lix. 1901, p. 6; see also ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 9. J. Morgan Gibbon, ibid. vol. lxxv. 1904, p. 113. J. Bannerman, Sermons, pp. 108, 128. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 52. C. J. Ridgeway, The King and His Kingdom, p. 40. W. H. Murray, The Fruits of the Spirit, p. 146. J. Lockie, Sermons Preached at Ibrox, p. 229. H. P. Liddon, Advent in St. Paul's, p. 257; see also Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 174. T. De Witt Talmage, Sermons, p. 52. C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Jesus, p. 339. Jesse Butt, The Soul's Escape, p. 5. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part i. p. 59. J. Keble, Sermons for Christmas and Epiphany, pp. 49, 79. IX. 6, 7.—J. Vickery, Ideals of Life, p. 295. V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah, I.-XII. p. 77. Stopford A. Brooke, The Old Testament and Modern Life, p. 303. C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 346. IX. 7.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 232. J. Clifford, The Secret of Jesus, p. 171. J. B. Mozley, Sermons Parochial and Occasional, p. 244. IX. 13.—C. H. Sharpe, Church Times, vol. xlviii. 1902, p. 48. IX. 16, 17.—C. F. Aked, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 387. IX. 29.—J. Percival, Sermons at Rugby, p. 127. X. 5-19.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah, I.-XII. p. 81.

THE BOASTING AXE

'Shall the axe boast itself against him that heweth therewith? or shall the saw magnify itself against him that shaketh it? as if the rod should shake itself against them that lift it up, or as if the staff should lift up itself, as if it were no wood.'—ISAIAH X. 15.

WHAT would be the result if we had amongst us through and through a most hearty and loyal and loving reception of the great doctrine of Divine sovereignty, the great doctrine that all things are settled and decreed and arranged.

I. If we could really believe these elementary truths we should have a great unit in society. Man did not make society, and man cannot destroy it; man did not make mystery, and man cannot solve it, unless by God's enlightenment and special permission.

Out of this acceptance of the Divine sovereignty comes a grand religious brotherhood, as well as a deep satisfaction and noble peace. God did it all.

II. We must have a sceptre, a throne, a king. We as Christian students and believers have accepted the idea that God reigns, and by God we mean the loving, personal, redeeming God, the God incarnate in Christ Jesus, the God of Bethlehem, of Calvary, and of Olivet; the priest God, who loved us, who gave His Son to save us. That is what we believe; and, believing that, out of it comes a whole philosophy of daily life, of social responsibility, and of all manner of well-regulated and harmonic action. Now which is the greater—for we must have great and small; these distinctions are not of our own making—which is the greater, I will ask you, the man who wrote the book—being Paradise Lost or Homer's Iliad—the man who wrote the book or the man who bound it? I wonder if you could constitute yourselves into a committee and appoint a sub-committee in order to return an answer to that inquiry? Which had the greater mind, judging both men from the evidence that is accessible? The one man wrote the book, the other man bound it; the book has achieved universal and imperishable fame, and the bookbinder has—been paid. Which is the greater? oh, tell me! the picture or the frame-maker? If I could invite you to a grand exhibition of all the paintings of the year, and if I could also ask you to attend a complete exhibition of all the frames that have been made during the year, to which exhibition would you go? But is not one man as good as another? Why not go and see the frames? they are all gilt, and they are all shapely, and they are all made by very expert and efficient workmen; now will you go to see the pictures or the frames? I need not wait more than one moment; you have answered before the question was put. There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth him understanding. You want the pictures, the genius, the flame pentecostal, the mystery of harmony, perspective, colour, the silent oratorio.

Let us beware of second causes in providence, let us beware of second causes in religion, and let us beware of second causes in destiny; and let us accept the old, old doctrine of the sovereignty of God, and when we are in darkness let us seek the altar, the Cross, and pray.

REFERENCES.—X. 15.—S. Martin, Sermons, p. 85. X. 17.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 55. X. 20-23.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah, p. 84.

THE SHOOT OUT OF THE DRY STOCK

'And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots.'—ISAIAH XI. 1.

I. In that story of the shoot out of the dry stock two thoughts, as it were, compete for utterance.

1. There is the thought that God in Christ finds us where we are and not other where, meets us in the weary day which our pilgrimage has actually reached, demands of us no impossible return to the beginning of our lives. He has a new growth for the cut-down stock. There is no uprooting, no fresh seed; but from the old tree springs the leaf of joy.

2. In that recovery which finds us where we are, there is a fresh upburst of that which is entirely original. It is a force from the root. The new thing which appears, appears not from the bark, appears not from the hewn surface, it witnesses to the vigour of the root and it repeats the power of its birth.

II. See how this was, first in the great fulfilment which was seen in the birth of our Lord from the Virgin Mary; when the Son of Mary, the Only Begotten Son of God, appeared upon the earth. There was the once majestic stem of Jesse reduced externally to a humble unknown family for which there was no room in the inn. Nothing could more strictly fulfil the picture of the hewn-down tree standing in the ruined forest than Israel the lowest and most wretched of the nations which still remained from that ancient world which the axe of Rome had levelled with the soil. In the old world, so disgraced, so confused, so burdened with heavy weights carried for a long journey, so ignorant of its direction, so wanting in hope—in the ancient world, out of the midst of it and out of its lowliest plant, sprang in the birth of Christmas night that fresh young Life which has in fact remade society, given hope and joy again to mankind, such hope, such joy, as mankind had never known before, brought them back, brought them at last rather, into full communion with the freshness of the eternal.

I think it is good to note in other children—in every child—something of that wonderful power which belongs to One Who brings the promise of the future out of the ancient stock of human life.

III. Think, also, how this hope of Jesus Christ, this freshness out of the dry stock, can give to us courage in our social task.

There must be a seeking after reasons and meanings. What is the Church for? What is the State for? and what am I for in this short pilgrimage which will so soon be gone, and where I may be a worker and supporter and in part a guide, seeing the road which others see, or I may be a mere slave upon the track, a slave who does no work?—P. N. WAGGETT, Church Times, vol. LVII 4 January, 1907, p. 22.

Illustration.—Do you remember the story that is told about St. Patrick? that represents also the salvation of Jesus Christ springing up in the midst of our ancient race. Patrick, they say, was born when his parents were fleeing from the heathen persecutors of their race, fleeing from them somewhere in Wales or farther north; and they were lost and panic-stricken in a desert place where there is no water, and, behold, the child is born, and how shall he be baptized in a dry land where there is no spring? And the priest who is to baptize him is himself blind and cannot go to seek or give any encouragement and leading to the bewildered train of fugitives. But the blind priest takes the little child's hand and with it blesses the dry soil, and up there springs in this land of fear and terror and loneliness fresh water, in which the child is baptized who is to be the apostle of Ireland.—P. N. WAGGETT, Church Times, 4 January, 1907, p. 22.

REFERENCES.—XI. 1.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 270. XI. 1-9.—Church Times, vol. xxx. 1892, p. 804. X. 1-10.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 56. XI. 2.—G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 132. G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 50. J. Martineau, Hours of Thought, vol. ii. p. 133. V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah, p. 89. XI. 3-10.—Ibid. p. 92. XI. 4.—J. H. Newman, Sermons Bearing on Subjects of the Day, p. 267. XI. 5.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah, I.-XII. p. 96.

A LITTLE CHILD SHALL LEAD THEM

(Christmas)

'A little child shall lead them.'—ISAIAH XI. 6.

You will remember the context of this verse. Isaiah is drawing a picture of redeemed nature. Under the rule of the promised Prince of David's line, 'the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fatling, and'—as a charming finishing touch to the idyllic scene—'a little child shall lead them'. I do not think that when Isaiah talks of bears and lions and reptiles, he means fierce and cruel and cunning men. When he talks of the beasts he means the beasts.

I. Christmas is the glorification of childhood. It is the fulfilment of Isaiah's vision. It proclaims peace on earth, peace 'among men of God's good will' (for this is the true reading of the angel's song); and the Prince of Peace, who leads the peace-makers, the men after God's own heart, is a little child. That little child grew up to teach us that unless we accept the kingdom of God as little children, we shall not enter therein.

II. 'The spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him; the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord, and shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord.' It is a majestic description of the intellectual endowments of humanity. 'The Holy Spirit,' says Gregory of Tours, in words which may sound rather startling, 'is the God of the intellect rather than of the heart.' This splendid enumeration of the intellectual gifts of the Messiah leads on at once to the idyllic picture which we have mentioned—the wild animals tamed and gentle, and led by a little child. It is, I think, a very noble and a very striking contrast. The ideal Ruler of David's line, on whom the Spirit of the Lord shall pour all His choicest intellectual gifts, shall found a kingdom of universal peace, gentleness, and confiding innocence. We are very near the heart of Christianity here.

III. In a very fascinating mediaeval religious book, the Revelations of Julian of Norwich, the wise and saintly authoress says, 'To me was shown no higher stature than childhood'. Not, of course, that we should remain children in understanding; not that when we have become men, we should refuse to put away childish things; but that there should remain much of the child-character in us to the end. Christianity was founded (I say it reverently) by a young man; it is a religion for the young, and for those who remain young in heart, though their hair is grey. Are not faith and hope and love, the Christian virtues, essentially the temper of the child—the boy and girl? There is something very charming and inspiring in the faith, hope, and charity which have survived prolonged contact with the world, and experience of its ways. The religion of the devout recluse is good, but the religion of the good man of the world is better.

In celebrating the birth of Christ at Bethlehem we are doing homage to the child-nature, which the Son of God took upon Him, not because it was a necessary preliminary to His adult ministry, but because it was right and seemly that the Son of God should appear on earth as a little child.—W. R. INGE, All Saints' Sermons, 1905-7, p. 11.

REFERENCES.—XI. 6.—R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 43. H. J. Willmot-Buxton, Plain Preaching for Poor People (9th Series), p. 17. E. Medley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 116. G. G. Bradley, ibid. vol. li. 1897, p. 28. B. Wilberforce, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 90. R. J. Kyd, ibid. vol. xli. 1894, p. 53. R. Winterbotham, Sermons Preached in Holy Trinity Church, Edinburgh, p. 30. J. T. Stannard, The Divine Humanity, p. 156. T. Arnold, Sermons, vol. i. p. 47. XI. 9.—J. H. Newman, Sermons Bearing on Subjects of the Day, p. 142. W. Landels, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 372. W. H. Lyttelton, Missionary Sermons at Hagley, p. 108. XI. 9, 10.—H. D. Rawnsley, ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, p. 204. XI. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2542. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 295; see also Readings for the Aged (4th Series), p. 93. W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches (2nd Series), p. 8. F. R. H. H. Noyes, Plain Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 330.

THE REMNANT OF GOD'S PEOPLE

'And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people.'—ISAIAH XI. 11.

THE text is very cheering and tender in itself, and especially in its connexion. Triumphant scenes have been described. Millennium glory; the world at the feet of Christ in willing and joyful subjection. But amidst all this glory the little 'remnant' is not forgotten. The remnant is forgotten in the world's triumphs and gala days, not in God's.

I. The Remnant.—The 'remnant' is a favourite word with God. Let it not think it is thrown away, or lost sight of. A 'second time' He sets His hand to recover it. Perhaps it was too poor, weak, thoughtless—even wedded to the strange land, at the last gathering. He will not only glean, but go back to fields already reaped and gleaned. You cannot be too poor, despised, sinful, for Christ to seek and save you. He has no 'residuum'. He counts the very dust of His temple of humanity.

II. The Scattered Remnant.—From Assyria, Egypt, etc. You may be scattered in other lands, among strangers; away from all old influences for good, from old habits, associations, interests, etc.; but His eye is as fully on you, and His heart is as wholly devoted to you, as if you were in the very centre of them all. Nay, if possible, yet more on that account. When father and mother forsake the Lord takes up.

III. Recovered from the Grasp of Strong Enemies.—Those powers named were the strongest and most grinding of all the powers known to the ancient world. But His weak remnant should be recovered from their oppression. Worldliness, evil passions, strong drink—all that is most tyrannical in sin—may be your master; you weak as a woman in their grasp; but God is stronger than they. 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.'

IV. The Whole Remnant.—How the Prophet names those powers one by one, as if he would bring a special message of hope and strength to every ear individually. 'Men and brethren, children of the stock of Abraham, and whosoever among you feareth God, to you is the word of this salvation sent.'

REFERENCE.—XI. 11, 12.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 264.

ENVY

'Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim.'—ISAIAH XI. 13.

EPHRAIM means here the kingdom of Israel, or of the ten tribes; and Judah means the southern kingdom, that of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. They were rivals; each was jealous of the other, because they were so evenly matched in power and influence. A weak tribe like Simeon was not jealous of either Ephraim or Judah.

I. Human nature is weak and sinful, and therefore the world is everywhere full of envy and jealousy. Sometimes unholy envy still cleaves a Christian nation into two, as it did the Hebrew nation long ago. Neighbouring cities are sometimes rivals. The successful man in the work of life is envied. Jealousy is even worse among professional men than it is among merchants. The same bad spirit is sometimes shown in Church life. Why was it, for example, that the chief priests and elders of the Jews accused Jesus so unjustly before Pilate, the Roman Governor? It is said in the Gospel narrative that Pilate 'knew that for envy they had delivered Him'.

Even in the bosom of families, and at the fireside, where all ought to be love, there is sometimes the same wickedness. It was the envy of Cain that led him to murder his brother Abel.

II. The Prophet Isaiah is speaking in this chapter about the reign of the Messiah, and the blessedness which that reign will bring to its subjects. He says that when the kingdom of God triumphs, envy and jealousy will depart out of the hearts of men. The ancient rivalry of Judah and Ephraim will be at an end, and all will be harmony and love.

III. Here is a double remedy for envy in one's own heart—two prescriptions, which ought both to be taken at once.

1. Think much about your mercies. Envious persons compare themselves in an unkindly way with those who are more successful than themselves, forgetting all the while that there are many who are less successful. If I am a believer in Christ, I am the possessor of 'all things,' and it is therefore unreasonable that I should envy any one.

2. Seek a renewed heart. The natural heart is evil, and it leads us to envy and grieve at the good of our neighbour. But the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, if we ask Him, will give us a new heart. The Holy Spirit will help us to entertain lowly thoughts of ourselves, and to learn to admire what is good in others.—C. JERDAN, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 200.

REFERENCES.—XI. 13.—R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 17. XII. 1.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 928. XII. 1-6.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 1. XII. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2541. XII. 3.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 64. Sir G. R. Fetherston, A Garden Eastward, p. 66. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 23. W. P. Balfern, Lessons from Jesus, p. 235. XII. 3-6.—V. S. S. Coles, Advent Meditations on Isaiah I.-XII. p. 100. XIII. 12.—J. Vickery, Ideals of Life, p. 61. J. G. Greenhough, The Cross and the Dice-Box, p. 133. XIV.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2612.

ISAIAH XIV. 8.

RUSKIN says on this text: 'Consider such expressions as that tender and glorious verse in Isaiah, speaking of the cedars on the mountains as rejoicing over the fall of the king of Assyria: "Yea, the fir trees rejoice at thee, and the cedars of Lebanon, saying, Since thou art gone down to the grave, no feller is come up against us." See what sympathy there is here, as if with the very hearts of the trees themselves.'

REFERENCES.—XIV. 9.—D. Biggs, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lx. 1901, p. 315. XIV. 32.—F. E. Paget, Sermons for Special Occasions, p. 65. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2612.

THROUGH THE MATERIAL TO THE SPIRITUAL

'But the harvest shall be a heap in the day of grief and of desperate sorrow.'—ISAIAH XVII. 11.

It will not appear to be so. Appearance, indeed, will be on the other side. But we are to judge by the harvest, by the end, and not by the appearances. Sometimes it would seem as if the devil reigned. He has everything his own way; he imagines evil, and brings his device to pass; and we say, 'Why should we trouble about God, and of what good is it to pray? He does not trouble us, He does not answer, He does not care for us.' But the Lord has never concealed from us the great fact that He judges everything by the end; He ripens evil, as well as good. God can only get at some people through the material; they have wasted the spiritual. He can make no impression upon them along the spiritual line; they have lost all their sensitiveness, they are past feeling, their conscience is seared as with a hot iron, and the withdrawal of His spiritual mercies would have no effect upon them.

I. God must come to us. He will come to us through the way of pain or loss or sorrow; He will take a long time to come, but He will come. It takes years to make some men think; it takes years to bring down the high looks of the haughty and to bring to nothing the devices that are multiplied against the Lord; but they will all come down. Do not judge by a moment of sunshine; the law has been made clear, it cannot alter: 'It shall be well with the righteous, and it shall be ill with the wicked'. The Lord causes the harvest to bud and to bring forth all manner of sweet miracles, and then at the last He looks at it in rebuke and withers it from the face of the earth, withers it whilst we are gathering it; we thrust in our sickle, and hew down sheaves of darkness and of poison.

II. Observe the reasonableness of this. Who is it that is offended? Who is it that is forgotten? The Giver, the Father, the Servant of all. What can happen but death? We cannot be living within a scheme of things which we did not set up, and we cannot adapt that scheme to our ways and our wishes without coming upon the Maker, the Contriver of it all. We are born into a scheme of things; we are not sent into the world to reconstruct it; great laws were here before we were; we found them out, discovered them, burnt our fingers in going too near them, and therefore we cannot ignore these laws without coming upon penalty, suffering, rebuke. Being sent into a scheme of things, our wisdom is in finding out how it begins, proceeds, how it develops, how it grows, and our great business in life is to lie alongside of these forces, and not to oppose them, but to obey them, and thus discover and glorify the will of God.

III. On the ground of mere reason, I hold that the Christian argument is a sound argument. It answers more questions than any other scheme of life; it lulls more anxieties, it brings more consolations, it goes further than any scheme of things can go into the great unseen and grand immeasurable. I ask you, therefore, to ground yourselves upon God's will, and take of life as it comes, with all simplicity of love and completeness of obedience and all-believing faith. If you would have peace, you can have it in that way; you can have it in no other way. The law is equal, it is equal on both sides, it cannot be trifled with; if it is severe on the one side, it is gentle on the other. The same holds good with regard to the law of mercy and peace, that everywhere that great law is operating in favour of those who are in sympathy with it, and who long to carry out all its meaning and enjoy all its rewards.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. VI. p. 157.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 1.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. pp. 35, 46. XVII. 10, 11.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture, p. 76.

THE BURDEN OF EGYPT

'The burden of Egypt.'—ISAIAH XIX. 1.

IN the preface to a volume of travel-letters by Dr. Liddon, his sister says: 'Dr. Liddon's interests were always the same. This was nowhere more evident than in Egypt, which had for him extraordinary fascinations, because, as he would frequently explain, the life of the ancient Egyptians all pointed one way; their monuments and their literature alike show that they held the real business of this life to be preparation for death. It was neither on their palaces nor on their public buildings that they lavished their art and their wealth, but on their temples and their tombs. "What an example for us," he would often say; "one that can only fill us with humiliation and shame."

I. That the true business of life is to prepare for death has ever been the belief of all serious, of all catholic, Christians, from Dr. Liddon to Thomas Carlyle's peasant father 'impressively pronouncing the words, "Prepare us for these solemn events, death, judgment, and eternity"'. It may have receded in the thin and washy versions of Christianity current in our day, but it must return. For life is a judgment as well as a discipline, and unless the moral nerve has been cauterized to death, the soul must seek the way by which alone the offended justice of God can be met in peace. And desire as well as fear, the desire of the soul created for God and restless till it finds Him, can be contented only with the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. The faith that joins us to Christ and restores us to God must be maintained by steady preparation—the preparation of prayer, labour, and self-scrutiny—for the supreme hour when, in presence of the Lord of Truth, the spirit makes its answer.

But we are told 'other worldliness' has gone out of fashion, that our business is with the rectification of life on earth. Yes; but that can only be accomplished by souls detached from time, though detained within it. Nothing, said St. Paul, could separate him from the love of Christ; neither life nor death, things present nor things to come. Neque instantia. And neither did Christ's love separate him from things present. Rather it made him and it makes all in the same case the true servants and rulers of the present.

To depreciate or stand aloof from the great tasks of social reform is a real denial of Christ. These questions will never be settled by war. They cannot be settled so long as personal passion and pique—envy, jealousy, and malice—are in the ascendant. They will yield only to those who are content to live and die humble servants of God, yet brave and free citizens.

II. This readiness will give us the transfigured courage of love. We shall not flinch at the slings and arrows of our foes; these cannot touch the immortal part. We shall not pander to the vain hopes of those we serve, but tell them plainly that stern limits are set to the efficacy of earthly good; and that all possessions will but leave them poorer if they miss salvation. We shall not be dismayed when foes and friends alike turn upon us. The best cause may come to such a pass that all men will seem to forsake it and flee; the rain will descend, the floods come, the winds blow and beat upon the house. But what is built on the rock will stand. The disciple is not greater than his Lord, and it may be, as Heine says, that wherever a lofty soul utters its thoughts there is Golgotha. Even so in the bold and free acceptance of death there is given perfect courage and perfect self-command. Jesus died among legions of peace-breathing angels, and His peace passes to the prepared soul in death. When the cruellest blow falls, when the few human faces that made our inner world are fading, the hope rooted in Christ remains, for we know they depart to shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of the Father. The affections are no more nerves to suffer with when in Christ, bereavement and death are met with the fullness of willing love.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, Ten Minute Sermons, p. 153.

REFERENCES.—XIX. 23, 24.—J. Wordsworth, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 346. XIX. 23-25.—W. L. Watkinson, ibid. vol. lii. 1897, p. 236; see also The Blind Spot, p. 21. XIX. 24.—J. H. Shakespeare, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 228. XIX. 24, 25.—Hugh Price Hughes, Essential Christianity, p. 249. J. Scott Lidgett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 156.

TWILIGHT AND TREMBLING

'The twilight that I desired hath been turned into trembling unto me.'—ISAIAH XXI. 4 (R.V.).

You all know that the twilight is a great wizard. I do not know whether you have ever thought to analyse its subtle power. If you have, I think you will have found that the spell of the twilight lies quite as much in what it hides from us as in what it reveals. It casts a filmy veil of indistinctness over all things we see—softening their hardness, dealing gently with their defects, making such beauty as they possess more suggestive and idealistic.

The twilight hour is the one merciful hour in the day—the hour when there is just enough light to see by, but when criticism has to be suspended. This hour, one feels, is in the beautiful fitness of things. There is a sense in which the whole span of our human life is but the twilight hour that ushers in the bright eternal day. God has set a merciful limit to our seeing.

I. There is a twilight that God giveth, that God willeth—a merciful limitation of light. But this is not the twilight of which the Prophet speaks. There is a twilight not of God's willing but of man's desiring, that brings the spirit of trembling into men's lives. 'The twilight that I desired.' Here is the picture of a man who is afraid to look life in the face; who does not want to see things as they are. He wants to limit his own vision—to see things less plainly. He is seized with a desire to shirk the responsibilities and pains of life's larger knowledge. He is desirous for the moment of laying aside his powers of insight and discrimination and delicate judgment and keen appreciation of life's ever-changing situation. He is willing to forgo the power of introspection.

The awful drama of pain and misery is being played out before our very eyes. We live in a suffering world. The outlook at times is unutterably pathetic, tragic, and saddening; and I am afraid that so long as these things do not cut their way into our own lives we try to ignore them, to live as if they were not.

II. The secret of quiet confidence in a world that furnishes us with the sight of so many sad things does not lie in shutting our eyes. That is the expedient of the cowardly and the faithless. It lies in looking at things as they are, and letting the sad vision force us back upon the mercy and power of God. If only we have the courage and faith to look into these things that pain the heart and try the spirit and lay rough hands on life's sensitiveness, we shall learn more of the patience and tenderness of God than ever gladness alone could have taught us; and we shall find awaiting us among these things a ministry of help in the offering of which God shall perfect our hearts in the knowledge of Himself and the love of the brethren.

III. 'The twilight that I desired hath been turned into trembling unto me.' The man who shuns the light forfeits his own final peace of heart. He who refuses to face his worst forfeits the possibility of finding his best. He does not solve the question of his sinfulness; he shelves it. It is there, gathering darker meaning and more bitter consequence. Every day twilight and trembling go together. You cannot build the house of peace on the foundation of self-deceit. Darkness hides wrong, but it does not alter it. There is no salvation among the shadows of moral delusion. There is no quietness in uncertainty. There are some who deliberately refuse to look at their own spiritual position—their relation to God the Saviour and the kingdom of peace and the promise of life—lest they should find it unsatisfactory. They live their lives in the vague hope that things will be well with them by and by. They do not desire anything more illuminating than the twilight of a hopeful speculation. That is, at the best, but an indefinite postponement of the day of trembling.—P. ARNSWORTH, The Pilgrim Church, p. 138.

REFERENCES.—XXI. 11.—R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 72. W. Landels, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 133. E. M. Geldart, Echoes of Truth, p. 222. XXI. 11, 12.—F. W. Farrar, ibid. vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 17. G. Campbell Morgan, ibid. vol. lxvi. 1904, p. 40. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. i. p. 19. D. Rowlands, The Cross and the Dice-Box, p. 217. W. C. Magee, Growth in Grace, p. 26. W. Laing, The Dundee Pulpit, 1872, p. 57. S. Cox, Expositions, p. 336. J. A. Craigie, The Country Pulpit, p. 31. XXI. 12.—J. Milne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 409.

THE KEY OF THE HOUSE OF DAVID

'And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; so he shall open, and none shall shut: and he shall shut, and none shall open.'—ISAIAH XXII. 22.

Nor often, even in Isaiah, are there words more full of mystery than these.

I. See how, of David also, according to his degree, it might be said that 'He was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief'. Persecuted by his own brethren in the army of the Israelites; hunted after by his own lord, King Saul; ridiculed by his own wife, Michal; betrayed by his own familiar friend, Ahithophel; conspired against by his own favourite son, Absalom; all but delivered to death by his own subjects at Keilah; to say nothing of his many battles, painful wanderings, little rest; and that whole lifelong struggle on account of which God said, 'Thou hast been a man of war, and hast shed much blood upon the earth'. See also how poor and needy he was; asking bread from Ahimelech the priest; requesting milk and cheese from Nabal the Carmelite; taking a cruse of water from King Saul; thankful for fruit from Abigail. So that when Gabriel said, in that cottage of Nazareth, 'The Lord God shall give Him the seat of His father David'; and when Isaiah prophesied here, 'The key of the house of David will I lay on His shoulder,' what is the key but the bitter Cross? what is the seat but extreme poverty?

II. Notice—for every word tells—that word: 'The key of the house of David will I lay on His shoulder'—not shoulders—and why? Because the Son of God did not endure the Death of the Cross on the right shoulder of His Godhead, but on the left shoulder of His humanity alone; so that, suffering as a Man, He should ransom like a God.

III. 'The key of the house of David will I lay upon His shoulder.' Beyond all other, David was a man of war. Now look what the natural heart says on the one hand, and what the Lord God of all power declares on the other: 'The people be strong that dwell in the land; and the cities are walled and very great; and moreover we saw the children of Anak there'. All very true; but here is the answer: 'The key of the house of David will I lay upon His shoulder'. So take courage. There is some one fenced city of a besetting sin of which you ought to take possession, some one Jericho in your hearts that defies the rule of the Lord God of Hosts. But that key will open it for you. Does not the way in which it was at first taken up, and then wearily borne along the Via Dolorosa, speak of its omnipotence? Only trust to it, and it will open the strongest wards of the most crafty lock wherewith Satan ever barred your passage yet, or ever shall bar it. And well for you that it is laid on His shoulder, not on yours. That key which opened the gates of Death and Hell, how shall it not throw back any other portals for your entrance?—J. M. NEALE, Occasional Sermons, p. 34.

Illustration.—Saint Teresa says very beautifully: 'O my soul, O my heart, if thou wilt, if thou desire to, enter into bliss, why dost thou not serve and go after good Jesus, Who hath the key of it? The key of this world, the men of this world have: the key of hell, Satan hath; the key of life, none but CHRIST. O good JESUS! O True Love of my soul! seeing that Thou art the Gate which is to be opened, and the House which we are to enter into, and the glory which we are to enjoy, why dost Thou not open to this my sinful soul, which is weary of calling for Thee? O Redeemer of my spirit, O sweetness of my life, seeing Thou hast said, that Thou didst not come into this world but to save sinners, and goest about to seek for none but sinners: why dost Thou not open to me, who am the greatest sinner of all sinners?'—J. M. NEALE, Occasional Sermons, p. 37.

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 4.—R. Primrose, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 103. XXIII. 18.—S. Chadwick, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 91.

THE CONSECRATION OF SUFFERING

'Wherefore glorify ye the Lord in the fires.'—ISAIAH XXIV. 15.

RELIGION consists in taking things out of their common places, and in removing them from a lower to a higher level. To hold everything in God, to use it for God, to dedicate it to God—this is consecration.

I. The Great Danger of Suffering—whether it be physical or mental suffering—is threefold:—

(a) Pride, because we become exceptional, and are made much of.

(b) Indolence, because the nerves become unstrung.

(c) Selfishness, because at such times it seems excusable, if not even a duty, to think very much about ourselves.

These things are just the most antagonistic to consecration, which is essentially a humbling process; an energetic process; a self-forgetting process. We have to consider what it is to consecrate suffering; or, as Isaiah expresses it, to 'Glorify God in the fires'.

II. To Consecrate your Suffering you must Dedicate it.—This must be done in a very positive, serious manner. As soon as the suffering comes, feel and say, say it distinctly: 'I will dedicate this trial. It shall not be an ordinary, profane thing. It shall be set apart for God. It shall be taken away from the world. It shall be God's. I dedicate it.' From that moment, your sickness, or your pain, or your trial, or your loss, or your bereavement, is hedged round. It remains sacred ground. This special committal of yourself and your suffering at the outset, by a religious act of devotion, is a very necessary part of the consecration; but it must be repeated very often. From that time you may call your pain, or your sorrow, not so much a suffering as an offering; as much as if you laid it upon an actually material altar, it is an offering.

III. Real Consecration is a very Practical Thing.—Our offering to God will seldom be real unless it is in some way an offering made to God through His creatures. Consecrate the uses of suffering, whatever those uses may be. Do not let them be natural, ordinary results, but let them be dedicated to a holy purpose. All our sorrows and sufferings are available for others, and are intended as means for usefulness.

(a) A trial is an experience, and an experience is a talent. Consecrate the talent. You are laying in a great power of sympathy. Consecrate that sympathy. Put yourself under a sacred obligation that that pain, that trouble, shall make you more tender, more wise, more religious in your dealings, ever after, from that moment, with other sufferers.

(b) A season of affliction is a vantage ground. Consecrate the vantage ground. Take opportunity to speak, to say something, which you could never say so well or so effectively; say it there; say it very lovingly, but say it very plainly. And let your words be consecrated words, as said before God; prayed over well, and then say them. Patience, simple, kind, unselfish patience, is always eloquent. A sufferer's smile is a sweet sermon!

(c) If all this be true of physical and mental suffering, it is truer still of spiritual trial. Take care. No trials are more in danger of being selfish and useless than spiritual ones. Your depression, your inward temptations, your repentance, your conflicts, all Lenten feelings, they are not ends, they are not for themselves only; use them; turn them to good account; consecrate them.

IV. Of all this Consecration of Suffering, the great Exemplar is the Lord Jesus Christ.—If you wish to know the way to consecrate, study Him.

AN ACT OF FAITH

'O Lord, Thou art my God; I will exalt Thee, I will praise Thy Name; for Thou hast done wonderful things; Thy counsels of old are faithfulness and truth.'—ISAIAH XXV. 1.

I. 'O LORD, Thou art my God.' This is not a prayer, but something higher—'an act of faith'.

What do we mean by an act of faith? We mean an expression of faith in which the will has its part.

An act of faith should be the utterance of the whole nature, the will giving effect both to the conclusions of the reason and to the desires of the affections. An act of faith seems so simple; it is tremendous, for it involves the operation of the whole soul.

II. There is (1) the act of faith, 'O Lord, Thou art my God'. (2) Then its result, 'I will exalt Thee, I will praise Thy Name'. (3) Then the reason for this, 'For Thou hast done wonderful things; Thy counsels of old are faithfulness and truth'.

1. The act of faith proceeds from personal religion; for having taken God as the Supreme Ruler of our life, the intellect loves to seek into the mysteries of His Being, revealed in Holy Scripture, and in the experiences of Divine Providence; the will strives to be obedient to His commandments and precepts, and the affections find their joy in reaching out to Him as the object of their love.

2. The result of this is expressed in the next two clauses, 'I will exalt Thee, I will praise Thy Name'. And by 'Name' we mean when we speak of God His character—what He is. Some may ask, 'How can we exalt God?' We cannot exalt God in the sense of raising Him any higher than He is, but we can proclaim to others, by our words and in our lives, that we recognize Him to be the Most High. This is what is meant by exalting God.

3. The reason for this—'For Thou hast done wonderful things; Thy counsels of old are faithfulness and truth'.

(a) Thou hast wrought wonders in our lives, in the lives of the saints, in the Church of God.

(b) 'Thou hast wrought wonders; counsels of old.' There was that counsel by which, before the world was made, God willed to become Incarnate in human nature, and to raise His creature, man, to a nature Divine.

(c) 'In faithfulness and truth.' All God's wonders, all God's counsels, have been in faithfulness and truth. The covenant He made with man He has kept, and therefore Isaiah was able to make his act of faith in God, his act of trust; for faith has both its objective and subjective side. It enables us first to believe that God is, then to learn from revelation what God is, and when we have learned this, to trust God with our whole soul.—A. G. MORTIMER, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part i. p. 29.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 1.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 25. J. Aspinall, Parish Sermons (2nd Series), p. 106. XXV. 3, 4.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, p. 54. XXV. 4.—S. Martin, Westminster Chapel Sermons, p. 221. XXV. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 846. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 90. XXV. 6-8.—Ibid. p. 80. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 66. J. C. Miller, Penny Pulpit, vol. xii. No. 720, p. 429. XXV. 7.—T. T. Carter, Lent Lectures, 1860-66, p. 297. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 92.

'He will swallow up death in victory.'—ISAIAH XXV. 8.

RUSKIN says, speaking of the death of Christ: 'It was not the mere bodily death that He conquered—that death had no sting. It was this spiritual death which He conquered, so that at last it should be swallowed up—mark the word—not in life; but in victory. As the dead body shall be raised to life, so also the defeated soul to victory, if only it has been fighting on its Master's side, has made no covenant with death; nor itself bowed its forehead for his seal. Blind from the prison-house, maimed from the battle, or mad from the tombs, their souls shall surely yet sit, astonished, at His feet Who giveth peace.'

WAITING FOR GOD

(Third Sunday in Advent)

'And it shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God; we have waited for Him, and He will save us: this is the Lord; we have waited for Him, we will be glad and rejoice in His salvation.'—ISAIAH XXV. 9.

I. What does Waiting Imply?—Advent is especially a time of waiting, and this waiting involves four things.

1. Faith. St. Paul speaks of Christians as those who are 'waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ'. They therefore believe in the promise of His coming.

2. Further, the posture of the Christian is one of desire. Israel of old longed for the manifestation of the Deliverer. 'Thou that sittest between the cherubims, come and save us!' (Ps. LXXX. 1, 2). St. Paul speaks of loving Christ's appearing; St. John cries, 'Come, Lord Jesus!' The word which the Apostle uses describes the attitude as of one stretching out and longing for 'the revelation' (Rom. xiii. 19).

3. Then patience is an ingredient in the waiting. 'Be patient,' says St. James, 'therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord;' and he compares the patience to that of the husbandman, who has to wait for the slow processes of nature to see the end of his labours.

4. Preparation is involved in this waiting; nay, is one chief purpose of it.

II. Why Wait So Long?

1. The question was discussed in the Middle Ages. Why was the Incarnation so long delayed?

2. One reason for this delay of the Incarnation is drawn from the condition of man. He had to be humiliated by a sense of his sinfulness, in order that he might feel his need of a Deliverer. We see the same providence in individual sinners as in a microcosm. God allows the prodigal to pursue his downward course until he comes to his senses, and misery brings him to the turning-point.

3. All delays in the approaches of God are for the sake of man, that he might prepare to receive Him.

The ministry of the Baptist is a visible setting forth of this need of preparation.

III. What Wait We For?—'Lo, this is our God; we have waited for Him.'

1. That there is a primary reference in the passage to wonderful interventions of God on behalf of His people, whether in contemporary or subsequent deliverances, is, of course, admitted. Commentators have, however, been puzzled as to what particular catastrophe or oppressing power the Prophet refers to in this chapter. Whatever may be the historic application, it cannot be more than a type of the full accomplishment of the prophecy in the Person of Christ. He alone swallows up 'death in victory,' and wipes away 'tears from off all faces'.

2. The text is fulfilled by the Incarnation. 'This is our God.' It points to the mystery that our Lord is a Divine Person, and that therefore He can 'save us'. This stirs the hymn of joy: 'We will be glad and rejoice in His salvation'.—W. H. HUTCHINGS, Sermon-Sketches, p. 12.

EXPECTATION

(A Christmas Sermon)

'This is our God; we have waited for Him, and He will save us.'—ISAIAH XXV. 9.

I. The Hope of the Incarnation.—Christmas is a season of expectation. And then also it is a season of confidence. 'He will save us.' Not—He will save the heathen, the outcast, the hopeless; but He will save us. It is a personal confession. For it implies that we are dissatisfied with our lives as they are; that we are willing that they should be lifted out of the bondage of convention. The slavery of selfishness and greed, the deception thoughtlessly practised, the slander carelessly spoken. No one can mix much with his fellow-men without realizing that a new doubt is everywhere awaking in men's minds. Is not Christianity an exhausted force. Is not its power over the world coming to an end? Here are vast social evils crying to heaven, and no salvation comes. Men live and work and die with no apparent consciousness of spiritual realities, and all our efforts break against the passive force of apathy. Can we, in face of all this, still hold to our belief that He who was born on that first Christmas morning is the Saviour of the world? If He is a Saviour, where is His salvation? We must face questions like these and they will lead us back to the cradle of Bethlehem. Like the wise men we grow bewildered in the streets of the city and we lose our star, but as we go towards Bethlehem, behold it goes before us again. We have found the lost cue, we are strong again, we can face the world's challenge. We believe that in the Incarnation lies still the hope of the world. Yes, and our hope too. For when the simple truths of religion have become complicated by human glosses, and have lost touch with reality, or have grown harder and intolerant, we need to bring them again to Bethlehem and lay them at the cradle of a little Child. For He is the Saviour of Christianity as well as the Saviour of the World. Of our religious ideas, as well as of our personal character, it is true that except we be converted and become as little children we cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven.

II. The Realization of God.—Christmas is a season of realization. 'This is our God.' The realization of God; God not far away in some heaven of music and rapture, but here by the cradle of little children, in the paths where footsore men tramp wearily, in houses of gladness or sorrow.

III. 'The Prince of Peace.'—We are asked to speak to the people of this country on the subject of international peace. But what can we say?

There can be no peace till the spirit of distrust and greed and selfish ambition ceases to dominate the policy of nations. The only real guarantee for peace is in the resolute and watchful action of all Christian men. In this too 'He will save us' if we wait for Him. He will teach us that there are better battles to fight than the battles full of 'confused noise and garments rolled in blood'. His battle is against ignorance and vice, against the selfish heart and the grasping hand, against discord and hatred, and all the foul things that haunt the darkness.

REFERENCES.—XXV. 9.—A. Murray, Waiting on God, p. 89. T. F. Lockyer, The Inspirations of the Christian Life, p. 196. W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 12. H. P. Liddon, Advent in St. Paul's, pp. 77, 306. E. Fowle, Plain Preaching to Poor People (1st Series). XXVI.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2430; vol. xlvii. No. 2713. XXVI. 1.—W. C. E. Newbolt, Counsels of Faith and Practice, p. 305. XXVI. 1, 2.—J. Monro Gibson, A Strong City, p. 3; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. p. 151. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 102; see also Paul's Prayers, p. 234. XXVI. 1-10.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—

Isaiah, p. 95. XXVI. 1-14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2609.

THE MARK FOR RECOGNIZING GOD'S PEACE

'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on Thee.'—ISAIAH XXVI. 3.

I. It is not said, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed'. There is nothing in mere movelessness which is suggestive of peace. A mind may be motionless without being rested; nay, it may be motionless by reason of its unrest. What, for example, is the numbness of despair, but just a mind which has been deprived of movement by its own unrest. Grief by its excess has stopped the pulses of feeling; fear has paralysed energy; inward struggle has ended in inward exhaustion.

II. In the peace of a human soul everything depends on the thing which fastens it. There are various kinds of fastenings by which a spirit may be bound. It may be bound by sleep; it may be bound by apathy; it may be bound by old age. The peace of which the Psalmist speaks is that of a soul bound by God; its perfection lies in the fact that it is stayed on something which is itself constantly moving.

III. What would be the difference between a soul bound to a rock and a soul bound to a star? The soul fastened to the rock would be stationary; the soul fastened to the star would be ever on the wing. That is the difference between the peace of God and the world's peace. The world's peace is a standing still; God's is a moving on. The world's peace is silence; God's is a living voice. The world's peace is languor after toil; God's is inspiration of strength to begin toil. To be stayed by God is to be stayed not by death but by life, not by exhaustion but by energy, not by folding the hands but by spreading the sails to reach a wider sphere. The peace of God descends on every man as it descended on Jesus—in the midst of the waters.—G. MATHESON, Messages of Hope, p. 173.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 3.—J. H. Thom, Laws of Life (2nd Series), p. 136. W. J. Knox-Little, The Journey of Life, p. 159. A. G. Mortimer, Studies in Holy Scripture, p. 58. B. Wilberforce, Sanctification by the Truth, p. 97; see also The Hope That is in Me, p. 165. W. P. Balfour, Lessons from Jesus, p. 275. F. W. Farrar, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 187. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxi. No. 1818.

KEPT PEACEFUL IN THE MIDST OF STRIFE

'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee.'—ISAIAH XXVI. 3, 4.

LOOKED at from any view-point life appears to be a struggle. The man of science, for example, pursues his investigations not as a mere search for facts but as a conflict against ignorance. Every discovery he makes is a fort captured from the enemy, and ensures the liberation of some who have hitherto been bound. And the ordinary individual, too, the one who is distinguished by no special rank in the array of contestants, but who has set his heart upon living a high and pure life, is entered for a struggle. His very ambition, itself an echo of Christ's command, involves him in a lifelong campaign against the powers of evil.

I. Hence the audacity of Christ's Gospel of peace, whose promises run counter to the entire natural order. Indeed, it is part of the proof of Christ's Divinity that He should offer to men peace at the heart of an endless and inevitable agitation, a gift about which the Apostle uses no mere hyperbole when he speaks of it as 'peace which passeth understanding'. For the human heart cannot conceive, apart from all that Christ Himself is, that in a world of this sort peace should perfectly possess any one. But this, the very mystery of the Evangel, is a large part of its fascination. Christ is ever willing to submit Himself to personal subjective tests, and is for ever calling men to come and try for themselves the reality of His claim and covenant. Faith may and often does begin as an experiment, but it always leads on to an experience of heart-rest which these words alone describe. 'How do you explain the possibility of peace in a world where even Nature is red in tooth and claw, and where all the activities of men are bent upon ceaseless strife?' is asked by the unbelieving cynic. And the only answer which we can give is that, while we cannot explain the possibility, we have experienced and continually enjoy the reality. And in its last analysis Christ's Gospel is found to be true as it responds not to speculative but to subjective tests.

II. It is significant that these words do not identify the experience of peace with the absence of loss and sorrow, but rather with the presence of God. It is not that we are to be withdrawn from the reach of the influence of these things, but that we are to be drawn into close union with Himself.

III. It is significant also that this prophetic declaration with its Gospel fulfilment should reveal God as the One upon whom the responsibility of the covenant really rests. 'Thou wilt keep him' is at once an encouragement to the one who knows his own grasp to be weak, his emotions fitful, his own power of fidelity inadequate—and robs him of all his fearful apprehensions. Just as He alone bestows, so He alone can maintain unbroken this experience of strengthening and recreative peace. It is His work to hold us, not ours to hold Him. And this truth, if once apprehended, will rid our lives of much of the worry and meaningless anxiety which often beclouds and weakens them. If we surrender to Him His own possession, it is but little to expect that the King will carefully guard His own crown-jewels. It is indeed as a sentinel on duty keeps the trustful garrison in peace that the watchful Lord guards the yielded heart to the exclusion of false love, keeps the mind to the exclusion of wrong thoughts, and controls the will to the exclusion of unholy purposes.—J. STUART HOLDEN, The Pre-Eminent Lord, p. 71.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 3, 4.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 111; see also Paul's Prayers, p. 245.

TRUST IN GOD

'Trust ye in the Lord for ever.'—ISAIAH XXVI. 4.

IGNORANCE and unbelief are man's foes, and unrest is man's misery. The purpose of revelation is to impart knowledge and to awaken faith, and thus to fill the mind with that peace which is spiritual strength.

I. The Object of Trust.

(a) 'The Lord Jehovah,' the self-existing, the eternal, the Almighty. A contrast to all created beings. Put not your trust in man—in the sons of men—in princes.

(b) 'The Rock of Ages' (marg.). The everlasting hills are an emblem of strength, unchangeableness, solidity, eternity. God is often, by Moses and by the Psalmist, described as 'the Rock,' 'the Stronghold,' 'the Fortress'. He whose feet are on the mountain peak feels his station solid and secure; he who builds upon the rock has a strong and safe foundation. A faint, poor emblem of the everlasting strength which is in God, the sure foundation upon which His people rest.

II. The Trust Required.

(a) A sincere trust, such as arises from a consciousness of need and weakness, and such as goes out towards a Being who is able to strengthen, to comfort, and to save.

(b) A steadfast trust, such as is described by the expression, 'Whose mind is stayed upon Thee'. This is leaning and resting upon God. It is the trust of the scholar in the teacher, the patient in the physician, the traveller in the guide, the child in the parent.

(c) A perpetual trust: 'For ever,' in all circumstances, for all time, and unto eternity.

III. The Result of Trust 'Perfect Peace'.—Whilst self-confidence, trust in man, distrust of God, bring restlessness, faith brings peace. Peace of conscience, peace of heart, peace of life, are all included; and these may be enjoyed even in circumstances likely to disquiet and distress. We are not, indeed, able to keep ourselves in such peace; but what we cannot do God can do, and will, if He be sought and honoured.

THE POOR AND NEEDY

'The foot shall tread it down, even the feet of the poor, and the steps of the needy.'—ISAIAH XXVI. 6.

'The foot shall tread it down.' Shall tread what down? 'The lofty city,' as it says in the verse before: 'the city of the terrible nations,' as it is in another place. Those blessed feet shall indeed, by their journeys over the Holy Land, and then by their rest upon the Holy Cross—painful journeys, a more painful repose—overthrow that empire of Satan.

I. 'The feet of the poor, and the steps of the needy.' And what a world of love there is in those two clauses! not to be slurred into one, as if both meant one and the same thing. A man may be poor enough, and not needy: for his poverty may content him, and he may need nothing further. A man may be needy enough, and not poor; is it not so every day? for all his riches may not satisfy him, and there is the insatiable craving for more wealth, more power, more honour. But it pleased our dear Lord to be both poor and needy for our sakes. So poor, that He was indebted to love only for the grave-cloths in which He laid Him down to sleep, and took His rest in the garden of Joseph of Arimathea. He would be helped as well as help; He would accept the offerings of love as well as pour them forth; He would fulfil the future law of His own Apostles, 'Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ'. And where did the steps of the needy first lead Him?

'The day following Jesus would go forth into Galilee, and findeth Philip, and saith unto him, Follow Me.'

Would go forth into Galilee? and why? Because He would seek for assistance there.

'Now as He walked by the sea of Galilee, He saw Simon and Andrew his brother casting a net into the sea: for they were fishers. And Jesus said unto them, Come ye after Me.'

And there you have the words, as well as the steps, of the needy. Now, take an example from this very thing. Remember: the next most blessed thing to affording help as you should, is accepting it as you should. It is more blessed—He Himself said it—to give than to receive. Therefore it inevitably follows, it is also blessed to receive. Of His fullness have all we received: but He vouchsafes to receive of our emptiness.

II. 'The feet of the poor, and the steps of the needy.' The feet of the poor are true to their title still. The King is exalted above all blessing, and worship, and glory, above every name that is named, of things present, or things to come; but He is the poor King still. Therefore He comes to you—not as that arch-hypocrite came to St. Martin in his cell, in gold and pearls, and costly array, commanding to be worshipped as the Christ, but in poverty still and humbleness, under the form of Bread and Wine. And does He come solely to give, and not to receive? Does He bestow Himself, and ask for nothing in return? Not so. If they are the feet of the poor, they are the steps of the needy also. He needs yourselves. This needy One seeks your full love: will you deny it? your most earnest help; will you withhold it? your very selves: and already they ought to be His.

III. 'The foot shall tread it down, even the feet of the poor, and the steps of the needy.' Why the singular in the first clause and the plural in the second? Why is the 'foot' of the beginning multiplied into the 'feet' and 'steps' of the end? And here we see, as in so many other passages, how the same prophecy tells of the Head, and tells of the members: of both, as engaged in one work: of both, as combining in one battle: of both, as to share in one victory. The Captain of our salvation goes forth first into the field: 'the foot shall tread it down': His servants follow Him to the war: 'even the feet of the poor, and the steps of the needy'.—J. M. NEALE, Occasional Sermons, p. 86.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 8, 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 2430. A. Murray, Waiting on God, p. 93. XXVI. 9.—W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches (2nd Series), p. 15. J. B. Mozley, Sermons Parochial and Occasional, p. 106. R. D. B. Rawnsley, Village Sermons (1st Series), p. 75. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. i. p. 71. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 31. XXVI. 12.—Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. iii. p. 275.

PEOPLE WHO THINK THEY HAVE DONE NO GOOD IN LIFE

'We have not wrought any deliverance in the earth.'—ISAIAH XXVI. 18.

ISRAEL WAS mourning before God. They deemed they had accomplished nothing. They thought nobody was any better in all the land for anything they had attempted.

How often God's people thus judge and condemn themselves! They conclude they have only cumbered the ground. Life appears to them a failure. What Israel wailed of old is their lamentation still: 'We have not wrought any deliverance in the earth'.

It was pathetic that Mrs. Oliphant inscribed these doleful words upon the title-page of her latest volume of stories. She appeared to think all her labour had resulted in little or nothing. And yet we cannot doubt that in many senses that gifted and heroic authoress did work deliverance in the earth.

This is frequently the retrospect which God's best and most useful people take of their life. Even C. H. Spurgeon at the last charged himself with 'uselessness'. He did this in a letter to his friend Bishop Thorold. Think of Spurgeon, of all men, self-accused of uselessness. It is one of Satan's most depressing devices that he causes God's people to cry, 'We have not wrought any deliverance in the earth'.

Let me speak to people who think they have done no good in life. May I but check this sore complaint which they utter to the Lord! Oh to give them, through grace, a more sanguine review!

I. Varied forms of deliverance are to be wrought. In many ways the earth is embondaged. 'The whole creation groaneth and travaileth.' Whichever region we contemplate there is abundant need of 'deliverance'. Captive souls are all around us; fettered intellects; bodies bound of Satan these long weary years. Who is entirely free? Verily there is abundant scope for 'deliverance' to be 'wrought'.

II. To work deliverance is a supreme end in life.

III. We are all apt to declare that we have wrought no deliverance.

IV. This is a dangerous lamentation.

V. Only the people of God can work true deliverance in the earth.

VI. We shall not know in this life what deliverance we have wrought.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Gospel of the Left Hand, p. 151.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 19.—F. B. Meyer, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 312. J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 70. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 306. J. M. Neale, Occasional Sermons, p. 13.

THE LORD COMING OUT OF HIS PLACE

'Come, My people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee: hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. For, behold, the Lord cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity.'—ISAIAH XXVI. 20, 21.

WHAT is the object of the retirement which is thus recommended to Israel.

I. Israel in retirement will see that God is the author of the great judgment on the nations—on the great monarchies of the Eastern world. One of the faults of this people, which haunted it from age to age, was that it did not see God in history—in its own history, in the history of the world.

Is it not much the same among ourselves? How do the majority of us Englishmen look at passing events, and especially at misfortunes, whether they happen to the world at large, or to our own country, or to our families, or to ourselves? If we think about them steadily at all we trace them to their causes—their 'second causes,' as our popular language religiously puts it—that is, to the forces or the events which appear to us immediately to produce these misfortunes. We ought not to stop at these secondary causes just as if they were living forces—just as if they were, to all intents and purposes, gods—as if there were no power beneath, behind them, to set them in motion, to control, or to check them—no Cause of causes Who is the real agent always and everywhere.

And if we would see God behind the agencies which, when governing us and governing the world, He employs, whether in judgment or in mercy, we must detach ourselves from the imperious, the binding power of sense: we must retire within the chambers of the soul, into an atmosphere of prayer.

II. And Israel in retirement may learn something of God's purposes in judgment. What a judgment means does not by any means always lie upon the surface. It only appears upon consideration, and it is missed if we do not make a serious personal effort to discover it.

Society as a whole has no eye for the drift of the judgments of God. God who rules the world unveils His mind to pure and holy souls, while He hides it from those who believe themselves to be the wise and prudent. To study the Divine mind in God's judgments in time is to learn before they appear—to learn to read—the signs of the Son of Man in heaven. It is to prepare in the most intelligent and effective way for the final doom.

III. And Israel in retirement may have power with God in judgment. The Israel of Isaiah's day could do little or nothing directly. But indirectly Israel might yet do as much as, or rather more than, in those ancient times.

If prayer can thus reach the physical and inanimate world, much more can it reach the moral and the human world; and so now, while the world goes on its way as if it held its own future bound in its hand, its course is really swayed by those of whom it takes the very least account—by poor and unimportant and simple people who live much alone with God, and who have ready access to His ear and to His heart. Israel, in his chambers, Isaiah would say, might yet do more for the future of the world than if David had been still ruling from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean.—H. P. LIDDON, Penny Pulpit, vol. xii. No. 689, p. 182.

Illustration.—An old writer tells us that he was reminded of this passage in Isaiah when he visited those remarkable sepulchres of the early Christian dead, the catacombs beneath the city of Rome. As he looked on those narrow cells cut out in the soft rock, with a brief inscription on a tablet in front of each, and read how first one and then another aged man, or youth, or maiden, had, in one of the last great imperial persecutions, laid down life itself for Christ, he could not but feel that God had called that soul to enter into the chambers of the blessed dead, and had shut the doors about and hidden it as it were for a little moment until the indignation was overpast—until the blessed day of the resurrection when the Lord Jesus should come out of His place for judgment, when it would enter on its new and on its splendid inheritance of life.—H. P. LIDDON.

REFERENCES.—XXVI. 20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 2387. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, p. 104. H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxii. 1902, p. 393. XXVI. 20, 21.—H. P. Liddon, Advent in St. Paul's, vol. i. p. 78. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2459. XXVI.—H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1908, p. 410. XXVII.—1-9. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2459. XXVII. 3.—Ibid. vol. xxv. No. 1464; vol. xi. No. 2391. XXVII. 5.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 121.

THE DAY OF THE EAST WIND

'He stayeth His rough wind in the day of the east wind.'—ISAIAH XXVII. 8.

I TAKE our text as a poet's thought. Translated, then, I read these meanings in it: Firstly, Our trials are timed. Secondly, Our sufferings are measured. Thirdly, Our lives are compensated.

I. Our Trials are Timed.—'He stayeth His rough wind in the day of the east wind.' It is something to know the east wind has its day. To everything under heaven, even the blighting scourge out of the east, there is a time.

In its larger aspects we are all agreed on that. There are whole classes of trials that have their season as surely as seed-time and harvest have. God in the life means order, means succession, means changing discipline for changing years. When I once see that trials have their times, I gain a new stability and peace.

Take no anxious thought about to-morrow. Do not go out to meet your troubles half-way. Till the day of the east wind dawns it cannot blow. When its morning comes, a sovereign God will summon it.

II. Our Sufferings are Measured.—The rough, rude, boisterous gale is on a man. He never could stand the blight of the east wind now. God sees: God knows: God willeth not that any man should perish. If the east wind must blow, the rough wind shall be called home that morning. And that is a poet's image of God's tender mercy.

III. Our Lives are Compensated.—The east wind blows. Is life worth living to-day? Can there be any compensation for that searching gale? Just on account of that east wind, God kept the rough wind in its chains this morning. It is heaven's compensation for the one that the other shall have no liberty to blow to-day.

I want you to believe God's ways are equal. We should fret less, we should worry less, we should have sweeter hearts, and far, far kindlier tongues, if we but realized God's compensating hand. You have been crying out bitterly against the east wind; you have quite forgotten that the rough wind is stayed. You have no iron will, no masterful character; you are impressionable, yielding, almost weak. So is the sea impressionable, yet there are glories unspeakable of light and shadow on it, and a highway for the great navies there.—G. H. MORRISON, Flood-Tide, p. 220.

REFERENCES.—XXVII. 12.—J. A. Baird, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 148. XXVII. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. 1. No. 2868. XXVIII. 1-13.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 125. XXVIII. 3-5.—Ibid. p. 132. XXVIII. 5.—Ibid. p. 136. XXVIII. 5, 6.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 85. T. McCrie, Sermons, p. 304. XXVIII. 10, 13.—D. Fraser, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 189.

THE VERIFYING FACULTY

'This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest; and this is the refreshing.'—ISAIAH XXVIII. 12.

THE Bible is always talking in our mother tongue. The oldest and greatest of the Prophets spoke in language which almost children can understand and appreciate. Take such words as 'weary'; the child knows what it means when it sees its father returning from the fields and stretching himself in token of fatigue. And 'rest,' the little word needs no translation; and 'refreshing,' the very word which an apostle uses in later times when he speaks of 'times of refreshing,' new showers, larger rains, food in the wilderness, water among the rock. 'This is the rest, this is the refreshing:' it is undoubted, it brings its own evidence along with it, it needs no witnesses and no certificates and no chemical tests. It makes its gospel known, and the world says, Well, master, thou hast said the truth; this is right, the heart feels it, the inmost soul is grateful for such proclamations.

We have in the text an exercise of what may be called the verifying faculty. The Bible alone gives you the all-sufficing answers to the all-including enigmas. Why fool away our time by asking adventurers and empirics to give us answers, when the Bible overflows with them, and our verifying faculty takes up the answers one by one and says, This is right, this is the voice of God, this is the outlined kingdom of heaven?

I. Take for example the question of consolation. You are told that you live in a system of law, that you are engaged or enmeshed in a great scheme of fatalism, and that things come and go, and we must accept them either in their going or their coming. Are you satisfied? You say to such visitors from far-away countries, miserable comforters are ye all! Away with you! for my soul loathes this evil meat which you set before it in its hunger. Who told you that these conceptions were wrong? You told yourself; the verifying faculty within you said, All that may in a certain measurable and momentary sense be more or less true, but it does not touch my hunger, my thirst, the sore of my heart, the agony that looks death into me. I believe in inspired experience; there comes a time when life so pulses and suns itself before a man's consciousness and a man's imagination that he himself has within his very soul the pleading and illuminating and solacing Spirit of God.

II. Now take it in the matter of repentance. The Prophet was offering this people in the context a very great offer. They were all drunk, they were all babbling mockers.

Yet the Lord made a great offer to them, He offered to teach them knowledge and to understand doctrine; He said to them, I will give you another opportunity: this is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest—repentance, be sorry in your soul's soul on account of your sin. We know at once that the answer is right. Only repentance can touch sin; it is not something on the surface that can be removed by a mechanical act; sin is in the soul, sin is so to say in the very tissue of the spirit; it is a grief against God and a grief in God's own heart, and God's only answer to sin is creating the possibility of true, profound, poignant, and sufficient repentance.

III. Take it in the matter of obedience. Obedience is God's way to refreshing; obedience opens the fountains, obedience points the way that will conduct you to the living wells of the living water. This is the rest—repentance; this is the refreshing—obedience; go back to God and find what you want. When you have lost your jewel you must find it.

IV. Then we take it, finally, at the very grave itself. We come to that awfullest of all sights, the descent of the coffin, the moment of intolerable agony, the dumb farewell, the speechless withdrawal; and there comes a loving voice which says of those who are interred in the hope of the Christian resurrection, This is the rest whereby He causes the weary to rest: he, she, is going to rest, to the last sleep, the holy slumber, out of which only one voice can awake her: this is the rest, this deep cold hideous thing, the grave, this is the rest. Then the soul catches the fire of God; it says in words that cannot be heard, O grave, where is thy victory, thou cruel monster, thou terrible thing? It has no victory; she has found in thee the pillow on which she can rest her weariness. And this is the refreshing; this tomb is not a grave only, it is a well, a well of living water, and in a mysterious, ideal, but not the less influential and effective sense, those who go down into the grave in the spirit of Christ and in the spirit of His Cross find below it the rockspring of which, if a soul drink, it shall thirst no more.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. III. p. 83.

REFERENCES.—XXVIII. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1593. XXVIII. 14.—F. D. Maurice, Christmas Day and Other Sermons, p. 105.

THE LEISURE OF FAITH

'He that believeth shall not make haste.'—ISAIAH XXVIII. 16.

I. Of course, it is very necessary for clear thinking to distinguish the haste of our text from strenuous speed. Every one who is at all in earnest about things feels the push and the pull to get his life-work done; but a strenuous and resolute forwardness such as that is very different from the spirit of haste. 'Unhasting but unresting' should be the motto on every Christian's coat of arms.

1. I like to apply our text to hasty judgments. He that believeth shall not make haste to judge. In all disparagement there is a lack of faith. In every hasty summing up of character what is really revealed is our own want of trust.

2. Again, I think our text is full of meaning for those who are in a great hurry to enjoy, and perhaps the haste to be rich and taste life's pleasures was never so markedly felt as it is now. Life has not been given us to enjoy, life has been given us to use.

3. Again, I keep whispering this text within my heart when I observe our common haste to see results. The man who believes in himself and in his message is never in a hurry to see results. What I feel is that if the Church of Christ really believes in her mission and her message, she must not be feverish about results.

II. Now when we turn to the dealings of God with men there is one thing that impresses us very deeply. It is the slowness of all God's procedure in guiding and blessing our humanity. In all God's dealings with the human race, and in all God's dealings with the human soul, there is purpose, urgency, infinite persistence; but I think no man will detect hurry there.

Now take our text and let it illuminate that thought. It is because God believes in man that He refuses to hurry His development. We speak a great deal about our faith in God. Never forget God's glorious faith in us.

And when I pass to the earthly life of Jesus, I am arrested by the same procedure there. He was leisurely, just because He trusted men.—G. H. MORRISON, Sun-Rise, p. 196.

FAITH AND HASTE

'He that believeth shall not make haste.'—ISAIAH XXVIII. 16.

'He that believeth shall not make haste.' That does not mean he that believeth shall never be hurried. This matter of haste is not a purely personal matter. We live in a hasting world—a world full of conditions that we did not make and must accept. In the heart of a swaying crowd it is nonsense for a man to say, 'I will not be swayed'. The crowd settles that matter for him. But he can say, 'I will keep calm and collected,' and can make good his word.

Jesus understood life completely. He was more human than we are, because He was Divine, and His Divinity took hold of all that is essential in humanity. And that was the secret of the quietness of the life of Jesus. It was a life lived for the essential things.

I. It is missing these things that turns life into a rush and a whirl and a selfish struggle. The world is in a mighty hurry, not because its life is so full—though that is the way it always accounts for its haste—but because it is so empty; not because it touches reality at so many points, but because it misses it at all points. The more we hurry the less we live. Life is not to be gauged merely quantitatively. There is a qualitative measurement. The length of life is found by measuring its depth. It goes inward to the core of the soul. It takes its meaning there and carries that meaning out into the eternity of God.

It is true that under favourable circumstances selfishness may seem to live without haste. A man may take life quietly because he does not take it seriously. He may be quiet because he is asleep. But that is not the quietness of faith. Let not this selfish sluggard claim a place among the disciples of a quiet life. In the eyes of faith life in all its concerns grows ever greater, and the greater a thing life becomes in a man's eyes the more disposed does he become, and the more able to live it out quietly. Haste is the product of a low and mistaken view of life. It is the outcome of a vast delusion concerning the things that matter and the things that last. Faith discovers the delusions, and lays hold upon the few great simple things that really count in life's long reckonings—the clean heart, the good conscience, justice, mercy, sympathy, and the service of love.

II. And, further, the haste of the world is the result of the short view of life. The world is in such a desperate hurry because it has no plan, no toil, no aspiration which the nightfall will not blot out. Unbelief has no to-morrow. Worldliness has no time to live. We often say, 'I wish I had more time,' meaning, of course, that we wish we could dispose of the hours of the day more in accordance with our personal desires. But our real need in life is not more time but more eternity. Instead of saying, 'Now or never,' Christ teaches us to say, 'Now and for ever'. He that believeth shall find the eternal meaning and the eternal issues of these fleeting hours. He shall know that he has time in which to do his best because the highest faith of his soul, the deepest desire of his heart, the most real significance of his daily toil, goes on for ever into the eternity of God.—P. AINSWORTH, The Pilgrim Church, p. 168.

REFERENCES.—XXVIII. 16.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 138. J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 123. W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 294. D. Coster, Christ a Sure Foundation, Sermons, 1842-79. XXVIII. 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxv. No. 1501. C. G. Finney, Sermons on Gospel Themes, p. 118.

MAN'S SCHEMES

'For the bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it; and the covering narrower than he can wrap himself in it.'—ISAIAH XXVIII. 20.

Two things we are asked to consider in this text concerning man's plans and schemes: (1) Their insufficiency, and (2) their insecurity.

I. Their Insufficiency.—Man's plans do not reach far enough, they are too short, he cannot stretch himself out upon them, and consequently it were folly for him to repose in them. Now the chief concern of man in this life is, or should be, the formation and maintenance of character. God alone can compass true character. God alone can conceive the plan which, being independent of all external and worldly circumstance, can build up and maintain a true all-round character. And has He not done this in the person and work of Jesus Christ?

II. Their Insecurity.—Man's plans are not only found to be insufficient, but also insecure. 'The covering is narrower than that a man can wrap himself in it.' As Israel found their plans to be insecure, a narrow covering indeed, so shall we find our earth-born plans, whereby we would protect our characters before God and man, fail us. As the house built upon the sand may stand well and look well whilst the sun is shining and there is calm all around, but will be utterly destroyed when the wind begins to beat upon it and the rain to fall, so our characters built upon our own feeble, insufficient plans will in like manner fall when the wrath of God shall descend upon the children of disobedience.—J. GAY, Common Truths from Queer Texts, p. 83.

REFERENCES.—XXVIII. 20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 244. Hugh Black, University Sermons, p. 164. W. W. Battershall, Interpretations of Life and Religion, p. 31. XXVIII. 21.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 147. W. L. Watkinson, The Transfigured Sackcloth, p. 221. XXVIII. 23-29.—Ibid. p. 150. XXVIII. 24-29.—P. N. Waggett, Church Times, vol. xlix. 1903, p. 459. XXVIII. 25.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1626. XXVIII. 29.—Ibid. vol. xii. No. 711. XXIX. 11, 12.—W. M. Taylor, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 191. XXIX. 13.—P. H. Hall, The Brotherhood of Man, p. 79.

TRUE IMPERIALISM

'The shadow of Egypt.'—ISAIAH XXX. 2.

MANY of the changes that time brings are on the surface of life. There is a certain stability at the heart of things. The great laws of life change not. The selfsame sunlight that put an end to Jacob's conflict with the angel gilds our joys and guides our toils to-day. So is it with these human hearts of ours. So is it with the great common sentiments and necessities. Motives that swayed men's lives when the world was young can be traced in modern life. Life changes its costume more easily than it changes its character. When we say that history repeats itself, we do not mean that there are occasional coincidences; we mean rather that the best and the worst in human life have a tendency to perpetuate themselves, and that through all the ages the human heart beats to the same tune, cherishes some of the same nobilities and the same follies, and shows itself capable of much that is fine and much that is contemptible.

So we may go back through very many centuries and find in a bit of ancient history that which is repeating itself in the life of to-day. The national question among the Jews of Hezekiah's day was, How can we shake off the Assyrian yoke? And the popular solution of the problem was, Enter into an alliance with Egypt. True, Egypt was a land of many idols, but it was also a land of many horses and chariots, and full coffers. And there have always been those in the world who, when they have wanted chariots, have not been over particular where they borrowed them. There have always been those who would fraternize with an idolater—provided he was a rich idolater. Egypt was powerful with that kind of power that the world and the devil can fully appreciate. There is a might that calls to the world in the clang of iron and the thunder of horsemen and the clink of gold, and many there be that trust in it. There is a might that lifts not up its voice in the clamour of the world, but that pleads its rights and its power in the silences of thought, in the quiet inner place where conscience dwells, in the depths of all true feeling, and on the lonely heights of the ideal—and would to God that you and I had more faith in it.

I. The choice between these two is ever before us. Since the days of Hezekiah, kingdoms have risen to greatness and sunk into oblivion. The great centres of power and industry, of learning and dominion, have shifted steadily westward. Places that once pulsed with industrial activity and political influence have now little more than an archæological significance. But the heart of the West to-day is as the heart of the East in many a dim yesterday, and the thing against which the Jewish Prophet protested is the thing against which some one must protest still—even trust in the shadow of Egypt. Recall for a moment the stately and spiritual interest of a song that Israel sang in the days of a purer and more reverent national life: 'He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge and my fortress, my God in whom I trust. Surely He shall deliver thee.' Then the shadow of Egypt fell on the people. They transferred their allegiance, not deliberately, but none the less really, from the unseen to the seen. The great changes of life, and especially those for the worse, are often undeliberate.

II. The difference between the nation and the individual is mainly a quantitative one. If the national confidence is in the shadow of Egypt, it is because the individual confidence is there. The shadow of an earthly ideal, an unspiritual interpretation of life, a material estimate of success, has fallen on our separate souls. No wonder that men miss the divinity of history, and leave God out of their widest reckonings and their corporate counsels, when they fail to find them in their toil for bread, and, reversing the word of Scripture, say, 'We walk by sight and not by faith'.

III. The first debt that we owe to our country must be paid to our God. The highest service that any man can render to the Fatherland is the service of faith. To dwell in the secret place of the Most High, and abide under the shadow of the Almighty; to lay up treasure in heaven; to be reverent and prayerful and unselfish; to lean on God amid the simple toils and necessities and pains of one's daily life; to manifest the heroism that passes unrecognized among men because it is heroism, and, therefore, clothed in humility; to be less worldly than you are often tempted to be; to believe in the deathless divinity of conscience, duty, and love—this is the higher patriotism, into whose hands at last the honour and the peace of any people must be placed for safe keeping.—P. AINSWORTH, The Pilgrim Church, p. 227.

REFERENCES.—XXX. 7.—E. A. Draper, The Gift of Strength, p. 46. W. Baxendale, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 278. J. Vaughan, Sermons Preached in Christ Church, Brighton (7th Series), p. 23. XXX. 10.—J. H. Jellett, The Elder Son, p. 164.

THE SECRET OF STRENGTH

'In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength: and ye would not.'—ISAIAH XXX. 15.

HEZEKIAH was double-minded; he had faith in God, yet he was not free from confidence in the arm of flesh. The Prophet was inspired to dissuade him from relying upon an earthly helper, and to assure him that in returning and in rest he should be saved. Apply this message to our own day.

I. The Need for this Counsel.—This is manifest when we consider—

(a) The dangers with which Christians are often threatened from without. Adverse circumstances, sore temptations, fierce assaults of the foe, are likely to disturb and to dismay.

(b) The weakness of which we are conscious within. Where shall we look for help and deliverance? Who are we that we should withstand such force, and baffle such craft?

II. In Time of Danger and Alarm it is not Easy to Maintain a Quiet Heart.—The advice is especially hard to follow in days of religious excitement or unsettlement, in days of social restlessness and of political change. In fact, this counsel is most difficult to accept just when it is most urgently needed.

III. The Nature and Bearing of this Counsel.—The exhortation is to—

(a) Quietness. A quiet mind is acknowledged to be a great blessing; it is only to be enjoyed by those who live in, and who breathe a serene atmosphere of devotion and fellowship with God.

(b) Confidence. This must be placed in Him who deserves and requires it. Faith in an overruling Providence; faith in a gracious and almighty Saviour; this is the posture of the soul which is here commended.

IV. The Blessings which Follow.

(a) Strength. This is a paradox, but it is a truth. Not the noisy, blustering, restless nature, is strong; but the nature which waits calmly and patiently on God.

(b) Safety. Whatever be the ill that overhangs the soul, whoever be the foe that assails it, there is one Deliverer, and He is Divine; there is one security, and that is quiet faith in Him.

REFERENCES.—XXX. 15.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 2985. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 156. J. T. Bramston, Sermons to Boys, p. 8. R. T. Davidson, In Quietness and Confidence, Sermon, 1885. H. M. Hilton, Church Times, vol. xl. 1898, p. 91.

WAITING

'And therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you. . . . Blessed are all they that wait for Him.'—ISAIAH XXX. 18.

WE have here two companion pictures.

I. The Lord waiting to bless. In the word 'wait' there lies, first, the idea of longing and yearning. All true love is a longing to make the beloved happy. Second, along with this longing to bless there is something that regulates the flow of the Divine love, 'Therefore doth the Lord wait'. A man must be prepared for the gift, and then, and not till then, will God bestow it. Third, there is often a wise and loving delay that a man may feel his dependence upon God. Instances—Martha and Mary, and death of Lazarus: 'Lord, if thou hadst been here'. Peter in prison, and at last moment, when hope is almost dead, deliverance comes. The Syrophenician woman—The Lord waiteth that He might be gracious.

II. The men waiting to be blessed. Our attitude has to have in it the same elements that God's has—First, earnest desire; second, patient dependence.—A. MACLAREN, Contemporary Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 126.

REFERENCES.—XXX. 18.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1766. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 159. A. Murray, Waiting on God, p. 97. T. Barker, Plain Sermons, p. 161. XXX. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1419. XXX. 19-21.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part i. p. 46. XXX. 20.—Morgan Dix, Sermons Doctrinal and Practical, p. 245. XXX. 21.—T. Yates, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 404. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1672. J. Keble, Sermons for Advent to Christmas Eve, p. 382. XXX. 26.—J. K. Popham, Sermons, pp. 263, 272. XXX. 29.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 274. XXX. 32.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 93. XXXI. 5.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 161. XXXI. 6.—J. Keble, Sermons for Christmas and Epiphany, p. 225. XXXI. 9.—Ibid. p. 168. XXXII. 1.—J. Vickery, Ideals of Life, p. 3. W. J. Woods, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 60. A. G. Blenkin, ibid. vol. liv. 1898, p. 298. XXXII. 1, 2.—W. C. E. Newbolt, ibid. vol. xlv. 1894, p. 8. XXXII. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1243; vol. xlix. No. 2856; vol. liii. No. 3031. A. Mursell, Hush and Hurry, p. 80. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 38. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 176; see also Sermons Preached in Manchester (3rd Series), p. 135. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 241. R. W. Dale, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 212. J. H. Jowett, ibid. vol. lv. 1899, p. 83. T. L. Cuyler, ibid. vol. lviii. 1900, p. 14. Jonathan Edwards, Works, vol. ii. p. 929. J. Boston, ibid. vol. ix. p. 220. E. Cooper, Practical Sermons, vol. v. p. 98. Simeon, Works, vol. viii. p. 45.

Blunt, Posthumous Sermons, vol. i. p. 23. C. Bradley, Practical Sermons, vol. i. p. 45. J. Keble, Sermons for the Saints' Days, p. 286. XXXII. 3.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 104. XXXII. 8.—W. S. Rainsford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 60. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. pp. 111, 122. XXXII. 13.—T. Arnold, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 222. XXXII. 14, 15.—G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 64. XXXII. 17.—J. Fraser, Parochial and Other Sermons, p. 321. J. H. Jowett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 380.

'Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters.'—ISAIAH XXXII. 20.

THE text of Coleridge's Lay Sermon (1817), which he describes as 'easy to be remembered from its briefness, likely to be remembered from its beauty'.

REFERENCES.—XXXII. 20.—W. J. Hocking, ibid. vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 396. J. Percival, Sermons at Rugby, p. 85. F. E. Paget, Sermons on Duties of Daily Life, p. 311; see also Plain Preaching to Poor People (6th Series), p. 121.

GOD IS A CONSUMING FIRE

'The sinners in Zion are afraid; fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites. Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings? He that walketh righteously, and speaketh uprightly; he that despiseth the gain of oppressions, that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes, that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil; he shall dwell on high; his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks: bread shall be given him; his waters shall be sure.'—ISAIAH XXXIII. 14-16.

THIS passage contains a question, and the reply to the question, and an assurance over and above the reply.

I. Consider the answer here given to the inquiry about dwelling with God. The possession of spiritual life—shown to be spiritual life by the external manifestations of walking righteously, and speaking uprightly, and holding aloof from evil—is the one thing which enables a man to stand without being consumed in the consuming fire of the presence of God.

II. We advance to consider our second point—the question asked by the sinners and hypocrites, or rather the statement involved in their question, that the God with whom we have to do is a consuming or devouring fire.

So long as we are in this world there is a sort of screen or veil interposing itself between our souls and God. God deals with us through the intervention of intermediate agencies, and thus there is no special distress, no very pungent misery experienced, if we are out of harmony with the Divine nature. But in the world of the future this state of things is altered. The screen is dropped, and the soul comes into direct, immediate contact with Deity, is hemmed round, and clasped in every direction, by Him Who is a consuming fire. To the purified soul, then, which has consented—willingly, gladly, consented—to be detached from its sin, and which, whilst on earth, has been changed into the image of Christ by the operation of the Holy Spirit, such close proximity to the Godhead is the source of indescribable gladness. But to the soul which has clung to its sin, and has identified itself with its sin, and has refused to be disentangled from its sin—this plunging into an element for which it is not prepared, and with which it has no affinity, this coming into direct contact with the purity and holiness of God—brings intolerable torment.

III. Something is promised us if we be of the number of those who walk righteously, and speak uprightly, and dwell in the presence of God. What is it? We may call it 'inaccessibility'—the being placed high beyond the reach of anything that can really harm us.—GORDON CALTHROP, Penny Pulpit, vol. xvi. No. 926, p. 129.

REFERENCES.—XXXIII. 14.—F. Ferguson, Peace With God, p. 1. XXXIII. 14, 15.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 189. XXXIII. 15, 16.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1764. XXXIII. 16.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 199. XXXIII. 16, 17.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 132.

THE INVISIBLE PRESENCE OF GOD

(Advent)

ISAIAH XXXIII. 17.

THERE is a peculiar feeling with which we regard the dead. What does this arise from?—that he is absent? No; for we do not feel the same towards one who is merely distant, though he be at the other end of the earth. Is it because in this life we shall never see him again? No, surely not; because we may be perfectly certain we shall never see him when he goes abroad, we may know he is to die abroad, and perhaps he does die abroad; but will anyone say that, when the news of his death comes, our feeling when we think of him is not quite changed? Surely it is the passing into another state which impresses itself upon us, and makes us speak of him as we do—I mean, with a sort of awe. We cannot tell what he is now, what his relations to us, what he knows of us. We do not understand him, we do not see him. He is passed into the land 'that is very far off'; but it is not at all certain that he has not some mysterious hold over us. Thus his not being seen with our bodily eyes, while perchance he is present, makes the thought of him more awful. Apply this to the subject before us, and you will perceive that there is a sense, and a true sense, in which the invisible presence of God is more awful and overpowering than if we saw it. And so again, the presence of Christ, now that it is invisible, brings with it a host of high and mysterious feelings, such as nothing else can inspire. The thought of our Saviour, absent yet present, is like that of a friend taken from us, but, as it were, in dream returned to us, though in this case not in dream, but in reality and truth.—J. H. NEWMAN.

WORSHIP, A PREPARATION FOR CHRIST'S COMING

(Advent)

'Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty: they shall behold the land that is very far off.'—ISAIAH XXXIII. 17.

YEAR after year, as it passes, brings us the same warnings again and again, and none perhaps more impressive than those with which it comes to us at this season. The very frost and cold, rain and gloom, which now befall us, forebode the last dreary days of the world, and in religious hearts raise the thought of them. The year is worn out; spring, summer, autumn, each in turn, have brought their gifts and done their utmost; but they are over, and the end is come. All is past and gone, all has failed, all has sated; we are tired of the past; we would not have the seasons longer; and the austere weather which succeeds, though ungrateful to the body, is in tone with our feelings, and acceptable. Such is the frame of mind which befits the end of the year; and such the frame of mind which comes alike on good and bad at the end of life. The days have come in which they have no pleasure; yet they would hardly be young again, could they be so by wishing it. Life is well enough in its way; but it does not satisfy. Thus the soul is cast forward upon the future, and in proportion as its conscience is clear and its perception keen and true, does it rejoice solemnly that 'the night is far spent, the day is at hand,' that there are 'new heavens and a new earth' to come, though the former are failing; nay, rather that, because they are failing, it will 'soon see the King in His beauty,' and 'behold the land which is very far off'. These are feelings for holy men in winter and in age, waiting, in some dejection perhaps, but with comfort on the whole, and calmly though earnestly, for the Advent of Christ.—J. H. NEWMAN.

FAR OFF, YET NIGH

'Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty; they shall behold the land that is very far off.'—ISAIAH XXXIII. 17.

HEAVEN is shown as a land of glory and peace and joy and rest. There is no darkness, no parting, no pain, and no sorrow. And yet we are given to understand from the words of the text that it is a land from which we are far off. A shadow of disappointment passes over us, a feeling of pain when we remember that the life of the blessed ones is far off, and we have a lone, hard road to travel before we can be safe—safe and sure in the presence of the King. That long road which we have to travel is life, and there is no cutting the distance short. Although this life contains many comforts, luxuries, and pleasures, the beauty of the vision of the King outshines them all. And to us, even with the vision of that far-off land, there comes a feeling of disappointment. We want safety and happiness now. Why does God keep it all for that land which is so far off? It is we that are making a mistake.

I. God Does not Keep it for that Far-off Distant Land.—We are far too ready to think of God as a far-off God; we are teaching our children to believe in Him as such. We teach them that God's angels spread their wings around them as they sleep, that He hears them and He loves them. Yet when the child asks, Where is God? we answer, Up there, above the sky. Are we not teaching the child wrongly?

Are we not teaching him just that which we should not teach him, just that which we should not let ourselves think or believe—that God is a distant God? We think of God as One Who will meet us face to face in a distant world. Would it not be better to teach our children that God is always with them; that He is with them in their room; that if they go into another room He is there also; and that if they go out into the street He is with them still.

II. It is only by God's Help that our Soul's Enemies can be Overcome.—God sends us temptations to see what metal we are made of. Scientific men will not trust an untested instrument, and so it is that God would have us perfect. Perhaps never at any time in the history of Christianity has the study of faith in the face of difficulties been more wanted than now. Men are using their intellects and their physical powers more than ever before. Men require and want an answer where perhaps an answer cannot be given. God does not always see fit to tell us everything. Not till we get to the next world shall we see things clearly. The mysteries of life and death are mysteries still, and we are to wait for the far-off land before we can have all things clear.

REFERENCES.—XXXIII. 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiii. No. 752. D. MacGregor, The Dundee Pulpit, 1872, p. 74. W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches (2nd Series), p. 23. B. J. Snell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. ii. 1897, p. 106. H. D. Rawnsley, ibid. vol. lxvii. 1903, p. 379. J. Hamilton, Faith in God, p. 213. J. W. Horsley, Church Times, vol. xvi. 12 July, 1901. H. E. Manning, Sermons, p. 431. F. Ferguson, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 249; Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 101. XXXIII. 20-23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ix. No. 489. XXXIII. 21.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 206.

THE LORD OUR JUDGE

(Advent)

'For the Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our King; He will save us.'—ISAIAH XXXIII. 22.

THESE four sentences seem to sum up all the great lessons of Advent.

I. The Lord is our Judge.—That is the beginning, and the condition of all spiritual progress lies in realizing the absolute and everlasting distinction between good and bad—the absolute importance of being on the side of good. Christ tells us of the everlasting distinction between those on the right hand and those on the left. Yes, in spite of the vice and wickedness of the good, in spite of the virtues of the bad, there runs a line, invisible, but as profound as can be conceived, in amongst us as we gather together, that distinguishes between those who at the bottom of their wickedness are serving God, and those who, at the bottom, in spite of all their attractiveness, are serving their own flesh, their own lusts, and their own selfishness.

The answer to the question 'Who among us shall dwell in the everlasting fire?' is, He that walks uprightly; he who has done no wrong; for him this consuming and awful fire of the Divine presence shall be a vision of beauty and of the land that is very far off. But for those who have done wrong, what punishment must it be to simply find themselves in God's presence unfit! They will find nothing else but the everlasting burning and devouring fire, with no other fate than weeping and gnashing of teeth. Those will be the horrible consequences of making the one irretrievable mistake. 'The Lord is our judge.' That is the beginning—to believe it in our hearts.

II. The Lord is our Lawgiver.—Surely if God loves us, He must have given us some guidance as to how we should walk, be able to know His character, and to come at last into His presence to behold the King in His beauty. We know God legislated for the people of the old covenant. He was their lawgiver. He gave them their ceremonial law to know how to approach Him, their social law that they might regulate their social life agreeably to God and for their own well-being. All that has been deepened and sterilized for us into those great moral laws illustrated in the writings of the Bible from our Lord's own character. We know what is right and what is wrong conduct. More than that, the Lord has given us the laws of the Church, the requirements and ordinances whereby those who need education are taught and trained for God. 'The Lord is our lawgiver.'

III. The Lord is our King.—That means He requires our deliberate service. In all things, and in all parts of life the kingdom of God is to be promoted. All members of society should realize that because they belong to Christ they are to work for Christ, because they belong to society they are to work for society. 'The Lord is our King.'

IV. He will Come to Save Us.—If you search into your consciences you know that you want something which your own nature cannot supply, a cleansing profound, which reaches into the very roots of your being. You must be delivered not from the results, but from the very power of sin. 'He shall save His people from their sins'—the same Lawgiver, the same King, He is our Saviour—'He will come to save us'. He gave not only His love, but Himself.—BISHOP GORE, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXIII 1903, p. 72.

REFERENCES.—XXXIII. 22.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 213. C. Gore, Church Times, vol. XLIV. 1900, p. 743; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. LIX. 1901, p. 36. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. I. p. 144; see also Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. IV. p. 266.

VICTORIOUS CRIPPLEDNESS

'The lame take the prey.'—ISAIAH XXXIII. 23.

THIS is a proverb amply verified in history and experience, 'The lame take the prey'.

I. This is Seen in the Overcoming of Disadvantages.—'The survival of the fittest' is man's motto, but the Lord often disproves our mottoes; He shows how unaxiomatic our axioms are, for frequently it is the survival of what we deem unfittest which we are called to witness.

No man need make his disadvantages a reason of despondency, nor need any make them an excuse for spiritual ineffectiveness. Disadvantages become advantages at the transfiguring touch of Jesus.

II. This is True of Providential Supply.—Your course in life may be sadly hedged in, but God shall clear it. Your lot may be a barren one, but God shall fertilize it. 'Have faith in God.' Cry, oft as the day dawns, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' and it shall be given.

III. This is Illustrated in Triumph Over Temptation and Sin.—We are all lame spiritually. The tragedy of many lives is their temptations, but the Lord turns the tragedy into glory.

So in respect of our besetting sin. It has oftentimes laid us low. And we never feel our humiliating lameness as we do in its presence. But how many have received superhuman power so that they have taken the prey! Look to the exalted Christ. Think less of your lameness and more, far more, of His power.

IV. In Christian Service we see this Verified.—How lame we all are who minister for Christ! But the ministry of lame men need not be a lame ministry. Power Divine is an overmatch for human crippledness. This has been signally demonstrated in the history of the Church of Christ. 'Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings' God has perfected praise.

V. This is Discernible in the Spiritual Blessings which Abound Amid Trials.—One of Lord Lytton's most celebrated characters said, 'Pain does not conquer me,' but what Eugene Aram vainly said the Christian truly declares. Pain does not conquer Christ's people. They conquer their pain, and they often conquer by their pain. Think of all maiming as an opportunity of winning a great prize.

VI. This is a Parable of the Winning of Eternal Blessedness.—By human merit heaven was never won. Those crowned victors were all lame on a time. They thought that with their cruel limitations they would never gain that glory. But they overcame 'because of the blood of the Lamb'. The lame who trust their Saviour shall all at length shout with the shouting of them that take the prey.

VII. This is a Gospel of Individual Salvation.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Travels of the Heart, p. 193.

'The lame take the prey.'—ISAIAH XXXIII. 23.

I. The Lame.—It is clear that Israel, in her cleansed and forgiven remnant, is here indicated by this word lame. Impoverished in captivity, she had not regained her strength; but since God has wrought on her behalf there is to be no waiting; but, lame as she is, she may enter into the full enjoyment of that deliverance which, by the strong hand of God, has been accomplished.

Are we not here introduced to one of God's great principles? The deliverances of life have been conspicuously of God. He has gotten unto Himself the victory. 'Not by might nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord.' And the victories of God have so often been won, not merely for the lame, but through the lame, as to constitute a law of God in human affairs.

II. The Lame Take the Prey.—May we not inquire concerning the prey which they take. 'Then is the prey of a great spoil divided,' says the Prophet. It was, in the first instance, the prey of their conqueror Sennacherib and the Assyrian power.

(a) It was the prey of conquest. These people had been for many years in captivity. Now, though so feeble, so weak, so impoverished, they have taken the prey of conquest, even their liberty.

St. Paul speaks about our deliverance from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Christ said: 'If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed'. It is given unto us, in Christ Jesus our Lord, to possess the prey of conquest, the freedom of the 'law of liberty'. And in this respect it is the lame who take the prey. It is the man who is lamed by sin and who knows it: beaten by his temptations, and tempest-tossed with his many difficulties, who, relying upon the finished work of Jesus Christ, through love to Him, gets the mastery over the sin which doth so easily beset, and enters into the liberty of God, while many another, seemingly stronger, but often self-righteous, remains still in bondage.

(b) It is the prey of a rich experience. A bitter one 'tis true, but a rich one nevertheless. We think that there is nothing like the sunshine, nothing like prosperity. But it is often the intervening cloud which makes the shining of the sun more precious, and the period of adversity which makes us value all the more prosperity. 'I have got the sunshine on the sensitive plate,' says the photographer. 'Shut out the light now, close the door, blot out the sun, let me remain in darkness. What light I must have for to see at all must be subdued, broken up.'

See, in the darkness, how the form develops, how the impressions of the sunlight are revealed! God has shone forth, in the face of Jesus Christ, upon the soul of man, and away into the darkness, like St. Paul, that soul is driven that Christ may be formed, developed within. It may be that all along the sorrowful way that soul must pass in the shadows. But in that day, when the clouds and the mists will all have been dissolved, what a prey, a spoil, of rich experiences that soul will have taken.—J. GAY, Common Truths from Queer Texts, p. 122.

REFERENCES.—XXXIII. 23.—F. B. Cowl, Straight Tracks, p. 18. XXXIII. 23, 24.—F. B. Meyer, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 4. XXXIII. 24.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1905. XXXIV. 5.—W. D. Ross, The Sword Bathed in Heaven, p. 5. XXXV. 1.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part i. p. 69. XXXV.

3.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 243. XXXV. 4.—W. M. Taylor, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 196. F. Hastings, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 38. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2815. XXXV. 5.—S. A. Barnett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 52. XXXV. 5, 6.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 215. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2835. J. Keble, Sermons for Advent to Christmas Eve, p. 90. XXXV. 6, 7.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 221. XXXV. 6-10.—C. Voysey, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1894, p. 4.

THE MIRAGE AND THE POOL

'The mirage shall become a pool.'—ISAIAH XXXV. 7.

'The mirage shall become a pool.' The illusory shall become the substantial. The life of disappointments shall become a life of satisfaction.

I. What some men have experienced in the sandy desert others have suffered in the common life. Humanity is mocked by a mirage more inviting and enticing than the semblance of the desert. There is the illusory in life, the mirage which allures with its promise of satisfying pools, and then mocks us with its leagues of desolating sand.

Disappointments abound: is it possible for us to attain to satisfaction? Is it possible to get away from semblance to realities? Can life become satisfying, and not a cruel procession of bitter chagrins? A disappointing life means an undiscovered God! The world presents the mirage: God offers the pool. 'The mirage shall become a pool.' The life of disappointments shall become the life of satisfaction.

II. It is a heartening thing for the preacher to be able to say to himself and to his hearers that these pools of God have been found. Some of the pools have been named, and their very names are full of soft and cool refreshment. Here is one of the pools of the Lord, around which the pilgrims are gathered. What is its name? The 'wells of salvation'!

But here is another band of pilgrims gathered round about another of the waters of the Lord. What do they call it? 'The river of God's pleasures.' And the real import is even sweeter than the phrase conveys, for its inner meaning bears this suggestion, 'God's delicacies'. The pilgrims appear to lack the multitudinous and riotous revelries of life; but they have its finest distillations of joy. It is not always the man who owns the countryside who owns the landscape. He owns the estate; his almost penniless cottager, with the refined and purified spirit, owns the glory of the landscape. Which of them drinks of the river of 'God's delicacies'?

Here is yet another band of desert pilgrims gathered round about the refreshing waters of the Lord. They call it 'the river of peace'.

III. What is the testimony of the pilgrims who have been to the Lord's pools? Here is a strain from the pilgrim's song: 'My soul is satisfied as with marrow'. Here is another pilgrim witness: 'He satisfieth the longing soul'.—J. H. JOWETT, Apostolic Optimism, p. 144.

REFERENCE.—XXXV. 7, 8.—J. Wordsworth, The One Religion, Bampton Lectures, 1881, p. 181.

THE HIGHWAY OF HOLINESS

'And an highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called the way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those' (or 'He shall be with them,' if you look in your margins): 'the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein. No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon, it shall not be found there; but the redeemed shall walk there: and the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.'—ISAIAH XXXV. 8-10.

CONSIDER some of the characteristics of the life of holiness to which the Prophet here calls our attention, and the conditions which are attached to the right of way.

I. 'The unclean shall not pass over it.' Until we are washed and cleansed from our 'old sins' we are not in a position to pass over the King's highway of holiness. We must pass through the gate before we can pass along the way, and that gate is the Cross, where the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanses from all sin.

II. 'The highway of holiness is the path of 'fellowship with the Divine'. When Christ was here on earth He ever moved along this way, and He is still to be found there by those who pass it. We may put it thus: Fellowship with Christ is the privilege of those who are wholly consecrated to the Lord, whose supreme desire is to be holy as He is holy; and just in so far as this privilege is actually realized, the soul is more and more completely sanctified by contact with the Divine.

III. 'It is the way of right direction.' How often in life it seems as if we scarcely know which way to turn; we want to do the right thing, but we hardly know which is the right thing to do. But here is the promise if we are on the King's highway of holiness, 'Though we are fools we shall not err'. The reason why we make such great mistakes as we sometimes do is surely that we get off the King's highway of holiness. We allow ourselves to aim at some other object, and to be guided by some lower desire.

IV. It is the only way of right direction to those who are 'wayfaring men'. 'The wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein.' Do we not sometimes err because we have so little of the wayfaring man about us? We are called to use the world as not abusing it; surely it is the abuse of the world when we allow it to take the place of heaven.

There is a quaint old Latin proverb which tells us 'The penniless travellers shall sing before the robbers'. No wonder; for what can the robbers take from them? And many a Christian might sing defiance of all enemies—even of the great robber himself—if only we made over our all to its proper Owner, and regarded it as a sacred trust to be used for Him.

V. It is also 'the way of safety'. 'No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon. It shall not be found there.' If you ask for an explanation of this mysterious safety, I point you to the words which follow. It is the way of the redeemed. 'The redeemed shall walk there.' Why has Satan no power to do us harm? Because we have been redeemed out of his power. Jesus Christ gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity. And now that He has redeemed us, we are in a position to claim exemption and immunity, not from Satan's attacks, but from his tyrannous power over us.

VI. It is 'a way of joy'. There is no real happiness out of the highway of holiness. Who are the happy Christians? They who follow the Lord fully. Who are the miserable Christians? Those who aim at compromise, who lead a half-hearted life; for the lion can tear and wound them, if not utterly destroy them, as they stray from time to time from the highway of holiness; nor can they enjoy fellowship, for they do not walk in the light; nor can they be sure of right direction, for 'he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth'.

VII. 'It is the way that leads home.' We are on the King's highway, and every step brings us a little nearer to that home where our own Father lives, and where we shall receive such a welcome as only a Father can give.—W. HAY M. H. ATKEN, The Highway of Holiness, p. 1.

REFERENCES.—XXXV. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1912. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 63. J. E. Cumming, The Blessed Life, p. 34. XXXV. 9, 10.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 229. XXXV. 10.—J. Parker, Studies in Texts, vol. i. p. 191. XXXVI. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 646. XXXVII. 14.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 242. XXXVII. 14-21; 33-38.—Ibid. p. 235. XXXVII. 23.—Newman Smyth, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 168. XXXVII. 31.—J. H. Newman, Sermons Bearing on Subjects of the Day, p. 203. XXXVII. 36.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. ii. p. 301. XXXVIII. 1.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. liii. No. 3021. H. Grey Graham, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1903, p. 130. J. W. Coleenso, Village Sermons, p. 1. H. E. Manning, Sermons, vol. iii. p. 311. J. Hamilton Thom, Laws of Life (2nd Series), p. 16. J. Fraser, The Relations of Religion and Science Considered and the Principles of Voluntaryism and Endowment Compared, p. 18. XXXVIII. 1, 2.—W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches (2nd Series), p. 30. XXXVIII. 1, 2-4.—W. D. Ross, The Sword Bathed in Heaven, p. 57. XXXVIII. 1-5.—E. M. Goulburn, Occasional Sermons, p. 403.

ADDED YEARS

'Behold, I will add unto thy days fifteen years.'—ISAIAH XXXVIII. 5.

I. God adds Years to Many Men's Lives.—For example:—

(a) In recovery from sickness. The sickness seems unto death. Hope is gone, or wellnigh gone. But a 'favourable turn,' as we say, is taken, and another course of years is added unto the man's days.

(b) In the gradual strengthening of the consti- tution. A new and deeper spring seems to be found in the blood, which has 'earnest in it of far springs to be'. The delicate youth becomes a strong man.

(c) In escape from peril. The ship was foundering, and you were saved. A mere step or tuft of grass saved you from a fatal fall, etc. In one way or another, at one time or another, God has said to us, as to Hezekiah, 'I will add unto thy days fifteen years'.

II. How we should Look Upon those Added Years.

(a) With gratitude, as a special gift from God. Hezekiah sang a hymn of gratitude on his recovery. Do we remember to thank God for our added years; for 'healing our diseases, and redeeming our lives from destruction'?

(b) With awe and resolution, as peculiarly our charge from God. What to do with those fifteen years: how shall we make them fruitful for the glory of God and the good of our fellow-men? They are God's, by special and solemn trust; may we discharge that trust as under His eye, and as with the day of account hastening on.

(c) With constant mindfulness that soon they must be given back to God. They are only a small added portion; the last act in the drama of our life; the last stage in our earthly journey. Let your loins be girt, and your lamps burning, and be as those who are watching for 'the coming of the Bridegroom'.

REFERENCES.—XXXVIII. 11.—J. M. Neale, Sermons for Some Feast Days in the Christian Year, p. 1.

THE BLESSING OF PERSECUTION

O Lord, by these things men live, and in all these things is the life of my spirit.—ISAIAH XXXVIII. 16.

It will be good for us if life is imbued with the feeling that all they who live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution, that suffering is as much our way of bearing testimony and winning victory as labour can ever be, and that by these things, by humiliations, by anxieties, by impoverishment, men live, and in these is the life of their spirits.

I. Let me recall Christ's own anticipation of persecution and suffering, an anticipation fulfilled in Himself, in His Apostles, and in His Church. We hardly realize the wonder of His first prophecy. At the very dawn and outset of His career He knew what the course and the end would be. He had none of an enthusiast's dreams, none of the bright and daring hopes so often quenched in blood. The morning of His life was red, and all the weather of the day was foul, and His sun set as He knew it would, in a tempest of agony and woe. All through the history of His Church there have been the painful following, the hard battle, the heroic death. Until the spiritual earth and heaven are completed we shall have them again.

It was persecution that ended by degrees the earthly life of all the Apostles. One by one they filled up

His sacrifice of weariness, crowning life by death. The words of one are enough: 'Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day have I been in the deep—' This is among the first pages of the noble and unfinished catalogue of Christian labours and Christian suffering. So much did the Church suffer at the beginning, that one of the early Christian poets represents the cities of the earth, each offering the Lord when He came to judge the world the relics of the martyrs who reposed in them. Not one city in all the habitable world failed of her gift. So it has been all through. Some have gone home by a short, rough road; others have toiled on with bleeding feet for years ere they reached their last cross. In Japan, Christianity was literally killed out by the killing of every Christian. One form of torture there was to feed the mothers delicately, and to starve the children. The cries of their famished little ones would, it was hoped, shake the constancy of the mothers, and lead them to trample on the Cross. The martyrs have been tortured on the rack till every bone has been dragged from its place, and every nerve of the body has thrilled with agony. They have been flung into the dungeon to recover strength, and then been taken through the street loaded with chains to the place where they were burned to death. More dreadful even than the public martyrdoms have been the cases where the saints have been put to death in secret. In the Low Countries the Baptists used to be drowned alone and in the darkness, in huge vats of water, hearing nothing but the jests of the murderers who had 'given the dipper his last dip'. We must have patience, not for a short time only, not for a long time only, but to the end. The opposition to truth and freedom takes ever new forms. Such a difficulty rises up, such a trial stands in the way, such a temptation opposes, so we shall have it till the voice comes, 'Ye have compassed this desert long enough,' till the eternal day breaks, the one day known to the Lord when at eventime it shall be light.

II. The effect of persecution and of accepted suffering is life. When a great trial befell his Church, it was said of the leader by many who little knew, 'This will kill him'. By these things men live. It might kill weaklings, but if we are bound up with Christ, filled with His Spirit, the trial of faith is the minister and stimulant of life. We know how it is in the daily experience. We know how any great initiation into sorrow sobers, deepens, strengthens every nature that has in it the germs of good. There are regions of thought and feeling which may not be profitably discussed by those who have not traversed them. Many and many a time, even natures that seem poor and meagre are strangely enriched and ennobled by a baptism of fire. For the Christian, the trial brings the inner peace and power, and so we have the succession maintained in the world of men and women who out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the army of the aliens. The soul that seemed rootless and fruitless has, again and again, disclosed itself under trial as a branch of the True Vine that rejoiceth God and man. Persecution has killed Churches, but hardly ever, I think, save in cases where the members have actually been exterminated. It will destroy a feigned profession, but by these things the true, the brave, the faithful live—as they never live when the sun went on shining, and the winds were soft, and the world wore a fair face.

III. The lessons are very simple, but they go very deep. Trials borne for Christ bring us to the heart of Christ. The nearer we are to Him, the more calmly we shall look on the sunshine and the shadow too. It is His sunshine, and it is His shadow. Joined to Him we shall arm ourselves with the same mind, and pray for those who have wronged us or are wronging us. If they refuse to own us or receive us, let us hope for the time when the clouds will pass, and for the day of Christ, when all the flock will be gathered in the fold upon the everlasting hills.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, The Lamp of Sacrifice, p. 226.

REFERENCES.—XXXVIII. 16.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 151. XXXVIII. 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 316; vol. xix. No. 1110; vol. xxiii. No. 1337.

THE VALUE OF LIFE

'The grave cannot praise Thee, death cannot celebrate Thee. The living, the living, he shall praise Thee, as I do this day.'—ISAIAH XXXVIII. 18, 19.

THESE words form part of the writing of Hezekiah, King of Judah, when he had been sick and was recovered of his sickness.

I. Notice the lessons there are for us in the conduct of King Hezekiah:—

1. To have recourse to God, in all time of our sickness, 'to turn our face (as Hezekiah did) to the wall, and pray'.

2. 'To give God thanks on our recovery,' to think of Him as our Deliverer, our Healer. The God of our life, in Whom we live and move and have our being, Who has added to our life a longer share of days. To think why He has added them: why He has prolonged our days on earth, even for this end, that we may serve Him more faithfully, walk before Him with a more perfect, less divided heart.

3. The value of life—the value as giving us the greater opportunity for serving God.

II. Death was to Hezekiah a far darker, far drearier state than it is to us who are Christians, us to whom Jesus Christ hath brought immortality of life. If he had any hope of a life beyond the grave, it does not appear in his words.

But it is this very view of death, as the end all and be all of man's brief existence, which enhances to Hezekiah the value of life. Because life offered, as he thought, the single field for serving God, he grudged to have it shortened.

We who possess the Gospel need not, and ought not, to think thus gloomily of death. The question put so touchingly, so doubtfully, by the Psalmist, 'Dost Thou show wonders among the dead?' has been answered for us by the Resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ.

III. In that darker view of death which Hezekiah held, there is a lesson for our learning. Though death be not now the end of life, it is the end of this life, the end of our day of grace, the end of the period which God gives us in which to see if we will serve Him or not.

And remember, every life is wasted, every life is a misspent life which is not led to the glory and praise of God.—R. D. B. RAWNSLEY, Village Sermons, 3rd Series, p. 22.

REFERENCES.—XXXVIII. 18, 19.—R. Scott, Oxford University Sermons, p. 232. XXXIX. 3, 4.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 160. XL.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2733; vol. xlix. No. 2812. XL-LXVI.—Lyman Abbott, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 124.

COMFORT YE! COMFORT YE!

'Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God.'—ISAIAH XL. 1.

How lovable the God who speaks thus! He allures us irresistibly. He commands our hearts. And the quality of the consolation He enjoins is so rich. Comfort, in the Bible, means strengthening. The word has deteriorated of late. It now too often signifies soothing, lulling to rest. But when God says 'Comfort ye, comfort ye my people,' He calls His prophets to strengthen them, to arouse them, to nerve them. It is a great and enduring empowerment which God desires for the people of His choice.

I. Comfort is commanded of God. Sweet is this 'saith your God'. There is a God-given charter of consolation. Is not this very characteristic of God? In this as in all things God is very consistent.

Every congregation, whatever else it wants, wants comfort. God enjoins it because God knows the deep and enduring need of it. 'I was greatly comforted at Church,' says John Wesley in his Journals.

II. God's people have special need of comfort.

III. Verbal comfort is to be administered. 'Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem.'

IV. Trouble survived is a comforting consideration.

V. The forgiveness of sins is a source of powerful comfort.

VI. The exaction of retribution is a ground of comfort.

VII. Relationship with God is the most solid comfort.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Gospel of the Left Hand, p. 193.

REFERENCES.—XL. 1.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 85. John Watson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 145. T. Allen, ibid. vol. lxx. 1901, p. 72. C. Stanford, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 197. W. J. Knox-Little, The Light of Life, p. 159. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 221. B. J. Snell, The All-Enfolding Love, p. 81. XL. 1, 2.—J. E. Vernon, Plain Preaching to Poor People (8th Series), p. 75. J. K. Popham, Sermons, p. 232. XL. 1-10.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 244. XL. 2.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 167.

THE MESSAGE OF PALM SUNDAY

'The voice of one that, crieth Prepare ye in the wilderness the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a high-way for our God.'—ISAIAH XL. 3.

THAT humble pageant from which Palm Sunday derives its name—that procession, so poor yet so royal, so fatal yet so victorious, whereby the Prophet of Nazareth claimed the allegiance of His people and challenged the power of their rulers—finds a picturesque memorial in the rites of the Eastern Church. The morning service is heralded by a procession from the western door of the church to the altar. First marches one who bears a burning torch; next a deacon, holding aloft a copy of the Gospels; then the priests and the bishop, with sacred images; and last, so long as the Eastern Empire endured, followed the Emperor in his most royal robes. All alike bear palm branches in their hands and chant the ancient hymn: 'Come forth ye nations, come forth also ye people; look upon the kingdom of Heaven. The Gospel comes as a figure of the Christ.' Those venerable words have a message for us to-day; for they recall an aspect of Palm Sunday which is too little remembered. Year by year, when the day comes round, we give it a personal colour. Each one remembers a day, perhaps long ago, when the Saviour first made entry into his own heart; when first he consciously welcomed the King of Love. We do well so to remember, so to give thanks, and to renew the fervour of our loyalty. But personal faith is not the whole of religion. A Christian is concerned not only with his own soul, but with all humanity. He is pledged by the words of his daily prayer to extend the kingdom of God. He is bound on such a day to commemorate those eras of grace, landmarks in the history of mankind, when Christ has made entry into new realms, or brought new generations into His kingdom. He is encouraged to watch, as he prays, for the signs of a new visitation. He is impelled, as he looks upon some spiritual wilderness, to prepare the way of the Lord.

I. Preparing the Way.—Prepare the way! Does that mean lay out the Christian system before men's eyes? Surely not. For the Gospel is neither a code of laws to be obeyed nor a set of principles to be learned: it is, first of all, the presentation of a Person and a Life, both human and Divine, which wins love and commands adoration. For that reason it can never grow obsolete so long as there are living men; for that reason, too, it needs ever fresh interpretation in speech and action—for only life can be the herald of life. As St. Paul says, 'How shall men call on Him Whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in Him Whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher?' True! And the preacher must speak their language; he must understand the modes of their thought. Then he can go before as a herald; he can gain their ear by his sympathy, he can draw such a picture of his Lord as will appeal to them; and so they will open their gates to the peaceful Conqueror, so they will strew their palm branches and cry Hosanna in the highest!

II. A Divine Discontent.—The Church of Christ is irrevocably committed to a Divine discontent with the social order so long as it involves grave evils. But many of us have been infected with that facile optimism, born of material progress, which taught the middle nineteenth century to regard social evils as mere regrettable incidents in a victorious campaign. To the sufferers at least we have seemed to be apologists for intolerable wrongs. We must purge ourselves of this, one and all. We must reiterate the Church's ancient war-cry—Our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the world-rulers of this darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places. Secondly, we must show that our discontent is practical. We must demonstrate that the brotherhood of man, in the eyes of Christians, is no abstract belief, but a living truth which is to be realized in the concrete. We must prove our conviction that the kingdom of God includes the organization of social life. If the Socialist programme, fallacious as it is, inspired by a pathetic ignorance of history and of human nature, appeals to men's hearts because it provides a simple cure for monstrous evils, how much greater and more permanent would be the power of a Christian ideal, towards which all were consciously working? Oh that we had such an ideal clearly before us to-day! How it would shine in our eyes, how it would sound in the very tones of our voices, how it would lend grace to our daily deeds! There would be little need of argument or exposition; the Christian's life would prepare the way of his Lord into men's hearts, for they would recognize that in our age, as in the age of St. Francis and of Luther, He comes to preach good tidings unto the meek, to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound.—CANON GLAZEBROOK, The Guardian, 24 March, 1910.

REFERENCES.—XL. 3.—S. Baring-Gould, Village Preaching for a Year (2nd Series), vol. i. p. 25. J. Service, Sermons, p. 1. W. J. Rutherford, The Key of Knowledge, p. 63. H. P. Liddon, Sermons Preached on Special Occasions, 1880-89, p. 117. XL. 3, 4.—W. L. Williams, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1904, p. 74.

THE WAY TO HEAVEN

'Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain: and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed.'—ISAIAH XL. 4, 5.

THERE is a great work, a most difficult journey set before us all. We are at one end, and heaven at the other. Now Isaiah tells us that there are five things which we have to do in this matter: and they are set down in the order in which we have to do them.

I. 'Every valley shall be exalted.' What does that mean? When a man begins in earnest to serve God, he finds so many difficulties, such different kinds of hindrances, so many defeats, that he is tempted to give all up as impossible. What does that man want, then, in the first place? Certainly comfort. And therefore the same Isaiah, beginning his prophecies of the great things that God was about to do for His Church, opens them thus: 'Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem.' Therefore it was that our LORD, coming to His Disciples after His Resurrection, began by saying, 'Peace' (and peace is the same thing as comfort) 'be unto you!' Half this discouragement arises from our own idleness.

And this—'every valley shall be exalted'—is set first, not only because it must really come first, but because also it is the most difficult. 'Comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak,' can be said in six words, but what a world of difficulty there is in them! And so it is in earthly matters: the filling up the valley is generally speaking a more difficult work than the cutting down of hills.

II. 'And every mountain and hill shall be made low.' For when Satan sees that a man cannot be discouraged from serving God, then he turns round and persuades him that he is serving God very well indeed; that he may well be proud to think how often he has resisted temptation, how often he has overcome difficulties, how often he has done great things for the sake of Christ. And so, except for God's grace, that man is puffed up in his own conceit, thinks that he need no longer take any care to himself, and so falls back again into some grievous sin, and it may be that his last state is worse than the first.

III. 'The crooked shall be made straight.' That is, when a man is really serving God, he will go straight on in his duty, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left, not caring what this or that person may think, or what the world may say; but what God will say, how God will approve, how at last God will reward.

IV. 'And the rough places plain.' That part of the promise can hardly be altogether fulfilled in this world. Rough places there always are and must be: sorrow and trouble we shall have up to the very end. But the text tells us that it will not always be so. As surely as we have them here, so surely they can none of them enter in there.

V. 'And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed.' So it shall indeed be to those that are counted worthy to enter into the kingdom of Heaven. But what that glory is—or how it shall be made manifest—who shall tell? St. John could not: 'Beloved,' says he, 'now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be.'—J. M. NEALE, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, p. 57.

REFERENCES.—XL. 4.—T. C. Fry, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1894, p. 381; see also The Gospel of the Kingdom, p. 21. H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1894, p. 385; see also The Gospel of the Kingdom, p. 37.

C. W. Stubbs, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 8; see also The Gospel of the Kingdom, p. 59; see also ibid. p. 78.

VOX CLAMANTIS

'What shall I cry.'—ISAIAH XL. 6.

I WOULD like to see the Church, all the Churches of Christ, holding their tongues until they had been shut up with the Lord, asking Him, 'What shall we cry?' What did the voice say? It said, 'Cry!' But that would be startling. Certainly. That would be fatal to slumber. No doubt; I never knew the Lord approve much sleeping; He does assign a few hours to rest, but it is a cluster of hours in which perhaps little else could be done. He is covetous of the daylight, He is miserly of the opportunity; He says: 'Buy it up, buy it, seize it, have it, work while it is called day, even if it be so called by a stretch of imagination; make the light go as long and as far as you can'.

I. I wonder if Christ would have said, 'I would take a draught of water from you, but I don't like the vessel; I can only drink out of gold, or silver certainly, not out of that rude thing of yours; I will go back to the city and bring up a proper vessel; I would not mind refreshing My thirst and cooling this hot summer that burns Me'. Did He talk so? What did He want? He wanted the water, not the vessel. When the Church wants the water, the substance, the gift of God, the Lord will not disregard the supplication of His people. 'What shall I cry?' The Lord says, Do not ask that question first; I have told you to cry; now you can ask the question, second, What shall I cry? But we must have the cry, the shout, the prayer that is so terribly alive that it will take the kingdom of heaven by violence. We must have these fever cries, these hot pulses, these shoutings without prompting. We may not have lost the message, and yet we may have lost the right way of delivering it. It would be possible so to read or speak even a great or true doctrine that not a soul would believe a word you said. The first business is in the cry—poignant, piercing, thrilling cry.

II. This inquiry for authority is well known by those who read the Scripture. There was a time when the Lord said unto a shepherd man, 'Go to Egypt'. Why? 'I have heard the cry of My people, the cry of pain, the cry of outraged humanity, the cry of instinctive justice: come, I will send thee, go thou to Egypt.' And Moses said what the Prophet said, 'Who sends me? What shall I say or cry if the people ask for my authority, if they ask my name? Shall I say that I am sent anonymously, or shall I be qualified, quiet, and empowered in every sense and degree by the possession of a name?' And the Lord said, 'Certainly, certainly I will be with thee; if they ask the name, say I AM THAT I AM'—a nameless name, an ocean pool, an Atlantic dewdrop. 'If they say again, "Who sent thee?" say I AM sent thee'—the verb, the one verb, the only verb, the seed verb, irregularly conjugated, but coming out in all its moods and tenses with terrible and expressive emphasis. Still, the point is Moses had his authority.

III. Now what was this man told to cry? It was a curious message, and yet it contained everything. He was to proclaim evanescence and eternity, he was to proclaim a universal message and give a particular application. 'The voice said, Cry. And he said, What shall I cry? All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field: the grass withereth, the flower fadeth: because the spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it: surely the people is grass. The grass withereth, the flower fadeth—that is the evanescence. The clock strikes, eternity never strikes; time must chatter, eternity must be silent. He was then told to complete his message respecting evanescence by delivering a message respecting permanence—'but the word of our God shall stand for ever'. The withering grass—the standing word; these two things abide to-day; they represent time, space; the measurable, the immeasurable; the fading and the amaranthine. If all flesh is grass, we had better fall to praying, because the praying time is very limited, the grass does not take a long time to wither. 'The grass withereth'—if it be so let us be up and doing, with a heart for everything, because the time is short, the opportunity lingers but for a moment, and every wise man says, 'I am a stranger, I am a pilgrim, I can tarry but a night; wake me before the sun is waked'.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. VI p. 62.

ISAIAH XL. 6.

RUSKIN says: 'We find the grass and flowers are types, in their passing, of the passing of human life, and, in their excellence, of the excellence of human life; and this in twofold way; first, by their Beneficence, and then, by their Endurance; the grass of the earth, in giving the seed of corn, and in its beauty under tread of foot and stroke of scythe; and the grass of the waters, in giving its freshness to our rest, and in its bending before the wave.'

REFERENCES.—XL. 6.—A. Mursell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 381. XL. 6-8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 999. J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 197. XL. 7.—G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 64. XL. 8.—W. H. Brookfield, Sermons, p. 1. H. P. Liddon, Christ-mastide in St. Paul's, p. 224; see also Penny Pulpit, vol. xii. No. 706, p. 317. E. H. Bickersteth, Thoughts in Past Years, p. 201. XL. 9.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 251. Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 182. XL. 10.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. pp. 175, 186. XL. 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ix. No. 540; vol. xi. No. 652; vol. xiv. No. 794; vol. xxiii. No. 1381. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 340. F. B. Cowl, Straight Trucks, p. 94. XL. 12.—G. Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 274. XL. 14.—E. A. French, God's Message Through Modern Doubt, p. 103.

NOT SUFFICIENT

'Lebanon is not sufficient to burn.'—ISAIAH XL. 16.

THERE are so many things in life upon which we have to write the legend, Not sufficient.

I. We write this upon Time; we have told off its centuries and have said at the close, Not room enough, not breathing space enough, not sufficient. We have received satisfactions and have been pleased with them for the moment and have said, Now we have entered into rest, and lo! our satisfactions have perished in the using, satisfaction has become satiety, nausea, and utterest disappointment. Who will show us the sufficient? who will lead us to the land of Enough?

We have written this same legend upon the parcel or estate which we call by the great and promising name of Life, and we have lived long enough to know that life is only a variety of death, if there be not something beyond it, something explanatory, comforting, and crowning.

II. 'Lebanon is not sufficient to burn' if we are trying to make up to God for our wrongdoing and most unfilial and horrible wickedness alike of sin and of ingratitude and of everything that belongs to ingratitude and sin. Let us cut down the forest on the hill and burn it, and of what avail will be the white ashes? can they touch the mystery of sin? is there any equivalent in matter to the great claim of wounded law, righteousness, and truth? When we talk of Lebanon and sin we talk of terms that have no relation to one another; they belong to different spheres, we are speaking about two different worlds and categories of things. Sin has no material equivalent; it is not an account that has a debtor and creditor side, and that we can settle by giving so much in return; the sinner cannot touch his own sin, it is within him, he has hurt the universe, he has pained God. What will Lebanon do for him? he is no longer master of the situation, he has parted with his strength, with his individuality, with every faculty and power he had that lay in any moral and spiritual direction, and he is left with nothing but the crushing sense of his own responsibility. Truly, in the most spiritual sense, what he has done cannot be undone.

No forest can make up for a broken heart. If you have wounded some spirit, if you owned the bank of your nation you could not pay in gold for that wound. You could mock the wound, you could say, I have come to pay you, there is your gold, now be quiet. Gold can never touch such misery; the trees of the forest, the beasts of the mountains, the cattle on all the hills, do not touch the sore that is in the grieved, the bruised, and the broken heart.

III. 'Lebanon is not sufficient to burn.' This is true not only in reference to sin but in reference to gratitude. We never can pay for spiritual service; between the gold and the service there is no relation. What shall I render? is a bigger question than it seems. You never can repay a spiritual favour. You can repay gold with gold, you can take a receipt, but not for spiritual ministry.

Herein we come upon the innermost truths of the Gospel. We cannot repay Christ, we cannot give God an equivalent of our sin, we cannot give God an equivalent for His mercies; we can ask, What shall we render? what can we do? then we are upon the right ground and we have started the right line of inquiry. But you can only repay love with love; along that line lies a great possibility. God seeks not mine, but me, the man; He cannot be paid with what I have in my hand, but He is willing to accept as part payment as it were—yet He would discourage the use of that word in its mercantile sense—the love in my heart, the temple I would build Him if I could; and who knows but that many a poor man may be credited with having built the Lord many a temple? Renounce Lebanon if you want to pay God even in the matter of sin or even in the matter of gratitude; rend your hearts, not your garments; bring your hearts, but not your Lebanons.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vii. p. 99.

REFERENCE.—XL 21 and 28.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 263.

UPWARD AND ONWARD

'Lift up your eyes on high.'—ISAIAH XL 26.

I. THE upward look corrects the ever-present tendency to which all of us are more or less prone, to absorption in the things of this life. Only the light of the eternal falling upon the things of time can keep us in constant remembrance of their uncertain value and continuance. To become absorbed by them, being possessed where we should possess and being ruled where we should ourselves rule, is but a misusing of life and a misspending of strength for that which profits not. The upward look assures us that life is ordered both in general scope and in intimate detail by Him Whose love is not merely universal but individual in its concern for men. Whose care is not only for the vine but for 'every branch that beareth fruit'. Life's facts are seen to be His purposes, and this alone explains and interprets those untoward experiences from which all men naturally shrink, and produces a calm trust and gladness amid all that tends to disconcert and dishearten.

II. The upward look ennobles our conception of duty—that stern necessity of which such a large part of life is made up. In its light alone we recognize that all work is worship, and that there is a glory in doing earthly things with heavenly aims which nothing equals. Duty no longer is regarded as irksome compulsion by the one who lives with uplifted eye—it is rather his opportunity for voicing the devotion of his heart.

III. The upward look enlarges our conception of service. For our Lord Himself bids us lift up our eyes and look upon fields that are already 'white unto the harvest'. The uplifted eye sees the world's need as a dark background to the Saviour's brightness, and with expanding consciousness of the gloom of sin comes a quickened impulse to service and sacrifice. The upward look has been in all ages the inspiration to onward effort, and those whose lives are to us as stimulating examples and supplementary inspirations laboured and died to save men just because they had first seen the Lord 'high and lifted up'. This is the secret of the lives of Carey and Martyn, of Chalmers and Keith-Falconer, of Mackay and Hudson Taylor, of Moody and Shaftesbury. They were one and all men whose eyes were lifted up on high, far beyond considerations of self-advantage and gain, so that they saw something of the need which compelled their Lord to the Cross.

IV. The upward look brings also into life a power for the bearing of the strain which Christian service inevitably imposes. The pathway of the disciple is the same as that trodden by the Master, Whose service meant suffering and anguish as well as the bitterness of ingratitude and hostility. And few, if any, of those who seek to follow in His steps escape similar experience. But he whose heart's attention is directed on high 'where Christ sitteth' learns to endure 'as seeing Him who is invisible'. To his gaze there does not only appear an open heaven, but he sees the angels of God also 'ascending and descending upon the Son of Man'—present help in his need.—J. STUART HOLDEN, The Pre-eminent Lord, p. 19.

REFERENCE.—XL 26.—R. Harley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 197. C. A. Berry, Vision and Duty, p. 61. XL 26, 29.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 268. XL 27, 29.—E. L. Hull, Sermons, p. 83. XL 27, 31.—A. B. Davidson, Waiting Upon God, p. 3. XL 28.—C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1904, p. 155. XL 29.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2812.

THE SECRET OF IMMORTAL YOUTH

'Even the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fall. But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; and they shall walk and not faint.'—ISAIAH XL 30, 31.

I. Look at the first fact here, that of the dreary certainty of weariness and decay.

1. Of course the words of my text point to the plain fact that all created and physical life, by the very law of its being, in the act of living tends to death; and by the very operation of its strength tends to exhaustion. There are three stages in every creature's life—that of growth, that of equilibrium, that of decay.

2. And the text points also to another fact, that, long before your natural life shall have begun to tend towards decay, hard work and occasional sorrows and responsibilities and burdens of all sorts will very often make you wearied and ready to faint.

3. My text points to another fact, as certain as gravitation, that the faintness and weariness and decay of the bodily strength will be accompanied by a parallel change in your feelings. We are drawn onward by hopes, and when we get them fulfilled we find that they are disappointing.

II. Now turn to the blessed opposite possibility of inexhaustible and immortal strength. 'They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles: they shall run, and not be weary; they shall walk, and not faint.'

The life of nature tends inevitably downward, but there may be another life within the life of nature which shall have the opposite motion, and tend as certainly upwards.

The condition of the inflow of this unwearied and immortal life into our poor, fainting, dying humanity is simply the trust in Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of our souls.

Here is the promise. God will give Himself to you, and in the very heart of your decaying nature will plant the seed of an immortal being which shall, like His own, shake off fatigue from the limbs, and never tend to dissolution or an end. The life of nature dies by living; the life of grace, which may belong to us all, lives by living, and lives evermore thereby.

III. The manner in which this immortal strength is exercised. 'They shall lift up their wings as the eagle,' implying, of course, the steady, upward flight towards the light of heaven.

1. There is strength to soar. Strength to soar means the gracious power of bringing all heaven into our grasp, and setting our affections on things above.

2. Again, you may have strength to run—that is to say, there is power waiting for you for all the great crises of your lives which call for special, though it may be brief, exertion.

3. Strength to walk may be yours—that is to say, patient power for persistent pursuit of weary, monotonous duty. Only one thing will conquer the disgust at the wearisome round of mill-horse tasks which, sooner or later, seizes all godless men, and that is to bring the great principles of the Gospel into them, and to do them in the might and for the sake of the dear Lord.—A. MACLAREN, The Unchanging Christ, p. 12.

REFERENCES.—XL 30, 31.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 276. J. H. Blunt, Plain Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 288. H. Varley, Spiritual Light and Life, p. 81. J. Thomas, Myrtle Street Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 84.

WALKING WITHOUT FAINTING

'They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles: they shall run, and not be weary; they shall walk, and not faint.'—ISAIAH XL. 31.

God as the Source and Giver of strength is the Prophet's theme in the text. 'They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength.' Man by himself is weak and helpless and impotent, but succoured by God he is equal to any task. 'With five shillings,' said Teresa the mystic, when her friends laughed at her proposal to build an orphanage—'with five shillings Teresa can do nothing; but with five shillings and God there is nothing Teresa cannot do.' And in that bold and daring claim the saint had Scripture for her warrant. 'Ye shall remove mountains,' said our Lord, 'and nothing shall be impossible to you.' And the Apostle Paul, as if writing a confirmatory comment on that promise of the Master, says, 'I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me'.

To the supreme feat of enabling men to walk without fainting the grace of God is equal. 'They that wait upon the Lord . . . shall walk, and not faint.' Life's disillusionments and disappointments cannot make them swerve from their purpose. When life has lost its zest, its glamour, its radiance, and has become dull and hard and grey, they still remain steadfast and unmovable—faithful unto death. God's grace is sufficient even in face of the stern, bitter facts of experience. Some of the ardour and enthusiasm and eagerness may disappear, perhaps, but still it enables men to walk, and not faint.

I. Let me give two or three illustrations of this truth. I will take first the history of the Christian Church. If you will look up the book of the Acts of the Apostles when you go home, and read what is there said, I think you will find that there was about the primitive Church a spontaneity and enthusiasm, a buoyancy that are wanting in the Church to-day.

But the belief and the hope were both doomed to disappointment. Men did not receive the Gospel as they expected they would. Instead of having their message welcomed, Christians found themselves brought to the stake and the block and the arena. Instead of coming back within the lifetime of the early Christians, nineteen centuries have passed, and still the Lord delays His coming. The dreams and hopes of the early Christian Church have been disappointed.

With the loss of the early belief in the speedy and easy triumph of the Gospel the Church has lost her light-heartedness and gaiety. She no longer soars and runs.

And yet she 'walks without fainting' and without any wavering, but with dogged resolution has set herself to the task of bringing the whole world into subjection to the rule of Jesus. And beautiful though the soaring enthusiasm of the early Church was, I will venture to say that the fact that the Church of to-day—awake to the difficulties and dangers of her high enterprise—still walks without fainting towards her goal is a still more wondrous illustration of the sustaining and strengthening power of the grace of God.

II. What is illustrated in the history of the Christian Church on the large scale is illustrated within smaller compass in the experience of every Christian minister and Christian worker.

III. The truth is still further illustrated by the contrast between youth and age—Christian youth, I mean, and Christian age.

There is one thing more beautiful than an enthusiastic young Christian, and that is a faithful old Christian. It is a glad sight to see the young pilgrim entering with enthusiasm upon his course, stripping with eager hopefulness for the race. But it is a still more beautiful sight to see an old man, who has borne the burden and heat of the day, still pressing toward the mark, marching boldly and bravely, even though his step be slow—'walking without fainting'. Paul the aged is a finer and more beautiful sight than young Timothy.—J. D. JONES, Elms of Life, p. 140.

'They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength.'
ISAIAH XL. 31.

This was a favourite text with Père Gratry, but he preferred the Latin rendering: mutabunt fortitu- dinem—they shall change their strength or courage. He liked to think that the courage of the soldier on the battle-field is changed into a higher form by those who accept the vocation to the ministry and become the prophets of peace to men.

REFERENCES.—XLI. 31.—A. Murray, Waiting on God, p. 101; see also Eagle Wings, p. 58. T. Vincent Tymms, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 276. R. J. Campbell, ibid. vol. lvii 1900, p. 129. E. A. Draper, The Gift of Strength, p. 12. J. Laidlaw, Studies in the Parables, p. 257. J. Pulsford, Our Deathless Hope, p. 126. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 876; vol. xxix. No. 1756. XLI. 1.—J. Leckie, Sermons Preached at Ibrox, p. 81. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1215. XLI. 6.—W. H. Stephenson, A Book of Lay Sermons, p. 191. XLI. 7.—C. Leach, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlii. 1892, p. 290. XLI. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1962. XLI. 8-20.—Ibid. vol. xlv. No. 2383.

THE ANTIDOTE TO FEAR

'Fear thou not; for I am with thee,' etc.—ISAIAH XLI. 10.

FEAR is common to man; increased by, if it does not originate in, a consciousness of sin. The text indicates three reasons why the Christian should not be afraid.

I. God's Presence.—'I am with thee.' Powerful, wise, and loving.

II. God's Relationship.—'I am thy God.'

These words imply on our part reverence, obedience, and submission; on His part guardianship and blessing. We naturally take special care of that which is our own.

III. God's Promise.

1. 'I will strengthen thee'—fortify thy heart against trial and suffering.

2. 'I will help thee'—render thee personal assistance; direct, protect, fight with and for thee.

3. 'I will uphold thee.'

'The right hand of My righteousness'—My faithful right hand; i.e. a hand that could be relied upon.

The right hand is generally used for work.

The right hand is offered in friendship.

The right hand is placed on those whom we wish to honour.—F. J. AUSTIN, Seeds and Saplings, p. 53.

REFERENCES.—XLI. 10.—A. Maclaren, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 201. "Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. vii. p. 1. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiii. No. 760; vol. xvi. No. 930. XLI. 13.—E. L. Hull, Sermons Preached at King's Lynn (3rd Series), p. 157. XLI. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 156, 157. XLI. 17.—Ibid. vol. xvi. No. 2696. XLI. 18.—Ibid. vol. xxxviii. No. 2270. XLI. 22.—W. M. Punshon, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 205. XLI. 1.—J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 27. XLII. 1-3.—G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 66. XLII. 1-4.—A. B. Davidson, Waiting Upon God, p. 27. W. M. Punshon, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 206. XLI. 1-5.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part ii. p. 97.

THE SMOKING FLAX

'A bruised reed shall He not break, and the smoking flax shall He not quench.'—ISAIAH XLII. 3.

Let us try to gather up the thoughts contained in these two images. They are slightly different, but one thought underlies them both. The one refers chiefly to God, the other to man.

I. The idea of the first is taken from one of the shepherd's pipes—one of those little musical pipes—crushed and trampled under foot.

The other picture is taken from the lamp in the temple, burning feebly and dimly, giving forth black smoke rather than light.

1. The 'bruised reed'. A soul just beginning the conscious Christian life, sore beset with difficulties, unable as yet to send out the harmony of praise and thanksgiving, unable to send up one real prayer.

2. The 'smoking flax'. Here we see the poor timid soul just beginning to wish to be of use, to let its light shine before men; sorry for a wasted life, longing to be of use, longing to be able to tell of the love of Christ, but timid; not able to speak so that others, seeing its good works and hearing its good words, may glorify the Father in heaven. It is a picture of the timid, unsatisfactory Christian—unsatisfactory to God, unsatisfactory to man. But Christ has a personal, individual care for every such soul.

II. The thought which the Holy Ghost wants to fix upon our minds is this: the tender love of our Lord; the way in which He keeps back His power; leading us on so tenderly; allowing the tares to stay among the wheat, lest one ear of wheat should be plucked up with them; His forbearance with those who are in many respects so unsatisfactory.

If I were to give you illustrations of this love the work would be endless. (1) His dealings with the Apostles, and His patience with their slowness to understand, their unbelief and hardness of heart. (2) The woman of Samaria. (3) Again, that woman in Simon's house. (4) But more striking still is the story of Zacchæus! 'These are instances of 'bruised reeds' which have been tossed aside by man, those of whom man had said, 'you will never make anything good out of them'. Yet the Lord Jesus Christ brought out the harmony of God from those 'bruised reeds,' and kindled the 'smoking flax' to the full light of the eternal kingdom.—BISHOP HOWARD WILKINSON, The Invisible Glory, p. 46.

REFERENCES.—XLII. 3.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxi. No. 1831. A. W. Thorold, The Tenderness of Christ, p. 167. R. Allen, The Words of Christ, p. 136. R. A. Suckling, Sermons Plain and Parochial, p. 198. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 286. T. G. Selby, The Imperfect Angel, p. 9. XLII. 4.—W. Garrett Horder, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 90. H. Macmillan, ibid. vol. lv. 1899, p. 276. C. Joseph, ibid. vol. lvi. 1904, p. 327. W. L. Watkinson, ibid. vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 232. Bishop Matthew Simpson's Sermons, p. 371. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1945. XLII. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 986. XLII. 9.—Ibid. vol. xxv. No. 1508.

'Let them . . . declare His praise in the islands.'—ISAIAH XLII. 12.

THE text chosen by Dr. Eugene Stock for the chapter of his History in which he describes the work of the C.M.S. in New Zealand, Ceylon, West India, and Malta.

REFERENCES.—XLII. 16.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 847; vol. xxii. No. 1310. J. Martineau, Hours of Thought on Sacred Things, vol. i. p. 177. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 205.

SEVEN LOOKS

'Look, ye blind, that ye may see.'—ISAIAH XLII. 18.

I. Look Back.—Remember God's goodness. Your sins.

II. Look Up.—In praise. 'Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless His Holy Name.' In prayer. 'In the morning will I direct my prayer unto Thee, and will look up.'

III. Look Down.—In humility. In caution. 'Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall.'

IV. Look Forward.—In confidence. In hope.

V. Look Within.—Daily. Thoroughly.

VI. Look Around.—Be vigilant.

VII. Look unto Jesus.—As your Saviour (John iii. 14). As your example (Heb. xii. 2).—J. W. MILLS, After-Glow, p. 175.

THE LORD'S SERVANT DEAF AND BLIND

'Who is blind, but My servant? or deaf, as My messenger that I sent? Who is blind as he that is perfect, and blind as the Lord's servant?'—ISAIAH XLII. 19.

FOR our present purpose it is unnecessary to consider the modern critical interpretation of the servant of the Lord in Isaiah. We apply the title to Christ, and read the text as a sidelight on His life. That Christ was in the highest sense the servant of God and man is His own teaching. The Son of man, He said Himself, came not to be served, but to be a servant, and to give His life as a ransom for many. It was the fulfilment of the will of God, the perfect rendering of the service claimed, that was the supreme object of His earthly life. He girded Himself through these mortal years, and without ceasing served God and man. Inasmuch that the old saying carries a deep truth, that our Lord looked to hear for Himself from His Father's lips the word He spake in parable, 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord'. But how should it be said of the servant and messenger of the Lord that He was blind as none other? How should it be said of Him Whose eyes are as a flame of fire, Whose look struck like a sword? Is it not told that when the Apostle saw Him he fell as dead before the intolerable lustre of His eyes? Did not His gaze pierce to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, to the last recesses of the thoughts and intents of the heart? Are not all things naked and open unto the eyes of Him with Whom we have to do? Yes; but, as the older writers and expositors have pointed out, He was in a sense blind. They dwell on the fact that His was the blindness that has no sense of difficulties. It is told of an officer attacking an almost impregnable fort that he was in great peril, and was recalled by his chief. To disobey the recall was death, if only he saw it. He was blind in one eye, and when told of the recall he turned the blind eye on the signal, and asked that the battle should continue. This is the blindness of Christ and His faithful. 'Who art thou, O great mountain?' Christ indeed lifted His eyes to the hills, but not to these lower hills that block the way and close us in. He lifted His eyes to the everlasting mountains, towering far above them, on whose summit the final feast of triumph is to be spread. Beyond the obstacles and thwartings that marked His earthly course He had a vision of the patience of God. He was blind, I say, to difficulty, even as His Apostle was. None of these things moved Him. A king about to engage an army five times as large as his own, prayed to God that He would take away from him the sense of numbers. The sense of numbers, in the earthly manner, Christ never possessed. On that side He was blind.

I. But I speak specially of His blindness to much in life that we consider it legitimate to see. He was blind to the allurements of our ordinary ambitions. (1) The desire for money never seemed to touch Him. (2) He was blind also, so far as we can tell, to that region which is the scene of the chief triumphs and apostasies of the heart—the rich and volcanic and often wasted region of passion. I think that Dora Greenwell's remark is true, that the passion of love which forms the staple of imaginative literature is absolutely unknown to the New Testament. (3) Once more, the sphere of art and culture He seems to have left alone. He, the Poet of the universe, was not interested in poetry. He glanced at the Divine glory of the lily, and said that it surpassed even the glory of Solomon. But of the treasures and marvels of human art and imagination He had nothing to say, and apparently nothing to think. On these sides, we ask, was blind as He that is perfect, and blind as the Lord's servant?

In the same way He was deaf not only to counsels of evil, but to much that seemed legitimate. Here, also, it appears as if many pleasant voices that spoke to Him might have been heeded without sin, and to His happiness. There are voices we think ourselves right in heeding which He might have heeded too. His life might have been richer, easier, more solaced, but He made sharp choices and stern renunciations and swift decisions, and so the fullness of life was not for Him, and its allurements and appeals were vain.

II. Let us not be afraid of anything, whatever it be, that ministers to the energy of our life in Christ. But I suspect that most of us have to restrict ourselves for the kingdom of heaven's sake. Most of us, if we are to enter into life, must enter more or less maimed. Most of us have to be deaf and blind to solicitations which stronger people might obey innocently enough. No one in recent years has preached more powerfully the hallowing of the common life than the late Dr. Dale of Birmingham. He was eager and strenuous for many years as a preacher, as a student, as a social reformer, and as a politician. Yet in the end of his life he came to the conclusion, wrongly perhaps, that he would have done more and been more if he had kept himself more closely to the work of a Christian minister. Yes, we have to be deaf and blind; but we need not grudge it, for the time is coming when, in the other life, all our energies will find free scope. A character in a recent novel was accustomed to say about some blessing that it must come soon. Her mouth was made up for it. Her friend replied that this world is just for us to make up our mouths in, and the next is for filling them. We can forgo what has to be forgone, if we look up to the heaven that darkles and shines above us, and remember that all things will there come back and be present again except repented and forgiven sin.

III. In the end we are to be blind to all things in comparison with the beauty of Christ, deaf to all voices but His own. It is for this we seek the House of God—to hear the call which the world through the week is trying to drown, in the hush of the Sabbath day.

Remember He was never deaf and never blind when a soul sought Him. Behold, the Lord's ear is not heavy that it cannot hear, neither is His arm shortened that it cannot save. Remember Him on the Cross in a strait where two seas met. Deep called to deep, the sea of misery to the sea of mercy. The Lord's ear was very heavy, but not heavy that it could not hear the thief. His arm was shortened, nailed to the wood, but not shortened that it could not save. That day the Lord and the thief were together in the new country. If thou seek Him He will be found of thee. Before we speak He calls that we may turn round to Him and say, 'When Thou saidst, Seek ye My Face, my heart said unto Thee, Thy Face, Lord, will I seek.'—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, The Lamp of Sacrifice, p. 1.

REFERENCES.—XLII. 21.—C. G. Finney, Sermons on Gospel Themes, p. 204. XLIII. 1.—Vaughan, Sermons Preached in Christ Church, Brighton (7th Series), p. 8. XLIII. 1-3.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 24. XLIII. 1-4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1895; vol. xliii. No. 2548. C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 354. XLIII. 1-7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2548; vol. xviii. No. 2799. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 296. XLIII. 1-25.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 2838. XLIII. 2.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 164. R. J. Campbell, City Temple Sermons, p. 74. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 397. XLIII. 2, 3.—Ibid. vol. i. No. 2877. XLIII. 3.—Ibid. vol. xxxvi. No. 2167. XLIII. 4.—Ibid. vol. xvi. No. 917; vol. xxviii. No. 1671. XLIII. 6.—Ibid. vol. xvii. No. 1007; vol. xlviii. No. 2799. XLIII. 10.—Ibid. vol. xi. No. 644. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Common Life Religion, p. 82. XLIII. 14-28.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 2908. XLIII. 21.—J. Robertson, Religion in Common Life, p. 108. W. E. Griffiths, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1898, p. 174. E. H. Bickersteth, Thoughts in Past Years, p. 121. XLIII. 21-28.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2849. XLIII. 22-24.—Ibid. vol. xxxii. No. 1895. XLIII. 22-25.—Ibid. vol. xliii. No. 2548. XLIII. 22-28.—Ibid. vol. xli. No. 2426. J. W. Atkinson, Penny Pulpit, vol. xiv. No. 833, p. 341. XLIII. 25.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 24; vol. xix. No. 1142; vol. xxviii. No. 1685. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 166. W. Page Roberts, Our Prayer Book, Conformity and Conscience, p. 91. XLIII. 28.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxix. No. 1743. XLIV. 1, 2.—J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 253. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 298. XLIV. 1-8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2427. XLIV. 2.—J. Baines, Twenty Sermons, p. 39. XLIV. 3.—T. G. Selby, The Holy Spirit and Christian Privilege, p. 231. A. G. Mortimer, Life and its Problems, p. 197. G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 69. XLIV. 3, 8.—A. Murray, The Children for Christ, p. 185. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xx. No. 1151. XLIV. 3.—G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 69. XLIV. 4.—J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 59. XLIV. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2429. XLIV. 7.—J. Parker, Studies in Texts, vol. i. p. 147.

THE IMMANENCE OF GOD

'Is there a God beside Me?'—ISAIAH XLIV. 8.

IN the Christian view of God there are two attributes which it is not easy for the human reason to combine. One of them we call the transcendence of God; to the other we give the name of immanence.

I. What do we mean by the Divine transcendence? We mean that apart from and above the universe there lives and reigns a personal Creator.

And what do we mean by the immanence of God? We mean the presence of the Almighty in creation. A God transcendent, like some mighty sculptor, models with His deft hand the human form; but a God who is immanent looks through human eyes, and thinks in the thinking of the human brain.

At different times in the history of man these differing attributes have received special prominence. To-day it is the immanence of God that is claiming the chief thought of Western Christendom. The chief causes of this change are two. The one is the devotion of our age to science, and the other is the modern delight in nature.

II. The immanence of God is a great truth to be grasped firmly by the believing soul; but to say that the immanence of God is everything is to be a traitor to to-morrow.

1. When we deny transcendence, we cease to have a God who is a person. The God of the pantheist may be a flowing stream; He certainly is not a living spirit.

2. The popular pantheism of to-day is also fatal to human personality. Slip the anchor of the living God, and you slip the anchor of accountability.

3. The popular pantheism of to-day is certain to put our moral life in jeopardy, for it destroys, and must inevitably destroy, the sharp distinction between good and evil. The moral power of the cross of Christ has operated in a twofold way. It has not only made goodness very beautiful. It has also made sin exceedingly sinful.

4. It is a bad thing to vilify humanity; I believe it is even worse to deify it. If the life of God be the life of the human race, and the activity of God be man's activity, where is your standard to tell that this is right, and to say with authority that that is wrong?

But some one may perhaps say what about conscience—is there not always left the voice of conscience? To which we would answer, as Knox did to Mary, 'Conscience, madam, requires to be educated'. We may picture conscience as a simple thing, but conscience is very far from being simple. It is no more simple than the ear is simple—that outward organ for the voice of God. It has been educated through the stress of years; and it still responds for a period of time to the calling of a faith that is disowned. But the day must come when conscience will grow weak, and fail to pronounce its verdict with authority, unless it is fed again with that same nourishment that has kept it strong and tender to this hour. There is nothing in an exclusive immanence that has any power to reinforce the conscience. And not only so, but, as has often been noted, the logical outcome is this, that might is right. If God and the life of His universe be one, then the mightier the life, the more of God. There is no room for the baffled and the weak—no place for the useless, the beaten, and the fallen—in a world whose God is but a stream of being which neither can pity nor can love.

III. From all such thoughts, whatever be their charm, let us come back to the Fatherhood of God. There is transcendence in the thought of fatherhood—the sweet and perfect sovereignty of love. And in fatherhood no less is immanence, for the father's life is in the child, and in ways not less real because they are undefinable, father and child are one.—G. H. MORRISON, The Wings of the Morning, p. 183.

REFERENCES.—XLIV. 17.—Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 170. W. Boyd Carpenter, ibid. vol. lxvi. 1904, p. 113.

*He feedeth on ashes: a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand.'—ISAIAH XLIV. 20.

DR. EUGENE STOCK, in his history of the Church Missionary Society, mentions that this was the text chosen by the Rev. Daniel Corrie when he preached one of the early sermons for the Society in 1816. The text was suggested by his personal experiences of Indian religion. He spoke at a time when suttee, child murder, and other crimes were rife.

REFERENCES.—XLIV. 20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2686. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 307. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, p. 299. XLIV. 21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xl. No. 2384. XLIV. 21-23.—W. A. Moberly, The Old Testament in Modern Light, p. 122. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1895.

CLOUDS REMOVED

*I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins: return unto Me; for I have redeemed thee.'—ISAIAH XLIV. 22.

THE bestowing of spiritual blessings is a warrant for the expectation of all needful temporal blessings. This passage is the foundation on which God caused His ancient people to rest. He had blotted out their transgressions, and therefore they might look to Him, as the true object of worship, for consolation, and for deliverance.

I. Clouds the Result of Transgressions.—As the natural clouds are formed by the vapours drawn up from the sea, so, in a degree, those clouds which darken our skies are the effects of our transgressions. Our metaphorical clouds, which produce real misery, are the projected results of our disordered condition. Moral disorder is the consequence of sinful conditions. By our sins we make the clouds, which darken the skies, obscure the landscape, take the sunlight out of existence, and make our days wretched. Our miseries are often our own making. Ideal troubles are very numerous, and very real. Sin disorders the brain, and leads to dread forebodings.

II. Clouds the Ministers of God's Mercy.—The natural clouds are the ministers of God's mercy, the testimonies of His faithful care, of His loving thoughtfulness for the children of men. But how wonderful that the clouds of our sins should be the ministers of His mercy! The misery of sin may be followed by the great blessing of forgiveness. The clouds lead us to appreciate the glorious sunlight.

III. Clouds Dispersed.—There are laws in the natural world, and there must be laws in the moral world. Clouds move in obedience to nature's laws; and the clouds of our sins cannot be blotted out in an arbitrary method. God is a Father, but He is a King and moral Governor. Even He has only a right to blot out transgressions, because He has redeemed. This redemption may refer to temporal deliverance; but Isaiah breathes the very spirit of the Gospel. God blots out sin by devising the method of redemption, and by not sparing His Son. God is not vindictive. God did not force the Son to the work. And yet God did not spare. That last word tells the story of God's love for the Son, and tender pity for sinning men.

IV. After Cloud the Sunshine.—God's forgiving, redeeming love scatters the clouds. The sunlight rejoices our hearts. We are gladdened by the sweet light of trustfulness. The life of the Christian is the bright sunshine of an ever-increasing and ever-developing trustfulness. How pleasant thus to dwell! How glorious to feel its sweet and kindly rays playing about our natures, gently but surely nourishing us up to spiritual health and beauty. Hope cannot flourish under a cloud. When the Sun of Righteousness arises and scatters the clouds, then there will be in the soul answering fruitfulness. The very clouds of our sins should make us fruitful when we stand in the sunlight. What return shall we make for love so vast? The forgiven man should be the hopeful, trustful, and fruitful man. When sin is blotted out, then the soul is started on a career of never-ending fruitfulness.

V. Clouds as Pathetic Preachers.—'Return unto Me.' Every time we see the clouds sweeping across the heavens, let us listen to their still small voice; let us hear their persuasive, pathetic entreaty. The Almighty bases His appeal upon the blessed work He has accomplished. He beseeches by means of the departing clouds of our sins. Return! God woos us as if our happiness were necessary to His own happiness. Let all return unto God, the true soul-rest; for all live too much in the cloud, while we might rejoice in the sunlight.

REFERENCES.—XLIV. 22.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2563; vol. xlix. No. 2847. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 317; see also Creed and Conduct, p. 170. XLIV. 22, 23.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 7. XLIV. 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1240; vol. xlii. No. 2450. XLIV. 28.—A. H. Bradford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. ix. 1901, p. 156. XLV.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2815; vol. i. No. 2807.

THE TREASURES OF DARKNESS

'And I will give thee the treasures of darkness.'—ISAIAH XLV. 3.

I. There are Treasures of Darkness.—Darkness is approached from two standpoints in God's Book. From one view-point it is something to be feared, dreaded, loathed. But darkness is shown to us from another angle of vision, and then it is desirable, inestimable in worth.

He who knows what is in darkness assures us that He will give us the treasures of darkness. But what is the literal meaning of these words? In the East of old, instead of depositing their wealth with the bankers as we do, they would dig deep pits or excavate and construct subterranean chambers in which they placed their treasures. So that as a matter of fact most of their possessions were 'treasures of darkness'.

God promises Cyrus that he shall tap the buried wealth of Babylon. But what does this promise mean for us? In an infinitely grander sense God promises to us in the ends of the ages 'the treasures of darkness'.

1. There are treasures of literal darkness. When darkness covers the earth millions on millions of worlds flash upon our view, all mansions of the Father's house. The stars in their 'mystic dance' are treasures of darkness.

Many of life's best gifts are 'treasures of darkness'. Is not sleep such a treasure?

The world of nature abounds in illustrations of this fact. Every lovely flower is a treasure of darkness: it springs up through the dark earth and blooms a parable of beauty. Every harvest is a treasure of darkness. The whole circle of Nature illustrates abundantly the idea of my text. Our debt to darkness is incalculable.

2. There is mental darkness. In a sphere of darkness we dwell, and but here and there are glints of light. Very depressing this darkness is, but God gives us treasures out of it. Facts, truths, philosophies, aspirations that are grander than realizations, dreams that are the true realities.

3. Are there treasures in social darkness? Sickness, bereavement, disappointment, business anxiety or reverses. Dark are these experiences. Yet God gives treasures out of them. Philip Melancthon said, 'Were I without cares I should be without prayers'. It is true of us all. Prayer is a treasure of darkness. The Bible is a treasure of darkness. It is but as a great book to us till sorrow comes, and then it becomes, as it is in truth, the Word of God.

Marvellous treasures come out of social gloom. In literature, in art, but supremely in perfected character, we are always discovering the encircling power of sorrow.

4. Dare we ask if God gives treasures of moral darkness? This is the most gruesome darkness the world knows. Bushnell describes moral evil as 'the night side of creation'. And we owe much to it. We speak only of sin that has been repented of. We are humbler, more tender, more ardent after holiness, more instinct with evangelistic sympathy, because of the past sins over which we grieve.

5. The mortal darkness will inevitably fall upon us ere long. What men call death will shadow us. Strong consolation. The peace of resignation. Hope on the atoning sacrifice of the Saviour. Blessed anticipations and outlooks. These are treasures of that final darkness.

II. The Treasures of Darkness may be our possession. All life's darkness may yield us enrichment. Our ignorance, our depression, our sorrow, our very sin, our death itself. Out of all our anxieties, loss, annoyance, tribulation, may come a wealth which can never take to itself wings and fly away.—DUNDALE T. YOUNG, Unfamiliar Texts, p. 233.

DIVINELY GIRDED

'I girded thee, though thou hast not known Me.'—ISAIAH XLV. 5.

MANY things are done without our intelligence. Our intelligence is oftentimes our only difficulty and only danger. It would often be happier for us if we had no heads. We are ruined by what we think we do know, and if any man thinketh he knoweth anything as it really is, he knows nothing. The Bible is full of explanations that are clear, simple, definite, and final. There is no book so final as the Bible. There are times when we want the final voice; that is to say, a voice which we feel is final; there cannot be anything beyond it that is contrary to it. That is the strength of every message, that is the sole power of every true ministry. A man who is uncertain of his message had better not deliver it.

I. Concerning the Bible answer I make three submissions. First, that it is adequate. The Bible says, The Lord reigns; you do not see everything just as it is in its real purpose and its full scope, you are walking in shadows, the colours are all blurred, but wait for the end, for the upsumming of life's mystery by the God of life, and God will justify Himself. There is but one Lord, there is only one enduring throne; you must not, therefore, judge anything before the time, the hour of judgment has not come, criticism must not yet be invoked, because the whole case is not before us; wait, wait patiently; O rest in the Lord. We have in this chapter and in the text great voices which bring with them their own adequacy: 'I have holden thee; I will go before thee; I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron; I will give thee the treasures of darkness and hidden riches of secret places; I have even called thee by thy name; I have surnamed thee; I have girded thee, though thou hast not known Me.'

II. The explanation is reasonable. It puts a living Personality at the head of things, it dismisses blind fate and enthrones a living God: no matter if He be invented, there He is; the imagination that invented fate has but a poor wing compared with the imagination that invented God. It is reasonable to believe that things are governed by an Infinite Intelligence; it is reasonable to suppose that God, having made this universe, has not discarded it: He who created the universe pledged Himself by that very act to redeem it; creation and redemption are terms implying one another.

III. The explanation is not only adequate and reasonable, but it is ennobling. All this was worth going through because of the issue; we are being watched, inspired, guided. Once let that faith get hold of the soul, and that faith will mean Sabbath day, a holy peace, a celestial, unruffled tranquillity. We are being educated, moulded, we are being made meet for the master's service, we are having another faculty added to the sum-total of our present manhood; we are being refined, purified, chastened.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vii. p. 39.

REFERENCES.—XLV. 5.—T. G. Selby, The Imperfect Angel, p. 50. XLV. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 183. R. J. Campbell, A Faith for To-Day, p. 107. XLV. 15.—G. F. Williams, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 309. J. Leckie, Sermons Preached at Ibrox, p. 94. R. F. Horton, The Hidden God, p. 3. XLV. 15-19.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 320.

ISAIAH XLV. 15.

COMPARE the words with which Mr. G. T. Romanes closed his Darwin, and after Darwin in 1892: 'As I said, at the beginning, the religious thought of our generation has been more than ever staggered by the question—Where is now thy God? But I have endeavoured to show that the logical standing of the case has not been materially changed; and when this cry of reason pierces the heart of Faith it remains for Faith to answer now, as she always answered before—and answered with that trust which is at once her beauty and her life—Verily thou art a God that hidest Thyself.'

REFERENCES.—XLV. 19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ix. No. 508. XLV. 22.—Ibid. vol. ii. No. 60; vol. xlviii. No. 2805; vol. i. No. 2867. David Macrae, Christian World Pulpit, vol. iii. 1897, p. 363. R. J. Campbell, ibid. vol. lvi. 1899, p. 312; see also A Faith for To-day, p. 29. XLV. 24, 25.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2793. XLVI. 1-4.—Ibid. vol. xxxiv. No. 2050. XLVI. 4.—Ibid. vol. ii. p. lxxxii. J. D. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 407. J. Page Hopps, Sermons of Sympathy, p. 83. XLVI. 4-11.—P. H. Hall, The Brotherhood of Man, p. 167.

RELIGIOUS USES OF MEMORY

*Remember the former things of old: I am God, and there is none like Me.—ISAIAH XLVI. 9.

Of all the powers that God has given us, none is more wonderful than memory. For what is memory? It is a twofold power. It is the power that gathers in the past, and crowds into some secret cabinet here the twice ten thousand things that we have learned. And then it is the power that out of that crowded storehouse brings the things forth again, calls them to mind.

I. There is no religion which lays such an emphasis on memory as Christianity. What do we call Christ's sayings? We call them memorable words. The words of Jesus are like the seal upon the wax. Once stamped with them, and memory will bear them to the end. Christ recognized the character of memory in making His words so memorable as that.

II. Now I wish to touch on three great offices of memory in the higher life:—

1. It is memory which helps us to consecrate the world. The hallowing of earth is memory's secret. There are villages sweeter than Stratford, and parks more ancient than the parks of Charlote, but the memories of Shakespeare that cluster there have consecrated these spots for ever.

2. It is an aid to charity. It helps us to understand our friend. It has been said our friends are never ours till we have lost them. It is a strained expression of the certain truth, that of all lights there is none clearer than the light of memory. I cannot judge a man while he is here. Memory redresses things: helps me to see, and know, and understand: lets me do justice to the great, and to the men and women I knew and wronged.

Did you ever regard it as a signal mercy that it is in the light of memory we have to do with Christ? Perhaps you have thought it would be an easier thing to be a Christian if Jesus Christ were here. If I do not know my friend till he is gone, would I have seen the Saviour in a Nazarene? I can look back now. I can appreciate in the light of memory.

3. It helps us to understand ourselves. Only faith and prayer and memory will bring self-knowledge. Faith brings it, for it brings me near to Christ. Prayer brings it, for it shows me what I lack. And memory brings it too.

III. The kind of thing that you remember best is no bad token of the kind of heart you have.

As life advances memory grows richer. Can it be, then, that in the hour of death the memory of the past is blotted out? It is impossible. It is no power extraneous to myself. It is part of this immortal me. And when I wake, freed from this hampering body, enlarged and glorified in every faculty, my memory must share in the full tides of life.—G. H. MORRISON, Flood-Tide, p. 1.

REFERENCES.—XLVI. 9.—R. Flint, Sermons and Addresses, p. 1. XLVI. 9, 10.—J. Martineau, Endeavours After the Christian Life (2nd Series), p. 105. XLVI. 12, 13.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 332. XLVII. 7.—W. R. Huntington, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1903, p. 109. XLVII. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. viii. No. 444. XLVIII.—Ibid. vol. xl. No. 2379. XLVIII. 6.—Newman Smyth, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 248. XLVIII. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 779. XLVIII.

9-11.—Ibid. vol. xviii. No. 1041. XLVIII. 10.—Ibid. vol. i. No. 35; vol. xxiv. No. 1430. XLVIII. 16.—J. Keble, Miscellaneous Sermons, p. 199. XLVIII. 18.—Ibid. vol. xi. No. 610. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah, p. 336. R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1902, p. 374. A. Raleigh, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament. J. Keble, Sermons for Advent to Christmas Eve, p. 414. XLIX. 1-23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 2703. XLIX. 2.—B. Wilberforce, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xvi. 1894, p. 356. W. A. Gray, The Shadow of the Hand, p. 9. XLIX. 4. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. ii. p. 207. H. Montagu Butler, Narrow School Sermons, p. 303. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. pp. 206, 215. J. Keble, Sermons for Advent to Christmas Eve, p. 401. XLIX. 5.—Ibid. p. 230. XLIX. 6.—J. J. S. Perowne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 290. XLIX. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ii. No. 103. XLIX. 8-11.—B. Wilberforce, Feeling After Him, p. 82. XLIX. 9.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 1. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 5397. XLIX. 10.—Ibid. vol. xxxvi. No. 2123.

I WILL MAKE ALL MY MOUNTAINS A WAY (Advent Sunday)

'I will make all My mountains a way.'—ISAIAH XLIX. II.

God says, 'I will make My mountains a way,' and the simplest consideration of the facts of life will demonstrate that the saying is true practically, true ideally, true on the plane of earth, true in the region of spirit, true in the domain of prophecy.

I. In the natural sphere the fact of the existence of mountains has ever initiated the stimulus required to surmount them. The physical and moral strength of the race is invigorated through the opposition of mountains, and man, as God's vicegerent, in his work of subduing the earth, has everywhere in all lands, amongst all peoples, made the mountains a highway to commerce, travel, discovery.

II. The spiritual analogy of the beautiful saying is even more true. There is a fascination—a challenge to the imagination—in mountain scenery through which He, Who is always appealing to the Divine secret in man, makes 'His mountains a way' to gaze into His face, to think into His heart, to hope into His promises.

III. Is there not in this inspired prophecy the Divine solution of a mystery, and the impregnable assurance of a victory? The sternest moral mountain in this perplexing world is the existence and permission of evil. All mountains, however precipitous and threatening, are God's; the Almighty responsible Father of poor puzzled, trembling humanity says, 'My mountains,' and it is enough. As the challenge of the rugged mountain crest and mighty glacier provide the impulse to muscular exertion which otherwise would slumber, so the energetic struggle against the mountain of moral evil in the world shall make that mountain a 'way' to your own perfection, and the perfection of the race; 'to him that overcometh,' that maketh mountains a way, 'will I grant to sit on My throne'.

IV. God will 'make all His mountains a way,' but it is His predestined purpose to effect it by the active co-operation of brave-hearted, God-fearing, consecrated men and women in the world. The crowning delusion of modern Christianity is that salvation can be divorced from helpfulness. Do you ask, 'What shall I do that I may make 'His mountains a way'? Get your springs of action and emotion right, and conduct will be automatically transfigured; incorporate into the verities of your life the spirit of the Master's words: 'One is your Father, even God, and all ye are brethren,' and your actions will start from another base and correspond to a new environment. —B. WILBERFORCE, The Gospel of the Kingdom, p. 8.

REFERENCES.—XLIX. 11.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 7. XLIX. 12.—G. T. Candlin, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 393. R. F. Horton, ibid. vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 388. XLIX. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 3012. XLIX. 14.—J. C. Shanks, God Within Us, p. 74. XLIX. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ix. No. 512; vol. xvi. No. 2072. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 9. XLIX. 20, 21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 2092; vol. xlviii. No. 2776. XLIX. 23.—A. Murray, Waiting on God, p. 105. XLIX. 24, 25.—C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 376. XLIX. 26.—J. Smith, ibid. vol. lv. 1899, p. 308. L.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2335; vol. xlvii. No. 2738; vol. xlix. No. 2832. L. 2-4.—C. Stanford, Symbols of Christ, p. 142. L. 2-6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 2827. L. 4.—H. P. Liddon, Clerical Life and Work, p. 46. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 15. L. 5.—Ibid. p. 20. L. 5, 6.—T. B. Dover, Some Quiet Lenten Thoughts, p. 124. L. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxv. No. 1486. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 22. J. Keble, Sermons for the Holy Week, p. 325.

THE ONE HELPER

'The Lord God will help me.'—ISAIAH L. 7.

I FOUND these words when I needed them much in Isaiah, chapter fifty, verse seven: 'The Lord God will help me'. We might write this on a signet ring and stamp with it all the record of our life. There are times when we need just these simple daisy texts, spring-violet texts. They seem to have no cubic depth, and yet when we come to live them there seems to be room in their infinite space for the heavens and the earth.

'The Lord God will help me.' I like the sound of it; there is a voice that is all music, a voice which, though we have not heard it before, we recognize it at once, saying, 'This cometh from eternity, and is the music of God.'

I. 'The Lord God will help me.' This is a proved fact. I have proved it, you have proved it; yet we could not explain it. 'I was brought low, and He set me upon a rock.' To hear that sweet testimony makes our hearts glad. Tell us something more, and let the house of Israel say, that His mercy endureth for ever, and let the redeemed of the Lord say so. There may be silent piety, there ought to be also a resounding testimony. I could not be an atheist without first committing suicide, because I have seen the Lord in the house and in the field, in the valley and on the hill-top.

II. The text is not only a proved fact, it is a continual inspiration. We can fall back upon experience; we can say, 'This or that happened to me'. If we can only say, 'This or that is reported to have happened to some other man,' we have no faith, we cannot have faith. We must be able to say that such and such deep joys, thrilling sacramental experiences, have been realized in our own life. 'This is how young David talked. 'I will fight the Philistine.' But thou art only a child, and no fighter. 'I will fight Goliath.' What justification is there for such a challenge? 'I was keeping my father's flock, and there came a lion and a bear, and they took a lamb, and I rose and caught them and smote them, and tore their jaws in twain, and I am not going to lose that fact: the Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion and out of the paw of the bear, He will enable me to deal with this uncircumcised Philistine.' This was good reasoning; this was deriving inspiration from the past. Exactly the same answer ought to be possible to every one of us.

III. The text is not only a proved fact and a continual inspiration, it is, finally, a sufficient rest. You are going to do such and such work: how are you going to accomplish it? And you say almost in musical cadence, 'The Lord God will help me'. You have already won the battle; the victory is not in the fighting, but in the spirit of the fighter. When does the Lord God help His people? Under three conditions. First, when the work is His own. 'Servant of the Lord' is speaking here—that mysterious personage that seems to pervade Isaiah and give personality to every word in the glowing prophecy. He comes to do the Lord's work, and he says, 'The Lord God will help me'. And, secondly, when we have given up self-reliance. That is almost a miracle. We think we can do something. When we come to know that we can do nothing we will do everything that God wants us to do. Even this depends upon the spirit of renunciation. The renunciation must not be made in a spirit of haughtiness or resentment, saying, 'I am formally required to give up myself and my efforts, and therefore I obey'. In that temper you will receive nothing; we must do the Lord's will in the Lord's own spirit; even Christ pleased not Himself. To be nothing is the way to be all we can be. And, thirdly, which, indeed, is a division of the second point, the Lord helps us when we have completed our faith by giving up our substitutes. We sometimes want to personate faith, to set forth something as if it were faith. The Lord will receive no proxies, He will burn all shams, He will have the naked soul in the perfectness of simple reliance upon Himself, and then He will say, 'Son, thy sins, which are many, are all forgiven thee'. And God cannot forsake a forgiven man.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 156.

REFERENCES.—L. 8.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 31. L. 10.—W. M. Taylor, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 210. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI.

p. 39. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1085; vol. xxxix. No. 2335. L. 10, 11.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 162. L. 11.—G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 78. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 47. LI. 1.—C. P. Reichel, The Anglican Pulpit of To-Day, p. 366; see also Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 213. P. M'Adam Muir, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 91. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xviii. No. 1050.

THE PENTATEUCH—GENESIS

'Hearken to me, ye that follow after righteousness, ye that seek the Lord: look unto the rock whence ye are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged. Look unto Abraham your father, and unto Sarah that bare you: for I called him alone, and blessed him, and increased him.'
—ISAIAH LI. 1, 2.

TO-DAY we begin to examine the early books of the Old Testament. The first five books stand together by themselves. Sometimes they are called the Pentateuch, which means only 'the book of five volumes'. First we must attend to the place which these five books hold in the history of the Jews. Speaking roughly, we may say that they tell us the beginning of the Jewish people. The early steps and stages by which they become a people.

I. We see at the beginning of all things God Himself, making all things. He is not the earth or the heavens, or anything that is therein: He is distinct from them all: He made them all: He was before them all. Last of all came man. Man was a part of the world, and was meant to remember that. The next step brings us into the state into which sin has entered. Here I wish you to notice especially two things. First the Bible does not begin with sin, it begins with innocence and goodness. Secondly observe that the first evil is distinctly religious evil. The temptation comes through the fruit; but the great force of the temptation lies in impatience of the restraint which God for good reason ordained; in trying to be independent of Him, in other words of being as Gods. Then the outward curses follow. The earth is no longer a garden but a place of thorns for those who have become estranged from its Maker and their own. Estrangement from God leads to estrangement between men even members of the same family. The husband becomes the accuser of the wife. The elder brother is jealous of the younger brother, and his jealousy has its natural fruit in murder. As mankind multiplies so does crime. The earth we are told was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence. Then the just anger of God went forth, and used the power of the world for the punishment of man. A flood of waters overwhelmed the sinful race, and only one small family was preserved. To these survivors, to Noah and his family, God renewed the blessing which He had given to Adam. Immediately, however, evil sprung up afresh. It showed itself in a shameful want of respect in one of Noah's sons towards his father. Presently we hear of men joining together to build a high tower whose top might reach to heaven. This was evidently done out of pride against God; but He scattered them abroad on the face of the earth, and with the scattering came the beginning of different languages, so that henceforth the different branches of the same race became foreign to each other. Such are the chief points in the first part of Genesis.

II. At this point the new life begins, which was to go on growing till it reached its full height in the person of Christ. God called on an old man named Abram to leave his country and go into a land which He should show him, promising to make him a great nation, and in him to bless all the families of the earth. This was the seed of the Jewish people: here we have in a few words the plan of the whole Bible, God making Himself known to a chosen few, that through them the whole race may be partakers in the blessed gift.—F. I. A. HORT, Sermons on the Books of the Bible, p. 24.

REFERENCES.—LI. 1, 2.—W. J. Knox-Little, The Journey of Life, p. 103; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 131. LI. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1633. LI. 2, 3.—Ibid. vol. xxvii. No. 1596. LI. 3.—H. Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 215. LI. 4.—S. R. Driver, Church Times, vol. l. 1903, p. 173; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiv. 1903, p. 104. LI. 8.—A. Murray, The Children for Christ, p. 192.

THE NEEDS OF THE AGE

'Awake! awake! put on strength, O arm of the Lord; awake! as in the ancient days, in the generations of old.'—ISAIAH LI. 9.

Who can be the speaker of this interesting passage? Is it the Prophet himself? Is it the cry of the Church of God? Or is it the Great Intercessor Himself Who speaks? Is it the Servant of Jehovah Who came in the fullness of time to bear our sins and to work out for us an everlasting righteousness? I am disposed to take this third view, partly because it seems to explain most simply and faithfully the whole passage, and partly because whatever of reality there is in the intercession either of an individual servant of Christ on earth or in the Church of Christ herself here below, as a whole, the strength and value of such pleading are entirely dependent on the work of the great High Priest and Intercessory Himself. It is the call of the Divine Intercessor, the Lord Jesus Christ, the Servant of Jehovah, addressed to God Himself on behalf of the present needs of the Church. What more powerful appeal could be made than by Him? When He speaks, surely He must prevail. It might have appeared sufficient if He had simply urged his personal claim, but He grounds the appeal upon an historical fact; He refers to the past. A pledge for help in the present is taken up from the help given in the past.

What are some of our great needs?

1. There is needed a higher standard of Christian teaching. There is a superficial knowledge of Divine truth in many directions, but those who are to reach the intellect, and heart, and conscience of men must make it plain that they have a distinct message, that they are conscious that this message is of supreme importance.

2. We want the prophetic spirit in our ordained ministers; men who have a witness for God that they must deliver, and if they cannot deliver it they must die. 'O arm of the Lord, awake,' and send us such prophets as these!

3. The masses can be won by holier living on the part of the Church of Christ. Example tells everywhere. A holy life is a searching sermon, a holy life is a homily that cannot be rejected or neglected, and the holy life is not to be lived by the minister alone; it is to be lived by those to whom he ministers, and who are gathered round him as disciples round a teacher. Are you fully aware of the fact that unless you live a holy life for God the kingdom of Christ cannot extend? You may be a stumbling-block in the way of your fellow-men if you make a profession of Christ and do not come up to that profession. A holy Church, men and women that are living according to the mind of Christ, with His example always before them, are an army irresistible. No force of evil can stand against such a power as that.

4. We want more fervent intercession for our great cities. We want a cry to God to go up day by day from the hearts of those who love the Lord, that these places may be given to Him for His inheritance.

5. We want more generous and ready self-sacrifice. We live in an age of great pleasure-seeking, an age of materialism, an age in which the race seems to be one day for the amassing of wealth and another day for the expending of the wealth so amassed upon the pleasures of this life. Will not the spirit of self-denial ever be granted to us again? Will not men put aside this seeking after self-indulgence in order that by sacrifice of this kind they may have time, and energy, and wealth to give unto the Lord?

6. If England is to be won for Christ, those who are in authority as Christ's ministers must pay much more earnest heed to the question of visiting from house to house those who are ignorant about Divine things. The sympathizing touch, the sympathizing look of a servant of Christ in some miserable so-called 'home' is of infinite value. O, if all who have this sympathy in their heart were to go out, give of their best, and touch with the hand of love those who seem cut off from all the joy of this life or the life to come, and who say, 'No man has cared for my soul'.

REFERENCES.—LI. 9; LII. 1.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 51. LI. 9, 10.—G. H. Wilkinson, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 214.

THE FEAR OF MAN AND THE FEAR OF GOD

'I, even I, am He that comforteth you; who art thou, that thou shouldest be afraid of a man that shall die, and of the Son of man which shall be made as grass; and forgettest the Lord thy Maker, that hath stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth; and hast feared continually every day because of the fury of the oppressor.'—ISAIAH LI. 12, 13.

MAN is here represented as standing between two powers—God and his fellow-man—each claiming to influence his life; and God calls upon him to consider whether, being what he is, his conduct should be influenced by the fear of man, or by the fear of God.

I. Man is first to consider what he is—to look into himself. And what does he find? Two things—weakness, and therefore dependence. Man is as grass, which groweth up in a day and withereth; and man is dependent for the preservation of his life, and for the supply of his needs, to some extent, upon his fellow-man, but far more upon God. That which a man knows of himself—that he is weak and unable to stand alone—this he knows also of his fellow-man. Why, then, should he live in continual fear of the world, which is made up of men like himself, weak and dependent, whilst he forgets God, Who is All-Powerful and absolutely independent?

How wonderfully this passage brings before us the folly of moral cowardice! It is an anticipation of the teaching of our Blessed Lord, Who said, 'Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear Him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell'. Not only is our own life in God's hands, but the life of those who oppose us. Not only can He give us strength to meet the difficulties put in our path by others, but He can remove those difficulties.

There is another way in which this fear of man affects our life. It robs our Spiritual life of all definiteness and power. The man whose words are inspired, whose actions are directed by mere human respect, the fear of what men will say or think, is never likely to dare anything noble for love of God.

II. Consider what forgetfulness of God carries in its train:—

1. It results in loss of faith.
2. Loss of hope, for hope depends largely on memory.
3. Loss of love.

III. What does God promise if, instead of fearing man, we fear Him? We find it in the first words: 'I, even I, am He that comforteth you'. Life is full of sorrows; the world is not a congenial environment for those who love and fear God; but God says to such, 'I, even I, am He that comforteth you'. The reiteration of the pronoun emphasizes the greatness of the Comforter.—A. G. MORTIMER, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part i. p. 126.

REFERENCES.—LI. 12, 13.—J. Martineau, Hours of Thought, vol. ii. p. 150. LI. 15, 16.—H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 49. LI. 16.—J. Hamilton, Faith in God, p. 112. LII.—Rutherford Waddell, Behold the Lamb of God, p. 81. LII. 1.—S. Martin, Rain Upon the Mown Grass, pp. 72, 83. J. Martineau, Hours of Thought, vol. ii. p. 834. LII. 2, 3.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 196. LII. 3.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX-LXVI. p. 71.

ISAIAH LII. 7.

RUSKIN remarks on this verse: 'How strange it seems that physical science should ever have been thought adverse to religion! The pride of physical science is indeed adverse, like every other pride, both to religion and truth; but sincerity of science, so far from being hostile, is the pathmaker among the mountains for the feet of them that publish peace.'

REFERENCE.—LII. 7.—W. J. McKittrick, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 29. LII. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 185. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 543. R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 296. LII. 11.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX-LXVI. p. 75. LII. 11, 12.—Ibid. p. 78. LII. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 230; vol. xxx. No. 1793. S. A. Tipple, Sunday Mornings at Norwood, p. 233; see also Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 215. W. L. Watkinson, The Blind Spot, p. 227.

THE PRUDENCE OF CHRIST

'Behold, My servant shall deal prudently.'—ISAIAH LII. 13.

THE word rendered prudent is a two-sided word, and, strangely enough, both the Authorized and Revised Versions only bring out one side of the significant word. Bishop Chadwick translates it 'shall deal prudently, so that prosperity shall be the result'. Very often prudence fails, but the prudence of Christ is to succeed.

I. Christ dealt prudently in not prematurely surrendering His life. Till He knew His work was done He would not allow His life to be squandered. He came to earth to die, but He refused to die prematurely.

II. Christ's prudence appears in His insight into character.

'He needed not that any should testify of man, for He knew what was in man.' Still does He deal prudently. For this prophecy is an eternal prophecy. He knows us and acts towards us with unerring wisdom.

III. The adroitness of His replies is a great evidence of His prudence. When He was but twelve years old the people in the temple were 'amazed at His answers'. And ever afterwards His answers amazed all men. He still deals prudently herein. We can take our present problems to the Divine man ascended. He may delay to answer. But the very delay is education.

IV. Christ's prudence is seen in His concessions to the limitations of His hearers.

Many a public teacher is destroyed through lack of prudence. Christ was established by His prudence. 'He that is able to receive it, let him receive it,' is His wise word. Christ will never put a cross upon the intellect that the intellect is unable to bear. Still, Christ only asks men to receive for the time being truths they are able to receive.

How prudently He dealt in graduating truth. He spake 'as they were able to hear it'. He graduated truth not only in respect of its quality but its season. 'I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now.'

V. By His encouragement of good Christ dealt prudently. He told the scribe he was 'not far from the kingdom of God'. He commended the religionists of the day in this: 'Ye search the Scriptures'. He shed the light of hope on a penitent woman by saying, 'Neither do I condemn thee'. This was His encomium upon a pardoned one, 'She loved much'. Said He to His sorrowing disciples, 'Already ye are clean'. Is it not always highest prudence to encourage all good, however incipient in all souls?

VI. Christ's prudence was the larger prudence. His was not the prudence of many so-called prudent people, which is but the instinct of self-preservation acutely developed. Christ's was the noble, the sacrificial prudence. Estimate prudence by the Eternal. Take long views of prudence.

VII. Christ dealt prudently in His procural of salvation.

The Son of God took pity on our flesh and blood. Through death He won us everlasting life. Most wonderful prevision marks that method of redemption. There is equal prudence in the condition of salvation. Salvation by faith, by trustfulness, by reliance! By such a method God reaches the many.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Crimson Book, p. 157.

REFERENCE.—LII. 13-15.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxi. No. 1231.

THE MARVELLOUS MARRING

'As many were astonished at Thee; His visage was so marred more than any man, and His form than the sons of men.'—ISAIAH LII. 14.

'MANY were astonished at Thee; His visage was so marred!' Not His power, then, but His weakness; not the blazing glories of the full-orbed Sun of Righteousness, but its mysterious and dark eclipse is herein held up to us as matter of astonishment!

I. It is suffering that mars the visage. Suffering mars the countenance sometimes almost beyond the possibility of recognition. And if the visage of the Son of God was marred more than any man, it was because He suffered more than any man.

In those sufferings there were indeed natural elements, such as are found more or less in the experience of all men. He was, like all, from time to time hungry and weary. He, like others, had no home. Then also He suffered much from loneliness of spirit.

II. But there were other exceptional and peculiar causes of the marring of the Saviour's visage. (1) That all the sorrow and the agony from the beginning to the end were steadily foreseen by Him. (2) To the depth of His sorrow and the intensity of His sufferings, in a certain way His very sinlessness must have contributed. And this the more because, unlike ourselves, again He saw men just as they were. 'He knew what was in man.' He saw through all disguise, and saw it constantly; saw the whole of that awful moral corruption around Him, and, because of His infinite purity, felt it as none of us could feel it even if we saw it. (3) It is with us that we know the power of God's grace. But herein was the last supreme woe that came upon the Saviour, that in His ultimate hour of anguish, when that conscious presence and felt love of the Eternal Father was most needed, then, of all times, in a manner unfathomably mysterious and incomprehensible, that presence and manifested love of the Father was withdrawn from the Man Christ Jesus. (4) But there is a still deeper mystery about the marring of the visage of the Son of God, that He who so suffered knew no sin. The wonder yet increases when we remember what this Sinless Man claimed for Himself to be. 'I and the Father are One.' Not only, then, is it perfect sinlessness, but the supremest dignity for which utter and peculiar anguish is reserved. (5) His ineffable sorrow is again yet the more marvellous, that it did not come upon Him as under any inevitable necessity, a resistless compulsion that He could by no means escape. 'I lay down my life,' He said.

III. There is one thing yet more a matter of astonishment than the marring of the visage of Jesus Christ, and that is, the reason of that marring. The same Prophet who tells us of the marvellous marring, tells us in never-to-be-forgotten words the reason of the marring also. 'Surely He hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows; He was wounded for our transgressions; He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him.' He suffered for others. All this peculiar and ineffable suffering was not for Himself but for others. Here is the final supreme reason why we may well be astonished at the strange marring of the Saviour's face, that it was marred for men! He suffered not for righteous men, for such there were none; He suffered for sinners.—S. H. KELLOGG, The Past a Prophecy of the Future, p. 183.

REFERENCE.—LII. 14.—C. G. Clark-Hunt, The Refuge of the Sacred Wounds, p. 9. T. B. Dover, Some Quiet Lenten Thoughts, p. 142. LIII.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2290; vol. xliii. No. 2499; vol. xliii. No. 2534; vol. xlix. No. 2840; vol. xlix. No. 2827. Rutherford Waddell, Behold the Lamb of God, p. 81. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 88. LIII. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xviii. No. 1076. C. H. Wright, The Unrecognized Christ, p. 102. "Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. v. p. 9. W. L. Watkinson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 225. F. E. Paget, Faculties and Difficulties for Belief and Unbelief, p. 86. LIII. 2, 3.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 92.

THE OFFENCE OF THE CROSS

'He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrow, and acquainted with grief.'—ISAIAH LIII. 3.
'The offence of the cross.'—GALATIANS V. 11.

AROUND the Cross a certain romantic interest has gathered, but what the Cross really stands for is an offence, a stumbling-block and a scandal to men. The Prophet Isaiah, with his piercing vision, saw the truth. In his prophecy of Christ he tells us that men shall see no beauty in Him that they should desire Him. The offence of the Cross has not yet ceased. Why?

I. The Cross of Christ is the condemnation of the world. It was the condemnation of the world of Christ's own time. As that Cross has come down through all the centuries it has passed its unfaltering judgment upon the vanities and prides, and hates and greeds, the self-indulgent pleasures and the lusts of men. To-day the Cross visits our worldliness with the same condemnation.

II. The Cross of Christ is an offence because it sets forth an imperative ideal of life. Christ's ideal of life was concentrated into the one act of His dying. Christ hung upon His cross from His cradle to His grave. That life of self-denial and self-crucifixion, in which He pleased not Himself whenever He endangered His pleasing of God, is the imperative ideal of life He lays upon men.

Are we not all conscious of our deeply seated offence at this imperative of the Cross? Are we not all pagans at heart? We all chafe at the restraint of a life like Christ's. We refuse to give up what we know His Cross condemns.

III. The Cross of Christ is an offence because it claims to be the power of God unto salvation. It makes this claim without an alternative. It throws up our sinful state in clear relief, and demands from every man, as his first duty, to get right with God. From its sacrifice there comes the stern word that nothing else in life is to be put before this getting right with God, and that this reconciliation is to be attained only through the Cross.

What is it which sin has done and always will do?

1. The first effect of sin is an altered universe. The reaction against your sin is not only in your conscience and in your body. It is in the world which environs you. You know that in the moment of your sin you spoiled all. There is that sobering and chilling experience of 'the moment after'. The story in the third chapter of Genesis sets that law of sin in a clear light. Adam and Eve found themselves in an altered world. But Christ's Cross has redeemed the world. It will become God's perfect poem again.

2. The second effect of sin is death. Whenever we sin something dies within us. The connexion of sin and death is constant, immediate, inescapable. But what is death? The Bible says, and, says always, from Genesis to Revelation, that had there been no sin there would have been no death. It has made death a tragedy, awful, terrifying, unbearable. But the Cross has annulled this penalty of death. 'He died for us.'

3. A third effect of sin is an estranged God. I have set this down as third in order although it is really first in fact. Yet the sense of the estrangement of the real and living God is the last of which we are conscious. It is not until we know and bewail the estrangement of God that we see and lament the effect of sin.

IV. When does the offence of the Cross cease? It ceases only when the soul is visited not merely by remorse but by repentance toward God, followed by a meek confession of one's sin, issuing into a faith in Christ Jesus Who died to reconcile us to God, to give us a new life in our soul, and to make this world a possible Eden again.—W. M. Clow, The Cross in Christian Experience, p. 115.

REFERENCES.—LIII. 3.—Archbishop Lang, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 394. S. Parkes Cadman, ibid. vol. ix. 1901, p. 180. R. J. Campbell, ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 145. J. J. Tayler, Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty, p. 202. J. A. Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 446. "Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ii.

p. 58. W. Brock, Penny Pulpit, vol. xii. No. 693, p. 213. W. J. Knox-Little, The Mystery of the Passion, p. 15. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xix. No. 1099; vol. liii. No. 3033. J. Keble, Sermons for the Holy Week, p. 102. LIII. 4.—Archbishop Lang, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 402. J. Baldwin Brown, The Divine Treatment of Sin, p. 51. F. D. Maurice, Christmas Day and Other Sermons, p. 260. George Tyrrell, Oil and Wine, p. 116. W. J. Knox-Little, Labour and Sorrow, p. 269. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 97. LIII. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 834; vol. xviii. No. 1068; vol. xxxiii. No. 2000; vol. xliii. No. 2499; vol. l. No. 2887. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, pp. 97, 305. F. B. Cowl, Straight Tracks, p. 100. F. E. Paget, Faculties and Difficulties for Belief and Unbelief, p. 172. C. G. Clark-Hunt, The Refuge of the Sacred Wounds, p. 17.

THOU SHALT ANSWER, LORD, FOR ME

'The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all.'

ISAIAH LIII. 6.

'The constant and characteristic effort of our Lord's life,' says Dr. Smith in his work on Isaiah, 'was to assert and explain Himself as the Only.' His contemporaries tried to make Him the First among them, but with that He was not satisfied. He pressed on to a singularity beyond, to be realized in suffering. In suffering men feel their oneness with their kind; through suffering He became like unto men, 'but only in order to effect through suffering a timely and a singular service for them.' He did not feel as they did about pain. 'Pain never drew from Him either of those two voices of guilt or of doubt. Pain never reminded Christ of His own past and made Him question God.' Nor did He seek pain for any end in itself. To Him pain was not in itself meritorious, a thing to be gloried in or desired: He shrank from it. 'And when He submitted and was in the agony, it was not in the feeling of it, or the impression it made on others, or the manner in which it drew men's hearts to Him, or the seal it set on the truth that He found his end and satisfaction, but in something beyond it. Jesus looked out of the travail of His soul and was satisfied.'

I. Why is the Gospel the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth? Is it because it reveals the eternal purpose of the Divine love? Or because it refashions life by an influence exerted on man's heart? Or because it breaks the chain that holds us to our past? St. Paul's answer is: For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith—that is, it unrolls the Divine righteousness and displays faith as its secret at each disclosure. God set forth Christ Jesus to be an expiatory offering through faith in His blood. This was to declare God's righteousness, that He might be seen by all His creatures as at once jealous for the law and judicially acquitting the guilty.

II. It is this judicial aspect of the Atonement which the Apostles set in the forefront as sovereign and prime. The Cross has many relations, and we are coming to understand some of them better. Others are beyond our knowledge, for to understand the whole we must be able to comprehend all the love and agony of the infinite nature. But the history of the Church shows that there is no fact which believers understand so readily, and rest upon so firmly, as the meritorious Sacrifice. Their teachers may be perplexed, but they are not. Whoever rejects the Stone, it is to them the head of the corner; 'it is still the tried Stone, the sure foundation, the Rock whereof Faith speaks, "Set me upon it, for it is higher than I"; Love's sure abiding Pillar of remembrance, whereon Love's secret is written and graven with a pen of iron for ever'. They delight in all statements, however naked and literal, that bring it into clear relief.

III. The desire to explain the Atonement may go too far. All help is welcome, but the fact itself is much more easily understood than many explanations of it. Its 'Onliness' is the main thing. No analogy goes more than a little way. The Cross far transcends reason and experience. It is indeed inscrutable in its very nature, and must be trusted implicitly if at all. The human mind offers a dull and wearied resistance to explanations which, as it easily perceives, do not touch the central mystery. In the Epistles we have the fact set forth in a variety of phrases which have been found sufficient for the soul's needs. Such explanation as these furnish must be used to the full. For, running to another extreme, evangelical preaching sometimes misses the mark by continual, exhausting demands for faith. The cry 'Believe, believe,' mocks and irritates when it is not accompanied by a setting forth of the ground on which faith may rest—how God is just and the justifier of them who believe in Jesus.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, Ten Minute Sermons, p. 227.

MANIFESTATION OF SUFFERING

'The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all.'—
ISAIAH LIII. 6.

No one ignorant of the nature, power, and guilt of sin can understand this text, but to the humbled sinner it is 'good tidings of great joy,' of which Christmas and the Epiphany speak to us.

I. For the Sacrifice is for His Salvation.

(a) It gives him rest from the works of the law (Rom. viii. 1-4; Gal. iii. 10-13).

(b) It brings reconciliation and communion with God (Rom. v. 9-11).

(c) It assures his heart with a triumphant confidence (Rom. viii. 32-34).

II. The Virtue of this Sacrifice is Its Completeness (John xix. 30; Heb. x. 14).

(a) The sinner has broken the holy law of God (Rom. iii. 20).

(b) His own righteousness is of no avail (Is. lxiv. 6).

(c) But Christ is a complete surety for the sinner (Heb. vii. 20-22); an accepted surety (2 Cor. v. 21); and the sinner stands complete and accepted in Him (Eph. i. 6; Col. ii. 10).

III. Shall we not Lay our Sin where the Lord hath Laid it—on Him? (Lev. xvi. 21).

(a) Shall we dare to trifle with that sin, which cost Him such bitter suffering? (Zech. xii. 10; Heb. x. 29).

(b) Shall we allow self-righteousness to rob us of the precious hope of full redemption in Him? (Gal. ii. 21; iii. 12, 13; v. 2-4).

(c) Shall we not rise to the heavenly privilege of praise for this great work? (Rev. i. 5).

REFERENCES.—LIII. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 694; vol. xvi. No. 925. W. Hay M. H. Aitken, Mission Sermons (2nd Series), p. 112. W. Howell Evans, Sermons for the Church's Year, p. 93. Ambrose Shepherd, The Gospel and Social Questions, p. 49. A. Maclaren, Paul's Prayers, p. 168. LIII. 7.—W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 105. G. S. Barrett, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 221. Rutherford Waddell, Behold the Lamb of God, p. 69. "Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. v. p. 86. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 103. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvi. No. 1543. LIII. 10.—Ibid. vol. iv. No. 173; vol. x. No. 561; vol. xxxvii. No. 2186; vol. li. No. 2963. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 108. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 267. J. Martineau, Endeavour After the Christian Life, p. 54. A. Mursell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 77.

THE TRAVAIL OF CHRIST'S SOUL

'He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied.'—
ISAIAH LIII. II.

THE travail of His soul! The Prophet lays no particular emphasis upon Christ's bodily suffering, because, though most visible, it was not the main part of His atoning sufferings. He emphasizes the inward mental spiritual agony, as that in which chiefly He bore our iniquities. Mental is in itself harder to bear than bodily pain. The soul, with its larger capacities, finer sensibilities, and chief place as governor of the body, is more sensitive. Bodily pain is narrower in its range and exhausts itself sooner. What physical agony can compare with the sharp sting of inward anguish?

Let us reverently note some of those things which we may conceive constituted for our Lord 'the travail of His soul'.

We must not limit Christ's atoning mental sufferings to His actual endurance on the cross, or forget what He endured before the last scenes of His ministry on earth. His closing sufferings were more intense, but in the death-sufferings we should not lose sight of the life-sufferings; for the whole period of His public ministry was a 'temptation,' and to Him temptation was suffering, as He met and fought it. It came upon Him from friend and foe.

I. He Endured the Contradiction of Sinners against Himself.—What neglects and oppositions were heaped upon Him! Ignorant but well-meaning friends tried His patience, failed to understand His character or believe in His words, and sought to thwart His aims which they could not grasp (cf. St. Matt. xvi. 8 seq., xvi. 23, xvii. 17; St. Luke xxiv. 25). Enemies gainsaid Him, refused His counsel, despised His teaching, caricatured His doctrine, said all manner of evil against Him falsely, even calling Him Beelzebub. Such contradiction, with all the irritation, and sorrow, and pain, and heaviness it caused Him, no one has ever endured, and none can understand what a humiliation and grief it was for Him to put up with it from those whom He came to save, and over whose sinful souls, even as they blasphemed Him, His pitying heart yearned with boundless compassion.

II. The Sight and Contact of Human Sin and Misery as they lay Passive around Him must have Deeply Wounded His Soul.—He was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners. He had all sources of personal happiness within Himself, yet He went down into the depths of society, into the depths of this fallen world, where only scenes of sin and misery could meet His eye, and tear His heart, and pain His purity. How must that native purity of His sinless humanity have been repelled and shocked as He, with His exquisite susceptibilities all instinct with holiness and love, beheld the sin, and selfishness and woe of the men among whom He dwelt!

III. His Foresight of the Doom Coming on God's Chosen People caused Him Pain.—His tears over Jerusalem, forsaken and doomed to utter desolation, expressed the real sorrow of His soul. He alone knew the wrath that His nation was treasuring up, and how hopeless was their position through rejecting His gracious efforts. He wept in the anguish and pity of His heart that such vengeance was in store for them, and that they themselves had made it for ever impossible for Him to avert it. Very acute such sorrow, venting itself in such tears, must have been to Him who came to 'save the lost sheep of the house of Israel'; who carried the knowledge of that doom with Him through life, and found all his efforts to rescue them vain, and had at last to confess His impotence, and give them up in sorrowful despair.

IV. The Shadow of the Cross Projecting itself over His Life cast a Burden over His Spirit as He anticipated the end of His ministry. Ever and again that burden pressed Him to speak of it, especially as time went on. But it was always with Him in daily consciousness, ever growing heavier and more distinct, and straitening Him more and more until His baptism should be accomplished. What a weight He must have carried on His soul in the knowledge of the death He was to die! How hard it must have been for Him to labour on with this prospect before Him! His humanity might well and naturally shrink from such painful anticipations. He was fitted to enjoy life perfectly and abundantly as none else; to delight in all beautiful things in nature; to appreciate all Divine and human truth; to feel the impression of all that was pure and lovely and virtuous and of good report. Yet He denied Himself, put a restraint on these holy and heavenly natural instincts of His, and bent Himself to the task of obedience, though He knew it was to be obedience unto death, even the death of the cross. Truly 'He learned obedience by the things which He suffered'.

The travail of soul during life culminated at death, assuming a distinctness and bitterness peculiarly great as that crisis arrived. All the past was intensified and concentrated, and additional elements of pain were experienced. Thus His friends forsook Him and fled. One denied Him. One betrayed Him. Did not this experience, to One who was so sympathetic and social Himself, and who then needed all the human sympathy and society which His friends could give Him, cause sorrow of soul of no ordinary kind?

V. Learn—

- (a) The costliness of His redemption.
- (b) The evil and shamefulness of sin.
- (c) The reality of our Lord's sympathy for all who are in the world as He was, and follow in His footsteps.
- (d) The greatness of the suffering of the impenitent.

SATISFIED

'He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied.'
—ISAIAH LIII. II.

Our text speaks to us of the 'satisfaction' the Lord will experience at the result of His great atoning work. Many a man is not satisfied with the fruit of all his labour; no man is indeed in this world ever satisfied with the results of his expenditure. But Christ is satisfied at every stage with the progress made. His satisfaction keeps pace with every enlarging vision of the travail of His soul. His satisfaction shall be full when the vision is complete. When the sons and daughters are all brought home, He will desire nothing more, and regret nothing. His delight is then perfect. He shall be satisfied with His people.

I. Satisfied with their Number.—There will be a multitude that no man can number; the vast majority of the race: a mighty gathering, countless as the dewdrops from the womb of the morning (Ps. cx. 3); and as He casts His eye over the General Assembly and Church of Himself, the First-born, He will not murmur that He has not more. Sufficient reward will He deem them to be for His travail of soul.

II. With their Variety.—All kindreds and nations shall be represented there; all varieties of generations, and ages, and climes, of culture, and temperament, and experience, of rank and degree in the social and the moral world, shall be brought together in perfect unity, to satisfy Him with the sight of their diversity in unity, and of the suitability of the 'common salvation'.

III. With their Character and Attainments.—All shall stand perfect and complete in all the Will of God; each, in his measure and degree, according to his capacity, filled with the Spirit, conformed to the image of the 'First-born among many brethren,' and partaking of the Divine nature, and beginning an eternal progress; so that He shall see them faultless and worthy of Himself, and have no greater joy than see them walking in the truth, and desire no greater perfection in them at any stage of their eternal history.

IV. With their Prospects.—They shall have fullness of joy, pleasures for evermore, new reaches of duty, new anticipations of higher felicity in His presence; and, under His guidance, enlarged and ever-enlarging capacities. There will be no drawbacks and deductions with God Himself their portion, heaven their home, His truth their study, His service their duty, His presence their light and glory. He will ask nothing more for them. He shall be satisfied with what God has given to Him for them.

V. With their Praises.—They shall thank Him, cast their crowns at His feet, fill heaven with His glory, and bless Him with full hearts and unflinching lips as they never could on earth; and as they cry, 'Worthy is the Lamb that was slain!' He shall be satisfied, and feel such adoring gratitude ample recompense for the travail of His soul. How great must be the number, variety, attainments, prospects, and thanks of Christ's redeemed to satisfy Him for His sorrow, and make Him think that that was not too sharp and sore for what it has brought!

REFERENCES.—LIII. 11.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 108. T. Binney, Sermon Preached in the King's Weigh-House Chapel, p. 1. W. P. Ballern, Glimpses of Jesus, p. 237. R. Waddy Moss, The Discipline of the Soul, p. 57. T. Monod, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 219. J. Kehler, Sermons for the Holy Week, p. 153. LIII. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. viii. No. 458; vol. xxiii. No. 1385; vol. xxxv. No. 2070. W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches (2nd Series), p. 44. J. B. Stedford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxvi. 1904, p. 133. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 173. W. Alexander, Verbum Crucis, p. 19. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 117. Jesse Butt, The Soul's Escape, p. 62. LIV. 1.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 640.

LENGTHENING THE CORDS AND STRENGTHENING THE STAKES

(A Sermon to Clergymen)

'Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations; spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes.'—ISAIAH LIV. 2.

My subject is steadfastness and then extension. We have the same connexion of thought in that pair of parables which ought never to be separated—the Parable of the Ten Virgins and the Parable of the Entrusted Talents—the connexion between secret faith in the heart and the life of active obedience—life in Christ and life for Christ. I shall consider the subject in two aspects:—

I. As to our individual inner life.

II. As to our special position as ministers of Christ.

I. To 'strengthen the stakes'—to drive in the tent-pegs—is a striking picture of the deepening and establishing of the inner life, and the lengthening the cords is a no less striking image of the gradual extension of our area of usefulness in the Church of God and in the world. As I shall dwell almost entirely on the first figure, let me remind you that the two must go together. The proportion must be complete. If you lengthen your cords, but do not strengthen your stakes, your tent will be liable to be swept away by the blast of temptation and trial. On the other hand, it is in vain to deepen your stakes unless you lengthen your cords, for the end of all religion is consecration of God and His service, to be used for His honour and glory.

There is one more point which must be settled before we proceed. That is the underground upon which we are building. If the foundation be sand, we drive in our tent-pegs in vain. They will not hold. Years ago I had an experience in the Lebanon. A sirocco was expected. My tent was pitched on rocky ground. I drove in my pegs to the hilt in narrow crevices in the rocks. The hurricane came in all its violence. My tent was shaken, but it stood. Let us ask ourselves once again the old, old question, Am I building upon the rock? Am I vitally united to Christ by faith? Is the living Christ the author of my salvation, the object of my faith, the inspiration of my love, the source of my power? If not—if some blast of temptation should assail me—if I should grievously fall, then should I have to cry in the words of the prophet, 'My tent is destroyed, and all my tent-pegs are plucked up; my children are gone away from me and are not, and there is none to spread out my tent any more, or to set up my tent curtains' (Jer. x. 20).

Let me mention two stakes which need to be strengthened.

1. First, we must rivet our souls more firmly on the Word of God.

2. The second 'stake' of which I would speak is prayer. Do we not all feel amid the endless claims upon our time that there is special danger of minimizing our seasons of private devotion? The very distraction of our work demands and necessitates increased carefulness in the habit of prayer. I have often sought refuge from the din and noise of the Strand in the repose and stillness of the Temple Gardens. The very act of prayer is soothing to the mind apart from the blessing we look for in return, just as we are refreshed in the darkness by the fragrance of the garden, even though we cannot see to cull the flowers. St. Paul constantly realized this. He tells us that one of the five conditions upon which the peace of God is to be maintained in the soul amid the distractions of life is this: 'In everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. So the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall fortify your hearts and minds'.

But not only for repose but for safety's sake we must pray. If our souls are not strengthened by prayer we shall certainly fall a prey to temptation. We marvel that some mighty tree is broken by the blast, until we discover the inner decay. The great Origen, under fear of death, denied his Lord. The heathen were exultant. They did not know that Origen that morning had left his chamber without his wonted prayer. His last biographer denies the recantation, but his sermon in Jerusalem on Psalm 1.

16, 17, seems to authenticate the fact. Even if it be not true, the instinctive feeling that it is likely is a proof of our consciousness that all our inconsistencies, every yielding to temptation, each fall, secret it may be, is to be traced up to the neglect of habitual communion with God. Let the old question come back with all its ancient force: 'Will you be diligent in prayer?' For our own soul's sake, for our ministry's sake, we must be more and more men of prayer. All mighty works for God are done by His saints upon their knees. The man of prayer is the man of power in the Church of God.

II. I must now look at a wider field. The tent, or tabernacle, is an emblem of the Church; and here we will use the command, 'Spare not; lengthen thy cords and strengthen thy stakes,' in a more catholic sense.

I would guard myself against three dangers in my pulpit ministrations:—

1. The danger of forgetting the only remedy for sin. All reading must be subject to this. When the mind is full of the theme, and your motto is 'Nihil humani a me alienum puto,' and you have notes on your desk from theology, history, poetry, fiction, biography, science, and you feel and know that you can interest your people, beware! Is there a remedy for sin amongst it all?

2. Let us guard against the danger of vanity. 'Why is it, father,' said one of the friends of St. Francis d'Assisi, 'that all the world goes after you?' 'Why,' he replied, 'even for this. The Lord saw no greater sinner in the world than I—none less wise, none viler, and so He chose me above all to accomplish a wonderful work on the earth.' 'Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints,' said St. Paul, 'is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ.'

3. Let us not forget our entire dependence upon God the Holy Ghost, that we may not be left to our own barrenness and blindness, but that our faculties for teaching may be directed and perfected.—J. W. BARDSLEY, Many Mansions, p. 89.

'Enlarge the place of thy tent.'—ISAIAH LIV. 2, 3.

FROM this text William Carey preached his famous sermon before his fellow-ministers at Nottingham in 1792. He divided the passage under two heads, which as Mr. Eugene Stock says, have been an inspiration to the whole Church of Christ from that day to this. (1) Expect great things from God. (2) Attempt great things for God. The sermon was preached on 30 May, and on 2 October the Baptist Missionary Society was formed. In the following year Carey himself sailed for India as its first missionary.

LENGTHENING AND STRENGTHENING

'Lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes.'—

ISAIAH LIV. 2.

THIS splendid and glowing chapter is a magnificent example of prophetic faith. The people were exiles in what looked like a hopeless captivity. Yet this chapter throbs and burns with the prophet's passionate conviction that many years shall not pass before he and his are restored again to their native land. His nation had been overwhelmed with disaster and political extinction, and when the people had been deported beyond the Euphrates, it looked as if the last chapter in the history of Judah had been written, and that its very name had been blotted out for ever from the roll-call of nations. But in this chapter the Prophet dares to predict for that ruined, desolate and wellnigh extinguished kingdom, a future greater even than its heroic past.

I. 'Lengthen your cords' is the Divine appeal to the Church. We must enlarge the place of our tent. We must continually be making more room. The danger of the Church is ever to be content with narrow boundaries, to be satisfied with less than God has in store for her. And so, to a Church always ready to sit at ease, God has always to be saying, 'Lengthen thy cords, stretch forth the curtains of thy habitations'. In many directions we must 'Lengthen our cords'.

1. We must be ever lengthening our cords in the way of seeking to win new territories and heathen lands for Jesus Christ.

2. We must be ever lengthening our cords in the way of seeking to bring daily life more and more under the sway of religion.

3. There must be a lengthening of the cords in the way of opening our minds to receive the new ideas and the larger truth that God from age to age reveals. For God does, from age to age, reveal new truth. No one can study the history of the centuries without seeing it. The Spirit is from time to time taking of the things of Christ and revealing them unto us.

II. But we must not only lengthen our cords, we must strengthen our stakes. There must be the inward confirmation as well as the outward development. Seek to win heathen countries for Christ; bring more and more of daily life under the sway of religion; keep an open mind for the larger truth; but see to it that the strengthening goes hand in hand and keeps pace with the lengthening; strengthen your hold upon the great Gospel verities, upon foundation truths, upon bottom facts. Strengthen your stakes, the great beliefs of your life; strengthen them, confirm them; in a word, while extending on this side and that, see to it that you are tightening your own grip upon Jesus Christ.

The lengthening without the strengthening can only issue in disaster.—J. D. JONES, Elms of Life, p. 155.

REFERENCES.—LIV. 2, 3.—A. T. Pierson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 360. J. Clifford, ibid. vol. xli. 1892, p. 344. J. Thoburn, ibid. vol. li. 1897, p. 267. LIV. 4.—Hugh Black, ibid. vol. lx. 1901, p. 138. LIV. 7-10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1306. LIV. 9.—Ibid. vol. xxxvi. No. 2176; vol. li. No. 2062.

THE KINDNESS OF THE LORD

'For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but My kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of My peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee.'—ISAIAH LIV. 10.

THERE are features of this earth which suggest eternity, voices which mysteriously speak of infinity. The sea is such a feature. Yet we are assured the time shall come when 'there shall be no more sea'. The mountains are another such feature; we read of the 'everlasting hills'. Yet, as the text assures us, 'The mountains shall depart and the hills be removed'. They serve to symbolize the Divine nature and attributes. But there is a contrast drawn. These stable things of earth shall pass away; but, saith the Lord, 'My kindness shall not depart from thee'. The Lord's loving-kindness towards His people is set forth in three clauses of this verse.

I. His Gracious Disposition is Revealed.—Very human and very encouraging is the language in which our God speaks of Himself and His feelings towards us. His kindness is not mere indulgence; it is a desire for our holiness as well as our happiness.

II. His Tender Mercy is Recorded.—Mercy is not a mere feeling; it is practically displayed. He 'hath mercy upon' us. Whilst righteousness alone might condemn, mercy forbears and forgives.

III. The Covenant of Peace is Established.—A covenant here is not a bargain, but a faithful declaration of Divine purposes. The former covenant was with Israel; the new covenant is with the race which Christ redeemed, the Church which Christ purchased. The element of the covenant is peace with God, with self, with men.

IV. The Unchangeableness of the Lord's Love.—This is shown by contrast, viz. with earthly objects, as mountains and hills; and implicitly by contrast with earthly possessions and with human friends.

(a) It is independent of us, i.e. of our desert, had we any; of our feelings, which are always varying.

(b) It cannot be affected by anything outside us. 'Who, what shall separate us from the love of Christ?'

(c) It is part of God's unchanging nature, whose power cannot fail and whose promises cannot be broken.

(d) It is assured to us in Jesus Christ, who by His advent and by His sacrifice reveals and ratifies a love which never changes and a faithfulness which never betrays.

V. Our Response.—What shall be our response? Let us think not how we feel towards the Lord, but how He feels towards us. Let us not misinterpret the changes, losses, and sorrows which, so far from being evidences of changes in the Divine heart, are ministrations of His kindness. But in all weakness and discouragement let us rely upon Him Who is independent of all our variableness and inconstancy.

REFERENCE.—LIV. 10.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 125.

ISAIAH LIV. 11, 12, 13.

RUSKIN says: 'How will you evade the conclusion, that there must be joy, and comfort, and instruction in the literal beauty of architecture, when God, descending in His utmost love to the distressed Jerusalem, and addressing to her His most precious and solemn promises, speaks to her in such words as these: "Oh, thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted,"—What shall be done to her?—What brightest emblem of blessing will God set before her? "Behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colours, and thy foundations with sapphires; and I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones." Nor is this merely an emblem of spiritual blessing; for that blessing is added in the concluding words, "And all thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children".'

REFERENCES.—LIV. 13.—T. G. Selby, The Holy Spirit and Christian Privilege, p. 197. Morgan-Dix, Sermons Doctrinal and Practical, p. 169. LIV. 14.—S. Barnett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lix. 1901, p. 110. LIV. 17.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. 1. No. 2918. LV.—Ibid. vol. xxxviii. No. 2278. J. H. Jowett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 282.

THE TRUE IMPERIALISM

'Ho, every one that thirsteth.'—ISAIAH LV. 1.

I. 'Ho, every one that thirsteth!' That is a call to the faint and the weary. What is he to do? 'Incline your ear.' 'Hearken diligently unto Me.'

1. There has to be a discipline of the ear. There has to be a determined and resolute effort to listen to God. The voices of the world are so plausible, so fascinating, so easily seducing, that if a man is to catch the higher voice he must set himself in the resolute act of attention. 'Hearken diligently unto me.' For the individual and for the nation the discipline of the ear is the first step to the attainment of a strong, restful, unwearyed, and satisfying life.

2. The discipline of the ear is to be accompanied by the discipline of the heart. Listen, and then yield. Right hearing necessitates strong and unequivocal doing. Hear the highest, and then uncompromisingly obey it.

II. What would be the issues of such obedience? They are unfolded for us in this chapter with wondrous prodigality. (1) There is the assured promise of a fuller life. 'Your soul shall live.' Life shall be no longer scant and scrumpy. (2) 'Behold, thou shalt call a nation that thou knewest not, and nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee, because of the Lord thy God, for He hath glorified thee.' What does that mean? It means that a true and glorified natural life is to create a true and glorified Imperialism.

That is the true imperialism—empire by moral and spiritual sovereignty, allurements and dominion by the fascinating radiance of a pure and sanctified life. (3) A true imperialism is to be accompanied by a splendid magnanimity. The thoughts of the Eternal are characterized by loftiness, by breadth, by comprehensiveness, by an all-inclusive sympathy which vibrates to the interests of each, as though each contained, as indeed it does, the welfare of the whole. The truly imperial people is to share this spacious and inclusive thought.

III. Note the climax of the sequence. All this exalted and glorified character, this true imperialism, this splendid magnanimity, is to issue in a rich, assured, and beautiful ministry. 'There is to be nothing wavering and uncertain about the moral empire and sovereignty of such a people.—J. H. JOWETT, Apostolic Optimism, p. 19.

THE GREAT PROCLAMATION

'Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price.'—ISAIAH LV. 1.

I. To Whom this Offer is Made.

It is to every one thirsty and penniless. That is a melancholy combination, to be needing something infinitely, and to have not a farthing to get it with. But that is the condition in which we all stand, in regard to the highest and best things.

The man that knows what it is of which he is in such sore need is blessed. 'The man who only feels dimly that he needs something, and does not know that it is God whom he does need, is condemned to wander in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is, and where his heart gapes, parched and cracked like the soil upon which he treads.

But there are dormant thirsts too. It is no proof of superiority that a savage has fewer wants than we have, for want is the open mouth into which supply comes. And you all have deep in your nature desires which will for ever keep you from being blessed or at rest unless they are awakened and settled, though these desires are all unconscious.

And yet there are no desires so dormant but that their being ungratified makes a man restless. Until your earthly life is like the life of Jesus Christ in heaven even whilst you are on earth, you will never be at rest.

'Ho, every one that thirsteth.' That designation includes us all. 'And he that hath no money.' Who has any? Notice that the persons represented in our text as penniless are, in the next verse, remonstrated with for spending 'money'. Which being translated out of parable into fact, is simply this, that our efforts may and do win for us the lower satisfactions which meet our transitory and superficial necessities, but that no effort of ours can secure for us the loftier blessings which slake the Diviner thirsts of immortal souls.

II. In What it Consists.

Jesus Christ Himself is the all-sufficient supply, and the soul that has Him shall never thirst.

III. How do we Get the Gifts?

The paradox of my text needs little explanation, 'Buy without money and without price'. The contradiction on the surface is but intended to make emphatic this blessed truth, that the only conditions are a sense of need, and a willingness to take—nothing else, and nothing more.—A. MACLAREN, The Wearied Christ, p. 113.

Illustration.—They tell an old story about the rejoicings at the coronation of some great king, when there was set up in the market-place a triple fountain, from each of whose three lips flowed a different kind of rare liquor, which any man who chose to bring a pitcher might fill from, at his choice. Notice my text, 'Come ye to the waters' . . . 'buy wine and milk'. The great fountain is set up in the market-place of the world, and every man may come; and whichever of this glorious trinity of effluents he needs most, there his lip may glue itself and there it may drink, be it 'water' that refreshes, or 'wine' that gladdens, or 'milk' that nourishes. They are all contained in this one great gift that flows out from the deep heart of God to the thirsty lips of parched humanity.—A. MACLAREN, The Wearied Christ, p. 121.

REFERENCES.—LV. 1.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 142. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 199; vol. xx. No. 1161; vol. xxix. No. 1720. C. Jordan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 327. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 109. J. H. Jowett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 401. J. A. Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 332. LV. 1, 2.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part I. p. 139. LV. 1-3.—R. W. Pritchard, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 99. LV. 1-7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2534. LV. 1-13.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 134.

WISE INVESTMENTS

'Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labour for that which satisfieth not?'—ISAIAH LV. 2.

MONEY and labour are the two great commodities which rule the exchange of life. The rich man gives his money, the poor his labour; and the words of our text therefore challenge the two classes of society—the one because they make a foolish expenditure of wealth, and the other because they get a poor return for their work.

I. Unwise Expenditure.—It is, perhaps, necessary to do no more than mention the very unwise expenditure of money and labour, of which most of us can tell, in the years that are past; how much has gone for flowers in the banquet of life, and how little for 'bread'. What care and toil have been devoted for that which, after all, has brought in the least possible amount of satisfaction. The leanness of many of our souls; and the restlessness of the hearts of thousands, could well bear witness to the necessity of the remonstrance, 'Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labour for that which satisfieth not?'

II. Some Good Investments.—It will suit our purpose better if we consider what are some of life's good investments, which bring in solid advantages—such as a man really wants if his soul is to prosper.

(a) Peace of Mind. I place first among the gains of life peace of mind, and for that the investment is simply and alone acts of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

You must commit your whole self, as a poor miserable sinner, absolutely to His grace and power. Your soul must go forth, without question upon that bold venture—accepting the promise as endorsed with the faithfulness of Almighty God. Do it fearlessly; and the result is sure: there will come back a sense of pardon; and the interest of that pardon, if I may so call it, pays you every day and every moment.

(b) Truth. The next thing which you will do well to traffic in is truth, the clear knowledge of God's truth. No man can get truth without labour. It is the wages of severe work. You must be always looking out for the teachings of truth. You must make your Bible a real daily study. You must pray over it; you must hold fast the little you get, and continually add to it. You must gather it as the Israelites gathered their manna, little by little—morning and evening, every day.

(c) Affections of our Fellow-creatures. I place next the affections of our fellow-creatures. Every affection is a real possession, and well worth the purchase, cost it what it may, so we do not barter truth. Therefore, lay yourself out for affections—not selfishly, not that you may be liked, not that you may be gratified, but for real affection's sake, and as a means to a high end; and especially, I should say, the affection of any who from any cause have been placed at some disadvantage, say persons who are afflicted, or the poor—for there are no affections so generous, so precious.

(d) Usefulness. Following this, and as a consequence (for unless we are loved we cannot do it), comes usefulness, one of the few things worth living for—usefulness to the body, usefulness to the mind, usefulness to the soul. I pity the person who is content to live on without trying to be useful. Whatever you have, remember He is the proprietor of all, and will take account whether it has been used selfishly, or for Him and His—His poor, His sick, His children, His sufferers, His outcasts, His saints, His Church, His world. Have some definite work always in hand for usefulness.

(e) Treasure in Heaven. Everything which we give or do for God is actually laying up for us treasure in heaven: transferred from this insecure and bankrupt world to the high places of that safe bank. It is gone before, and awaits us there against the time we come, and every day we may increase that hidden treasure within the veil. The return it pays us now, in God's retributive justice, is a payment of all we touch; and we shall receive it all back again at last a hundredfold.

REFERENCES.—LV. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2278; vol. xlviii. No. 2786. J. A. Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 345. LV. 3.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxv. No. 2092; vol. xxxix. No. 2316. K. A. MacLeay, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 44. LV. 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2787. LV. 4-6.—Ibid. vol. xliii. No. 2534. LV. 4-8.—H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 65. LV. 6.—R. H. McKim, The Gospel in the Christian Year, p. 114. J. A. Alexander, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, p. 357. LV. 6, 7.—W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 48. F. D. Huntington, Christian Believing and Living, p. 129. W. Reiner, Sermons, p. 85. C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 221. LV. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xx. No. 1195; vol. xlviii. No. 2797. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 332. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. iv. p. 207. LV. 7-9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, xxxvi. No. 2181. LV. 8.—W. M. Taylor, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 231. H. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Sermonettes for a Year, p. 163. LV. 8, 9.—H. Wace, Christianity and Morality, p. 55. G. Granville Bradley, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892. J. Percival, Some Helps for School Life, p. 20. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 152. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 676; vol. xxiii. No. 1387. Clergyman's Magazine, vol. xii. p. 23. W. M. Taylor, Old Testament Outlines, p. 231. "Plain Sermons" by contributors to Tracts for the Times, vol. iv. p. 302. J. Foster, Lectures (2nd Series), p. 129. C. Morris, Preacher's Lantern, vol. ii. p. 60. H. W. Beecher, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxv. p. 106. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 676; vol. xxiii. No. 1387. J. Keble, Sermons for Christmas and Epiphany, p. 27. LV. 8-11.—E. S. Talbot, Sermons at Southwark, p. 71. LV. 9.—S. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 279. T. G. Selby, The Strenuous Gospel, p. 2.

THE RAIN AND THE WORD

'For as the rain cometh down and the snow from heaven,' etc.—ISAIAH LV. 10, 11.

THE Gospel is compared to rain and snow in its

I. Origin.—'From heaven.' All truth is Divine in its source.

II. Operation.—'Watereth the earth.' The Gospel produces a marvellous change on the human heart.

III. Benefits.—'That it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater.' The Gospel gives instruction, comfort, strength, confidence.

IV. Final Results.—'It shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.' We do not see this yet; but we shall by and by.—F. J. Austin, Seeds and Saplings, p. 48.

REFERENCES.—LV. 10.—W. Simpson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 361. LV. 10, 11.—H. Hensley Henson, ibid. vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 56. T. P. Boulton, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 232. F. E. Paget, Studies in the Christian Character, p. 41. G. E. Jelf, Plain Preaching to Poor People (9th Series), p. 25. LV. 10, 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2410.

THE REPUTATION OF GOD

'And it shall be to the Lord for a name.'—ISAIAH LV. 13.

By 'a name' we mean a reputation. This old Testament word carries the same signification in my text.

I. It is Necessary that God should have a Name.—It is not necessary that we should have a name, but it is obviously necessary that God should. One of God's earliest rights is the right of reputation. This shall be accorded Him, says my text, 'And it shall be to the Lord for a name'.

God desires a name. Some believe in an impassive God. Surely not such is the God of the Bible. It is necessary God should have a name that His people may realize it. One of our greatest spiritual blessings is to realize the reputation of God. Men must know what God is that they may appreciate Him with reverent appreciation.

It is necessary God should have a name for the world's sake. Man, considered as separated from God by sin, needs to know that august and redeeming name. Give God a name, for till men know God they are dead whilst they live.

II. God's Deliverances of His People give Him a Name.—Note the prophecy in v. 12, 'For ye shall go out . . . and be led forth'.

God has a wondrous reputation in all things. But that He is the God of deliverances gives Him His greatest name. God has such a conception of redemption as never entered into the heart of man.

God delivers from guilt. God delivers from evil habit. God delivers from sorrow.

III. The Characteristics of God's People give Him a Name.—The emancipated ones are to be marked by 'joy' and 'peace'. We give God a name when gracious characteristics mark us. Joy is the privilege of the Lord's redeemed. But peace is an even richer gift.

IV. Nature, as Suggestive of the Spiritual, gives God a Name.—'The mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands.' Nature has a mystical value. To some souls Nature is non-spiritual. They find God eludes them in that province. To others Nature is a shrine of God and is crammed with heaven.

Said Blake, who was alike painter and poet, 'You ask me if, when I look at the sunrise, I see a round disc of fire something like a guinea. No, I do not. I see an innumerable company of the heavenly host, crying, "Holy, Holy, Holy".' He added, 'I look through the window, not with it'.

V. All Beautiful Transformations give God a Name.—'Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle-tree: and it shall be to the Lord for a name.' Every renewed nature is a testimony to God. National and world-wide conversion will glorify God's reputation in inconceivable degree.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Crimson Book, p. 221.

REFERENCES.—LV. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 833; vol. liii. No. 3044. A. W. Mathews, "Let the Myrtle Flourish," Sermons, 1900-1902. LVI. 2-5.—H. D. M. Spence, Voices and Silences, p. 259. LVI. 4.—J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 69. LVI. 4 and 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2762. LVI. 8.—Ibid. vol. xxiv. No. 1437. LVI. 12.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX-LXVI, p. 162. LVII. 1.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Saints' Days, p. 41. LVII. 6.—S. A. Tipton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxix. 1906, p. 377.

WEARIED IN THE GREATNESS OF THE WAY

'Thou art wearied in the greatness of thy way.'—ISAIAH LVII. 10.

WEARINESS—spiritual weariness—that is our subject to-night. It seems that in this chapter, as so often, the language of the Prophet is suggested by the incidents of national history. The memorable journey of Israel through the wilderness, in the passage from Egypt to Canaan, was fraught with many lessons concerning human infirmity and concerning Divine righteousness and grace. In this passage, where Isaiah laments the sinful defections of the nation, he makes use of the wanderings of the wilderness to illustrate the experience of rebellious and apostate Israel. The people wander and wander, and know no repose; they are 'wearied in the greatness of their way'.

I. Causes of Spiritual Weariness.—These are mainly two:—

(a) Abandonment to error and sin. 'There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked.' They who are led by Satan are led in a devious, an aimless, and altogether unsatisfactory and wretched road.

(b) The deceitfulness of false religion. Men, feeling their spiritual need and misery, strive to make out a way of safety and of peace for themselves. They sometimes submit to many sufferings in the hope of propitiating the Deity and of appeasing their own conscience. The self-imposed penances and pilgrimages and privations of the religious who yield themselves to the devices of human religions are chargeable with no small part of the misery of mankind. Men following the lead of such delusive lights grow 'wearied in the greatness of their way'.

II. Signs of Spiritual Weariness.—These are:—

(a) Dissatisfaction. The journey is too 'great' for human strength. They who undertake it find no peace.

(b) Distress. This is natural enough when effort has been put forth and sacrifices have been made, and all in vain.

(c) Despondency. They who journey for long, and who find themselves in no way advanced towards their goal, or who return to the point whence they set out, are likely enough to abandon themselves to despair.

III. Remedy for Spiritual Weariness.

(a) Confess the error and folly of the past. If the whole course has been a mistake, it is well to find out that it has been so, to cease deluding self, to acknowledge that the weariness of the spirit is owing to having 'followed too much the devices and desires of our own hearts'.

(b) Abandon the ways which have brought only to weariness and to misery.

(c) Accept Divine guidance, that the feet which have so long and so often erred may be led into the way of peace.

REFERENCES.—LVII. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 684. LVII. 14.—Ibid. vol. xxvii. No. 1579. H. Ward Beecher, ibid. (4th Series), p. 90. G. W. McCree, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 275. J. H. Jowett, ibid. vol. xli. 1894, p. 33. F. Hastings, ibid. vol. i. 1896, p. 403.

THE ETERNAL AND HIS HABITATIONS

'For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones.'—ISAIAH LVII. 15.

I. THE first great theme of meditation the text brings before us is God's inhabitation of infinite time. In all eternity past there is no vacant century, no unpeopled epoch, no barren, unilluminated, God-lacking millennium. He fills immeasurable time to its utmost dimension, every moment of the vast eternity, past and to be, pulsating with God's conscious presence.

II. We are reminded of God's inhabitation of selected space. 'I dwell in the high and holy place.' God presents Himself to us in these words as a being who brings His noblest attributes within space-limits because the dwellers in the high and holy place with whom He communes are beings to whom space-limits attach.

God dwells here with an express and intentional manifestation wanting in those extensions of His wisdom and power which touch every part of the universe alike. God is present, but not equally present and unveiled in all the orbs of the firmament. There are elect realms in which He vouchsafes peculiar epiphanies of His majesty and spiritual perfection.

III. God's inhabitation of the individual hearts of His contrite ones is declared. This rests upon His pure compassion. Not only does He stoop to the finite that is holy but also to the finite that is frail.

That He Who inhabits eternity and receives the homage of the high and holy place should seek this latest enshrinement is a mystery, but it is a self-consistent mystery. In making the humbled heart sensible of His presence He appeals more directly to man's consciousness than would be possible by any other method. He must deal with us first in the sphere of the affections. His opening revelations are revelations of healing tenderness to that part of man's nature which is most susceptible to His influence. 'Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him.' That truth gets into the affections and puts mystic fire at their source.

IV. This is a mystery of condescension, but it is a self-consistent mystery. The revival and homeward return of the life that came from God is the clue to this enigma of pity and gentleness. It is no slight thing to recover and restore that life. By this inhabitation of contrite hearts the Eternal will add at last a new kingdom to the high and holy place where He is enshrined. From those to whom He so strangely bows Himself He will attract a devotion of which those never needing a Saviour may be incapable. 'We love Him because He first loved us,'—true for angels, but uniquely true for us.—T. G. SELBY, The Lesson of a Dilemma, p. 165.

REFERENCES.—LVII. 15.—G. McHardy, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 134. R. J. Campbell, City Temple Sermons, p. 199. F. W. Robertson, Sermons Preached at Brighton (3rd Series), p. 230.

GOD'S TWO HOMES

'For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones. For I will not contend for ever, neither will I be always wroth: for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made.'—ISAIAH LVII. 15, 16.

We know and believe separately the doctrines of the majesty and of the mercy of God, but it probably seldom occurs to a Christian to think of one as a result of the other. It would not occur to us to say that God sent His Son into the world because He is almighty and infinite, and all-glorious, or that Jesus came to save us because He is the eternal God. Yet this or something very like it is what Isaiah does say in the text.

I. Isaiah, who says so much elsewhere, both before and after this chapter, of the work and the sufferings of Jesus, here does not mention Him; he speaks of the dwelling of God with the humble, of the mercy of God to the contrite, not as fruits of the Incarnation or of the sacrifice of Christ, but as results of the glory of the Eternal Father, the High and Lofty One that inhabiteth eternity. The special truth that seems set forth in these verses is, that the Incarnation and the Sacrifice of Christ, while they are to us the cause and the source of all blessing, of all pardon, of all grace, of all holiness, of all salvation, are themselves not the cause but the effect of the mercy and the love of God the Father; as Jesus says Himself, 'God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son'.

II. The reason why God is so eager to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones, is simply His own majesty, His greatness, before which they are so little. This is a great and glorious thought if only we can bring our minds to the effort of grasping it. Our creation, our preservation, our redemption, and all the mercies of the Gospel, are not merely acts of God, things that He has been pleased to do, and which we may rejoice that He has done, but which might have been otherwise; they are all the overflow of the fullness of God's own nature. Because He is what He is, He has done what He has done. The time will come when the world and all the works therein shall be burned up, even the works of God Himself. The time will come when there will be no Holy Bible, no Christian Church, no faith in Christ; but those who now know and trust in the redeeming work of God know that their salvation rests, not on the Bible, not on the Church, nor on their own faith, but on Him who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; that it can never fail until there be no God, or not the same God as our God.

III. Thus then God's promises are made surer than certainty; we know and more than know that He is ready to dwell with us. Only let us be such as those with whom He dwells: 'With him that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones'. Do not think that this is said only of the beginning of the Christian's conversion: that though he must have a contrite and humble spirit before God will come to dwell with him, yet his heart is healed and his spirit exalted as soon as God comes. It is with the heart that is—not only that has been—humble and contrite, that God will dwell; it is with the spirit that does not forget its own sin, even when it feels and knows and rejoices in God's grace. We have not to do anything that we cannot do, only what our own nature requires of itself. Being weak, we ought to be humble; being sinful we ought to be contrite, even though we had nothing to hope for by it. To this simple confession of the truth—a thing that has no merit, that ought to require no effort—to this God promises His presence.—W. H. SIMCOX, The Cessation of Prophecy, p. 48.

REFERENCES.—LVII. 16-18.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxv. No. 1490. LVII. 18.—Ibid. vol. xxii. No. 1279. LVII. 19.—Ibid. vol. xxvi. No. 1558. LVII. 20-21.—Ibid. vol. 1. No. 2386. LVIII.—A. Rowland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 321. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2411

THE DANGERS OF FASTING

(Ash Wednesday)

'Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and show My people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins.'—ISAIAH LVIII. 1.

THERE are two classes of people to whom Lent brings no blessing—those who do not keep it at all, and those who, while they observe it with outward formalities and even with strictness, yet do not keep it in the spirit of true penitence.

I. What a strange picture is here drawn! a nation seemingly most religious, not only fulfilling the ordinances of religion, but delighting in them, and yet absolutely without spiritual life. This character is described in other parts of Isaiah, notably in the first chapter, and is the character which is most difficult to change.

What is the character which Isaiah is describing? We must carefully bear in mind that it is not the conscious hypocrite, but the self-righteous, the self-deceived man who is here brought before us. It is not the man who is wearing the garb of religion in order to deceive his fellow-men, but who all the time knows himself to be a hypocrite. On the contrary, this man is conscious only of virtue, he delights in approaching God, religion is the interest of his life. He is the prototype of the Pharisee in the temple. The Pharisees of our Lord's day, like those Jews in the time of Isaiah, to whom this rebuke is addressed, looked upon the externals of religion as its important part, and entirely ignored its life in the soul.

God demands external worship as the manifestation of the religion of the heart, not as a substitute for it.

II. Jehovah points out what was wrong in the fasting of His people:—

1. The motive of their fasting was wrong. They looked upon fasting as constituting a claim upon God, rather than as a help to penitence.

2. The method of their fasting was wrong, as God points out, 'Behold in the day of your fast ye find pleasure, and exact all your labours'.

3. The accompaniment of their fasting was wrong.

III. God proceeds to indicate the manner in which they may make their fasting acceptable to Him and of value to their own soul:—

1. Fasting should be accompanied with penitence.

2. Fasting should be associated with almsgiving, that is, with works of charity.

3. Fasting must always be attended by prayer.

We must fast with Christ in the wilderness during Lent if we are to rejoice with Christ in the gladness of Easter Day.—A. G. MORTIMER, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part ii. p. 229.

REFERENCES.—LVIII. 1, 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2308. LVIII. 3.—F. E. Paget, Studies in the Christian Character, p. 167. LVIII. 3-7.—J. G. Rogers, Christian World Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 145. F. W. Farrar, ibid. vol. xxxi. p. 129. S. Pearson, ibid. vol. xii. p. 225. W. Archer Butler, Sermons Doctrinal and Practical (2nd Series), p. 148. T. Dale, Penny Pulpit, No. 2977. W. M. Punshon, Sermons (2nd Series), p. 317. G. Brooks, Outlines of Sermons, p. 262. LVIII. 5.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 211. LVIII. 6.—A. D. Spong, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 78. LVIII. 6, 7.—W. M. Punshon, "An Acceptable Fast," Sermons, p. 343.

THE NECESSITY OF SELFLESSNESS TO CHARITY

'Thy righteousness shall go before thee; the glory of the Lord shall be thy reward.'—ISAIAH LVIII. 8.

I. This whole chapter is an exhortation to charity. The Prophet is urging men to deeds of ministration—to sympathy with the poor, compassion for the sorrowful, help for the needy. He says that such a life of sacrifice is of more value than the keeping of sacred days or the attendance at holy festivals. But he says that even this life of sacrifice will have no value unless it is sought for its own sake—that is to say, for the sake of the sufferer.

II. Do not think of the glory with which God will recompense you. Let that glory be to you in the rear—a thing not before your eyes. Let the only thing before your eyes be the cause of righteousness, the duty to minister, the need to succour man; 'Thy righteousness shall go before thee; the glory of the Lord shall be thy reward'.

III. In the life for God there is an invitation to personal glory. But the Prophet tells us to put the promise behind our back until we have finished the sacrifice. He bids us forget the glory until we have surrendered the life. He says: 'There is joy in heaven to a sacrificial soul; but I would not have that soul keep the joy of heaven before its eyes. I would have it, when it serves the beggar, forget the golden streets and the pearly gates and the unsetting suns and the crystal rivers and the living fountains. I would have it remember only the claims of love. I would have it remember only the cries of the perishing and the groans of the wounded and the deep inarticulate longings of those who are too feeble to cry, let the glory of the Lord be my reward.'—G. MATHESSON, Messages of Hope, p. 53.

REFERENCES.—LVIII. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1793; vol. liii. No. 3028. A. Ainger, Sermons Preached in the Temple Church, p. 268. LVIII. 9, 11.—S. Martin, Sermons, p. 169.

THE GUIDANCE OF THE HOLY SPIRIT

'The Lord shall guide thee continually.'—ISAIAH LVIII. 12.

IN very deed the promise given to God's people by Isaiah of old is fulfilled in the Christian Church; and as we live our lives in union with Jesus, we are called on to live them under the constant guidance of the Holy Spirit of God.

I. Jesus is our Director. Notice how truly His direction supplies our need.

1. The first qualification which a wise director must possess is knowledge—a threefold knowledge. (a) He who would direct me aright must know clearly what it is that God wills me to be, he must have a clear apprehension of the end of my life. (b) He must know the nature of the one he guides. (c) He must have a continuous knowledge of the external circumstances of my life.

2. Firmness. Jesus Christ is firm; most tender, most patient, most constant, yet most firm.

3. We need sympathy also in our director; we need one who will feel with us as he guides us along the road which leads to eternal life. For of necessity this road is the Via Crucis, there is no other way which can bring us to the haven where we would be.

II. Notice how He directs us; it is by the ministry of the indwelling Spirit. Who is the Holy Spirit? You know full well that He is the Third Person of the Ever Blessed Trinity. Yet there are many who practically think of the Holy Ghost as simply an Influence coming forth from the Father and the Son. We can put this easily to the test. How often do you offer in your devotions direct adoration to the Holy Ghost? How often do you offer thanksgiving to the Holy Ghost? How often do you offer direct prayer to the Holy Ghost? If direct worship of the Holy Ghost is lacking from our devotions, is it not because the verity of His Divine Personality is not really laid hold on by us?

God the Holy Ghost is in us. Why? To lead us as our indwelling Guide. 'Let Thy loving Spirit lead me forth into the land of righteousness.' Such was the ancient cry, and that cry has been answered in an arresting manner in the Church of God. Speaking to His Apostles on the night of His betrayal, Christ uses these words about the Holy Ghost: 'He dwelleth with you and shall be in you'. Of old He was with them, guiding them from without, but now He is in us, guiding us from within; and this is the essential condition of all true Christian liberty, that we are taught by an indwelling Teacher, and guided by an indwelling Guide.

How does He guide us? Not by sensible visions and signs. (1) He guides us first by His action on our minds; He instils into them holy thoughts; He reveals truth after truth, each of which calls for moral correspondence. (2) He acts not only on our minds, but on our hearts. (3) He acts upon our wills. (4) He guides us by acting upon our conscience.

III. Practical rules to help you in living this guided life:—

1. We must obey our Lord's calls promptly.
2. Our Lord's calls must be fully responded to.
3. When Christ calls, we must respond perseveringly.—GEORGE BODY, The Guided Life, p. 3.

A WATERED GARDEN

'A watered garden.'—ISAIAH LVIII. 11.

'A WATERED garden.' There is too much music in these two words; we could have done with one of them. 'A garden'—beautiful; 'Watered'—music in itself, but 'a watered garden,' both things together and both things in our possession, and we ourselves representing that dual wealth. Who can handle a Psalm so magnificent, so majestic?

I. Yet even this text may give us pause, may lead us to the asking of some piercing questions. The further such questions penetrate the soul the better for the soul's health. 'A watered garden:' cannot a garden water itself? No. That is the answer, definite, cold—discouraging, encouraging, as we may take the term. Is it not enough to be a garden? what matter about the sunshine? who cares about the rain or the dew? Is it not enough to be a garden, a geometric form, pearled and diamonded with many a flower? The king's gardens cannot do without rain; Solomon's parterres wither away but for the morning dew and the summer shower. We need something from without. We are always reminded that there is no one world; you may write it up and sneer at the other worlds, and enclose yourselves in little square cages in which there is no room for an altar; you can do this; but again and again the Lord of the vineyard cometh to seek fruit, and if we have not supplicated His sunshine and His rain, His morning dew, we shall have no fruit for Him when He comes to visit His own land.

Cannot a man sustain himself by his own resources? He cannot. If any man has tried to do so he will be the loudest in his confirmation of my reply. We soon exhaust ourselves, we want the other man, the other hand to touch, the other eyes to look into, the other voice to fill the dull vacancy of our solitude. Is it not enough to be a man? What do you mean by being a man? A figure is not a man, a corpse is not a man; a mere personality, if it could be detached from all other personalities, would not be a man. We cannot live upon stature or figure or aught that our hand can hold. Life is deeper; there is a sanctuary of life, a well far away, where spring water bubbles and gurgles and flashes out in the sunlight like a great gospel preached to the thirst of man. You think you can do with your own resources; let us test your foolish argument for one moment, if we may dignify it by the name of argument.

II. Self-sustenance is not the law of the body; why should it be the law of the mind? Let us reason from the lower to the higher. Every day every man has to go out of himself to keep himself going. If he would study that simple philosophy, he would soon begin to pray. But he will not: he is led captive by Satan at his will. Who can believe that the body not living upon its own resources proves to the soul that it has resources enough within itself? The mind is not sustained by itself. You have books; lay them down, be your own book. You cannot. You need some other man to write you a book, and sometimes to en-plain it to you. You have libraries. What are libraries but wheatfields for the mind? If I ask you in the autumn, What do you want with all these golden growths, all these purple riches and vegetable and fruit? you say, We require all these things for the sustenance of the body. And what do you want with all these libraries, and museums, and academies, and colleges, and schools of every name and degree? These are the wheatfields which the soul reaps, and it needs them every one, for the soul is bigger than literature. The soul lives by friction with some other soul. God is fire. To come into happy attrition with Him, or contact, or friction, who can tell what may come out of that soul touching soul, man praying to God? Prayer is a kind of friction if truly wise and honest, and out of that friction comes sparks to lighten the night and put out the common sun.

III. As we do not leave a garden to take care of itself, neither should we leave ourselves to ourselves.

God waits to give us every one more water, more sustenance, more sunshine. What we might be if we would enjoy our privileges! Into what great distance we might have entered the sanctuary if we had really cared to be at the upper and inner altar that we might be blessed by its sacrifices! Oh that thou hadst hearkened unto me! then had thy peace flowed as a river and thy righteousness had been as the waves of the sea. A branch cannot bear fruit except it abide in the vine, and the Vine is Christ, and except we be in Christ our souls cannot receive the true culture or the true nourishment.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. II. p. 194.

REFERENCES—LVIII. 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiii. No. 736. LVIII. 12.—J. Marshall Lang, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xviii. 1895, p. 38. W. Ince, A Retrospect of Progress in the Church of England During the Nineteenth Century, Sermons. LVIII. 13.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 233. F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 171. LVIII. 13, 14.—H. D. M. Spence, Voices and Silences, p. 259. G. E. Jelf, Plain Sermons on Sunday Observance, p. 39. R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lviii. 1900, p. 49. H. Ward Beecher, Sermons (4th Series), p. 264. "Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ix. p. 267. LIX. 1, 2.—R. A. Suckling, Sermons Plain and Practical, p. 122. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2411.

SIN AS SEPARATION FROM GOD

'Your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid His face from you, that He will not hear.'—ISAIAH LIX. 2.

We cannot fathom the mystery of sin; we may not even ask the questions, How? and Why? But we may contemplate the terrible fact, and remind ourselves of what it is.

All sin, in its degree, separates the soul from God: and whatever separates from God is sin.

I. All sin in its degree separates the soul from God, 'and sin, when it is perfected, bringeth forth death'. For as the separation of the body from the soul is the death of the body, so the utter separation of the soul from God is the death of the soul. Absolute separa- tion from God must be eternal death. Every hope of restoration, every prayer for pardon, every upward glance to God as the soul's true good, is based on, and is the proof of, the fact that the soul is not yet altogether separated from God.

II. Sin is the great separation of the soul from Him Who is our Life. We talk of degrees of sin, of little sins and great ones, of sins mortal and sins venial. And though there is a sense in which all sins are mortal and all sins are venial, yet the distinction is a real one. Some sins tend more directly than others to widen the breach between the soul and God. We call them mortal because they have more power to weaken the will, and to blind the conscience; or because they imply a greater rejection of God's love, or estrange us more entirely from holy things, or bow us down more closely to the earth. And yet the little sins play a more terrible part than we know in the soul's tragedy. A great sin often brings its own visible punishment, its own recoil. We see its loathsomeness. But the little sins are so little we hardly notice them. They are like the drizzling rain which wets us through before we think of taking shelter.

III. And as sin is primarily the act by which the soul turns away from God, so the revelation of God's Love in Christ is primarily a Reconciliation, an Atonement; in the old sense of that word, an At-one-ment. Christ healed us, paid our debt, bought us with a price, satisfied the Law—all that He did; but they were all parts of the work of reconciliation. And that reconciliation is always in the Bible, a reconciliation of man to God. In the Incarnation the restoration of human nature is begun. On Calvary the work of Atonement is complete.

God in creation willed that man should serve Him with a willing love, and man refused. God wills that all should be reconciled to Him in Christ, and men reject His love.

IV. Sin is the unutterable mystery of our lives. We cannot solve it; but this we know—it is man's work, not God's. Not one soul shall be separated from Heaven which has not rejected the appeal of love: 'Ye will not come unto Me, that ye might have life'.—AUBREY L. MOORE, Some Aspects of Sin, p. 65.

THE TRAGIC SCHISM

'Your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid His face from you.'—ISAIAH LIX. 2.

It is said that sometimes the ridge of rock or the sand-bank separating the island from the mainland to which it was once joined may be walked across at low tide, or at least traversed by one who will consent to wade. And so when the floods of passion ebb we may see traces of connecting pathways between ourselves and God and prove that converse with His presence is not a lost possibility of our history.

I. It was thus with Israel in the days of humiliation and reproach. Its people could look back to times of memorable intimacy with the Most High when God seemed to be very near and the prayers of prophets and righteous men possessed an efficacy that had perished from the formal service of recent years. There may possibly be in us and in the communities to which we belong a like experience of decline. Restraints and reservations, which we call the spirit of the age, have wedged themselves in between our souls and God. There was once a union that seemed to be vital, but much has come between us. God's resources can never verge on exhaustion. It is only a moral impediment of the most portentous character that can keep God and the children of His household apart. Sin is the tragic schism, the great divide, parting off worlds in which God hides His face from those in which He reveals the glory of His loving kindness. And this is the paramount condemnation of sin; it bereaves the human spirit of God—its one essential good.

II. The conditions of modern business life are sometimes adduced as an excuse for the waning spirit of prayer and the outfading consciousness of Divine help. God, however, can make Himself known to men under all conditions but those of wilful sin, and if He has fixed your vocation and there is something in it that puts God far from you, that barrier is what you have perversely built up, and not what God has placed there by the determinative act of His Providence.

III. We are sometimes ready to put down this tragic schism to the progress of scientific thought. God is desiccated, systematized into a scheme of mechanics, turned into an ingenious automaton conditioned by His own methods. Perhaps we may one day see that the modern argument against prayer is the cast-off garment of the old theological fatalism, turned and remade with a few scraps of science to trim it into the fashion.

IV. The inscrutable methods of God's sovereignty are sometimes adduced to explain away this ominous separation referred to by the Prophet. More often than not it is sin which veils God and His goodness from the sad breaking, woe-begone heart, and we shall not get out of the gloom by closing our eyes to the explanation and assuming that this terrible silence of the Most High, this apparent indisposition to help at the mere thought of which the heart sickens and faints, is one of the decrees of His unsearchable sovereignty. This separation is often veiled from us by the illusion of the senses and the pomps of this present evil world. If sin is ignored, unconfessed, unforaken, if unflattering truths are obstinately disguised, we shall find at last that our capacity for communion with God is lost and our doom is an abyss from which there can be no uplifting.—T. G. SELBY, The Unheeded God, p. 24.

HOPELESS WEAVING

'Their webs shall not become garments.'—ISAIAH LIX. 6.

THE Prophet Isaiah has laid hold on the idea, now a commonplace of our thought, that all character is a web. And from our text we wish to look at one or two methods of character-weaving which are doomed to miserable failure when the web of life is spun.

I. Half-done Duties.—To find a man who confesses that he does not do his duty is as rare as to find one who admits he has not got common sense. But experience shows us that multitudes perform their duty in such a way that it is but half-done. In the ordinary routine of life they are always a little late, and consequently have to work with haste—a small thing in itself did we not consider that this habit forms itself into a character which is discounted in the eyes of God and man. Or take the higher duty of man to love God and keep His commandments. There are moments of Pi-gah vision, but what weary leagues of plain are there unredeemed by any thought of God! This half-done duty is life's shuttle plied with a palsied hand, and the fabric of character is such as in the end will put the weaver to the blush.

II. Half-conquered Temptations.—Many a man is conquered who does not fall. Such grace may be given that a man is able to stand, but if Satan can leave behind one little thought of evil he reckons it as a triumph. Our Saviour was tempted as other men, but when the tempter was gone there was not one spot of evil upon the pure lustre of our Redeemer's mind.

III. What is the Secret of Duties half-done, of Temptation half-conquered?—The secret is half-consecrated lives. If all the provinces of the soul do not obey the Divine mandate, we need not be astonished if rebellion sometimes shows its head. What we want is enthusiastic piety. The enthusiast spares no pains, counts no cost, deems no labour too much. Once let a soul be fired with the love of God, and body, soul, and spirit will be laid on the altar, a living sacrifice.

IV. When we have done our best to weave, we are not to go to heaven in our own garments. Christ has provided raiment for His people, woven on the cross and dyed there in colours more enduring than Tyrian purple. We have to weave as those who have to prove their calling, not win it.—J. WALLACE, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LVI. 1899, p. 279.

REFERENCES.—LIX. 6.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 174. J. S. Mavor, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 157. H. W. Morrow, ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 381. LIX. 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 884. LIX. 16-21.—Ibid. vol. xlv. No. 2617. LIX. 17.—Ibid. vol. xiv. No. 832. LIX. 19.—Ibid. vol. xii. No. 718. G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 71. F. B. Meyer, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlvii. 1895, p. 407.

THE 'NO MORES' OF LIFE

'No more violence.
No more wasting nor destruction.
No more sun.
No more moon.
No more mourning.'—ISAIAH LX.

I. THE tone is very wonderful. No more sun, no more moon, no more wasting, no more violence, no more earth, no more firmament heaven, but quite another heaven, which that great firmament has been trying, and trying in vain, to hint at all these countless thousands of ages. It is very curious to notice how many things you can part with without parting with yourself. It is astonishing how many things you could cut off your own self and leave yourself in all its superior faculties and capacities.

Now it is proposed, and given to us as a promise to be kept in the heart, that there shall be no more sun, no more moon, no more stars and planets and other fiery points. How foolish therefore we have been to have regarded all these things as of any importance beyond a very limited line! Yet how mightily we have been taken up with these things, and how forgetful we have been of prayer! Is it not like man, is it not a map of himself drawn by his own hand, that he should be so busy looking at things that were doomed before they ever came into existence?

II. What is the eternal in relation to this particular text and context? The words are beautiful: 'Thy God thy glory'; that is to say, thy God thy sun, thy God thy moon, thy God thy morning. Find all things in God, all you want, all you need, all that can be dreamed by sanctified fancy. I saw no temple in that upper city, said the seer in his Sabbath vision. And why did he see no temple in that upper city? Because the city was all temple. People forget that. They say that institutionalism will be done away; I would rather say that institutionalism will be purified, ennobled, sanctified; for God has been aiming at something even through the blunders of religion and civilization. All things are moving forward even when they seem to be moving backward, and things are often moving backward when they seem to be moving forward. We did not start the action, and we cannot control it. When one poor wondering man said, How can this thing be? how can a little one become a thousand, how can a small one become a strong nation? the great religious triumphant answer was, 'I the Lord will hasten it in His time'. So He orders out of His way all mean interruptions and all the temporary substitutes for Himself.

III. Then think, looking at the text and the context, what a wonderful process, taking the Bible as a whole, there is going on under what may be called the category of the 'no mores' of life. 'No more sun, no more moon, no more sea, no more light, no more death, neither shall there be any more pain'—thus you can look at God cutting away the universe until He gets at its soul, meaning, personality, out-living matter and surviving it by countless ages of ages.

No more violence, no more destruction, no more wasting. All these things exhaust themselves. Whatever burns is burning itself out. But if we could get behind the burning and see the meaning, then we would know that burning of that sort such as Moses saw at Horeb is a self-renewing burning. So that we read further in the context that the sun shall be as it were restored with another significance. 'Thy sun shall no more go down; neither shall thy moon withdraw itself: for'—God will give them both a new handling, He will take them up into Himself—the Lord shall be thine everlasting life, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended'.

God has always been moving along the line of progress. This is His programme. 'For brass I will bring gold, and for iron I will bring silver, and for wood brass, and for stones iron; everything shall change places with everything else. The Lord's providence is a great movement, a continual action and interplay, and no man can stay the action: it is God's. O rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for Him, and He will give thee thine heart's desire.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. v. p. 213.

REFERENCE.—LX.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2764.

ISAIAH LX. I.

It is recorded that in Athens there was a law according to which any man who had a lighted candle and refused to allow another to light his by its means, was to be punished by death. This kind of communication is illustrated even in connexion with physical light, since it spreads and imparts itself to some other thing without itself diminishing or losing anything; and still more it is the nature of spirit itself to remain in possession of what belongs to it, while giving another a share in what it possesses.—HEGEL.

ISAIAH LX. I.

Mrs. H. B. STOWE, in her reminiscences of her grandmother, tells how 'on one occasion, after her hearing had become slightly impaired, a wordy battle had been raging round her for some time, which, as she could not understand what we said, and as we seemed to be getting more and more earnest, moved her solicitude very deeply. At last she called one of my brothers to her, and said, "There, now, if you have talked long enough, I want you to read something to me," and gave him that eloquent chapter in Isaiah which begins, "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee"; and goes on to describe the day when the whole earth shall be full of the glory of the Lord. Her face, while he was reading, was like a transparency, luminous with internal light. At the close she said, "Bishop Heber tells in his memoirs how, off in India, there were four ministers of Christ met together, all of different denominations, and they read this chapter together, and found then there was one thing they all agreed in exactly".'

REFERENCES.—LX. 1.—E. L. Hull, Sermons, p. 71. A. F. Winnington Ingram, Banners of the Christian Faith, p. 197. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 240. H. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxix. 1891, p. 24. A. H. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part i. p. 114. A. H. Bradford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. I. 1896, p. 181. H. W. Webb-Peploe, Calls to Holiness, p. 175. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2017. J. Keble, Sermons for Christmas and Epiphany, p. 69.

LIGHT OBTAINED: LIGHT DIFFUSED

(The Epiphany)

'Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. . . . And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising.'—ISAIAH LX. 1-3.

WE ourselves are a part fulfilment of this prophecy. It is Israel's God we worship, Israel's faith that beats in our hearts, Israel's hope we cherish, Israel's Messiah in Whom we trust for salvation, Israel's privilege to which we are admitted. The light is risen. It has spread to the dark places of the earth. Many out of every nation have come to its beams; they bask in its glory.

The Church of to-day is what it is through the fulfilment of this prophecy in part; the Church of the future will be what it shall become through its fulfilment in completeness. God hath not cast off His people whom He foreknew. The Redeemer shall come to Zion (chap. lxx. 20; Rom. xi. 26). Israel shall be converted. Their conversion will have a powerful reactive effect on the Gentiles. 'For,' says St. Paul, 'if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?' (Rom. xi. 11-16).

Dropping the special reference to Israel, and viewing the text in its universal bearings, we have—

I. The Church Enlightened by Christ's Coming.—'Thy light is come. . . The glory of the Lord is risen upon thee' (v. 1). The reference is to the coming of Christ, the God-man Redeemer. Christ arose upon His Church like a great sun, imparting light, reviving courage, diffusing gladness, making bright with glory. 'The Sun of Righteousness' (Mal. iv. 2). Christ gives light—

(a) By imparting saving knowledge. He taught men of the Father. He showed the way of life. He put into the precepts of the law a depth of spiritual meaning never seen in them before. He could say of Himself, 'I am the Light of the World'; 'I am the Truth' (St. John viii. 12; xiv. 6). Christ could give this light because He was Himself the sent of the Father for the salvation of the world. He came with full knowledge of the Divine purpose. He spake with absolute authority. There was nothing the world needed to know that Christ could not tell it.

(b) By restoring the Church to power and influence. The godly in Israel were but a handful. They were down-trodden and despised. The Church of the exile stood sadly in need of comfort. But Christ would lift up its head; He would reinstate it in power and influence among the nations; He would give it prosperity. This was bringing it light. Accordingly, a new spring-time came with the advent of the Saviour. He made His Church a power. Its power speedily became felt, and continues to this day. Christ's kingdom is at this hour the highest thing on earth. It is a permanent and influential factor in history—a thing of might.

(c) By conferring on the Church the beauty of holiness. This may answer to the 'glory' which the Prophet declares 'shall be seen upon it' (v. 3). Christ confers a glory on the Church by the spiritual gifts which He bestows, and by the graces which become visible in the character of His people through the operation of His Word and Spirit.

II. The Light of the Church in Contrast with the Surrounding Darkness.—'For, behold, darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people,' etc. (v. 2). The Church, believers, Christian nations, enlightened by Christ, stand in marked contrast with the darkness of the world around. The effect of the light is to make the darkness more visible. Contrast—

(a) The enlightenment of faith with the boasted enlightenment of reason. 'The world by wisdom knew not God' (1 Cor. i. 21). The world's cleverness did not lead it to the truth. It leads it often to reject the truth now that it has come. The boasted enlightenment of antiquity left it profoundly immoral. The theories, schemes, reasonings of our philosophers to-day leave the mind in just as great uncertainty on the chief questions of existence (God, the soul, future life, etc.); are often as hopelessly astray in their first principles (materialism, utilitarianism, etc.); and are as powerless as the ancient systems to reach the conscience and renew the heart.

(b) The enlightenment of nations which have received the truth with the darkness of surrounding heathenism. The nations which have the most light of every kind on earth are the Christian nations. The purer the gospel, the more advanced the peoples. Where this light has not penetrated, the darkness is gross and the peoples are stationary. Heathenism is sadly uniform in the spectacle it presents of idolatry, debasement, cruelty, gross moral corruption, hideous superstition, etc.

(c) The enlightenment of individuals who have obeyed the truth with the darkness of those who are still in sin. The believer recognizes in his own experience that, whereas he was once darkness, he is now light in the Lord. The change in his character manifests this to be true. The unbeliever, on the contrary, knows his state to be one of darkness, of moral evil, of unhappiness; through lack of true knowledge of God, of hopelessness as regards the future.

III. The Duty of the Church to take Advantage of and to Diffuse her Light.—'Arise, shine' (v. 1). 'And the Gentiles shall come,' etc. (v. 3).

(a) The Church's duty to take advantage of her light.—Arise to welcome it. Shine in the beauty of it. Reflect the glory of it. Shine (1) in the light of a fuller knowledge; (2) in the light of a more perfect sanctification; (3) in the light of a higher gladness (Phil. iv. 4). The light may shine on the sleeping or the dead, and no benefit be derived, no gladness communicated. 'Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light' (Eph. v. 14).

(b) The Church's duty to diffuse her light. She is to let her light shine that others may behold it. She is to use active measures to spread it abroad. Here the figure fails. The sun shines by natural law; the gospel is not spread abroad save by human exertions. Missionary effort is of the essence of the Church's calling (St. Mark xvi. 16).

REFERENCES.—LX. 1-3.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 176. J. H. Jowett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxii. 1902, p. 161. LX. 1 and 19.—F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. I. p. 62. LX. 3.—W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches (2nd Series), p. 37. LX. 4-6.—H. Scott Holland, Church Times, vol. liii. 1905, p. 123; see also Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 56.

ENLARGEMENT OF HEART

'Thine heart shall fear, and be enlarged.'—ISAIAH LX. 5.

THE word 'heart' has a very wide meaning in the Scriptures of the Old Testament. It is used to express the whole inward nature of man. It is the seat of knowledge, it is the home of feeling, and it is the spring of action.

As to the word rendered 'fear,' it is not exactly fear itself which is meant, but the excitement, the exaltation, the throb which comes when a man trembles on the verge of action, that is meant by this word. It is the thrill which comes to a man as he girds himself up to a new departure.

I. 'Thine heart shall throb with an emotion corresponding to the greatness of the situation.' So it is in life at every great crisis of living. It is the way by which human nature is made, by which men attain to manhood, by which Christian men attain to Christian manhood.

The vision comes, and the response comes also, and the heart fears and is enlarged. Passing from the fact that this has been so in the case of all the great workers of the world, let us dwell for a little on the state of mind depicted here. Wide and deep feeling are needed in the making of man. Nor is deep feeling possible without the vision of the true, the beautiful, and the good. Feeling keeps pace with intelligence, and it responds to every enlargement of the vision. Feeling is needed to strengthen the vision, and the wider vision calls forth a deeper emotion, and these translate themselves into action.

II. There are those who fail to respond to the vision, and who thus lose the power of feeling that deep emotion which the Prophet here describes. There are those who respond to the vision at once, and having seen and felt the glory of it, desire to live always in the enjoyment of that exalted emotion. But the emotion passes, as the vision, or that form of the vision, becomes familiar. The great emotion was not meant to last, it was to accomplish something, and having done its work it passes away.

III. There is progress in the Christian life, and at each progressive stage there is the added vision and the responsive emotion.

Thus we ought not to seek to ask for a repetition of the former vision, or for a renewal of former experiences; there is some better thing in store for us. There is the fullness of Him in Whom there is all the fullness of God.

The text discloses the abiding interest of Christian life. It can never be without interest to Him who lives it, it can never be monotonous; for as it unfolds itself and becomes more fully conscious of its great meaning, it opens to itself fresh fields, higher intellectual, emotional, and volitional possibilities, and calls on us to make them actual.—J. IVERACH, The Other Side of Greatness, p. 35.

REFERENCES.—LX. 7.—Bishop Simpson Sermons, p. 209. LX. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ii. No. 63; vol. xlviii. No. 2764; vol. liii. No. 3051. T. De Witt Talmage, Sermons, p. 282. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 337. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. I. p. 245.

OFFERINGS FOR THE SANCTUARY

'The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee, the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of My sanctuary; and I will make the place of My feet glorious.'—ISAIAH LX. 13.

THE earth is full of God's wonderful works, do you say, and what are we to do with them? what to do with marbles and precious stones, gold and silver, and fine linen? Give them to God. Render them to Him from Whom, and through Whom, and to Whom are all things. This is their proper destination. Is it a better thing to dress up our sinful bodies in silk and jewels, or to ornament therewith God's house and God's ritual? Does anyone doubt what all these excellent things are meant for? or, at least, can he doubt what they are not meant for? not meant, surely, for sinners to make themselves fine withal. What presumption would that be, what senselessness! Does not the whole world speak in praise of God? Does not every star in the sky, every tree and flower upon earth, all that grows, all that endures, the leafy woods, the everlasting mountains, speak of God? Do not the pearls in the sea, and the jewels in the rocks, and the metals in the mine, and the marbles in the quarry—do not all rich and beautiful substances everywhere witness of Him who made them? Are they not His work, His token, His glory? Are they not a portion of a vast natural temple, the heavens, earth, and sea, a vast cathedral for the Bishop of our souls, the All-sufficient Priest, who first created all things and then again, became, by purchase, their Possessor? Does it not strike you, then, as extreme presumption, and a sort of sacrilege, to consecrate them to anyone's glory but God's.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—LX. 17.—J. S. Mayer, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 302. J. Keble, Sermons for Christmas and Epiphany, p. 327. LX. 18.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX-LXVI, p. 188. Bishop Simpson's Sermons, p. 279.

THY GOD THY GLORY

'Thy God thy glory.'—ISAIAH LX. 19.

THIS is the end; this is the final meaning; this is the upshot. We wanted to know how things would terminate, and the Prophet tells us, and the Apostle tells us, and they both say, God shall be all in all. The Prophet saw it from afar. We need men who can see the morning; most of us can see and feel the night. There were men in the old, old time whose face was warmed by the morning beam. They persisted because God was with them. God said, Cry aloud, spare not, and tell the world that the morning is coming. We need these morning singers, people who have great sweet words to say when appearances are against them and all the heavens appear to crush them down. Some of us have moods, we see light now and then, we have good times; but the Prophet saw the morning afar off, and spake of it according to the Spirit of God.

The point that I wish to fix attention upon is, that the end of all things is God. We must end where we began; the last note and the first must melt into one burst of music. The Apostle says the end of all things is God; Isaiah says thy God shall be thy glory; and all through there is a feeling that Alpha is Omega, that Omega has in it Alpha, and the purposes of God are one.

I. 'Thy God thy glory.' It might have been so from the first; God meant it, but man turned away from God. Then came the promise, and from that point God has been working to bring man back again into His movement. Consider that things were not done to-day and to-morrow; consider that God, having uttered a purpose and revealed a plan, will keep to it till the end. The centuries will die, and be as white ghosts on the fields of time, but God's eternity quietly, calmly, majestically, goes on.

II. 'Thy God thy glory.' It might always have been so, but it was not so. What happened? Sin happened, and it will take God many a century to get sin out of the universe, but it shall go. God showed man the way back to Himself, but it is of grace, not of works, or discovery, or invention, or human plan; the way back to God is the very wonder of love.

III. 'Thy God thy glory.' He will never be less than God: He will be on the throne for ever and ever, and He will be the glory of man. What has God done to recover man's apostasy, to bring him into right relation to himself? He has sent him a Saviour, Christ the Lord; that Saviour has come to seek you and me, to seek the whole human race. He speaks to every man in His own tongue wherein he was born. He adapts Himself, He reincarnates Himself, He will be to us what we can be to Him, that He may raise us up into His own personality and majesty. He is determined to win; there cannot be two Gods. He has set to His seal that the world is His, and He will redeem it, and has redeemed it with blood more precious than gold.

IV. 'Thy God thy glory.' Do not imagine that we can easily get to the end; through much tribulation we must enter every kingdom that is worth entering—how much more in entering into the kingdom of God! And make of the passage what you like, degrade it, you cannot take all the poetry out of it—'These are they which washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb'. That is a secret meaning, a sacred meaning, a practicable and intelligent meaning, and until we get at that meaning we have not yet begun the great Gospel way.

We have not given God field enough; we should have given Him more elbow-room. He will take it, and not until we see things from that point of view shall we be able to believe that His will will be done on earth as it is in heaven. 'Thy God thy glory'—a recovered God, a reconciled God, a reconciled man, all things tending to unity, radiance, music; then God shall say, 'It is finished!'—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. vi. p. 204.

REFERENCES.—LX. 20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xx. No. 1176. T. Gasquoine, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 330. J. Page Hopps, Sermons of Sympathy, p. 93. LX. 22.—G. Matheson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 36. P. T. Forsyth, ibid. vol. lvii. 1900, p. 305. J. Percival, Some Helps for School Life, p. 264. J. Keble, Sermons for Christmas and Epiphany, p. 299.

ISAIAH LXI. I.

SPEAKING against the South, on 3 February, 1863, John Bright declared: 'I cannot understand how any Englishman, who in past years has been accustomed to say that "there was one foul blot upon the fair fame of the American Republic," can now express any sympathy for those who would perpetuate and extend that blot. And more, if we profess to be, though it be with imperfect and faltering steps, the followers of Him who declared it to be His Divine mission "to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised," must we not reject with indignation and scorn the proffered alliance and friendship with a power based on human bondage, and which contemplates the overthrow and the extinction of the dearest rights of the most helpless of mankind?'

REFERENCES.—LXI. 1.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1604; vol. xl. No. 2371. G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 73. T. G. Selby, The Holy Spirit and Christian Privilege, p. 25. C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 17. W. M. Punshon, Sermons, the Year of Jubilee, p. 171; see also Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 239. LXI. 2.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 254. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiii. No. 1369. LXI. 3.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 191. J. Pulsford, Infoldings and Unfoldings, p. 1. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 1016. LXI. 4.—Mandell Creighton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. li. 1897, p. 324. LXI. 7.—J. B. Brown, The Soul's Exodus and Pilgrimage, p. 392. LXI. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2543. LXI. 11.—Ibid. vol. xix. No. 1104.

THE REIGN OF SOLOMON

'For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.'—ISAIAH LXII. I.

I. Solomon reigned over a great empire. The Jews were never masters of so wide an extent of land before or after as in his days. The king himself began his reign in a spirit which promised well for the coming time. He asked God neither for long life nor for riches, nor for victory over his enemies; but for a wise and understanding heart to discern between good and bad, that he might be able to do true justice among so great a people; and immediately the wisdom given in answer to his prayer was put to a sore trial, and proved itself equal to the need; and all Israel, we are told, feared the king for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him to do judgment. This is the first mark of Solomon's reign.

The ruler of the people is also the wisest of the people. The second mark is of another kind; we must attend to it well if we would understand the rest of the Bible. It is the building of the temple.

II. When the peaceful Solomon was settled in his kingdom, he began to build the temple of the Lord. He knew as he said 'that the heaven of heavens cannot contain the Most High; yet he rightly prepared for Him a house set apart from all common uses, which should bear His name and be the sign of His presence, and he rightly poured forth upon this house of God all his riches to make it beautiful and wonderful to behold. That temple of Solomon was the beginning of our Churches.

III. The latter end of Solomon's reign is sad to think of. His many heathen wives turned away his heart after other gods. He had freely spent his riches in building a temple for the Lord, but he did not keep his own heart pure and true to the Lord; that Divine temple he neglected. His sin no doubt spread far and wide among the people. The worship of idols came in once more in the very sight of the new temple. When he died and his son Rehoboam became king, a day of reckoning followed. By his bad conduct as a ruler Rehoboam goaded a large part of the people into rebellion. Ten out of the twelve tribes refused to obey him and set up another king; only two remained faithful to him. From this time the ten tribes are called the Kingdom of Israel or Ephraim, the two tribes are called the Kingdom of Judah. Cut off from Jerusalem and the temple the Kingdom of Israel fell at once into idol worship, yet great and true prophets were not wanting; and the deeds of Elijah and Elisha remind us that God did not forsake even those who were estranged from His holy place and from the kingly family of David. The story of the Kingdom of Judah is sad enough likewise. The end of both kingdoms is the same. Both become the victims of powerful foreign nations. The Kingdom of Israel is destroyed by the Assyrians who carry the people into captivity. The Kingdom of Judah, often threatened, often reduced to sore straits, lasts on three or four generations longer and then its day of doom comes. Jerusalem is taken, and the people of Judah are dragged away as captives to Babylon.—A. F. HORT, Sermons on the Books of the Bible, p. 59.

REFERENCES.—LXII. 1.—W. C. E. Newbolt, Church Times, vol. lviii. 1907, p. 586. T. T. Carter, Lent Lectures, 1860-1866, p. 374. LXII. 1, 2, 6, 7.—A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part i. p. 151. LXII. 1, 6, 7.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX-LXVI, p. 200. LXII. 2.—"Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. ix. p. 3. LXII. 4.—R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 276. LXII. 5.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 417. H. P. Liddon, Sermons Preached on Special Occasions, 1860-1889, p. 320. J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 371.

'Take ye no rest and give Him no rest.'—ISAIAH LXII. 6, 7 (R.V.).

THIS is the double counsel for the Christian soldier, and it links together working and praying.

I. Observe how the natural blends with the supernatural. Take ye no rest. Therein our Lord was our pattern. How He toiled! 'I must work while it is day. The night cometh when no man can work.' I am inclined to think that never perhaps since the beginning of the Christian Church was this precept nearer to receiving a complete obedience. Take ye no rest. Most of us are very busy. The day begins early and ends late, and some of the hours are long, and perhaps the most comforting thought that comes to you ere you sleep is that you have done the best that ever you could. Often, no doubt, the tired body makes a tired soul, and there is too frequent feeling of disheartenment and defeat.

II. So let us lay the stress on the second part of the precept:—'Give Him no rest'. That is what the issue of the battle turns on. You give yourself no rest, you give no rest to the workers under you; you are prompt to censure anyone who seems to neglect anything; you are willing to rally the little strength you have left for any new burden. Try this, Give Him no rest.

Our Lord in a peculiar and remarkable manner insisted on this and practised this. He taught it in those strange parables which shed such a shower of light on His inner mind. It is strange to think that He Himself gave His Father no rest. It might seem as if He, least of all, needed to pray. The Prince of this world had nothing in Him; He was holy, harmless, and undefiled, separate from sinners. Yet to this duty and privilege of importunate prayer the mystical body are called by their Covenant Head. We know how He prayed on the mountain and in the desert. I agree with Bishop Monrad, who says that the words 'He offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears,' refer rather to a habit than to a particular instance. He prayed without ceasing, and He calls upon us to do the same.

In temporal things there is often a limit to importunateness. God may say to us, 'Speak no more to Me of this matter'. 'I besought the Lord thrice,' said St. Paul. But when we are praying for conversions importunity cannot be pressed too hard. We are not to give runaway knocks at the heavenly door; we are to knock there till we are answered.—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, British Weekly, 25 March, 1909.

REFERENCES.—LXII. 6-7.—A. F. Winnington Ingram, Banners of the Christian Faith, p. 76. W. F. Cobb, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 58. J. T. Briscoe, ibid. vol. lvi. 1879, p. 181. R. Waddy Moss, The Discipline of the Soul, p. 153. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvii. No. 2189. LXII. 10.—Ibid. vol. xix. No. 1131. H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Sunday Lessons for Daily Life, p. 122. W. Brooke, Sermons, p. 256. LXII. 11, 12.—Spurgeon, ibid. vol. xxxiii. No. 1047. LXII. 12.—Ibid. vol. ix. No. 525. C. A. Kelly, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxviii. 1905, p. 57.

MIGHTY TO SAVE

*Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in His apparel, travelling in the greatness of His strength? I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save.—ISAIAH LXIII. 1.

How is this free salvation to be appropriated so that it shall have a practical influence on our hearts and lives? How are we to lay hold of it individually?

I. Grasp the Meaning of Your Baptism.—God Almighty applied this free salvation to each of us at our baptism.

God chose you: He elected you into Jesus Christ at your baptism. He gave you His Holy Word, and He gave you the Holy Spirit to dwell in your heart and to reveal to you clearly what is taught in that Bible about your Saviour.

II. Submit Your Will to God.—As soon as you understand your position, believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. Act on what is revealed. Having learnt that God has given you a Saviour, and that this Lord Jesus Christ has broken down every barrier, and that, having been baptized into Him, your debt has been paid by Him, go on to the next step. In the dark, with but very imperfect knowledge as yet, and with no eye upon you, it may be, but His, make up your mind, though without feeling any improvement in yourself, without love, without any power to pray—make up your mind to trust Him, as a child in the dark trusts its mother.

III. Seek to be Filled with the Peace and Joy of Believing.—Having first trusted Him, instead of waiting to trust Him till you have found peace, try to obtain, in God's way, the peace which passeth understanding. Seek for it as God has taught us to seek; not, at this stage, by hard struggling self-examination, although that is most useful afterwards; but by simply looking up to the Brazen Serpent. Read about Jesus. Try to realize His presence. Speak to Him, if only by a few short words such as 'Lord help me! Open mine eyes! If Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean.'

IV. Seek, if Need Be, the Help of God's Ministers.—If you are not able alone to realize your acceptance in Christ, use the other help that God has provided for you. Go to one of His ministers. He has ordained them for this very work—to lead you to Christ.

Whether by the help of others or alone, this step must be taken. Until we know something of the peace of God which passeth all understanding, true progress is impossible. Till we have realized the forgiveness of sins, the very earnestness which might have raised us into the rank of saints will only drive us into the depths of a morbid superstition, or of a hopeless despair.

Forgiveness is the beginning, and not the end, of the Christian life. We are set free at once from the burden of guilt, in order that we may run in the way of God's commandments with a heart at liberty; that we may live in Him and for Him; that, being nourished by the Body and Blood of our Lord, we may grow in grace, and bring forth fruit unto holiness, to the praise of the glory of His grace who hath made us accepted in the Beloved.—G. H. WILKINSON, The Invisible Glory, p. 70.

REFERENCES.—LXIII. 1.—S. R. Driver, Sermons on Subjects Connected with the Old Testament, p. 178. J. B. Lightfoot, Cambridge Sermons, p. 19. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 217. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 111; vol. xxx. No. 1947. LXIII. 1-4.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 208. LXIII. 2, 3.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 221. LXIII. 3.—Cosmo Gordon Lang, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 244. C. Vince, The Unchanging Saviour, p. 137. F. D. Huntington, Christian Believing and Living, p. 202. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2667. LXIII. 7.—Ibid. vol. xix. No. 1126.

THE SYMPATHY OF GOD
(Passiontide)

'In all their afflictions He was afflicted.'—ISAIAH LXIII. 9.

I. THERE are two great afflictions in which our Saviour may be said to have been afflicted. There is, in the first place, the affliction of sin. It is a wondrous and overwhelming truth that God in the person of Christ chose to learn by a personal experience the power of evil. And so ever more and more He, the sinless One, bears the sins of men upon His own heart, feels them even as if they were His own, until at last they seem even to obscure the Father's Face. . . . What else is the meaning of that cry, 'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?' . . . What does it mean except that, in that darkest hour, the Son of God had so completely identified Himself with His sinful brethren that 'in all their affliction He was afflicted'.

And it is this which gives Him His power to-day; the fact that He stooped to learn by a personal experience all the strength of evil, that He descended to enter into the common human struggle, and in issuing victorious to be the leader against the forces of evil everywhere. He can save because He has conquered. And in our own private and personal struggles against evil, is it not the sense of Christ's victory and Christ's sympathy which is our chief encouragement in what might seem a hopeless battle?

II. The other great affliction of which I am thinking is the affliction of suffering. Do we not feel the suffering of the world to be one of our great difficulties in the way of believing in the goodness of God—the undeserved suffering of the world?

The mystery of pain may be insoluble, but at least it is illuminated by the truth which Passiontide proclaims, that by pain was the world redeemed; that He Who was 'in the form of God,' Himself entered into the bitterness of our human experiences—made them all His own—and became 'obedient to death, even the death of the cross'.—H. R. GAMBLE, The Ten Virgins, p. 115.

THE PASSION OF GOD

'In all their afflictions He was afflicted.'—ISAIAH LXIII. 9.

I. HEBREW piety has taught us two truths regarding God which are not always united in human thought, but which are necessary to the perfect idea, and the first is not His sympathy but His spirituality. With travail of soul the saints of the Old Testament extricated the Being of God from the phenomena of nature and safeguarded His personality from the abstractions of philosophy. God who made the clouds His chariot and rode upon the wings of the wind was the creator of the ends of the earth, and He Who was the source of righteousness and power dwelt with the contrite and humble heart.

Surely it was enough for one school of religious thinkers to bequeath this heritage to the world! But it was an even greater achievement when the prophets of Israel infused that pure spirituality with a most intimate sympathy and convinced many generations that the Holy One of Israel is the most gracious Deity who has ever entered into the heart of man. There is no emotion of the human heart they did not assign to God, no tender relation of life they did not use to illustrate His love.

Is not the Incarnation of Christ the convincing climax of the Divine sympathy? Jesus born of the Virgin Mary and crucified upon the Cross of Calvary is God with us, baptized into the very depths of human suffering. When Jesus came and lived among us the heart of God was laid bare, and every one can see in the Gospel that patient wistful love which inhabits the secret place of the universe. The cross is not only in the heart of human life, it is also in the heart of God. He is the chief of all sufferers, because He is the chief of all lovers.

II. One does not forget, while insisting on the fellow-suffering of God, that there is a certain danger in analogies between the human and Divine, and one lays to heart the warnings against Anthropomorphism. But we must not allow ourselves to be beaten by big words, and we can surely distinguish between what is real and unreal. Has it not been the religious expert—the saints, the mystics, and the prophets—who have most loved to dwell upon this likeness between God and man? When we make a sacrifice for those whom we love and stand upon the height of our heart, may we not be sure that our love is the outcome of the passion of God, and that if we deal kindly by our flesh and blood He will be ten times more kind to us all?

III. With this glimpse into the heart of God we gather riches for our creed because we learn the idea of a lovable God. It is possible to think correctly about God, but not kindly. Master thinkers miss their footing when they speculate on the Being of God, but the simplest can hide himself in God's protecting love, who is perfect father and mother, perfect husband and friend.

With this glimpse into the Divine heart we also gather riches for the struggle of life, because we have a sympathetic God. It is hard enough in any case to pray unto one whom we cannot see, and it is beyond our power if we imagine Him untouched by this world's agony, which breaks beneath His feet as spray upon the base of a cliff.—J. WATSON

(IAN MACLAREN), The Inspiration of Our Faith, p. 85.

Illustration.—

Think not thou canst sigh a sigh,
And thy Maker is not by;
Thinkest thou canst weep a tear
And thy Maker is not near.

O He gives to us His joy
That our grief He may destroy,
Till our grief is fled and gone
He doth sit by us and moan.

—WILLIAM BLAKE.

REFERENCES.—LXIII. 9.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 220. J. Baines, Twenty Sermons, p. 15. C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 59. T. B. Dover, Some Quiet Lenten Thoughts, p. 23. E. A. Draper, The Gift of Strength, p. 37. R. W. Church, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 84. LXIII. 10.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvi. No. 2179. LXIII. 11-14.—Ibid. vol. xxxviii. No. 2258. LXIII. 12-14.—Ibid. vol. xxxvii. No. 2229. LXIII. 13.—T. G. Rooke, The Church in the Wilderness, p. 158. LXIII. 14.—G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 70.

JEHOVAH OUR REDEEMER

'Our Redeemer from everlasting is Thy Name.'—ISAIAH LXIII. 16.

If we wish to learn the full content of these terms 'Redeemer,' 'redemption,' as descriptive of Christ's salvation, we must go back to their earliest use in the Old Testament revelation. For Isaiah, we must not forget, was a Jew, and his prophecy in the first instance was delivered to Jews. And when he used this word 'Redeemer,' and told the Jews that 'Goel' or 'Redeemer' was Jehovah's name from of old, the ideas which both he and his hearers would attach to the word would be the ideas which were attached to it in its common use in their law.

I. The law concerning the redeemer thus involved these particulars as belonging to his office.

(1) The redeemer must be near of kin. (2) The duties of the kinsman-redeemer were three. If any of his brethren had through poverty been dispossessed of his inheritance, the redeemer was to buy it back with a price, and reinstate his poor brother therein. If, worse yet, any of his poor brethren had through stress of poverty sold himself into slavery, the kinsman-redeemer was to buy him out of his slavery by giving a price to the master, and set him free again. If, finally, any of his brethren should be maliciously slain, it was his duty to 'redeem his brother's blood,' as the phrase was; to redeem his brother's blood by slaying the murderer.

II. And now, in the light of this history, we come back to the text, "'Our Redeemer" from everlasting is Thy Name!'

The word plainly contains a prediction of the Incarnation. For to Hebrew thought there was no such thing known as that a redeemer should be other than a kinsman. They also teach the voluntariness, and thus the grace of the great salvation. For while the avenging of blood was a command laid on the next of kin, it was not so with the redemption of persons or possessions. The word is not 'he shall,' but 'he may'.

Further, the text shows what is included in Christ's work as Redeemer.

We are reminded, then, that Christ's work as Redeemer involves first of all the redemption of our persons. That the sinner is, by reason of his sin, fallen into bondage is one of the most familiar thoughts of Scripture. The Scripture represents this bondage as fourfold. There is a bondage to the law. There is also a bondage to sin, in which we have been bound. We are in bondage to the power of sin, and from this Christ came to set us free. We have also been redeemed by Christ from the bondage to death in which we were aforetime. But there is also a bondage to Satan, and from this bondage also Christ's work as our Kin-man-Redeemer has freed us.

III. He was also to redeem his brother's inheritance, and reinstate him in it.

This word Redeemer, illumined by that old Mosaic law, manifestly bears in its bosom the promise of resurrection from the dead. For the Levitical goel did not buy back the lost estate of his impoverished brother that he might himself enter into it and enjoy it. No: he bought it back for that poor brother. So it follows from this text that those whom Jehovah Jesus redeems must be reinstated in the inheritance from which they have been cast out.

IV. The redeemer was, in virtue of his office, the avenger of blood. Christ, then, not although Redeemer, but because He is Redeemer, must be the Avenger of blood. It is, therefore, just because Christ is Redeemer that He will yet destroy—as it is written that He shall destroy—him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil, and cast him into the lake of fire.—S. H. KELLOGG, The Past a Prophecy of the Future, p. 116.

OPTIMISM

'Doubtless Thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not. Thou, O Lord! art our Father, our Redeemer from everlasting is Thy name.'—ISAIAH LXIII. 16 (R.V.).

THIS grand challenge of Isaiah represents the final appeal of the spirit of man—baffled, confounded, heartbroken with the 'riddle of this painful earth'. It is the standpoint of the optimist, who, in spite of the difficulties and horrors and failures in a world wet with tears, persists in enthroning a good God behind all phenomena, an infinite and responsible Love Spirit behind all visible things, and challenging Him in the words: 'Doubtless Thou art our Father, though the pessimist be ignorant of us, and the facts of life seem against us'.

I. Practically, there are only three possible conceptions of God's relation to that which we, in our limited comprehension, call evil. The first is that evil exists independently of God's will; that He was, as it were, taken by surprise and His will thwarted. To believe this, however you may deck your thought in Christian phrases, is to be a dualist. If God, and God alone, has not existed from all eternity, He does not exist at all. The reflections of the really thoughtful will not entertain the conception for a moment.

Secondly, that moral evil and its consequences are self-engendered. That God is one, and irresistibly omnipotent, and therefore could have prevented evil if He would, but did not. This is worse than Atheism, inasmuch as it is Bad-Godism, and that, practically, is devil worship. It predicates that God is the sole supreme power, and yet not good; that man at his best is better, far better, than God. And so this conception, though it may be enshrined in tradition, is a reductio ad absurdum. There remains the third conception. That God is the Infinite, Eternal, Universal Spirit; the one self-existing substance expressing Himself in all visible things; perfectly conscious everywhere; with an individuality higher than what we mean by personality. That whatever is, is not in spite of, but because of, a 'determinate counsel and fore-knowledge'.

II. Now, consider, is not this the conclusion to which St. Paul had arrived?

1. He lays emphasis on the magnitude and universality of the mystery of evil. 'The whole creation,' he says, 'groaneth and travaileth together in pain'. There is no minimizing or ignoring of facts.

2. He absolutely fearlessly attributes it to its one only possible elemental source. 'The creation,' he says, 'was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of Him who subjected it.' That is the supreme ruler, God.

3. He positively and dogmatically affirms that evil is only temporary; only a passing incident of the present; only a means to an end. 'The creation,' he says, 'shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption'.

He deliberately estimates the sum total of the agony as establishing a direct claim upon the justice of the Creator for abundant compensation, who, he declares, will liquidate the debt, with accumulated interest, when the purpose of the infliction is fulfilled. He does not explain, but he declares that the future shall redeem the present. 'I reckon,' he says, 'that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared to the glory that shall be revealed.'

III. There is, however, one profounder thought than this. St. Paul has taught us that one Life is immanent in the universe, and that this one Life realizes itself specially in man. He said, at Athens, 'in Him we live, and move, and have our being'. Therefore, in us He lives, and moves, and has His being. This is not Pantheism. St. Paul does not teach that God has no being apart from the universe. He never says or implies that the universe is God. He does imply that all visible things are an expression of God, a clothing of God, a mode of God's thinking; and that humanity is the highest expression, the highest mode of God's thinking; and that Jesus is the climax, the epitome of this expression, this mode of God's thinking. Thus he teaches the inseparability of God and man. Now the conclusion from this underlying principle is almost confusing in its grandeur. If God is not external to His universe, but the central evolving life in all, then there is not a pang in this suffering universe that does not pierce the heart of God before it reaches man, and God is suffering in and with His world. The Divine self-sacrifice is creation, not Calvary alone.—BASIL WILBERFORCE, Feeling After Him, p. 159.

REFERENCES.—LXIII. 16.—B. Wilberforce, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xvi. 1894, p. 321. D. Macrae, ibid. vol. lii. 1897, p. 363. Lyman Abbott, ibid. vol. liv. 1898, p. 68. C. Stanford, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 240. LXIV. —Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2258; vol. xl. No. 2391. LXIV. 1.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in a Religious House, vol. i. p. 139.

ISAIAH LXIV. I.

'A PHANTASMAGORIA of men and events floats before the historian,' says Mr. J. H. Shorthouse; 'men seem in history to have walked in a vain show; the more he inquires into men and creeds, the more he is perplexed—he finds none which he can say is absolutely right, no one fully wrong; the course of Nature maintains its impartial calm, shutting out the sight of God from him, and his constant prayer is that ejaculation of Isaiah, "O that thou wouldst rend the heavens and come down!"'

REFERENCES.—LXIV. 1, 2.—F. D. Maurice, Lincoln's Inn Sermons, vol. vi. p. 164; see also Sermons, p. 193. LXIV. 3.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvi. No. 1538. J. Keble, Sermons for Sundays After Trinity, part i. p. 212. LXIV. 4.—A. Murray, Waiting on God, p. 110. LXIV. 5.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. i. p. 95. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX.-LXVI. p. 231. LXIV. 6.—S. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. ix. 1901, p. 283. J. Parker, City Temple Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 261. T. De Witt Talmage, Sermons, p. 70. R. Collyer, Where the Light Dwelleth, p. 299. J. E. Vernon, Plain Preaching for Poor People (6th Series), p. 85. C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiv. 1908, p. 230.

FADING LEAVES

(An Autumn Sermon)

'We all do fade as a leaf.'—ISAIAH LXIV. 6.

THE literal reference of these words is to a spiritual rather than to a physical condition. The sap—the inner life—of the Jewish people had failed, for they had separated themselves from God, who was their life (Deut. xxx. 20). 'And the destruction of the transgressors and of the sinners shall be together, and they that forsake the Lord shall be consumed; for ye shall be as an oak whose leaf fadeth, and as a garden that hath no water' (Is. i. 28, 30).

The object-lesson before us is not simply a leaf, but a fading leaf. 'We all do fade as a leaf,' and fading leaves suggest four special lessons:—

I. They are emblems of man's mortality. Scripture abounds with images descriptive of the shortness and uncertainty of human life, but none is more striking than the emblem of a leaf. How weak, how frail it is! By what a slender bond does it retain its place! How slight is its tenure! Even if it last a whole season and live its appointed time, it does not retain its verdure and vigour; the sap of life begins to fail; the tints which give it such a beauty are the symbols of weakness and decay. The leaf fades sooner than it falls. To change the figure, the 'flower' withers before the 'grass' upon which it grows. Man's physical and mental 'glory' begins to decline often long before the man himself departs.

Death comes with noiseless steps. He is not heard; he is not seen; he is not perhaps suspected. He enters our chamber—the chamber of the poorest; for this king knows no distinction. His majesty is so great that he can afford to dispense with the adventitious adjuncts of pomp and circumstance. His cold shadow falls upon us, and his dark form stands between us and the light of the living world. Let us look the fact in the face; let us not put it from us. And as we contemplate it in the light of Him who died upon the cross and who burst the bars of death in His garden sepulchre, the aspect of the fact will change, and we shall not fear to die. As regards the soul, like the angel who visited Peter's prison, death is but the Lord's messenger to break off its fetters and lead it from the prison-house to the open streets of the celestial city. And as regards the body, 'the grave will be like the bath of Esther, in which she lay for a time to purify herself with spices that she might be fit for her Lord'.

II. When the leaf fades it exhibits its greatest beauty, and is in this an emblem of the end of a Christian life. Before the leaf falls it breaks forth into its richest hues.

'And have you never known,' says Mr. Vaughan of Brighton, 'known better than you like to confess, by the exquisite advancing loveliness of his moral features, as by a surer symptom than any physical indication, that one whom you loved so well was going to his end? Have you not seen those mellowed glows of tempered intellect and joy and Christ-like sweetness, which showed by how slight a tenure the life was held, and how soon the scene would change, and all that made earth so pleasant was all going from your sight? "We all do fade as a leaf;" but let us "fade" as the leaves do, and let our last be our best; and the truth of God be reflected and Himself made glorious in the sanctity of our later years, in the peace, and love, and grace of our dying!'

III. The fading of a leaf is a proof that its work is accomplished and that its mission is fulfilled. The leaves of trees are made subservient by an all-wise Creator to most important ends. One of their chiefest functions is to keep up the purity of the atmosphere. As Christ said of His disciples, 'Ye are the salt of the earth,' we might say of them, 'Ye are the leaves of the world'; your office is to stay the moral pollution which surrounds you and to breathe a healthy and life-giving influence. To have done this is not to have lived in vain. Who shall account how much we in this twentieth century are indebted to those who have passed away before us like the leaves of a hundred generations? Each leaf in its turn withered and went back to its kindred earth, but left behind it the elements of a continuous life. Have the deaths of patriarchs and prophets, of evangelists and apostles, of ministers and missionaries, of district visitors and Sunday School teachers, of godly parents and children, of brothers and sisters in Christ, of relatives and friends, been in vain? The teachings of their holy experience, their words, their writings, their letters, their living examples, their dying testimonies, all live on. They cheer, they instruct, they quicken us. These fallen leaves have entered into the experience of the living Church to-day. They are part of our heritage, they enrich and strengthen our spiritual life. Thus also may we of this generation live, and then fade and fall. The tree of the Church will never die; it is the Tree of Life in the midst of the Paradise of God, and therefore the history of each leaf will live in it and abide for ever and ever.

IV. The fading leaves of autumn tell us that death is the necessary precursor of life. Every leaf that falls carries with it not only the memorial of death, but of resurrection-life.—J. W. BARDSLEY, Many Mansions, p. 215.

REFERENCES.—LXIV. 6-8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. viii. No. 437. LXIV. 7.—Ibid. vol. xxiii. No. 1377. LXIV. 11.—J. Marshall Lang, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxii. 1902, p. 149. LXIV. 11, 12.—T. Spurgeon, ibid. vol. liii. 1898, p. 257. LXV. 1.—F. E. Paget, Sermons for the Saints' Days, p. 19. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxii. No. 1919. LXV. 5.—Ibid. vol. xxv. No. 1497. P. McAdam Muir, Modern Substitutions in Christianity, p. 33.

THE CHURCH A BLESSING IN THE WORLD

'Thus saith the Lord, As the new wine is found in the cluster, and one saith, Destroy it not; for a blessing is in it: so will I do for my servants' sakes, that I may not destroy them all.'—ISAIAH LXV. 8.

As a rule, the pious and good are of little value in the eyes of the world, and are despised often as foolish and 'narrow' men. The 'religious public' is spoken of contemptuously and scornfully. But God's judgment is a different one. It is the judgment that Abraham recognized when he pleaded for Sodom and Gomorrah for the sake of even (at length) ten righteous persons. It is the judgment of the text. The vinedresser is about to hew down the unfruitful tree, but spies a rich cluster in one part, and it is spared, and so orders are given that it shall be spared. Thus is the world itself indebted for its preservation to the 'cluster' of the righteous. The Church is the 'blessing' in the world. 'Ye are the salt of the earth.' The text teaches us:—

I. Why God's Judgment on the World is Restrained.—1. Because He is a righteous God, Who will not destroy the guiltless with the guilty (Gen. xviii. 25). Rather will He remove the righteous from the world or save them from the danger (as Noah, Lot, Isaiah from the Babylonian exile, etc.).

2. Because He is a merciful God, Who must hear the prayers and petitions of His children and let Himself be entreated (Ezek. xxii. 30). As a rule, we think too little of the power of prayer. If we only knew what a power it possesses and how it avails with God, we should knock at the door of heaven until heaven itself resounded (Ps. l. 14, 15; St. Matt. vii. 7, 18, 19, 20; Abraham, Jacob, David, Elias).

3. Because He is a wise God, Who has certain great purposes to fulfil, and proceeds with calm leisure to carry them out in His own way. He desires that none should perish, and He sets before the evil the example of the pious for their salvation. How many a trifling mind has been made serious by a single casually spoken word of the good? How many a home has been blessed because a pious Joseph is in it? How many a house prospered like the house of Obed-edom because of the ark of God? How many cities and lands are spared because of a 'cluster' of the good and holy in it? The land of Israel is not utterly corrupt, destroyed, and degenerate while there are the seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal—life in the very midst of putrefaction. The influence of pious men will be seen in eternity, if it is lightly esteemed here. There are great names in the world, artists, poets, sculptors, statesmen, princes, who have done great things, broken up new paths, provided bread for thousands; but what are these to 'the blessing' which Moses gave mankind in his law, David by his Psalms, St. Paul by his letters, Thomas à Kempis by his 'De Imitatione Christi,' Bunyan by his 'Pilgrim's Progress,' Charles Wesley by his 'Hymnology'? Truly a blessing is in it, this poor degenerate humanity. The text equally teaches us:—

II. Why God's Judgment on Individual Sinners is Restrained.—'Wherefore do the wicked live?' As long as there is a spark of good left, He will not quench it in anger, if it be even natural goodness, uprightness, like that of Nathanael, 'in whom there was no guile'; benevolence, as in Cornelius, 'thine alms are come up as a memorial before God'. He recognizes it, does not overlook it, fans it to a flame. And so the great Daysman, the Vinedresser, says, 'Spare it; there is a blessing in it'. The man is not all degenerate, his heart not all rottenness.

1. What an infinite mercy! We should long ago have given up the fickle, unfaithful man, but not so the mercy of our great God.

2. What a comfort! If we can only discern a spark in the ashes of our sinful hearts, a fire may yet be enkindled. Deal not rashly with yourself. Do not despair. There is a blessing in it.

3. What a warning! Not to judge harshly of our fellow-men, nor to condemn them as long as our Lord will hear them, and says, 'There is a blessing in it'. This may also teach us charity towards those who have for various reasons split up the Catholic Church of God into sects, parties, and denominations. So long as the fundamental truths are not cast aside, it is not all bad, though greatly to be deplored. There is a 'blessing in it,' some good in each.

REFERENCES.—LXV. 8.—J. C. Miller, Disestablishment, p. 5. H. Hensley Henson, Christ and the Nation, p. 17.

LXV. 10.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah XLIX-LXVI. p. 237. LXV. 17-19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxvii. No. 2211.

ON KEEPING YOUNG AND GETTING OLD (Sunday School Anniversary)

*There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner, being an hundred years old, shall be accursed.—ISAIAH LXV. 20.

I. You cannot quite see how a child can die a hundred years old. No, but it is possible for a man with a great weight of years to live and die just as hopefully and happily as a child lives. It is possible to have a very old body and a very young heart; and it is just as possible to be only thirty or forty years old, and yet to be as weary, and sad, and heavy-hearted, and gloomy-hearted, as if you were tottering down to the grave with a hundred winters on your shoulders.

II. A real Christian calls himself a child of God. It is no empty figure of speech. He is a child of God, and feels it. He is ever learning like a child, and he is as trustful as a child, and as restful; and he looks forward to a bigger life, and dreams beautiful dreams and his heart sometimes dances for joy, though his feet have not much spring and movement left in them. I tell you it is not the calendar and the birthday book that determine your age. It is the soul within, and the eyes you look out with, and the mind that thinks, and the heart that feels. It is health that makes young blood, not mere health of body, but health of spirit, health of temper, health of affection. A bad life, as this Prophet says, comes to bear the weight and weariness of a hundred years upon it.

III. There are three things in a child which makes child-life happy and beautiful—faith, hope, and love. Faith in God, mother, friends, and all men. Hope of to-morrow, hope for the years which are coming, hope of the better things which lie beyond; and love: the joy of loving, and the joy of being loved. There you have all the best things in a child's life. And these three things are in the life of every good man and woman. Certainly they are in the life of every Christian. They never leave him however long he lives. They are with him through all life's rough scenes. They are with him on his dying bed. Now abideth these three—faith, hope, and charity.—J. G. GREENHOUGH, Christian Festivals and Anniversaries, p. 150.

REFERENCES.—LXV. 22.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. i. p. 275. F. E. Paget, Helps and Hindrances to the Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 185. LXV. 24.—“Plain Sermons” by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. x. p. 208. LXVI. 1, 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xviii. No. 1083. W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches, p. 57. A. J. Parry, Phases of Christian Truth, p. 74. LXVI. 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxv. No. 2071. LXVI. 8.—R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxi. 1906, p. 328. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 1009. LXVI. 10.—Ibid. vol. xxxv. No. 2085. LXVI. 11.—J. M. Neale, Readings for the Aged (3rd Series), p. 45. LXVI. 13.—P. M. Strayer, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lx. 1901, p. 39. S. Martin, Comfort in Trouble, p. 1. J. T. Stannard, The Divine Humanity, p. 1. LXVI. 13.—

T. Gasquoine, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 157. LXVI. 21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 992. J. Keble, Sermons for Advent to Christmas Eve, p. 332.

THE PRAYERS OF THE SAINTS

‘It shall come to pass, that before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear.’—ISAIAH LXV. 24.

ALL through the great ages of the Christian Church the people of God have been a people of prayer. They have had their faults, they have had their grievous inconsistencies, but, throughout, they have clung to the Throne of Grace, and, with all the differences which divide good and Christian people of the Church of God to-day, the true men of Christ are men of prayer. The first evidence that a man shows in his life that there is a work of grace in his heart is his desire to pray. When St. Paul's heart was opened, St. Paul's lips were opened too, and somebody said at once, ‘Behold, he prayeth’.

I. The measure of our real religion is the measure of our prayer-life, and no less the measure of our love to Christ is the frequency, the earnestness, the heartiness with which we come to God in prayer, because, depend upon it, what we really are before God is what we are when nobody is with us but Himself. Is it not a very lamentable thing to know how often there is a spirit of great earnestness in the public gathering, and yet that we go home to sometimes a very slight and slender approach to God in secret prayer? We catch the spirit of the day, and the spirit of the place, and the spirit of the people, and we seem to be in earnest, and we are; but how often we go home to a comparatively neglected Mercy-seat, and to an unknown God! Gauge your religious life by the earnestness and the heartiness and the warmth of your secret addresses to God.

II. The praying Christian is, above all, the Christian that grows and the Christian that thrives. It is so in the material life. The material life is built up not half so much, we should say, by the food which we eat, as by the atmosphere that we breathe. The conditions of health are not only good food and pure water, but they are sweet air as well. And the soul that lives, and moves, and speaks, and thinks, and acts with a very distinct and definite sense of the Divine nearness is a thriving one and a growing one. There is feebleness and sickness in the souls and the spiritual lives of those who are neglecting the secret Throne, but the breezes of heaven are blowing on those who are, again and again, kneeling at its Court.

III. Then the third thing is this. A praying Christian is the Christian who gets the most from God. The praying Christian is the Christian who gets everything from God. How is it that this is so? Because he goes where everything is; that is the reason, and no other. He goes to the Throne of Grace, where is the residue of grace. He goes to the very seat over which Jesus Christ not lingers but permanently sits, and Jesus Christ shows to those who come to Him in secret prayer what, otherwise, the world cannot see. The greatest trophies of the Christian soul that have ever been taken have been taken on the field of prayer. I believe with all my heart, that whether a prayer is answered, or whether it is unanswered, it is impossible for a Christian to syllable one single prayer without that prayer bringing in some way a blessing to his own soul. Some of our prayers seem to go a very long voyage, but they are not lost at sea, and it may happen that the prayer that is latest in port may, after all, be richest in blessing.

Let me offer three or four suggestions in reference to secret prayer.

1. First of all in prayer be careful that you have a cleansed conscience.

2. And, secondly, let there be a felt need. You cannot express a thing till you feel a need. We kneel down to pray, sometimes because it is the time to pray, or the place to pray, or the hour of prayer, not because we have a real urgent need that makes us importunate before God, and we feel we must speak to Him. Get a sense of need, and if you have not one, tell the Master so, and He will give it you, and you will find that the sense of need is a means of grace.

3. And then, thirdly, disentangle yourselves, if you can—it is difficult to do so sometimes—disentangle yourselves from the things that hinder you. The Apostle speaks of 'hindered prayers'. He says: 'That your prayers be not hindered'. They are hindered, perhaps, by their wretched coldness, perhaps by their want of faith, perhaps by their want of believing reverence to Jesus. Sometimes we hinder our own prayers by not being conformed to the Will of God because, if we are not willing to do the Will of God, how is it to be expected that He will trouble to do our will?

4. And then remember, fourthly, that prayer is not only an act, but a state and a spirit. God, I daresay, loves the act of prayer, but He likes the spirit of prayer better, because an isolated act of prayer on your own part or on mine may be absolutely unworthy.

5. And, lastly, remember that in the midst of all your weakness and infirmities, you have the power of God's Spirit to help you, if you will only ask for it. It is difficult to pray without the Spirit; it is drudgery. If we come pleading the merit, the mediation, and the righteousness of Jesus Christ, and trusting to the Spirit to help our infirmity, then depend upon it, again and again, in your believing experience, you shall know the truth of these glorious words and promise of the text: 'It shall come to pass, that before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear'.

6. Learn to be definite. Generalities are the death of prayer, and they will kill the spirit of it. Learn to be thankful, because the way to get new blessings is to be thankful for old ones. Learn to trust, because God is worthy of our confidence. Learn to persevere, because God has plenty of time, and what He does not give to-day He may give to-morrow. And learn to wait, because oftentimes the richest fruit is that which comes latest in the autumn. To such souls He graciously says, as He did to the humble suppliant who came to Him of old, 'Be it unto thee even as thou wilt'.

'It shall come to pass, that before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear. The wolf and the lamb shall feed together. . . . They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain, saith the Lord.'—ISAIAH LXV. 24, 25.

THIS text was quoted by Henry Venn in the last report he drew up for the Church Missionary Society. He pointed out that 'one of the richest promises of answer to prayer is given in immediate connexion with the full establishment of Christ's kingdom'.

THE GENESIS OF DELUSIONS

'I also will choose their delusions.'—ISAIAH LXVI. 4.

THEY will think it is the devil, but I am behind it all; they will ascribe it to some peculiar condition of the brain, and they will endeavour to trace that condition to indigestion, to the wrong food, to a mistake in choices and fancies; they will never suspect that I am in it. We are not worshippers of a limited Sovereign; the universe is not split up into sections, God presiding over, it may be, the larger section, and the devil presiding over the remaining fraction. Yet it would seem as if this was the religion of some people; what wonder if they are disturbed and perturbed and dealt with vexatiously, the whole process ending in confusion twice confounded? They do not know the central reality of things; they have no faith; they have a kind of meagre and struggling sentiment, but a deep, living, eternal faith they have not; and they cannot have until they get back to the centre and metaphysic of things.

The Apostle uses the word which we have correctly translated delusion: 'For this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie' (2 Thess. ii. 11). The Apostle Paul was not so dainty and whimsically sensitive as we are; his God ruled the heavens and the earth, little time and great eternity. And he said that the object of this delusion was that 'They all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness'. We should carefully consider the exact terms used by the indignant and ever-majestic Apostle. God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe not a lie, as it is written in this English, but that they should believe the lie—the lie of the day, the popular lie.

1. When does God choose for us our delusions, intellectual devices, and mean and false-tending imaginings and nightmares? Often when we have sinned away our privileges. We have attended church so long as to have become quite familiar with it, with a familiarity of that kind which breeds, if not contempt, at least indifference. A man may have sat through a ministry thirty years long, and have remained a hard heart at the last. A man may boast that he sat under the brilliant ministry of one teacher, and the instructive teaching of another expositor, and under the comforting ministry of one tender-hearted as Barnabas; and yet when we come to ask him concerning the result of it all, we may find him under the spell of a delusion which keeps him out of the Church and makes him an alien and a stranger who ought to have been like a child at home. It is a dangerous thing to have too many spiritual privileges; such an abundance of opportunity of understanding somewhat of the kingdom of God may tell against us in the judgment.

II. When we have trusted our own imaginations God may have turned imagination itself, our finest faculty, into a delusion. When the imagination carries us too far God simply breathes upon us, and it becomes a delusion; He takes the poetry out of it, He robs day of the morning light, and that which might under some circumstances have been to us as wings, great strong pinions that flap themselves in the upper airs, yea, even at the gate of heaven, may be turned into a poor cripple, a mean dreamer, a man who is the victim of his own misguided impression. God often chooses our oracles for us or our delusions for us when we seek for guidance at forbidden oracles.

III. God always sends us delusions when we undertake the management of our own lives. A man thinks that he will undertake everything on his own account and do it in his own strength, not knowing that he has no account and that he has no strength but such as may be given to him by a condescending and loving God.

Then what are we to do? We are to go back to God, we are to live and move and have our being in God, we are to have a sanctuary in the rock, we are to possess the key of a chamber in high places into which we can retire prayerfully, lovingly, and penitentially, there to learn what God would have us do on this particular day and at that particular hour. Then we shall have no delusion.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. III. p. 69.

JEREMIAH

JEREMIAH

REFERENCES.—I.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2684. I. 4.—Ibid. vol. liii. No. 3049. I. 4-10.—A. B. Davidson, The Called of God, p. 209. A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 3. I. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. liii. No. 3035. C. J. Vaughan, Sermons Preached in Christ Church, Brighton (7th Series), p. 169; see also Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 243. II. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 168.

PREDESTINED

'Before I formed thee in the womb, I knew thee.'—

JEREMIAH I. 5.

It is a great thing for a man to believe that he is where God means him to be; but it is a greater thing for him to believe that, in order to put him where he is, God has been shaping all his past, and that He was even thinking of him and planning for him before he was born. Such was the feeling with which Jeremiah entered upon his great career, and it is this that explains his life-long fidelity to his mission, continually assailed as he was by warnings without and fears within. It was not only the sense that God was with him, but that, even before his birth, he had been in the mind of God.

I. We must remember that such a vision comes only to the man who is worthy of it, and, in a measure, prepared for it. Jeremiah, like Isaiah at his call, was a young man—he cannot have been over twenty-five, if as much; but so thoughtful and tender-hearted a man must have often brooded over the sins and the follies of his people. To such a people somebody must speak for God; and there gathers within him half unconsciously the feeling that his is the voice that must be lifted up—that he is the man; till, in one sublime moment, the whole wonderful meaning of his career—his birth, his youth, his special and peculiar experiences—is flashed upon him. He sees that God had been thinking of him, caring for him, preparing for him, before he was born. Clearly, if the past and present have any meaning at all, he is God's marked man. No human life is hidden from God.

II. It is often the greatest who hesitate. To shrink is at least to show that we have measured the magnitude of the task and the slenderness of our own resources. But the man who has heard the voice must obey it, unless he is prepared to see his future filled with desolation and remorse. There is a humility which is perhaps even more disastrous than pride. The proud man injures himself; the man who, in mistaken humility, makes the great refusal, injures the world by depriving it of the service he is fitted to render. Think for a moment of the incomparable loss to the world had Jeremiah finally yielded to the voice that spoke within him. His sense of weakness was, after all, a high qualification; it gave him sympathy with men, and it threw him back upon God. In some important directions Jeremiah's contribution to the religion of Israel is profounder than that of any other Hebrew, and there is no Old Testament character who is such a marvellous prototype of Jesus. And all this would have been lost to the world had he listened to the voice that pled so plausibly for keeping aloof from the public life of his time.

III. The whole career of Jeremiah is a proof that this Divine promise had been kept. In his own strength he could never have faced the fearful odds that were arrayed against him. Look at him as he calmly stands before a howling mob that demands his execution. At such a moment he is, indeed, in his own words, firm as a brazen wall against the whole land—kings and priests and people. Why is he, the timid and the tender Prophet, so calm amid these cruel shouts? Is it not because his God is with him, as He promised to be? With Jeremiah, as with Paul, power was made perfect in weakness. Each of these great men had to contend with serious natural disadvantages: their intrepid careers are proof abundant that the power which they displayed was not their own, but that their work was done in the strength of Him whom they served. Of themselves they were weak; but the grace of Another was sufficient for them, and the power of Another rested upon them.—J. E. McFADYEN, The City With Foundations, p. 117.

JEREMIAH I. 6.

LIFTING my eyes in the sunshine of yesterday to the flowering orchards above me, the 'summers snow' that stretches away southwards to the hills, and the very avalon of apple-trees that makes an 'awful rose of dawn' towards the east—an impulse seized me to tempt you with a description of their beauty. But I threw down my pen, guiltless of a line or a word, helpless before this unapproachable world, and able only to cry out, with the prophet, in my heart—'ah, Lord God, behold I cannot speak; for I am a child'. —SYDNEY DOBELL to Charlotte Brontë.

REFERENCES.—I. 6, 7.—J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, vol. ii. p. 275. I. 6-9.—J. B. Lightfoot, Ordination Addresses, p. 3. I. 8.—"Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. v. p. 248. I. 10.—P. M'Adam Muir, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxvii. 1905, p. 330. I. 11, 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2678.

I. 30.—J. Parker, Studies in Texts, vol. i. p. 172. II. 1-19.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. li. No. 2926. II. 2.—Ibid. vol. xli. No. 2399; vol. li. No. 2920. Hugh Black, Christ's Service of Love, p. 316. II. 9.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 245. II. 11.—Ibid. p. 246. II. 13.—Ibid. p. 249. W. M. Punshon, Broken Cisterns, a Sermon, p. 601. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 322. II. 18.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 350. II. 19, 20.—Jesse Brett, The Soul's Escape, p. 42. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 252. II. 20-37.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. li. No. 2931. II. 26.—Hugh Black, University Sermons, p. 153. II. 32.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1634.

TRIMMING

'Why trimmest thou thy way to seek love?'—JEREMIAH II. 33.

WHAT is trimming? It is the holding of a middle course or position between parties, so as to appear to favour each. The Jews trimmed between God and the idols. And the just God who loathes all that is not straight and upright shakes their equivocal souls with this stormy interrogatory, 'Why trimmest thou thy way to seek love?'

I. Expressions of Trimming.—We often find trimming expresses itself in speech. Quite as often it shows itself in conduct. Policy is the regulating principle of some men's action. They act with a view to universal conciliation. They would establish themselves upon the basis, always most insecure, of general approval. Silence is quite commonly the result of trimming. The trimmer knows well the value of taciturnity: but he prostitutes it into a vice.

Every sphere of life unhappily has those who trim their way to seek love. The religious trimmer is worst of all.

II. The Motive of Trimming.—The motive which actuates a trimmer is here succinctly and accurately described. It is 'to seek love'—to win favour, to gain commendation, to stand well with everybody.

III. The Folly of Trimming.—This system cannot permanently attain the end it seeks. No 'love' worth having can be thus won. A trimmer is soon discovered, and his judgment does not linger. Contempt becomes his portion.

Moreover trimming destroys our individual testimony. It makes us echoes of other voices, but prevents us being voices ourselves. We bear no personal witness if we thus trim our way.

This mean habit also hinders the prevalence of truth.

And what an evil influence the trimmer has upon others! Hear how God impeaches him in the words which ensue upon my text; 'therefore hast thou also taught the wicked ones thy ways'. Trimming is infectious: all evil is.

When we understand that the trimmer will be condemned at the judgment-seat of God, we are indeed convinced of the folly he works. Truth alone will stand the scrutiny of the 'Bar severe'.

IV. The Cure of Trimming.—As the previous verse (v. 32) shows, it is forgetting God which leads to this trimming of our way. If we walk before Him we can never grieve Him by such folly.

Would we avoid this paltry habit we must seek depth of conviction.

To recall the examples of the heroic saints who scorned to trim their way is another means of health and cure in this regard.

The example of our Lord is the grand deterrent from this evil. He died upon the cross because He would not by trimming His way seek love. When we are tempted to be trimmers let us remember our Saviour's bright example and pursue it. —DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Travels of the Heart, p. 237.

REFERENCES.—II. 36.—W. G. Rutherford, The Key of Knowledge, p. 30. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. lii. No. 3007. III. 1-23.—Ibid. vol. xlii. No. 2452.

THE HEAVENLY GUIDE

(Sermon to the Young)

'Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me, My Father, Thou art the Guide of my youth?'—JEREMIAH III. 4.

WE are all travellers, but are not all travelling in the same direction. We need a guide. There is no difficulty in finding one. There is only one to be relied upon.

I. Some of the Reasons Why we Need a Guide.

1. Our ignorance of the way.
2. Our liability to take the wrong path.
3. Our liability to leave the right path after we have chosen it.

II. Some of the Reasons Why we Should Take God as Our Guide.

1. Because He knows the way.
2. Because He knows the trials that will befall us.
3. Because He knows the perils that we shall encounter.
4. Because He is our Father, and therefore kind and considerate.

III. Some of the Reasons Why we Should Ask God to Guide us now.

1. Because the present time is the best.
2. Because the present time is the safest.
3. Because the present may be the only time.

—F. J. AUSTIN, Seeds and Saplings, p. 27.

THE LIMITATION OF EVIL

'Behold, thou hast spoken and done evil things as thou couldst.'—JEREMIAH III. 5.

I. WE indicate some of the restraining influences of life.

1. There is the restraint imposed by revelation. That Israel did not fall into the flagrant wickedness of the surrounding nations was not the consequence of their innate strength or goodness—the Lord their God restrained them. The voices of Sinai ringing in their ears warned and strengthened them against the destructive errors of paganism. Are we not to-day restrained by the same gracious influence?

2. There is the restraint imposed by grace. The direct Divine action on our mind, will, conscience, feeling. This was the master-restraint of the antediluvian world. So has the self-same Spirit striven in all hearts, and in all generations.

3. There is the restraint imposed by society. There is the restraint of civil law. There is the restraint of public opinion. There is the restraint of our business. There are the restraints of domesticity.

II. 'Notwithstanding the restraints of life, we discover the wickedness of our nature by going as far as possible in the direction of transgression.' Men have power to fling themselves over a precipice, but for obvious reasons they usually stop short of these desperate deeds. So Israel hitherto had abstained from the extreme acts of transgression which would have involved immediate retribution, but they showed their disposition by playing with the fire, by trifling on the edge of the abyss. The lively manner in which we have used our rarer opportunities to sin shows that increased leisure and facility would only have exaggerated our misdoing.

III. It is sufficiently clear that 'many would at once proceed to greater lengths of wickedness if the restrictive influences of life were withdrawn'.

1. Note the extent to which men 'resist these saving influences'. Opportunity no longer permits us to stone the prophets, or to crucify the Son of man, but we reveal the same hatred of truth and righteousness by doing despite to the Spirit of grace.

2. And the second sign of 'the irregularity and inordinateness of our desire is found in the popularity of certain imaginative literature'. The lark singing from its little cage in Seven Dials is a pathetic attempt on the part of the city poor to restore in some measure the rural delights they may no longer share; and just as certainly do we seek in our literature to compensate ourselves for liberties and pleasures denied or curtailed by civilization.

We conclude with a few practical reflections:—

1. Let us recognize 'the glory of God's preventing grace'. The Dutch call the chain of dykes which protects their fields and their firesides from the wild sea 'the golden border'. God's grace directly affecting our heart, or expressed in the constitution of society and the circumstances of life, is a golden border shutting out a raging, threatening sea of evil.

2. Let us confess 'the folly of our self-righteousness'. The consciousness of a self-righteousness often stands in the way of men attaining the righteousness which is of God, but the foregoing reflections show how little our self-righteousness may be worth.

3. We see 'the necessity and urgency of the grace which converts and perfects'. It is by no means wholly satisfactory that we are kept by restraining grace; we must go on to seek the grace which renews.—W. L. WATKINSON, The Transfigured Sackcloth, p. 47.

REFERENCES.—III. 12, 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxi. No. 1833. III. 12, 14, 22.—Ibid. vol. li. No. 2931. III. 13.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 41.

III. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiii. No. 762. III. 16.—Ibid. vol. xxvii. No. 1621.

THE TENDERNESS OF GOD

'But I said, How shall I put thee among the children, and give thee a pleasant land, a goodly heritage of the hosts of nations? and I said, Thou shalt call Me, My Father; and shalt not turn away from Me.'—JEREMIAH III. 19.

THE thought of the verse refers not so much to the saying as to the thinking and reflection which go before the speaking. 'I thought how I would put you among the children.' The text comes to us through Jeremiah, to whom we owe so much of true, tender, and adequate teaching about God. He brings men into the secret of the Divine presence, and enables them to hear the consultation of God with Himself.

I. The problem is how to put among the children one who is not a child. The person who is not a child would be miserable and far from home among the children of God. The Bible reveals to us the way which God took to solve the problem. It is the story of the making of man, and it is the story of the Divine patience and hopefulness for man that man will yet be placed among the children. Follow the line of Divine action down through the centuries, follow it on to the greatest manifestation of Divine love in the gift of the only begotten Son, and you have the practical illustration of the answer to the question of our text. All these great doings are a revelation of the Divine thought of how to put men among the children.

The Divine thinking issued in Divine action, and the action is just the story of redemption. The Divine action is also the Divine appeal to man. Answer it by the attempt to see that your place is among the children, and you can never find rest till you take your place.

II. Follow for a little the thought of God as to the way by which a man is to be put among the children. 'I thought thou wouldst call me, My Father; and wouldst not turn away from Me.'

It is the return to the Father of children made in the image of God; it is the restoration of the power of speaking to the Father; it is the placing of a son in his right place in the family of God. With this return there is the new quality of real thought, of spiritual worth, of Divine fellowship.

To say 'My Father' is not merely to say the words, or to take them on our lips; it means experience with God, speaking to Him, hearing Him speak, being filled with the Spirit of God, and being entered into the secret of God's purpose.

III. 'I thought thou wouldst not turn away from Me.' It is enough to break the heart of any one who believes what is here said. This word of the Prophet, this picture of the living God stretching forth hands of tenderness and love to men, saying to them, 'Thou wilt not turn away from Me,' is a real and true portrait of God. It is the truest revelation of Him that man can ever know. Think of Him, finally, as Jesus Christ His Son has revealed Him to us, who through the Son may become children.—J. IVERACH, The Other Side of Greatness, p. 68.

REFERENCES.—III. 19.—J. T. Forbes, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxiii. 1903, p. 257. R. J. Drummond, Faith's Certainties, p. 149. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2742. III. 21, 22.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 254. III. 22, 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2452.

PLURAL, YET SINGULAR

'Truth . . . judgment . . . righteousness.'—JEREMIAH IV. 2.

I WANT to speak about the plural that runs itself up into the singular. 'Truth, judgment, righteousness.' We cannot get rid of the three; when we sometimes think we are farthest from it we are closest upon it. It is a mystery that is to be reckoned with. Indifference, worldliness, folly, may avoid all these subjects, and thus run a downward and self-extinguishing course. There remains the idea of the three. We cannot, let us say again and again to ourselves, get away from that idea; it is in us, it is part of us, it is the mystery of our own being. We deny the three-one, but denial is no argument. We have to account for the triune.

I. You will find instances of this three-one in many places. For example, in the very words of the text. 'Truth, judgment, righteousness.' These are not three things differing from one another in quality and opposing one another in policy and in aim; the three are one, and that one is the first—'truth'. How then do the others apply themselves? Adjectivally as qualifying the great and inclusive word truth. Truth—yes, truth that stands in judgment, truth that stands in righteousness, truth that runs out in these threefold expressions and yet returns upon itself and stands forth as it were a diamond or a star.

II. In Daniel iii. 7 'all the people, the nations, and the languages fell down'. Can languages fall down? Is there not something here highly rhetorical and figurative? Certainly; that is the very subject. The reading, therefore, would be, All the people—yes, even nations and languages—fell down before the image. The great noun is 'the people'; 'nations and languages' are little aspects of the great substantive, 'the people'. So we do not read, 'All the people and the nations and the languages' as if they were three different things; the great central thought is the people, the incidentals are the nations and the languages, and yet quite essential to the completeness of the figure. How easy it would be to run off on either of these nouns, 'nations,' and 'languages,' and deliver a useless ethnic discourse upon these motto words. These words must be put in their right place, and that place is subsidiary and collateral; the great outstanding noun is 'the people'.

III. Take another instance with which we are very familiar, so familiar indeed that many of us know nothing about it. Matt. vi. 13, 'Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory,'—as if they were three different things. When will we remember that there is a leading noun, and the two other nouns shade away and subside into rhetorical assistances and phases of the thought? The subject is one; the writer is not talking about three different attributes; he is talking about one thing, but he needs the rhetorical three members in order to fill out the expression of his thought. Here also we cannot get rid of the three-one.

IV. Take a wonderful instance from the lips of Christ Himself; you will find that instance in the fourteenth chapter of John and the sixth and contextual verses. 'I am the way, the truth, and the life'. Three things? No, one thing. Jesus Christ is talking about the way and about nothing else. How then does He describe it? 'I am the way, the true way'—you see how 'truth' drops into 'true,' the noun into the adjective—'and the living way'. But it is way, way, and only way that forms the subject of the Master's thought. Always get into the one thing that makes the other things possible. Do not waste your very souls on the details. Your first business is to get hold of the central truth, the one thing meant, and then to get hold of what is illustrative, external, and auxiliary.

V. You have the same thing in your own personal constitution. The Apostle describes us as 'body, soul, and spirit'. Three things? Certainly not. One thing? Yes, one thing. What is that one thing? Man; and man is a triunity, and a tri-unity, a three-one and a one-three; and as he studies himself in these aspects there will come upon him great religious moods, visions, and dreamings, and he will find that grass and flesh and air and many things have been made specially for the growth and culture of the body. Then he will ask himself, Is there anything in higher fields growing for the soul? And the answer will be a gracious Yes whispered from the secret places of eternity. There is a spirit, there is a revelation, there is a holy doctrine, there is an altar, and as he watches the fields and the rivers and the seas for the food which he needs for the body, so he will search these greater waters and greater spaces for the nurture of the soul. But is there nothing for the spirit, which seems to be, according to our poor crude thinking, a kind of higher quality, a more spiritualized and etherealized soul, even the spirit? God is a Spirit. God is not what we call a soul, a psyche; God is a pneuma, a spirit, a Spirit of the soul. The soul is but a kind of clothing for the spirit, but body, soul, spirit belong to one another, and constitute what but an ineffable unity?—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. iv. p. 214.

REFERENCES.—IV. 3.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 284. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 50. J. Parker, Studies in Texts, vol. i. p. 180. IV. 10.—Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. i. p. 267. IV. 14.—H. Harris, Short Sermons, p. 170. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvi. No. 1573. IV. 19.—J. Marshall Lang, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liii. 1898, p. 356. IV. 20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 349; vol. xxiii. No. 1363. IV. 30.—Ibid vol. xxiii. No. 1363.

A MAN

'Run ye to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem, and see now, and know, and seek in the broad places thereof, if ye can find a man, if there be any that executeth judgment, that seeketh the truth; and I will pardon it. —JEREMIAH V. 1.

To feel and to bring out the force of this verse stress must be laid upon the word man. The text tells us what a man is; how rare a man is; how valuable a man is.

I. The man that is to be sought out according to the direction in this verse is a person that executeth judgment, and that seeketh the truth. A man, then, is first of all one that does what is right and just from principle, uniformly, and towards all.

Further, a man is one who not only does what is right, but he has in his heart a love of truth. We are told that he 'seeketh the truth'. In doing what he believes to be equitable and just, he has a conscious desire that his views of equity and justice should be according to truth, and that of course is the truth as it is before God, which ought to reign supreme and through all the relationships and the intercourse of intelligent and responsible beings. When on the coronation of Edward VI. there were brought to be carried before him, according to custom, the sharp sword of justice, the pointless sword of mercy, and the two-handed sword of state, he called for the Bible also. 'That,' said he, 'is the sword of the Spirit, by which we all ought to be governed who use these others for the safety of the people by the law's appointment; it is from that that we obtain all our power, and goodness, and grace, and salvation, and whatever we have of Divine strength.'

II. Notice the value of a true man. God says in this verse, 'If ye can find a man,' a man of this character, 'in Jerusalem, I will pardon it,' pardon Jerusalem. What forbearance is there in God, how unwilling is He to destroy. When a man or a community violates truth and justice, he is exposed, they are exposed to the evil consequences. Each of us has an independent responsibility and must give an account of himself to God, but at the same time we are linked with others, we contribute to the general tone of society, we act along with it and as component parts, we have each a share in the aggregate responsibility, the praise or blame, the good or evil that belongs to the whole.

III. One last thing is thought of—a centre of trust, a shield of defence, before which God would lower the sword's point. What was that? What have men and women to look to for the defence and prosperity of nations? It was a man. Goethe says no greater good can happen to a town than for several educated men thinking in the same way about what is good and true living in it. But Goethe's standard is insufficient; it falls short of the Divine. The defenders and the benefactors of nations and of their fellow-men are the morally and religiously good in them; men whose lives are regulated by the teachings of God; men who seek to act as Christ did are the men that are worthy, and that are looked upon by God as blessings to the nation. Even one such is a mighty pillar, and on occasion even one such may be the Saviour and mainstay of the State.

Can we ever forget that in regard to the salvation of the world, and of our own souls, we owe everything to the ONE MAN, Christ Jesus, and that it is for His sake alone that we can obtain blessing, and salvation, and pardon!—R. J. DRUMMOND, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. II. p. 81.

REFERENCES.—V. 1.—J. Mitford Mitchell, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 117. C. Jerdan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 130. W. Reading, Sermons, vol. II. p. 469. J. Smith, "A Man," Sermons, vol. II. p. 270. "The Courage of the True Prophet," Archdeacon Farrar in Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxiii. p. 101. "Christian Manliness," (i.) "Right Doing," Momerie's Origin of Evil and Other Sermons, p. 197, and (ii.) "Right Thinking," Origin of Evil and Other Sermons, p. 209, and (iii.) "The Value of Manliness," Origin of Evil and Other Sermons, p. 222. Wythe, Pulpit Analyst, vol. V. p. 294; and see an admirable outline, "True Manhood," by S. Conway, in Pulpit Commentary, "Jeremiah," vol. I. p. 128. For the history see Geikie's Hours With the Bible, vol. V. p. 165, etc. V. 1-6 and 10-31.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2660. V. 2.—C. Kingsley, Sermons on Natural Subjects, p. 199.

GOD'S DEALINGS WITH MEN

'O Lord, are not Thine eyes upon the truth? thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved.'—JEREMIAH V. 3.

It may well be a source of comfort and strength to a man to know that God's eyes are upon the truth, upon the present reality, and not on mere appearance. Let all men know that God sees things precisely as they are. In the present instance He saw untruth, faithlessness, untruthfulness. And when He smote them, they did not really respond by sorrow for their misdeeds, whatever outward show they may have made. They forgot that, while man looketh on the outward appearance, the Lord looketh on the heart.

I. The Gracious End God ever has in View in Afflicting Men.—It is that they may return to Him by the path of grief for their sin and of amendment of life. The treading of this path is absolutely necessary for the sinner's return, and it is cast up by the fatherly chastisements of God.

II. But Man has the Power of Frustrating the Gracious End of God.—When stricken, he is not grieved. In many ways, consciously or unconsciously, he can frustrate God's gracious purpose on his behalf. For example:—

(a) By tracing all his sufferings merely to secondary causes. They bring no message from God to his soul; they merely speak of a fellow-man's injustice, or a weak constitution, or some mistake he himself has made in his plans and calculations, etc.

(b) By a mere stoical endurance rather than a childlike acquiescence. The child's feelings are acute while he says, 'Even so, Father, for so it seems good in Thy sight'. To drill and school oneself to bear pain of body or spirit without flinching is not to submit to God, but to bow to fate. This will never lead anyone to 'return' to God.

(c) By simple delay in returning to God by re- penitance and faith. A man may feel and recognize the calls and chastenings of God; but by simple delaying to comply with the message contained in those chastenings, this feeling gets gradually dulled.

'To-day, if ye will hear His voice, harden not your heart.'

REFERENCES.—V. 3.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1585; vol. xlv. No. 2655. V. 10.—W. M. Punshon, Take Away Her Battlements, Sermons, p. 453. Phillips Brooks, The Law of Growth, p. 80. Prebendary Grier, The Church of the People, p. 163. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. i. No. 38. V. 12.—R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 12. V. 22, 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iv. No. 220. V. 23-25.—H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 113. V. 24.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 830. "Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. viii. p. 185. V. 30, 31.—R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 160. H. Hensley Henson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 161. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part iv. p. 243. V. 31.—"Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. x. p. 258. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 267. VI. 2.—J. Parker, Studies in Texts, vol. i. p. 187. VI. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 301. C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxviii. 1890, p. 45. F. Ferguson, Peace With God p. 23. T. Chalmers, Sermons Preached in the Tron Church, Glasgow, p. 447.

OLD PATHS ✓

(Thoughts for the New Year)

'Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls.'—JEREMIAH VI. 16.

'Ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls.' Our Blessed Saviour knows that we want rest; His beautiful call comes right across the ocean of trouble, the oft-repeated call, 'Come to Me, come to Me, and I will give you rest'. It is what you most want—rest. So many people deviate from the old paths and try to get rest. Just look round about and see the number of religions there are—bypaths; and people wander along these paths and think they will get rest. They do not. What are the old paths, that you and I are to walk therein and rest?

I. The old path, first of all, is the path of blood. Do not mistake that. All along the road you can trace drops of blood. It is the Blood of the Passion of the Saviour. How could we, you and I, face the judgment seat of Christ if it were not for the Blood of the Lamb? Our only hope of redemption is in the Blood of the Blessed Saviour. It is the old path. We have no other hope, no other rest than in the Sacrifice of our Blessed Saviour. Do not let any of the modern ideas of the twentieth-century religion allure you into bypaths.

II. And then I should say walk in the old paths in the day in which we live by accepting the Word of God. The Word of God is written, of course, for your souls; your soul shall find rest therein, and, if I were you, I would learn by heart your favourite texts, so that when you cannot read, and things are beginning to get a bit dim, you may have them within your heart.

III. Then there is this: keep in the old path of service. What I mean by this is that it is so very common nowadays to divide up the secular from the religious. We Christians must not have that. St. Paul says all is to be sacred, nothing secular. You would not call it 'churchy' to eat and to drink, but we are told whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, we are to do all to the glory of God. We are to make no distinction. Paul was sent by the Saviour to preach the Gospel to men; he was an Apostle, and yet he was a tent-maker. Paul used to make tents to get a little money to live by. He sold his tents and earned money and lived by it, and lived for the glory of God. To those who love God, where do the secular and the profane come in at all? You are often told that we Christians ought to give a tenth of our income to the Church. A Jew gives a tithe. Well, if you give a tenth, you do what the Jews do, but that is not the rule of the Christian religion. The Christian religion is to give all. You must not divide up your money into secular purposes and religious purposes; that is not the old path, that is not the way of salvation. Every penny you spend you should spend as best you can to the glory of God. Do not let us be unreal; let us be perfectly true. We Christians must live and act as under God's sight, and do everything for His sake, and the man who spends his money to bring up his family does right, he is acting in the sanctuary, the sanctuary of domestic life, which God Himself will bless.

IV. Another of the old paths is obedience to God's Word; submission to God's Word. 'Ask for the old paths.' 'Teach me to do the thing that pleaseth Thee, for Thou art my God.' That is the old path. Ask God to show you the way, that you may walk therein, and find rest for your soul. If you do your own will, you will never find rest, but if you do God's will, it is perfect rest.

V. Last of all the paths, I should mention the beautiful pathway, when it draws towards what seems to be the end of the way altogether, the path of communion with God. 'If Thy presence go not with us, carry us not up hence.' You do not want to go away from Him. Confide yourselves bravely to Him and be happy, and ye shall find rest for your souls. If you have listened for His command, and your ear has become attuned to His Voice, you will hear His Voice in the storm, in the wind, in the night, and in the end you will hear Him call you to come to Him across the water, and you can say, like Peter, 'Lord, teach Thou me to come to Thee across the water,' and He will say, 'Come'. Is not this really what we want, right deep down beyond everything, to rest in the Arms of God.

STEADFASTNESS IN THE OLD PATHS

'Thus saith the Lord, Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls.'—JEREMIAH VI. 16.

It is one great peculiarity of the Christian character to be dependent. Men of the world, indeed, in proportion as they are active and enterprising, boast of their independence, and are proud of having obligations to no one. But it is the Christian's excellence to be diligent and watchful, to work and persevere, and yet to be in spirit dependent; to be willing to serve, and to rejoice in the permission to do so; to be content to view himself in a subordinate place; to love to sit in the dust. Though in the Church a son of God, he takes pleasure in considering himself Christ's 'servant' and 'slave'; he feels glad whenever he can put himself to shame. So it is the natural bent of his mind freely and affectionately to visit and trace the footsteps of the saints, to sound the praises of the great men of old who have wrought wonders in the Church and whose words still live; being jealous of their honour, and feeling it to be even too great a privilege for such as he is to be put in trust with the faith once delivered to them, and following them strictly in the narrow way, even as they have followed Christ. To the ears of such persons the words of the text are as sweet music: 'Thus saith the Lord, Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls'.—J. H. NEWMAN.

REFERENCES.—VI. 16.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2748. H. D. M. Spence, Voices and Silences, p. 271. E. C. S. Gibson, Messages from the Old Testament, p. 238. "Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. v. p. 157. Ibid. vol. x. pp. 307, 317. W. Brooke, Sermons, p. 50. VI. 16-19.—W. Hay M. H. Aitken, Mission Sermons (3rd Series), p. 163. VI. 29.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xv. No. 890. VI. 29, 30.—VII. 9, 10.—T. Teignmouth Shore, The Life of the World to Come, p. 107. VII. 12.—"Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. i. 168. VII. 18.—W. Hay M. H. Aitken, Mission Sermons (3rd Series), p. 207. VII. 21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2301. VIII.—Ibid. vol. xlii. No. 2491; vol. xlix. No. 2858. VIII. 6.—Ibid. vol. iv. No. 169. VIII. 7.—Ibid. vol. xlix. No. 2858. VIII. 11.—Ibid. vol. xxviii. No. 1658. J. Wordsworth, The One Religion, Bampton Lectures, 1881, p. 217. VIII. 14.—H. W. Webb-Peploe, Calls to Holiness, p. 175. VIII. 19, 20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 608. VIII. 20.—Ibid. vol. xxvi. No. 1562. C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 154. S. A. Tipple, Sunday Mornings at Norwood, p. 39. J. Parker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxviii. 1905, p. 177.

BALM IN GILEAD

'For the hurt of the daughter of my people,' etc.—JEREMIAH VIII. 21, 22.

THE lament of a good man over the sins of his countrymen.

I. The Nature of the Malady.

1. Hereditary.

'By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin.'

2. Universal.

'All have sinned and come short of the glory of God.'

3. Dangerous.

'The wages of sin is death.'

II. The Means of Cure.—The medicine here referred to is a resinous substance obtained from the balsam-tree, which flourished near Gilead, and was far-famed for its healing properties; often sold for twice its weight in silver. Obtained by cutting the bark with an axe when the fresh juices were most vigorous. The quantity which exuded from one tree did not exceed sixty drops a day.

The Gospel is the cure for sin-sick souls. This is:

1. An infallible remedy.

2. The only infallible remedy.

3. A remedy within the reach of all.

III. The Reasons Why the Cure is Not Effected.—

Why does the Gospel fail? It is not Christ's fault, but ours.

1. Insensibility and indifference on the part of the sinner.

2. Apathy and neglect on the part of the disciples of Christ.—F. J. Austin, Seeds and Saplings, p. 24.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 22.—Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1894, p. 301. W. M. Punshon, Balm in Gilead, Sermons, p. 513; see also Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 245. IX.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2274. IX. 1.—Ibid. vol. iii. No. 150. A. Phelps, The Old Testament a Living Book for All Ages, p. 7.

THE WISH TO ESCAPE

'Oh that I had in the wilderness a lodging-place of wayfaring men; that I might leave my people, and go from them!'

—JEREMIAH IX. 2.

'And now, behold, I loose thee this day from the chains which were upon thine hand. If it seem good unto thee to come with me into Babylon, come; and I will look well unto thee: but if it seem ill unto thee to come with me into Babylon, forbear: behold, all the land is before thee: whither it seemeth good and convenient for thee to go, thither go. Now while he was not yet gone back, he said, Go back also to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan, whom the king of Babylon hath made governor over the cities of Judah, and dwell with him among the people: or go wheresoever it seemeth convenient unto thee to go. So the captain of the guard gave him victuals and a reward, and let him go. Then went Jeremiah unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam to Mizpah; and dwelt with him among the people that were left in the land.'—JEREMIAH XL. 4-6.

JEREMIAH had cried wildly, 'Oh that I could escape'; but when escape was possible he turned his back on it. He went to Mizpah with Gedaliah, and though only the dregs of Judah had been left there, still—dregs or no dregs—they were his own people, and like a gallant soul he would not leave them.

I. We all feel sometimes the longing to escape To escape from what?—in the first place from monotony.

Or again responsibility may cause it—the pressure of responsibility and care—not the weary weight of this unintelligible world, but just the burdens that lie at our own doors.

But to most of us there come hours when the great longing is to escape from ourselves.

O that a man might arise in me,
That the man I am might cease to be!

II. This longing betrays itself in many ways.

1. It betrays itself in day-dreams. It is one of the great offices of imagination to be a refuge when we are in rebellion against facts.

2. It betrays itself in pleasure, and especially in the craving for exciting pleasure. The very charm of excitement lies in this that it helps men for a little to forget.

3. And then does it not betray itself in theories? How easy it is to blind ourselves to facts, when we once adopt some theory about them! When I see, and I see it every day, how men turn away from the straight gaze of Christ, and when I see how they run to philosophies and theories which have no cry in them, no cross, no blood—only harmonious and flattering music—to me at least that is another betrayal of the strange yet quenchless longing to escape.

III. The duty of a Christian is to crush it. However instinctively this wish may rise, it must when it rises be sternly combated. This is our duty every day we live, because of the example of Christ Jesus. 'O my Father, if it be possible let this cup pass from me!' What is that, but the wild cry of all humanity, to flee from its Calvary and be at rest? Yet immediately, 'Not My will, but Thine be done. I am here not to do My will but Thine, O God.' And that instant recognition of the Father, and the immediate owning of His will, tells how in the very moment that the wish was formed, the wish—to escape, to flee away—was crushed.—G. H. MORRISON, The Unlighted Lustre, p. 102.

REFERENCES.—IX. 2.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 47. G. A. Smith, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii, p. 309. IX. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxviii. No. 2274. IX. 23, 24.—J. P. Gledstone, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 150. A. E. Tonkin, ibid. vol. xlv. 1893, p. 122. J. Parker, Hidden Springs, p. 153. X.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. I. No. 2893.

'Thus shall ye say unto them, the gods that have not made the heavens and the earth, even they shall perish from the earth, and from under these heavens.'—JEREMIAH X. 11.

DR. STOCK, in his History of the Church Missionary Society, says that Claudius Buchanan, in his valedictory address to the first men sent to India, refers to this unique Chaldaic verse embedded in the Hebrew of Jeremiah's prophecy. 'Just as if,' says Buchanan, 'while you are receiving instructions in your own tongue, one sentence should be given you in the Tamil or Cinghalese language which you should deliver to the Hindus.'

REFERENCE.—X. 16.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 268.

THE COLLAPSES OF LIFE

'Woe is me for my hurt! my wound is grievous: but I said, truly this is my grief, and I must bear it. My tent is spoiled, and all my cords are broken: my children are gone forth of me, and they are not: there is none to stretch forth my tent any more, and to set up my curtains.'—JEREMIAH X. 19, 20 (R.V.).

'For in the day of trouble He shall keep me secretly in His pavilion: in the covert of His tent shall He hide me; He shall lift me up upon a rock.'—PSALM XXVII. 5 (R.V.).

I. The Lament of the Prophet.—'Woe is me for my hurt! my wound is grievous, truly this is my grief.' It was not an irritation, inconvenience, or annoyance, a disagreeable, disappointing incident, as so many of our troubles are: it was a bitter grief, a crushing overthrow.

1. The overthrow is total. 'My tent is spoiled and all my cords are broken.' Many times had the land of Israel been devastated and its population subjected to loss and suffering; on this occasion the catastrophe was to be overwhelming. Thus from time to time is it with the individual. Sometimes adverse financial fortune wrecks our tent. Sometimes the calamity that surprises us is the total failure of our health.

2. The overthrow is sudden. A tent in the wilderness is broken without warning, and herein is the symbol of our overthrows. We speak of coming events casting their shadows before: tremendous events supervene with little warning. The most desolating bolts shoot out of a blue sky, the spectre of ruin is ambushed in broad sunshine and takes us unawares.

3. The overthrow is irreparable. 'There is none to stretch forth my tent any more, and to set up my curtains.' This order of calamity is repeated in private life. Usually the losses of life admit of ameliorations; but some deprivations are complete, some losses final. We must look the fact in the face that the day approaches when we shall be totally helpless, when nothing can be done, and everything must be endured.

4. The overthrow is personal. 'Truly this is my grief, and I must bear it.' We live in a world of misfortunes and sorrows; but, as a rule, they do not greatly affect us: they occur in distant places, they affect strangers. One day, however, the calamity comes right home, and the arrow drinks up our spirit. 'It is my grief.'

II. The Psalmist's Refuge.—'For in the day of trouble He shall keep me secretly in His pavilion: in the covert of His tent shall He hide me.' When your tent sinks away hopelessly there is a royal pavilion in which you may hide—this is the sublime direction and consolation of these precious words—something deeper than our grief, vaster than our sorrow.

Fly to the living God. Jeremiah, in the chapter whence our first text is taken, dwells upon the reality and glory of the living God. We believe in the living God—all-wise, just, loving, keeping mercy for thousands who fear Him, and we trust in His perfect government and glorious purpose.—W. L. WATKINSON, Themes for Hours of Meditation, p. 44.

REFERENCES.—X. 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. I. No. 2893. XI. 8.—Ibid. vol. xiv. No. 838. XI. 12.—W. J. Knox-Little, Labour and Sorrow, p. 131.

TRIVIAL TROUBLE

'If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou contend with horses? and though in a land of peace thou art secure, yet how wilt thou do in the pride of Jordan.'—JEREMIAH XII. 5 (R.V.).

THE proof that so many of us have little real trouble is found in the fact that we so piercingly bewail trifling losses and pains; were the distresses more acute, we should say less about them.

I. The habit of pampering ourselves shows how far we have lost sight of the seriousness of life. The sacramental host of God has ever been prepared to accept great losses and sufferings for the high rewards it contemplates. 'The noble army of martyrs' is the glory of God's Church, and in a real sense representative of its spirit and power. Its members have sworn allegiance to a captain who was 'made perfect through suffering'; and in all ages they have dared the most tremendous tribulations that they might win eternal life. Our disproportionate attention to minor miseries shows how far we have lost sight of the extreme seriousness of the true idea and design of human life.

II. To brood over paltry trials reveals littleness of soul; and accentuates that littleness. We are in danger of deceiving ourselves on this point. It is not uncommon for men to believe that they are able to bear great calamities better than they can small ones. It is an illusion. He who is wearied in a sprint with the footmen will never contend successfully with horses; he who faints in the land of peace will make a poor show in the swelling of Jordan. Little physical energy is left when the grasshopper becomes a burden; little energy of soul remains when the grasshopper of trivial trouble is allowed to plague us. And as fretfulness indicates spiritual feebleness it accentuates it; it effectually precludes inward largeness, strength, and heroism.

III. The habit of repining unfits us to deal with the real troubles awaiting us farther on. We ought so to run with the footmen that we shall be able to bridle the horses; we ought so to dwell in the land of peace—careless of its gnats, contemptuous of its grasshoppers—that it shall prove a precious discipline against the day when deep calls unto deep, and when all the waves and billows go over us; but to permit the inevitable friction of everyday life to waste our power is to lay ourselves open to inglorious humiliations whenever the crisis comes.—W. L. WATKINSON, Themes for Hours of Meditation, p. 107.

Illustration.—In Mosses from an Old Manse Nathaniel Hawthorne writes: 'There are so many unsubstantial sorrows which the necessity of our mortal state begets on idleness, that an observer, casting aside sentiment, is sometimes led to question whether there may be any real woe except absolute physical suffering and the loss of closest friends.—W. L. WATKINSON, Themes for Hours of Meditation, p. 107.

REFERENCES.—XII. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 635. C. Leach, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 204. J. Pulsford, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 246. G. Dawson, Sermons, p. 43. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 272. XIII. 1-11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxix. No. 1700. XIII. 15-17.—Ibid. vol. xxix. No. 1748. XIII. 10.—A. W. Potts, School Sermons, p. 150. XIII. 20.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. i. p. 3.

HABIT

'Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? Then may ye also do good that are accustomed to do evil.'—JEREMIAH XIII. 23.

I. The Origin of Habit.—Habit may be conceived to arise in this way. When, in the revolution of time—of the day, or the week, or the month, or the year—the point comes round at which we have been thinking of anything, or have done anything, by the law of the association of ideas we think of it again, or do it again. For instance, when day dawns we awake. We get out of bed because we have done it at that time before. At a later hour we take breakfast, and go away to business, for the same reason; and so on through the day. The more frequently anything has been done, the stronger is habit, and frequency acts on habit through something else. Frequency gives ease and swiftness to the doing of anything. It is not only the mind that is involved in habit. Even the body is subdued to its service. Do we not recognize the soldier by his gait, the student by his stoop, and the merchant by his bustle? And in the parts of the body that are invisible—the muscles and nerves—there is a still greater change due to habit. Hence the counsel of the philosopher, and I think it is a very profound counsel: 'Make your nervous system your ally instead of your enemy in the battle of life'.

II. Excessive Habit.—Habit, even good habit, may be excessive. It tends to become hide-bound and tyrannical. There is a pharisaical sticking to opinions once formed, and to customs once adopted, which is the principal obstacle to human progress. Yet, on the whole, there is no possession so valuable as a few good habits, for this means that not only is the mind pledged and covenanted to good, but the muscles are supple, and even the very bones are bent to what is good.

III. Desirable Habits.

1. Self-control; that is, the power of getting yourself to do what you know you ought to do, and to avoid what you know you ought to avoid.

2. Concentration of mind.

3. Really working when you are at work.

4. Prayer.

IV. The Tyranny of Evil Habits.—Evil habits may be acquired through simply neglecting to acquire good ones. Like weeds they grow up wherever the field is uncultivated and the good seed is not sown. For example, the man who does not work becomes a dissipated loafer.

The tyranny of evil habit is proverbial. The moralists compare it to a thread, at the beginning, but as thread is twisted with thread, it becomes like a cable which can turn a ship.

V. The Problem of Christianity.—In the work of overcoming evil habits, is there available for man a power outside himself that when his own power fails, will stand him in stead, not, indeed, by pushing his own powers aside, but by entering into compact with them, and raising them to the strength necessary for the occasion? I say that is the problem of Christianity, and nobody can have any doubt what the answer is which Scripture gives to it. Is it not also the answer of experience, the experience of tens of thousands of men who have tried in vain to reform themselves, but have found in the Gospel the power of God unto salvation; the experience of men in whom the power of evil habit was so strong that it seemed as impossible to overcome it as to reverse the course of Acheron, and yet who, by the grace of God, were made humble and progressive Christians? There is no force of evil with which the Saviour cannot cope.—JAMES STALKER, Christian World Pulpit, vol. XLIX. 1896, p. 198.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 23.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xliii. No. 2536. A. Brooke, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 205. L. T. Dodd, ibid. vol. lxix. 1906, p. 88. E. B. Speirs, A Present Advent, p. 51. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 274. XIV.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2745. XIV. 3, 4, 22.—Ibid. vol. xxxv. No. 2115. XIV. 7-9.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 281. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1661. XIV. 8, 9.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 1. XIV. 9.—Ibid. Sermons on the Apocalypse, etc., p. 9. XIV. 22.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2745. T. K. Cheyne, The Hallowing of Criticism, p. 83. XV. 4.—W. Lee, University Sermons, p. 262. XV. 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 993.

THE EATING OF GOD'S WORDS

'Thy words were found, and I did eat them.'—JEREMIAH XV. 16.

THE former verse contains a suggestion which bears upon the interpretation of this text. That suggestion is this, that the position which the prophet finds himself in is due to the words of God which he had found and had eaten.

I. The first word he found was, the word of Divine ordination: 'Then the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, before thy birth I knew thee; and at thy birth I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations'. He discovered that it was by no mere chance that he had entered into this life. On the contrary that he was sent into the world for a very definite purpose. He found he was where God intended him to be and he was fulfilling the mission for which God had given him life.

In the day of this discovery Jeremiah was delivered from the blight of a self-conscious insufficiency. 'I cannot speak, for I am a child.' That was a genuine word. While, however, he was under its spell he was utterly useless. He had no confidence in himself or in his powers. He was in consequence prostrated at the shrine of his own weakness and self-conscious insufficiency. Though a man may prostrate himself in true penitence for sin, even at the foot of the Cross, God can do nothing with him until he stands erect again, conscious no longer of his own weakness, but of a power which has become his by eating the words of the Lord.

II. The word of a Divine ministry—a ministry which was to be first of all destructive, and then constructive. In that Divine ministry unto the nations he discovered: (1) The word of God's integrity. (2) The word of God's pleading. What is the story of this book? Is it not the story of a prolonged pleading, throughout the centuries, of God the Father with His rebellious sons? This is surely the word of the Cross. (3) The word of God's judgments. This was perhaps the most difficult word which the prophet had to receive. It was certainly the most unpopular word. To its reception may be traced much of the trials, difficulties, and sorrows which had surrounded the life and ministry of this man of God. Yet he did not hesitate to receive it. He received it as complementary to the word of pleading which had gone before it. He saw most clearly that consequent upon Israel's refusal to receive the pleadings of God came the judgments of God.

III. Notice what the eating of these words meant to the prophet himself. (1) The reception of those words for the nourishment of his own spiritual life. (2) The willing acceptance of the principles and practices involved in them. God's ordination would become the prophet's ordination. (3) By the eating of these words of God, which he had found, the prophet would become in heart and mind entirely God's. It is the mingling of the waters which make the ocean. It is the blending of the valleys and mountains and plains which make the landscape. It is the coming of God into man, and the losing of man in his God, which make the patriarch and the prophet, the Psalmist and the seer, the saint and the martyr, the disciple and the apostle, the preacher and the evangelist.—J. GAY, Common Truths from Queer Texts, p. 59.

REFERENCES. XV. 16.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvii. No. 980; vol. xviii. No. 1079. XVII. 1.—Ibid. vol. xiv. No. 812. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 294. XVII. 5.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. I. p. 217. XVII. 5-8; XVIII. 7-10.—Selected Sermons of Schleiermacher, p. 67. XVII. 6.—C. Perren, Revival Sermons in Outline, p. 341. XVII.—6, 8.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 302.

'The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it?'—JEREMIAH XVII. 9.

PÈRE PACHEU quotes the saying of the Comte de Maistre: 'Whatever the conscience of a criminal may be, I know only the heart of an honest man, and it is a wretched and a fearful thing!'

A BAD HEART

'The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it? I the Lord search the heart, I try the reins, even to give every man according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings.'—JEREMIAH XVII. 9, 10.

I wish, firstly, to prove to you the truth of the words 'the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked'; secondly, to remind you that God knows what is within you—'I the Lord search the heart'; and, thirdly, the only remedy that can do you any good, if you would be saved.

I. As to the natural deceit and wickedness of every man, woman, and child that is born into the world, first and foremost what says the Scripture? You can hardly turn to a single part of Bible history in which this doctrine does not come uppermost. Look at the men before the flood! who would have thought, with Paradise as a witness before their eyes (for until the flood Paradise was on earth), who would have thought they could have turned their backs on God, and given themselves up to all manner of lusts and sin? And yet they did so, in spite of every warning, and God was obliged to drown the whole world, excepting eight persons. Look at the history of Israel, the chosen family itself. The Lord gave them judges and kings, and priests and prophets and ministers, and preachings and warnings; and yet their history, with a few exceptions, is a history of unbelief and backsliding and transgression and crime, down to the very day when they crucified the Lord Jesus Christ Himself.

You can hardly turn to a single family, even of the best of God's servants, in which the natural corruption of our hearts does not appear more or less in some one of the branches. You can hardly turn to a single character, among the holy men described in the Bible, who did not, to his own horror and dismay, fall at one time or another. Job thought he knew his heart, but affliction came and he found he did not. David thought he knew his heart, but he learned by bitter experience how woefully he was mistaken. Peter thought he knew his heart, and in a short time he was repenting in tears.

II. We read, 'I the Lord search the heart, I try the reins, even to give every man according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings'. There are two things written here: one is that, although you do not know your own hearts, the Lord God Almighty does, and keeps a close watch over them; the other is that He will one day call you to account, and judge you accordingly. And do you not observe here what the mind of the Spirit points to? Some men might say, God will not be extreme to mark what is amiss, I shall have peace though I walk in the imagination of mine heart; but the prophet sweeps away these refuges of lies by warning us of searching and of judgment immediately after he has declared to us the deceitfulness of man's heart.

III. 'Who can be saved?' All, I answer, who give up their iniquities, and grieve over them, and put their whole trust in Jesus Christ.—J. C. RYLE, The Christian Race, p. 1.

REFERENCE.—XVII. 9, 10.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 55.

JESUS CHRIST OUR SANCTUARY (KEDESH)

'A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary.'—JEREMIAH XVII. 12.

THE name Kedesh means set apart, a sanctuary, a holy city.

I. The first thought connected with sanctuary is that it is a sacred or consecrated place. But the word sanctuary has a wider meaning. It is a sacred asylum or refuge, a place of protection.

II. Jesus Christ is the true Sanctuary. He fulfils all that the city of refuge suggested. He is our Kedesh, our place of refuge, our sanctuary, our sacred place.

The altar was the meeting place between God and the transgressor, where the innocent victim was offered in the place of the guilty sinner. So Christ is the true altar, the meeting place between God and man, the one and only Priest, the one and only Sacrifice, the one and only Atonement for sin. To grasp the altar horns was to lay hold of God's strength and to rest under the shadow of His protecting love. So Christ is at once our shelter and our strength. He surrounds the believer as with a temple wall, keeps him in safety from all enemies and in peace amidst all alarms.

The temple was God's sanctuary of old. It represented God dwelling in the midst of Israel, and Israel drawing near to God in the appointed way. Christ is the true sanctuary. His Manhood, 'The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us,' is the 'tabernacle of meeting' between man and God.

Kedesh, the city of the holy place of the sanctuary, points to Jesus the holy one of God, who is our one and only Refuge, the strong tower of the Lord in which we are safe for time and for eternity.—W. J. ARMITAGE, The Cities of Refuge, p. 25.

REFERENCES.—XVII. 12.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 311. XVII. 12-14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1786. XVII. 13.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 319. XVII. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1658.

GOD'S PITY FOR FAILURE

'When the vessel that he made of the clay was marred in the hand of the potter, he made it again.'—JEREMIAH XVIII. 4.

I. IN every action of the potter God was speaking, and Jeremiah heard and understood. What was the message? This: God's pity for failure—'It was marred, so he made it again'. Why did the potter not leave the broken and marred clay, and use a fresh and flawless piece? There was plenty of it at his disposal. Why? Because he knew that if the obstacle that marred it was removed the vessel could be perfected, and so he tried again. Jeremiah was despondent, depressed, and disappointed. Israel, whom God had chosen and moulded for His purpose, had resisted and rebelled, and such thoughts as these were passing through the prophet's mind: What was God going to do with Israel? Would He cast her aside? Would He take another people and use another people for His purpose and praise? In the potter's house that morning God answered these questions, and silenced his doubts and fears. God would not cast Israel off, for as the potter had taken the broken, marred clay and made it again, so would God gather Israel to Himself once more and try and make Israel again. God was giving Israel another chance.

II. God has an ideal for every one of us. Every revolution of the wheel and every touch of His hand has been to mould and make us according to the Divine pattern. God's ideal for each of us was that we should become like Jesus Christ.

Why have we failed? It is the fault of the clay—the clay is marred, there is something concealed in the clay which collides with the potter's will, and try as

He may, He cannot make us until that obstruction is removed. The reason of our failure is in ourselves, we have failed in God's purpose because we refused to let Him have His way with us.

III. And what will He do with us forlorn failures? Has He become so weary of our failure as to abandon all hope? He is not weary of forgiving. He is not tired of trying; His mercy endureth for ever and His patience is as enduring as His mercy. He has hope for the most hopeless. Let God have His way with you, for only by your willingness can He succeed. Full surrender to His will is the absolute essential.—H. KENWARD, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXVIII. 1905, p. 315.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 4.—R. Waddy Moss, The Discipline of the Soul, p. 89. D. D. F. MacDonald, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXIX. 1906, p. 22. J. Parker, Studies in Texts, vol. i. p. 18. XVIII. 6.—A. Macleod, Days of Heaven Upon Earth, p. 23. XVIII. 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. XLIII. No. 2547. XVIII. 12.—Ibid. vol. XII. No. 684. XVIII. 14.—J. Parker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. II. 1897, p. 164. XIX. 11.—F. E. Paget, Sermons for Special Occasions, p. 29.

THE DECEPTIONS OF GOD

'O Lord, Thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived.'—JEREMIAH XX. 7.

I. THERE are times when we are ready to say that God deceives us. Think of the ideals of our childhood. It is one of the sweet illusions of the child that father or mother has neither fault nor flaw.

1. Think again of the deceptions of the senses. If there is one thing that seems above dispute, it is that this earth of ours is fixed and firm.

2. Think once again of how God fulfils His promises. One thing certain is that when Abraham was called from Ur, he was promised the land of Canaan for his own. The strange thing is that to his dying hour Abraham did not own one rood of Palestine. It is a signal tribute to the splendour of Abraham's faith that not in his darkest hour did he doubt God.

3. Think once again of how life deceives us. It is when men compare all that the years have brought with the glad and golden promise of the morning. It is then that they are tempted, not in bitterness, but in the melancholy which Jeremiah knew so well, to cry, 'O Lord, if this be life, Thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived'.

4. Then think for a moment of the Christian calling: 'Come unto Me, and I will give you rest'. And we come, for we are weary and it is rest we want, and immediately we are summoned out to war. 'Fight the good fight of faith; put on thine armour; show thyself a good soldier of Jesus Christ.'

II. There are loving purposes in this so-called deception.

1. Sometimes this is one of the ways of God for strengthening and educating character. He leaves us, not because He is false, nor because He has broken the promise of His help, but because, like a mother with her little child, He is teaching us to stand upon our feet.

2. It is one of God's ways to make us happy, and God is at infinite pains to make us happy. There are dreams so sweet that He will not rudely waken us; the time for that is coming by and by. Our hopes are not less ministers of happiness because they may never be fully realized.

3. It is one of God's ways to make us valiant, and to stir and rouse us to our best endeavour. I think, for example, of that first hope of Christendom that the second coming of the Lord was near at hand. Without that burning hope do you think they could ever have suffered and been strong? So does God strengthen us by what He hides not less divinely than by what He shows.

This so-called deception is one of the ways of God to lead us on. Do you think that we would ever have the heart to travel if we were not beset by stratagems of mercy? So does God lead us through the ideals of childhood, and the hopes of youth, and the letter of the promise, till at last the husk is broken in our grasp, and we find with a strange joy the hidden kernel.—G. H. MORRISON, The Wings of the Morning, p. 288.

REFERENCES.—XX. 7-13.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 25. XX. 9.—W. Sanday, Inspiration, p. 124. XXI. 12.—C. Gore, Christian World Pulpit, vol. I. 1896, p. 296.

THE WOES OF THE UNJUST

'Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong; that useth his neighbour's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work.'—JEREMIAH XXII. 13.

THE whole law is contained in these words, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself'. These two parts cannot be separated. God places us among our own kind, and our character cannot be formed and our souls saved without doing justly and loving mercy, while we walk humbly with our God. If we are servants, we are to do honest work for our masters; and if we are masters, we are to give equitable wages to our servants. The text denounces woe against those who deal unrighteously. An unjust man may, as the Psalmist complains, prosper in life, and have no bands in his death, and leave his substance to his children; still there are subtle woes which he cannot escape.

I. The Woe of Estrangement from God.—God says, 'Woe to him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness'. He is the Father of the fatherless and the shield of the widow; and it cannot be that the man who is conscious of defrauding any weak creature of his bare rights will enjoy God's blessing and communion. Many an unjust man, it is true, affects, and in a spurious way feels, devotion towards God and love to Christ. They rob widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers. But what real communion can light have with darkness?—the God of perfect righteousness with the man whose every possession, the house in which he lives, the clothes he wears, the sumptuous fare on which he exists, speak of oppression and wrong? 'When thou sawest a thief, then thou consentedst with him.' 'What hast thou to do to declare My statutes, or that thou shouldest take My covenant in thy mouth?' 'I hate robbery for a burnt-offering.' Must not the dishonest man strive hard in his fancied communion with God to forget many a stern feature in God's character? It is a god of his own imagining and moulding as really as the man's which is hewn by him out of the stock of a tree, whom the unjust man serves. He who lives in a house built by unrighteousness can never feel the exquisite joy of him who may, like his Saviour, have nowhere of his own to lay his head, but who can say, 'Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations'.

II. The Woe of the Curses of those who are Oppressed.—The man who buildeth his house by unrighteousness and his chambers by wrong, is like one who builds his house in the heart of a poisonous swamp. He is like the old Norman tyrants who built their fortresses (which were really prisons in which they immured themselves, and from which they fought often for bare existence) among the people whom they had wronged, and whom they despised. How unlike the sweet experience of Job—'When the eye saw me, then it blessed me. I was eyes to the blind, feet was I to the lame; I was a father to the poor, and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.'

III. The Woe of an Accusing Conscience.—The accusation may not be loud or very persistent. But surely there must be times in which the hoarse voice of the hireling defrauded of his wages mingles with the songs and merriment of the feast; in which 'the stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber shall answer it': 'Woe to him that buildeth a town with blood, and stablisheth a city in iniquity'. If men would but believe that 'a little that a righteous man hath is more and better than the wealth of many wicked,' what woes would be averted from the heads of their fellow-men, and from their own hearts!

IV. The Woe of a Perverted Nature and Deadened Heart.—As men's hands are dyed by the colours they work in, as the bodies of those who work daily in some constrained and unnatural position get gradually distorted, as the speech of the child reproduces that which his ear perpetually drinks in, so the heart of the man who, for the sake of gain, defrauds his neighbour and oppresses those who are under him, is gradually deteriorated and benumbed. This, it is true, may be hailed as a relief by the man whose heart is too pitiful by nature, and his conscience too tender for the work he chooses to do. But, all the same, it is the ear which is quick to hear God's voice, and the heart which is alive and which thrills at His touch, that alone can know what the joy of the Lord, which is the only true joy, means. 'The blessing of the Lord maketh rich and addeth no sorrow.'

REFERENCES.—XXII. 13-19.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 93. XXII. 15, 16.—Ibid. p. 71. XXII. 19.—T. De Witt Talmage, Sermons, p. 201. XXII. 21.—"Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. I. p. 118. XXII. 23.—R. Allen, The Words of Christ, p. 274. XXII. 24, 27.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 179. XXIII. 1-32.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2460. XXIII. 5.—C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 298. XXIII. 5, 6.—R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. II. p. 301.

THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS

'This is His name whereby He shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness.'—JEREMIAH XXIII. 6.

I. You must have some righteousness, or you will not be saved. The Bible says plainly, 'The unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God'; 'The righteous hath hope in his death'; 'Thy people,' says Isaiah, 'shall be all righteous'. Many often say they know they are not what they should be, but 'God is merciful'. Their religion goes no further; this is the first and last of all their Christianity. This will not stand before the Bible. God is a God of perfect holiness, and 'without holiness no man shall see the Lord'; God is a God of perfect justice, Whose laws may not be broken without punishment (Deut. xxxii. 4; St. Matt. v. 17, 18). God's mercy and justice must be reconciled. God is indeed all love: He willet not the death of a sinner, but 'the wages of sin is death,' and God will have His demands paid in full. By some means, then, you must have righteousness or you cannot be saved. But—

II. You have no righteousness of your own of any sort, and therefore by yourself you cannot be saved. Look at the law of God, and measure its requirements. Does it not ask of every man a perfect, unsinning obedience from first to last, in thought, word, and deed; and who can say 'All this have I performed'?

(a) Some tell us that repentance and amendment will enable us to stand in the great day, and no doubt without them none will enter the kingdom of heaven above. But they cannot put away your sins; they cannot blot out a single page of that book in which your iniquities are written. John the Baptist preached repentance, but he never told his hearers it alone would save them.

(b) Some put their trust in well-spent lives: they have always done their best, and so hope they shall be accounted righteous. This is miserable trifling. Let them mention a single day in which they have not broken the spiritual law laid down in the Sermon on the Mount. What! never an unkind thought, an unchaste look, no covetous feelings?—nothing left undone which was in their power to do?

(c) Some say they hope sincerity will carry them through: they have always meant well. St. Paul, before his conversion, was zealous towards God; he thought he ought to do many things contrary to Jesus of Nazareth. Here was sincerity and earnestness; yet we find him, when his eyes were opened, saying, 'I was a blasphemer—the chief of sinners'.

(d) Some build their claim to righteousness on religious forms and ordinances alone. The Jews had ceremonies and observances in abundance. Men may pay attention to these, and yet be abominable in the sight of God (1 Sam. xv. 22, 23).

III. 'But what are we to do?' 'You seem to have shut us up without hope.' 'You said we must have some righteousness; and now you say that we have none of our own; what are we to do?' Beloved, God can be a just God, and yet show mercy and justify the most ungodly. 'The Lord' is, and must be, 'our righteousness.' Here is a mystery of wisdom and love. The Lord Jesus has done and suffered what we ought to have done and suffered. He has taken our place, and become our Substitute, both in life and death. Is not His Name then rightly called 'The Lord our Righteousness?'

REFERENCES.—XXIII. 6.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vii. No. 895. "Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. vii. p. 261. Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. ii. p. 214. S. R. Driver, Sermons on Subjects Connected With the Old Testament, p. 204. Bishop Hampden, Sermons at Oxford, p. 109. Bishop Andrewes, Sermons, vol. v. p. 104. Philip Henry in Matthew Henry's Works, Appendix, p. 24. Whitefield's "Sermons," Works, vol. v. p. 216. Wesley's "Sermons," Works, vol. v. p. 234. Simeon, Works, vol. ix. p. 166. Bishop Heber, Parish Sermons, vol. iii. p. 437. Lord Arthur Hervey, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 345. Dean Alford, ibid. vol. ii. p. 214. Bishop Bickersteth (the late), Clerical World, vol. i. p. 117. Saphir, "Jehovah Tsidkenu," Christian World Pulpit, vol. xiii. p. 104; and see Geikie's Hours With the Bible, vol. vi. p. 63 (note). XXIII. 7, 8.—II. Scott Holland, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1904, p. 204; see also Church Times, vol. li. 1904, p. 50. XXIII. 8.—J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 9. G. W. Herbert, Notes of Sermons, p. 202. XXIII. 24.—R. F. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 97. P. McAdam Muir, Modern Substitutes for Christianity, p. 65. XXIII. 28.—J. Guinness Rogers, ibid. vol. xlv. 1903, p. 392. G. Lorimer, ibid. vol. lix. 1901, p. 253. J. Tolesfree Parr, ibid. vol. lix. 1901, p. 267. XXIII. 28, 29.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 71. XXIII. 29.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2460. XXIV. 6, 7.—C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 264. XXIV. 7.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xx. No. 1206. XXV. 8, 9.—Newton H. Marshall, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 33. XXVI. 8.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 115. XXVI. 11.—J. B. Mozley, Sermons Parochial and Occasional, p. 233. XXVIII. 10, 11.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 199. XXVIII. 13.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xviii. No. 1032. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 322. XXVIII. 16.—T. De Witt Talmage, Sermons, p. 309. XXIX. 7.—"Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. i. p. 236. XXIX. 11.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiii. No. 1905. XXIX. 13.—R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. i. p. 144. Lieut.-Col. J. Barnsley, A Book of Lay Sermons, p. 207. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1313; vol. xxv. No. 1457. XXX. 1-22.—Ibid. vol. xlv. No. 2654. XXX. 7.—Ibid. vol. xlv. No. 2645. XXX. 17.—Ibid. vol. xxxix. No. 1753. XXX. 21.—Ibid. vol. xxviii. No. 1673. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 15. J. Vaughan, Fifty Sermons (9th Series), p. 219.

RELIGION IN THE FAMILY

'At the same time, saith the Lord, will I be the God of all the families of Israel, and they shall be My people.'—JEREMIAH XXXI. 1.

WHAT constitutes a godly home? The acknowledgment of God in all things. Making His will the governing principle. There can be no godly household where that is not done.

I. Where the will of God is placed first there will be order—an inestimable blessing in a home. God is not the God of confusion in the home or the Church. A man or woman who truly walks with God will soon become ashamed of disorder and slovenliness. And where God is the God of the family, and not merely the God of the Church, there will be order. The father and mother will take their proper place at the head of the household, and govern it and administer it as a trust for God. There will be no tyranny, no caprice; but there will be firm order, and an insistence upon it, and a constant striving after it.

II. There will be unselfishness. Not every one doing that which is right in his own eyes, but every one asking, 'What is the will of God?' And there will be a perpetual and relentless war upon selfishness. Care for others will be supreme. Consideration of others will prevail. Kindness will be paramount, and it will be a happy service to render it.

III. Where God is the God of the family, His will will govern the whole policy of the home. Such matters as the education of the children, the treatment of servants, such matters as dress and evening parties, as books and games, are sadly in want of a Christian standard. They are matters about which some Christian people think, or seem to think, that there is no will of God, and they simply follow the fashion, that is, the fashion of the world, and sometimes money dominates, and sometimes your neighbour's custom. And we shall not get right in any of these matters until we recognize that there is a will of God in them, and it is not a question of what my neighbour practises, and allows or condemns. Not my narrow neighbour on the one hand, nor my broad neighbour on the other, but 'What is the Christian standard? what is the will of God?' and I must be brave enough to follow that.

IV. And there is another side to this fair and lovely picture. It is suggested by the last line in the verse. Wherever you have a number of people set on doing God's will and placing that will first, there you have most surely God's protection and safe keeping.—C. BROWN, Light and Life, p. 137.

REFERENCES.—XXXI. 1.—C. Brown, God and Man, p. 95. XXXI. 1-26.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2726. XXXI. 3.—Ibid. vol. xxxii. No. 1914; vol. xxxvi. No. 2149; vol. i. No. 2880. J. S. Mavor, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 109. J. Tulloch, Sundays at Balmoral, p. 18. S. Martin, Westminster Chapel Sermons, p. 61. R. E. Hutton, The Crown of Christ, vol. ii. p. 253. G. Brett, Fellowship With God, p. 132. XXXI. 10, 11.—John Clifford, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 161. XXXI. 14.—H. W. Webb-Peploe, Calls to Holiness, p. 53. XXXI. 14 and 25.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlvii. No. 2726. XXXI. 18.—Ibid. vol. xlii. No. 743. XXXI. 18-20.—Ibid. vol. xxxv. No. 2104. XXXI. 31-34.—Ibid. vol. xlviii. No. 2762. H. P. Liddon, Christmastide in St. Paul's, p. 38. A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 261. XXXI. 33. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ii. No. 93; vol. xxviii. No. 1687; vol. lii. No. 2992. XXXI. 34.—Ibid. vol. xxviii. No. 1685; vol. xxxiv. No. 2006. E. Griffith-Jones, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxii. 1907, p. 282. XXXI. 36.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 332. XXXI. 37.—Ibid. p. 336. XXXII. 1-27.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 2675. XXXII. 8-10.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 241.

EVIDENCES SEALED AND EVIDENCES OPEN.

'Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; Take these evidences, this evidence of the purchase, both which is sealed, and this evidence which is open, and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days.'—JEREMIAH XXXII. 14.

THE placing of the deeds in an earthen vessel or vase was of course peculiar to this case. It was intended to preserve them from damp and decay in their secret hiding-place during the long years of the captivity, as Jerusalem ere many months would be destroyed by the King of Babylon.

I. Consider this mode of the authentication of purchase of property as an illustration of one of the evidences of the truth of the Word of God.

One of the great features of Christianity is that it is based on facts. What Professor Rawlinson says of the historical statements of the New Testament is equally true of the Old. 'When a shallow learning and a defective knowledge of the records of the past have led men to think that they had found a slip or a mistake, and a shout of triumph has been raised, profounder research has always demonstrated the veracity and accuracy of the sacred writer, and has exposed the ignorance of the assailant.' Some years ago a Yorkshire clothier lost a bale of cloth. He suspected a neighbour who was in the same business, and whose character was 'none of the best'. He entered his neighbour's warehouse, and pointing to a bale which he immediately recognized said, 'That is mine'. The rogue said, 'Prove it'. The owner of the bale was in a difficulty and went home. He was convinced that he was right, and yet how could he prove his case? One night as he lay awake he suddenly said, 'I have it'. Next morning he took witnesses and said to his suspected neighbour, 'Will you let me take that bale to the drying croft?' The man could not well refuse. The croft is the place where the cloth, after being dyed, is stretched on long, strong needles attached to posts. In this croft no two posts were equally distant. Our friend, taking the cloth, fitted the first needle into the first hole on the edge of the cloth, the second needle exactly agreed with the second hole, and so on to the end. The distances between the holes in the cloth exactly corresponded with the distances between the needles. The case was clear—the proof was certain. There are 1000 needles, so to speak, in the Bible, and there are 1000 holes in the land in which the Book was written and in the countries to which the Book refers. Take the cloth to the croft—the Book to the lands; compare the narrative with the history of the world to which it continually refers, and in every instance, the needle corresponds with the hole. The open evidence is one with the sealed. The mode of evidence which was used by the Jewish people to prove the certainty of purchase strikingly illustrates to my mind this mode of authenticating the veracity of the words of the living God.

II. My text is a striking illustration of spiritual truth. It is in redemption spiritual as it is in redemption literal; there must be two kinds of evidence, sealed and open, to make the title good; so that if either of these be deficient, the claim or title to the Divine heritage is invalid, and we have no manifested interest in the precious blood and righteousness of Jesus Christ, through which alone there is forgiveness of sin and an entrance into everlasting life.

1. There are the evidences which are sealed or secret, which cannot be seen, and read, and known of men. (a) The revelation of Christ to the heart in His person and work as adapted to our necessities is a sealed evidence. (b) A spirit of adoption is a sealed or secret evidence. (c) A secret love to God's people is an evidence that God hath 'sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts'. 'We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love the brethren.' (d) I can only mention one other evidence of a like character, and that is the love of truth, the loyal allegiance of the soul to all revealed truth. From the time that the entrance of the Word giveth light, the soul loves the light, and continually craves for it.

2. Consider the open evidences. Remember that this kind of evidence, in verification of the purchase by Jeremiah of the field of Hanameel, was open, that it might be seen, might be read, might be known. To make it manifest that we have an interest in that which Christ has purchased for us, there must not only be the secret evidence within the soul, but the open parchment of a godly and consistent life. A religion which begins and ends with emotion can give no real evidence of our title to everlasting life. We must look to it that we have open evidences as well as sealed, for both are equally needed to prove our title good.

III. 'Put them in an earthen vessel to continue many days.' I believe that the application of these words is to the final restoration of the Jewish people to the land of their fathers; but we are distinctly taught that the captivity in Babylon is a type and picture of the captivity of death and the grave. This thought runs through Psalm and prophecy. The earthen vessel seems to describe the Christian here, frail, of the earth earthy, at present unrecognized as regards his princely condition, and yet one for whom the inheritance is kept.—J. W. BARDSLEY, Many Mansions, p. 232.

REFERENCES.—XXXII. 14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, xxxix. No. 2297. XXXII. 17.—Ibid. vol. viii. No. 462. XXXII. 26, 27.—Ibid. vol. xxxiv. No. 2020. XXXII. 27.—Ibid. vol. xvi. No. 2675. C. Holland, Gleanings from a Ministry of Fifty Years, p. 92. XXXII. 30-42.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxix. No. 2316. XXXII. 39.—Ibid. vol. xxvii. No. 1623. XXXII. 40.—Ibid. vol. xxxv. No. 2108.

THE ENTHUSIASM OF GOD

'With My whole heart and with My whole soul.'—JEREMIAH XXXII. 41.

God is telling His people the great things He purposes to do for them, and He declares He will accomplish all with His whole heart and with His whole soul. Here we are brought face to face with the kindling fact that God is a God of enthusiasm.

I. God is Enthusiastic.

Enthusiasm is an impressive element of Bible theology. It is God's quenchless enthusiasm which is to establish in triumph the ever-increasing kingdom and peace of Emmanuel. All Christian missionary crusades have as the guarantee of their victory the enthusiasm of God.

If enthusiasm be a quality which Old Testament theology ascribes to God, it is also emphatically accredited to Him by the theology of the New Covenant. It is revealed as an outstanding feature of Him to have seen Who is the Father. 'With My whole heart and with My whole soul' was the motto of His Incarnate life.

Enthusiasm must surely be an essential of a true theology. One cannot conceive of an impassioned God. The very idea and etymology of the word 'enthusiasm' involves God. An ancient Greek finely described enthusiasm as 'a God within'. And such all grand enthusiasm is, and must be evermore.

II. God is Enthusiastic Concerning Human Character.

God's 'people' represent character. And God's enthusiasm for character is shown in His enthusiasm for His people.

The fact is, nothing in man creates such enthusiasm on God's part as the instituting and enhancing of character. Your soul is that in you in which God is most interested, and He is interested in everything about you. Christ's cross is the measure of God's enthusiasm for character.

III. God's Enthusiasm is Beneficent.

There are those whose so-called enthusiasm is self-centred. No altruism irradiates them. Nobody is anything bettered for them. God's zeal is to help, to bless, to enrich men.

IV. The Enthusiasm of God is Exemplary.

All enthusiasm is contagious. The awful peril is that we imitate evil enthusiasms. God's enthusiasm is the true ideal for man. 'Be ye imitators of God.'

V. There are things which do not excite God's enthusiasm.

God has no spark of enthusiasm for much that man burns about. This is apparent in the objects of their respective enthusiasms. God has no enthusiasm for self-centredness. God has no enthusiasm for worldliness. God has no enthusiasm for indifference. Stoicism is not sanctity.

VI. What a Claim God has on us by Reason of His Enthusiasm.

A God who, with His whole heart and His whole soul, seeks man's highest good, is a God who constrains our devotion.

Here is ground of trustfulness. Can I fear for the morrow when this God is mine? Here is ground of hope. All shall always be well, seeing such a God is mine. Here is ground of service. Too much one cannot do for such a God. Passion is reason in the service of such a God.

VII. We may safely Reckon on God's Enthusiasm, if we be His.

The mountains may depart and the hills be removed, but God's steadfast enthusiasm abideth. Pass through the wilderness gripping that beloved hand.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Enthusiasm of God, p. 1.

REFERENCES.—XXXII. 41.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2036. XXXIII. 3.—Ibid. vol. xi. No. 619; vol. xli. No. 2664. S. Martin, Comfort in Trouble, p. 161. XXXIII. 9.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 340; see also After the Resurrection, p. 156. XXXIII. 9.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1636. XXXIII. 11.—J. C. Hedley, Sermons in St. Edmund's College Chapel, p. 126. XXXIII. 15-26.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlii. No. 2472. XXXIII. 23.—F. Lynch, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lv. 1899, p. 236. XXXV. 2.—D. T. Young, Neglected People of the Bible, p. 147. XXXV. 12.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 137. A. N. Obbard, Plain Sermons, p. 71. XXXV. 16.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 351. XXXV. 18, 19.—A. Phelps, The Old Testament A Living Book for All Ages, p. 201. XXXVI. 3.—C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 316.

JEHOIAKIM'S PENKNIFE

'Now the king sat in the winter-house in the ninth month: and there was a fire on the hearth burning before him. And it came to pass, that when Jehudi had read three or four leaves, he cut it with the penknife, and cast it into the fire that was on the hearth, until all the roll was consumed in the fire that was on the hearth. Yet they were not afraid, nor rent their garments, neither the king, nor any of his servants that heard all these words. Nevertheless Elnathan and Delaiah and Gemariah had made intercession to the king that he would not burn the roll: but he would not hear them.'—JEREMIAH XXXVI. 22-25.

JEHOIAKIM sends for the roll; it is brought; he commands it to be read. But when only two or three columns have been read to him, he takes it from the reader, and deliberately cuts it into pieces with his penknife, and throws it into the fire, so that all is destroyed. And that was the answer of Jehoiakim to the Lord and His prophet.

I. This was an act of peculiar and intolerable wickedness, burdened with every aggravation possible.

1. It was committed in defiance of luminous evidence that the prophecies of Jeremiah were indeed the word of the living God.

2. The act of the king was the worse, in that the Word which he so treated was a word not only of threatened wrath and judgment, but also of tender entreaty and still proffered grace.

3. It was committed despite earnest remonstrance from some of those that stood by.

4. To make the deed as bad as possible, this was done on a public fast day, when professedly the king and people were confessing their sins, and imploring the grace and help of God in the nation's extremity!

This destruction of the roll of the book of Jeremiah was not only very wicked, but no less foolish and useless. The Word of the Lord could not be hindered from fulfilment because the roll on which it was written was burnt.

II. The reasons which probably moved Jehoiakim in his treatment of God's Word are undoubtedly still in operation in the case of many who, like him, reject the Word of God. Primarily, Jehoiakim's reason for his treatment of Jeremiah's prophecy was that there was in the message so much which to him, a fast young man, bent on luxury and display, and endeavouring to combine wickedness with an easy and popular form of religion, was not pleasant.

The true reason for the most of scepticism is not found in inability of the understanding of the intellect. It is not found in the head at all, but in the heart—in the will.

And then the young king was proud. He was filled, apparently, with an egregious conceit of his own importance. He was a cultured young man; he was a connoisseur in architecture—as Jeremiah tells us, he was striving to excel in fine building in the precious cedar. But Jeremiah took no account of this. He dealt with him just as with any common, uncultivated, unpolished sinner. And this made the king angry.

III. To reject God's Word is both wicked and foolish. (1) It is wicked because, as it comes to us to-day, it comes supported by the most overwhelming evidence of its Divine authority. (2) Because if in the Word of God is announcement of wrath and warning, there is also in it an expression and a revelation of the tenderest love and grace. (3) Because all who hear these words have, like Jehoiakim, again and again been warned against rejecting it. (4) Because most if not all of us are like Jehoiakim at that time in this also, that we profess to give the Lord a certain degree of outward honour. We profess to be, at least in a general sense, Christians.

To reject the Word of God is as foolish as it is wicked. For with us, as with Jehoiakim, that Word will go on to fulfilment.—S. H. KELLOGG, The Past a Prophecy of the Future, p. 219.

REFERENCES.—XXXVI. 22-24.—S. Wilberforce, Sermons Preached on Various Occasions, p. 12. XXXVI. 23.—J. Thain Davidson, The City Youth, p. 225. T. De Witt Talmage, Sermons, p. 41. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part iv. p. 234. XXXVI. 23, 24.—E. Fowle, Plain Preaching to Poor People (1st Series), p. 15. XXXVI. 24.—"Plain Sermons" by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. i. p. 177. Harvey Goodwin, Parish Sermons, p. 222. XXXVI. 26.—C. Jordan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 161.

THE WRITING ON THE ROLL

'Take thee again another roll, and write in it all the former words that were in the first roll, which Jehoiakim the King of Judah hath burned.'—JEREMIAH XXXVI. 28.

Jehoiakim was one of the wickedest of the kings of Judah. God ordered Jeremiah to write words of warning in a book or roll, and send it to the king, so that even yet he and his people might repent, and the terrible calamity be averted. Jehoiakim, when he had heard a small part of the message, took the roll and cut it in strips and threw them into the fire. But God will save him and the nation, if possible, in spite of themselves; and so, in the text, we find God ordering Jeremiah to take another roll and write in it all the former words of warning and implied promise.

I. Some of the Rolls in which God Writes His Will:—

(a) Nature. 'Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge.' 'Doth not nature itself teach you?' It tells of God's power and wisdom and goodness.

(b) The history of the world. Its course speaks of the justice of its Almighty Governor. It speaks of the reign of law, of the punishment of sin, of the struggle and triumph of righteousness.

(c) The human conscience. There are written in it, as in a roll, the eternal truths that God is angry at sin, that He approves and loves the good.

(d) The experience of men. Looking back upon past experience, every man knows and feels that he has been goaded by an unseen power into what was just and right and merciful, and that his kicking against the goads has pierced him with sorrows, and left him scarred with sad reminders of the conflict.

(e) The Word of God. God's law is perfect, and converts the soul. The other rolls from their very nature could only be written in a few large and general characters. They are hieroglyphs rather than words or letters, or, at best, are like some rude and simple language, capable only of expressing the very simplest thoughts. But the Bible is pre-eminently a word, drawing, as from a deep, exhaustless well, the very thoughts and purposes of a gracious Father.

(f) The life and death of the Lord Jesus. There we see the very heart of God revealed.

II. Many Burn the Rolls.—Every one of the ways in which the truth and will of God and His very existence have been declared has been gainsaid. The books have been thrown into the fires of criticism and satire and passionate denial. Nature and the heart of man have been pronounced confused and contradictory in their teaching, or even utterly dumb. The history of the world and the success of Christianity have been entirely accounted for by secondary causes. The Bible has been scouted as old wives' fables, and a revelation from God has been pronounced impossible. Even our Blessed Lord is rejected, or, even as now, regarded as a teacher and reformer rather than as the Saviour and Lord.

III. Yet all God's Words are Preserved.—'I will turn aside,' said Moses, 'and see this great sight, why the bush is not burned.' It is a simple fact that God's words have not failed or been destroyed. The fires have burned fiercely, but 'the Scripture cannot be broken'; and the heart and conscience of man comes out of the fire with the finger of God more clearly and solemnly traceable in it than ever

God writes again 'the former words' in the rolls of men's hearts. The crowning blessing of the Gospel is contained in the promise, 'I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they shall be my people'.

THE FATAL BARTER

Then took Jeremiah another roll, and gave it to Baruch the scribe, the son of Neriah; who wrote therein, from the mouth of Jeremiah, all the words of the book which Jehoiakim king of Judah had burned in the fire: and there were added besides unto them many like words.*—JEREMIAH XXXVI. 32.

A REAL parallel exists between the contemptuous rejection of the scroll by Jehoiakim and the rejection of revelation by many to-day. Far from anything being gained by such rejection, all the old problems revive in exaggerated forms. We may decline the explanations, threatenings, and hopes of these sacred pages; yet the enigmas of life are still with us, and they appear in forms deeper and darker than ever.

I. The Genesis and Design of the World.—These constitute one of the first problems pressing for solution. Revelation declares that the world in which we find ourselves, and wherein we must work out our destiny, is the creation of the living, intelligent, and omnipotent God; that in Him it lives, moves, and has its being; and that He governs it to a wise, just, and benevolent end. Many find this explanation entirely unsatisfactory, and reject it; but, having refused the interpretation of revelation, are we in any better position in relation to the question of the origin, meaning, and end of things? Can we discover any more reasonable explanation of the source of the world, of its government and design?

To conclude that this world of manifold wonder and beauty; this human race, with reason, science, love, and piety; these long ages of history, implying harmony and design—that all has arisen like a vapour out of the fires of the sun, is surely to aggravate the riddle of the universe and not to dissolve it. To assume that the orb has given birth to so many things greater than itself is to assume the impossible.

To believe in a personal God as the fountain of life and thought, beauty and joy, is, we confess, to rest in a great mystery; but such faith is far more reasonable than that of the fire-worshipper. The problem of the world may not be put aside. It is the first of the obstinate questionings; we cannot escape it, it insistently demands consideration; and, refusing the explanation of revelation, we can only fall back on irrational and incredible theories.

Denying this sublime conception of the first Cause and sovereign Upholder of the universal frame, we 'cannot choose an object more worthy of our worship than the luminary adored by our ancestors'. Surely there is more luminary than luminousness; we have not gained anything, but lost much, by consigning the sacred writing to the brazier. The enigma of the world returns, the difficulties are greater than ever; 'many like words have been added unto it'.

II. The Question of Liberty.—Revelation by many is renounced in the name of liberty. Our freedom, they hold, is arbitrarily narrowed by the sacred law-givers. And these emancipated ones have placed on record the sense of enlargement and rapture they experienced when first they felt themselves free of the incubus of the righteous God and His commandments; yet, though we repudiate the throne, statutes, and government of God, we must still recognize the dominion of law, unrestricted liberty being simply impossible.

It may be argued, however, that if the necessity for law survives the destruction of revelation, we may create for ourselves a wider and worthier freedom. Let us, then, inquire whether this is likely. Mark three points as characteristic of the law laid down by revelation for the regulation of human conduct.

1. It assures us of our freedom. From the beginning to the end it distinguishes between us and necessitated nature. Everywhere it upholds the liberty of the human spirit, regards the power of choice as the essence of our greatness, and invests us with responsibility for our character and action. That we are no part of the mechanical world is the fundamental assumption of revelation, therein agreeing with the universal consciousness.

2. The Divine law as expressed in revelation claims obedience as the law of reason, right, and love; and all may see that in keeping such law is liberty indeed. The higher law, as laid down in God's Word, contains nothing that does not commend itself to the understanding, the conscience, and the heart. But forswearing revelation, we must perforce turn to nature; and what now is the gain? If modern science teaches one thing clearly, it is that nature does not furnish high laws of conduct. And if we turn from the material universe and seek the laws of conduct in our own ambiguous nature, we find no royal law of liberty. The book of the soul is as blotted and obscure as the page of nature.

3. Law as expressed in revelation is softened by Divine clemency; it expresses a gracious element elsewhere lacking. Monmsen writes concerning Roman law: 'It seemed as if the law found a pleasure in presenting on all sides its sharpest spikes, in drawing the most extreme consequences, in forcibly obtruding on the bluntest understanding the tyrannic nature of right'. This is not the characteristic of the legalism of revelation. The severe claims of the Old Testament are yet mellowed by the sentiment of consideration, sympathy, and tenderness.

A great love glows through all the austerity of the Mosaic dispensation. And the burden of the New Testament is God's grace to a world of sinners; it is one incomparable proclamation of pity, forgiveness, and salvation.

On the score of freedom, then, how much advantaged are we by the repudiation of the sacred canon? No better; only infinitely worse. Having before been beaten with whips, we are now chastised with scorpions. The freedom of the soul, the righteousness of law, the reality of grace, are precious doctrines surrendered. We dethrone the just and gracious Lawgiver, and, having broken His golden sceptre, proceed to occupy His place with blind, dark, capricious shapes, or shapelessnesses, called Fate, Force, Chance, Nemesis, Necessity, Destiny. The writing comes back, and many words, many terrible and painful words, are added to it.—W. L. WATKINSON, The Fatal Barter, pp. 1-19.

REFERENCES.—XXXVI. 32.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 353. XXXVII. 1.—Ibid. p. 357.

THE PUNISHMENT OF EVIL

'Thus saith the Lord: Deceive not yourselves, saying, The Chaldeans shall surely depart from us: for they shall not depart. For though ye had smitten the whole army of the Chaldeans that fight against you, and there remained but wounded men among them, yet should they rise up every man in his tent, and burn this city with fire.'—JEREMIAH XXXVII. 9, 10.

THE great teaching of the text is that we must not allow appearances to mislead us respecting the fact and certainty of the law of retribution.

I. We mark some illustrations of the law of retribution furnished by the history of the nations. The Old Testament records many instances of the fact that God makes the law of retribution to act by unlikely instruments, in unlikely ways, and at unlikely times. Very memorable was the retribution that Israel brought on Egypt. At the other end of their national history, Israel itself furnishes a most striking illustration of the working of the law of retribution through all improbabilities. When the Christ was crucified through weakness, the people cried, 'His blood be upon us, and upon our children'. How unlikely did it seem that the Victim of Calvary could ever be avenged upon an unjust nation! And yet that 'wounded Man' rose up invested with strange powers, and burned their city with fire. Let us not think that these instances of retribution are to be placed in the category of the miraculous; they were the natural consequences of great denials of truth and justice. Men unjustly 'pierced through' are terrible avengers in all ages and nations.

II. We note the law of retribution as exemplified in the individual life. What is true of the mass is first true of the atom; what is true of the ocean is first true of the drop. It is easy to see the law of retribution when it is exemplified in the broad effects of national calamity, but not so easy to apprehend its action in the individual fortune. 'Deceive not yourselves.' God has wonderful ways of confounding us, and we may be sure that our sins will find us out.

1. Let us not permit ourselves to be deceived by glattering prophets. God is merciful, but fire does not forget to burn, teeth to tear, water to drown, and no transgression of the Law can pass without detection and punishment.

2. Let us not deceive ourselves because appearances seem to promise immunity. When Joseph's brethren had thrown their young brother into a pit and left him there, how utterly hopeless seemed the lad's condition! He was to all intents and purposes buried alive, and it seemed absolutely impossible that he should ever avenge himself upon the fratricides. But in due time the wounded man was on the throne of Egypt, and the strong-handed clever sinners were lamenting, 'Verily we are guilty concerning our brother'.

3. Let us not deceive ourselves because judgment is delayed. As the Hindoos say, 'When men are ripe for slaughter, even straws turn into thunderbolts'.

4. Let us improve the gracious respite. Many rebel altogether against the doctrine of grace, sternly insisting on inexorable law, justice, retribution; they utterly reprobate the ideas of repentance, forgiveness, and salvation. But mercy is a fact as much as justice is. The death of Calvary is the most solemn and tremendous sanction ever given to law, and yet it opens a door of escape to a world of sinners. There is forgiveness with Him, and plenteous redemption.—W. L. WATKINSON, The Transfigured Sackcloth, p. 131.

REFERENCES.—XXXVII. 11-21.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 361. XXXVII. 17.—J. Paterson, British Weekly Pulpit, vol. ii. p. 597. XXXVIII.—T. Champness, New Coins from Old Gold, p. 206. XXXVIII. 3, 4; XL. 4; XL. 6.—F. W. Aveling, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvi. 1899, p. 324. XXXVIII. 5.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 221. XXXVIII. 7.—D. T. Young, Neglected People of the Bible, p. 165. XXXVIII. 24-26.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 221. XXXIX. 1-10.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 367. XXXIX. 18.—Ibid. p. 374. XL. 4-6.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 47. XLIII.—13 (R.V.).—C. Jordan, Pastures of Tender Grass, p. 142. XLIV. 4.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xvi. No. 2684. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 377. Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 3. W. M. Taylor, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 248. W. Michell, Plain Preaching for a Year, vol. i. p. 236. Hugh Black, University Sermons, p. 9. XLV. 1-5.—A. Ramsay, Studies in Jeremiah, p. 159. Stopford A. Brooke, The Old Testament and Modern Life, p. 319.

THE MINUTE PHILOSOPHER

'Seekest thou great things for thyself? Seek them not.'—JEREMIAH XLV. 5.

SERVICE is perhaps life's best interpretation.

I. To rise in life, then, is never to escape from service. The nobler and better we are growing, the more entangled shall we be in a far-reaching servitude. Jesus has taught us that service is the true measurement of greatness. He is the least whose service is the poorest. He is the greatest whose service is the best. Could we forget ourselves, and serve mankind in life and death, we should be growing Christlike.

In service too, and nowhere else, lies our true liberty. True freedom is never liberty from service. True freedom is always liberty to serve.

II. If life be service, how all-important is it for you and me to learn the art of serving well. The best and richest service you can render is often not the service of great things but of small.

We begin to see the truth of that when we remember how largely our lives are compact of little things. Even to the greatest, the chance of doing great things rarely comes.

So then, if life be service, and if the bulk of life is made up of little things, the service that neglects these lesser elements must fail. A saint is one who sanctifies life's trifles.

Do you not think that service in the small things is often the hardest service in the world? To work on, serve on, love on, unnoticed and unpraised, is perhaps the finest heroism earth can show.

Again mark this, as telling the importance of these little acts. Only through the small services of life faithfully done can you and I be disciplined for the great services when God is pleased to send them. God measures the service that He will give us tomorrow, not from our talents so much as from the faithfulness with which we serve to-day.

And after all, how can you tell which act is small, which great? These measurements are human, not Divine. God's standard is very different from ours.

III. What the world needs above all else to-day is consecrated character, and that is just what service in small things shows. God brings the glory of the autumn hills out of a million indecipherable heather-bells. God brings the glory of the rainbow out of a million indistinguishable drops. And God can bring the glory of a consecrated character out of that countless multitude of little deeds that form our life.—G. H. MORRISON, Flood-Tide, p. 241.

Illustration.—Great services reveal our possibilities. Small services reveal our consecration.

And in the latter, rather than in the former, lies your best hope of influencing the world. Bridge-builders build our bridges seven or eight times stronger than the ordinary traffic needs. And bridges are rarely tested to the utmost. They do their best work carrying the daily loads. Still, if the strain should come, the strength is there. So you and I have latent powers and slumbering capacities. And some day, perhaps, all shall be needed. But now—to-day—it is in life's common traffic, and the brave carrying of life's common loads, that we shall serve best, and glorify God in a consecrated life.—G. H. MORRISON, Flood-Tide, p. 251.

REFERENCES.—XLVII. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxiv. No. 2025. XLVII. 6, 7.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 380. XLVIII. 11, 12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiii. No. 761. XLIX. 8.—Ibid. vol. xviii. No. 1085. L. 1.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 385.

THE WAY OF CONTRITION.

*In those days, and in that time, saith the Lord, the children of Israel shall come, they and the children of Judah together, going and weeping: they shall go, and seek the Lord their God. They shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward, saying, Come, and let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten.—JEREMIAH L. 4, 5.

Our spiritual life as a life of contrition is typified for us in the return of the children of Israel to Jerusalem from their long exile in Babylon.

I. Of necessity, contrition must be the first stage of spiritual life. For what is contrition? The Bible definition of contrition is, sorrow, sorrow that is in union with God. Contrition is no passing paroxysm, it is a state of abiding spiritual sorrow; we are taken by the Spirit of God into union with God, and therefore the Spirit is ever acting upon our mind and heart and will.

In its essence, contrition is the virtue that unites the sinner's will with the Will of God. Sin, in its essence, is the variance of the will of the creature from the known Will of the Creator. As a necessary consequence, therefore, sin involves spiritual death. And equally of necessity, contrition involves the recovery of life.

II. Let us see how the Spirit leads us along this tear-stained path of penitence.

1. It is generally recognized that there are two distinct stages in the contrite life. The first is the stage of initial contrition; it is that stage into which we pass by spiritual awakening, and out of which we pass when, through the tasting of the Divine forgiveness, we enter into the peace of God. In other words, initial contrition is the contrition which precedes and leads up to a true conversion.

2. But this is a transitory stage. Does contrition then come to an end after the message of forgiveness is heard and believed in? Is the sinner set free from the guilt of sin in order that he may go forth and forget it? No, this cannot be the case, unless he is lacking in all true generosity. In every generous heart this will be the resolve: Because God forgives me so freely, I will never forgive myself; so that instead of forgiveness drying up the sorrow of contrition, it has upon it a double effect—it takes out of it every low and selfish element, and it intensifies our sorrow instead of making it cease to be.

III. So the Spirit leads us along the path of contrition, and we see that our spiritual life as lived under the guidance of the Living Jesus must be always a life of sustained contrition, a contrition not only deepened and intensified, but continuous. And this for many reasons.

1. Our sin is continuous.

2. We carry into our new life a great deal of what we contracted in our evil past.

3. When we pass into union with God we do not cancel the influence which thoughtlessly or deliberately we used against Christ in our past days of disobedience.

Surely of us, as of Israel of old, it should be true that we 'go upon our way weeping'.—GEORGE BODDY, The Guided Life, p. 29.

REFERENCES.—L. 4, 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlix. No. 1752. H. Scott Holland, Church Times, vol. xlii. 1899, p. 273. L. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2566. W. Brooke, ibid. p. 194. L. 11, 12.—J. P. Gledstone, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxxvii. 1890, p. 230. L. 20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2789.

THE UNLIKELY INSTRUMENTS OF GOD

'Babylon hath been a golden cup in the Lord's hand.'—
JEREMIAH LI. 7.

BABYLON, then, for all its power and all its independence, was an instrument of God, and no one can deeply study the Word of God without coming to perceive the awful emphasis that it lays on the fact of instrumentality.

I. Now sometimes the blindest eye can see how exquisitely the instruments of God are fitted to the task God has in hand. But is not the general rule the very opposite? I think it is the reverse that strikes us most.

1. Think, for example, of the instrument which He used to keep alive the knowledge of His name. A man could not do it, it required a nation; God's name is too great for one man to hold in trust; but of all the unlikely nations in the world, I think Israel was the most unlikely. To the human eye that seems the worst of choices, and yet that nation was the chosen of God. Israel became the instrument of heaven. It was Israel that was the cradle of the Christ.

2. Whenever I think of God's unlikely instruments, I think of little Samuel in the temple. God chose a little child to be His instrument.

II. Now if Jesus of Nazareth be the Son of God, I shall expect to find Him adopting the same procedure. I surmise from His very methods that Christ was

Son of God whenever I think of His choice of the disciples. Twelve men, provincial and unlettered—and all the world against them in the battle. Yet by such men, inspired by the Holy Ghost, victories were won that changed the world.

III. What, then, does that inexplicable feature of God's choice mean for you and me?

First it guards us against putting limits upon God. Who shall dare say what powers may not be used by heaven if even Babylon be a golden cup in the Lord's hand? That is the first use of God's unlikely instruments. It makes us watchful, open-hearted, very humble. We must be alive to possibilities of usefulness, or the chances are we may be missing God.

And it should make us very strong when we are called to any little service. The men who think that they are fit for anything are very seldom fit for God's work. But the men who cry, as Jeremiah cried, 'Ah, Lord God, I am a child, and cannot speak'—it is such men whose lips are touched with fire, whose hearts are emboldened, and whose way is opened. For God is not bent on glorifying you; God is bent on glorifying Jesus.—G. H. MORRISON, Sun-Rise, p. 240.

REFERENCES.—LI. 50.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlv. No. 2648. LII. 1-11.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Isaiah and Jeremiah, p. 398. LII. 8-11.—A. Phelps, The Old Testament A Living Book for All Ages, p. 215.

LAMENTATIONS

LAMENTATIONS

REFERENCE.—I. 1.—A. P. Stanley, Sermons on Special Occasions, p. 310. I. 9.—W. L. Watkinson, The Blind Spot, p. 255.

CIVIC APATHY

(A Sermon for Women)

'Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto My sorrow, which is done unto Me.'—LAMENTATIONS I. 12.

I. The Home-Side of Patriotism.—Is it not a serious matter to find such multitudes in all our large towns and cities who have little or no sense of what it means to belong to a great community, who have little or no idea of the life in common and of the responsibility and duty which all share? There are many around us who do not care anything for the problems of a great city; do not indeed realize that there are any problems at all, except how to get more money, or more amusement in and from the city. It is only the few here and everywhere who care enough to give thought and time and toil to the things on which depend the public good.

II. The Cause of Indifference.—The causes of this indifference are many. (a) The love of ease and personal indulgence tempts many who might be rendering noble service to the community to be content with the conditions of citizens of the lowest class. (b) There is now, as there ever has been, a large number of men who are kept from all public work by their eagerness for the accumulation of worldly interests. It is nothing to them that thousands and thousands around them are at a woeful disadvantage in the struggle for existence and the attainment of good. Business dominates; they are men of business and nothing more.

III. The Citizenship of Women.—Though the women of to-day in our country as compared with the women of yesterday are more awake to the ideals and duties of citizenship, have wider interests and sympathies, and are not untouched by that new sense of social responsibility which is the centre of the times; yet the common lot of women still fails to develop in them a social spirit, a public soul. The selfish pride and vanity of men has much to do with the circumscribing of the sympathies and activities of our women. Man has for long claimed exclusively for himself the capacity to carry on all the higher work of the world. Though equality does not mean identity—each sex has its peculiarity of capacity of character, and therefore of service—yet there is no reason in the nature of things why women should not share with men on more equal terms all the largest aims of life and be able in spite of different gifts to do much in common. The womanly qualities are needed not only in the home but in the community, and just as they find expression and scope will the best life of the community be nourished and strengthened.

IV. What Women can do.—It is often asked what can women do in the way of social service without losing their womanliness? There is very little I think which they cannot do. Give the women of London and England the sense that they belong to a people; give them the feeling that they owe something to their city and country, that the uplifting of the community is part of their work, and you will not degrade but ennoble them, their life will not lose one particle of its real beauty and charm, but will gain immeasurably in depth and breadth and power.

V. Sacrifice for Citizenship.—We have been hearing much in recent days about revivals. One revival we sorely need, and we need it all over the country, is a genuine revival of civic patriotism, a national awakening of home patriotism. The command to seek first the kingdom of God, translated into the language of this generation, includes as one of its first implications the subordination of all private, party, and class aims and interests to the common good, the diligent and conscientious discharge of our civic duties.—J. HUNTER, Christian World Pulpit, vol. LXVIII, 1905, p. 273.

FOR GOOD FRIDAY

'All ye that pass by, see if any sorrow is like unto My sorrow?'—LAMENTATIONS I. 12.

I. GOOD FRIDAY a melancholy day. Our attention held against Christ's suffering.

II. What can we make of all this.

(a) Ordinarily we are repelled by human pain.

(b) The emotion which contemplation of pain produces is precluded. Pity for the suffering of Christ is an impertinence!

(c) Yet men are strangely drawn by the story. It is so free from repulsiveness. Dignity of the succinct narrative. Instead of being dragged down by His agony He exalted pain.

III. Christ by His 'sorrow' let Himself into Humanity's tragic economy.

IV. He sanctified suffering. Not made evil good, but gave it a meaning.

V. Chiefly; He bore our sins.—S. D. McCONNELL, Sermon Stuff, p. 51.

IS IT NOTHING TO YOU?

'Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?'—LAMENTATIONS I. 12.

Go back six hundred years in thought before the Crucifixion, and there you will see a city which, in spite of warning after warning, has got slack and careless, has endured a sixteen months' siege, gone through incredible hardships, and at last has given itself over into the hands of the conqueror. And there they pass by, this triumphant host, as it enters the conquered city. They jeer at those who are sitting on the roadside, and at last, as they come to a man—we know his name, this Jeremiah who is making his great lamentation—they wring from him who has warned the city, year after year, the cry of a wounded heart: 'Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by, you who jeer at us in our defeat, you who see these men and these women so cruelly emaciated, and our little children suffering so after the siege?' Who shall tell what that wounded cry of that great patriot was as they wrung from him that pathetic appeal, 'Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?'

The story is a parable of Passion time. Time passes, and the world is taken captive by the great arch-enemy. Warning after warning has been neglected by humanity, the great Captain is dying and nailed to the Cross, and, as the passers by go to and fro in front of Him, there come the words the Church has ever loved to put into His mouth, 'Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? You have conquered, you have gained a temporary victory. what use are you going to make of it?' And there still to-day, as we are in sight of Good Friday, that same cry rings out.

From the throne of His Cross, the King of grief
Cries out to a world of unbelief:
'Oh! men and women, afar and nigh,
Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?'

And what is our answer to-day to be?

If I were a great painter I would paint a picture of the Crucifixion, with a great Christ in the centre, and I would there place three different groups of passers by, as they listened to that great antiphon as it comes from the Redeemer's lips. I would place a group that was there—those to whom He was nothing; a group of those who did care; and a group of those who had learnt to care. That picture would sum up the state of humanity to-day.

I. The Appeal to Those who Care.—Look first at that large and ever-growing group that does care, when the appeal from the Cross is made—'Is it nothing to you?'—and who have seen the vision, and throw back the answer, 'Yes, it is something to us, nay it is everything to us as we pass by'. 'There stood by the cross of Jesus His mother.' She cared; it was something to that mother; and when I see the hundreds and thousands of mothers and fathers to-day who do care that their children should receive and pass on the old, old faith of Jesus and Him crucified, I am filled with hope for the state of the world. It is so easy to throw a cheap snarl or a nasty thrust at it, and never to see those thousands of men and women who, from their very hearts, like the Blessed Mother, are caring when they see the crucified Sufferer.

II. The Appeal to Those who do not Care.—There are still those, God help them! to whom it is nothing as they pass by. They will find themselves in company with those of whom it is said that they who passed by wagged their heads and reviled Him: not so many as there were, but you know, if you have ever tried for a fortnight to live the Christ life in the middle of the world, that you will come across that group of whom it can be said, 'It is nothing to them what went on for them on the first Good Friday'. And you may find yourselves standing with that group of soldiers who, sitting down, watched Him in cold, callous indifference, gambling, seizing as their perquisites the very clothes of the dear Lord as they jeer at Him in His dying moments. Do you mean to tell me that the world is no better now than it was when the soldiers, unrebuked by public opinion, could do that? Nineteen centuries of Christianity have left their mark upon the world, and though there are those to whom the appeal from the Cross is a matter of sheer indifference, I dare to say that their number is decreasing, and not increasing. There they are, just those few, and to them with all a man's pathos the Christ appeals.

III. The Appeal to Those who have Learnt to Care.—You must have something to tell them, before you can tell it, in your own hearts, and perhaps you have not got it. Then you will be standing in our third group, and be amongst those who did not care but who have learnt to care, those who find themselves in that group where there is the well-known figure of the dying thief, the one to whom it was nothing at first and then to whom it became something. As you look back upon life and know the sin that has got to be surrendered, then as you learn to care, the appeal from the Cross will get right home to you. You will say, 'I have learnt to care. I am like the centurion, like the soldier who little thought as he donned his uniform on the morning of the first Good Friday whose army he was going to belong to before Friday's evening shades were to fall. God saw humanity wandering, God at the Incarnation came down. At the Crucifixion He placed His picture, the express image of His Person, where all wanderers can see it, and there, won by His love, many and many a wanderer this week will see it, and yield themselves up to the claims of Jesus the Crucified.

IN VIEW OF THE PASSION

'Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?'—LAMENTATIONS
I. 12.

THE plain fact from the Hill of Calvary is this: that God has opened out Himself in this story of the Passion, for the regarding of them that pass by.

1. It may mean Much, or it may mean Little to You and Me.—

(a) We can ignore the Passion, the story of Calvary, if we will. It is easy to hide it under the drift of the things that we are doing day by day. It is easy to forget, it is easy to leave it out, it is easy to go our own way and to leave it unregarded.

(b) Or we may belittle it. There are those who look upon the Passion as just one of the events of ancient history that, perhaps, has had its share once in moulding men and creatures long ago, but which we may leave, noticed or unnoticed, with the dust of the forgotten past.

(c) Or we may resent it. I saw once a bitter wail of resentment against the preaching of Lent and of the Passiontide, as a false presentment of religion in the face of the growing spring, when all things bid a man renew himself and rejoice. It is a thing, this Passion of the Lord, it is a thing resented by the rich, and by the comfortable, and by the selfish, as a thing that is interfering with the enjoyment of the pleasures of the world.

II. Whatever you Think about it, it is There, it is here, immovable, confronting us. We have to do with it. No man can escape from it. It cannot be taken from you. You cannot take the Passion of the Lord out of the world's book, you cannot take the Passion of the Lord out of the world's imagination. It has coloured our imagination, it has set its mark in our literature, it has given the ideals which every one of you are pursuing, even those of you who, maybe, reject the name of Christ. It has coloured our ideals, it has set our tone, it has left its mark, it is there.

III. Nor can it be taken out of Christian Experience.—There are some of us, perhaps most of us who have come prepared to get its message, prepared to get its meaning. Long enough it may be with some of us here, long enough our consciences have been stirring blindly under the touch of God. My conscience is my spiritual faculty which is capable of perceiving the spiritual touch of God. Long enough we have been filled—have we not, or why are we here?—we have been filled with the desire for some assurance of His reality. To us, then, the Passion of the Lord is the sign, which witnesses to God's high seriousness. It is the sign of His earnest intention to stand by the man who is struggling, to stand by the girl who is afraid, to stand by the life that is daunted. It is the sign and mark of high seriousness that God Himself has come down to share in, not merely the glory of the world's achievement, but the Passion and the struggle of its people. Is it nothing, then, to you, all ye that pass by? It is a serious matter to God; it is a serious matter to you and me.

IV. What Means it to go Home and to Ignore this?—Shall I tell you what it means to go home and leave the Passion, and the Crucifixion, and the Cross, and the seriousness of God, and the sympathy of His Spirit, and the history of His Son? Shall I tell you what it means to leave all these things out of your life? It means this, that you will go home to bear and to take upon yourselves alone the burden and the judgment of your own life. This is the attempt of God to share with us, and if we will not join Him, if we will leave Him all to Himself, then, you and I, with our conscience, and our load, and our burdens, and our mixed motives, and our stained life, and our past history, and our sense of guilt, and the wrong we have done in the world, we, with all we have done, must stand the eternal judgment by ourselves; and what man will stand the judgment by himself? Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by, that the Lord desires to share judgment with us? Is it nothing to us, that God has taken a place which He opens out to every man who cares to join Him?

REFERENCES.—I. 12.—J. Keble, Sermons for the Holy Week, p. 183. E. M. Geldert, Faith and Freedom, p. 80. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxvii. No. 1620. J. M. Neale, Sermons Preached in Sackville College Chapel, pp. 280, 288. Ibid.—Readings for the Aged (4th Series), pp. 71, 82. E. Blencowe, Plain Sermons to a Country Congregation (2nd Series), p. 205.

TRUE DEVOTION

'Pour out thine heart like water before the face of the Lord: lift up thy hands toward Him.'—LAMENTATIONS II. 19.

WHERE there is love there is true devotion. There is true devotion when the object of love is God.

I. False devotion. People are apt to deceive themselves and suppose themselves to be devout when they are nothing of the sort. One is given to much frequenting of church, yet her heart all the while is full of rancour against a neighbour. Another mortifies and denies himself food and sleep, but takes no little pride in his austerities, and flatters himself he is becoming a saint. Another again is liberal in charities, but is chary of forgiveness to one who has wronged him.

II. True devotion consists in an eminent degree of love, which makes us prompt, active, and diligent in the observance of God's commandments. He who loves grieves to offend the person loved. True devotion is not acquired all at once, but as it grows it exhibits the three characteristics of contrition, love of prayer, self-sacrifice.

III. True devotion may be obtained—

- (a) By acquiring a love of God and a hatred of sin.
- (b) By constant recollection, or abiding in the presence of God.
- (c) By oblation of all we do and all we suffer to Him.
- (d) By frequent and exact purification of conscience.
- (e) By frequent communion.—S. BARING-GOULD, Sermon-Sketches, p. 191.

REFERENCES.—II. 19.—A. P. Manley, Sermons on Special Occasions, p. 310. S. Baring-Gould, One Hundred Sermon-Sketches, p. 191. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. ii. No. 59. III. 16.—T. Hooke, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxv. p. 325.

THE SHADOW OF THE CROSS

(For Palm Sunday)

'Remembering mine affliction and my misery, the wormwood and the gall.'—LAMENTATIONS III. 19.

WE celebrate to-day an event that stands alone in the sacred life of Jesus, the solitary occasion on which He was publicly honoured and escorted into Jerusalem amid popular rejoicings: the central Figure in a grand procession of triumph. Palm Sunday is a day of triumph, but still there is something sad even in the triumph, and so we take our text from Lamentations.

I. The Shadow of the Cross.—The week which opens with a triumph closes with a death and a burial; the brightness of Palm Sunday fades only too soon into the still, solemn quiet of Holy Week and the gloom of Good Friday. On Palm Sunday with the glad shouts of Hosanna ringing in our ears, the sight of the waving palms before our eyes, we are tempted to forget the life of sorrow. But even in His brief days of earthly triumph His Passion has already begun. He can read the future. Is it hard then to understand the 'affliction and misery' even in this very triumph? Think of that scene with the excited, rejoicing crowd, and in the midst the only sad face, His, to whom all this homage was being given. He knows how brief the triumph will be; what a terribly different scene will in a few short days be enacted by the walls of Jerusalem. And so as He rides along a dark shadow lies across the sunlit path before Him—the shadow of the cross—and Jesus sees it there.

II. The Attitude of the Disciples.—Look again. See His disciples full of joy and pleasure. It is a glad day for them. They think that at last He is going to assert His rights and be an earthly conqueror; that He will become King of Jerusalem and redresser of His country's wrongs. They love Him, these chosen ones. Will they ever forsake Him? Yet one of them is a traitor! He will betray his Master with a false kiss. It is that which hurts you more than anything when your best friend turns against you, one whom you have loved and trusted. Others may revile you, misjudge you, but when your bosom friend turns and curses you, that breaks the heart. Here was such an one, and Jesus knew it. And what of the other disciples? In His darkest hour, in His sorest need, they will all forsake Him and flee. When He stands before His murderers He will stand alone. And He knows it. Yet how He loves them, how He yearns over them in prayer! His 'little flock'. Ah, we may well remember His 'affliction and misery'.

III. Our Attitude.—Now shall we forsake Him in this Holy Week? Ah, we say, we could never be like Judas, or even like Peter and the others. Think again. When you are among those who serve Him, in the midst of waving palms and glad Hosannas, it is comparatively easy to be true. But when you are among those who jeer at religion, and the fear of God, and doing right, have you never felt ashamed of Him? Have you never denied Him? When He has asked you to share His cross have you ever rebelled against Him? Then let our past offences bind us closer to Him now, that we may learn through this Holy Week the lesson the cross will teach about sin and the way it may be overcome.

THE REASON OF HOPE

'... therefore have I hope.'—LAMENTATIONS III. 21.

We should inquire into this 'therefore'. It ought to be to us like a great gate of entrance into a king's house. If the logic fails here it fails everywhere.

We must keep our eye upon the therefore of Divine and human reasoning and providence.

I. It is as if insanity suddenly emerged into sobriety, self-control, and a true spiritual realization of the meaning and purpose of things. The very memory of the gall and the wormwood makes me hope; I have had so much of them that there cannot be any more to have; it has been so terrible that now surely it is going to be summer-time and joy. This man handles life well. He is a true poet; he sees somewhat of the measure of things, and knows that at a certain time the dawn cannot be far off. I tell you I will number the hours and give you a forecast. I have been here in this prison of gloom and doubt and desolateness one hour, two hours, three hours, all the winter, all the summer, all the winter again; it must now be not far from morning. We need those great prophetic voices. Sometimes we need the very biggest soul that ever lived, and we seem to need him every whit—all his brains, all his heart, all his music. He is not too much for us because our grief is so deep and so sensitive, and the whole outlook is a horizon of blackness, and darkness has no history and no measuring points.

This is where the religious element enters into life with great copiousness, and where it should be received with unutterable welcomes. This is not as if one human being were addressing another; the words certainly come through a human medium, but they bring a Divine meaning with them. Words have an atmosphere. It is the atmosphere that is, as we say, supernatural, Divine, transcendent.

II. The vital point in the text is the word 'therefore'; and it comes upon us suddenly, unexpectedly, it is as a flaming bush at the foot of the mountain, the mountain all grim barrenness.

'Therefore.' I have never seen the stars except in the darkness, therefore the night may have something to show me as well as the day—the night of loneliness and desolation and bitter sorrow. There may be a star on purpose; one star in all the uncounted millions of stellar points was marked out as His star—as if the jewels stary were already appropriated and labelled, as if for personal acceptance and enjoyment.

III. Intellect grows, therefore character may grow. The little may become great, the weak may become strong, that which is far off may be brought nigh, and that which is barren may be fruitful. Yesterday's providence should be to-day's prophecy, hope, and poem of assurance. And, said one who wrote that bitter chapter against the day of his birth, He hath been with me in six troubles and in seven He will not forsake me. Who can draw a line at six and say the Deity ends here, or here Providence finally stops? No one. I will take the whole six as meaning the culminating seven. God Himself is an odd number; He is One or He is Three; and He will deliver me out of the odd number of my affliction and sorrow. Seven shall not frighten the Trinity.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. iv. p. 88.

REFERENCE.—III. 21.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xi. No. 654.

IT IS OF THE LORD'S MERCIES

'It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed.'—
LAMENTATIONS III. 22.

No text expresses more perfectly the old Puritan temper and faith than this: 'It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed'. The Christianity it uttered was not completely normal, but there were elements in it for lack of which our modern religion is suffering.

I. To begin with, the old Puritanism was profoundly aware of the tragical element in life, and met it fairly. That element remains with us, and science has brought it nearer. Whose heart has not fluttered at the sight of a telegram? The skies above us are charged with possibilities of tempest and destruction. We hold nothing securely. We walk continually by the edge of a precipice. We go to sleep knowing that next day may bring us news which will darken all the days to come. 'It is of the Lord's mercies' if it does not. These bolts strike us oftenest from an unclouded heaven, and make the very earth reel under our feet. So often is the lesson read that fear looks out even from innocent blue eyes of hope, and a nameless sudden chill falls on the most rapturous hours. How are we to master this? Not by the murder of nobler thought and sweeter instinct, not by the substitution of casual lusts for faithful affection, not through trampled and conquered love, but through victorious faith. There is enough in life to make us sober—to moderate moods of triumph, to teach us that there are worse things than death. The Puritans knew this; and they knew also that, strange as it seems, the Christian may realize peacefully that the things which are seen are temporal. Not by loving less, but by loving the creature in the Creator, are we fortified to take the worst that time can do, saying, 'The things which are unseen are eternal'. What came into this sphere of time may vanish from it; what we loved in God abides in God, and we go to find it. Thus after 'the wreckful siege of battering days' there often comes over the worn and furrowed face that blessed light of childhood, with its sure hope of happiness. Thus we may rise to say, 'Whom have I in heaven but Thee, and there is none on earth that I desire beside Thee,' and know the secret of loving God with heart and soul and strength and mind. Thus we may learn not merely to bless God for the stroke averted, but to bless Him in the moment of its falling; to arise at midnight and give thanks because of His righteous judgments.

II. This Puritan motto gives us the true viewpoint from which to apprehend the Cross. That form of Calvinism which sought to destroy humanism, and to treat the Church as a body whose members have no relation with the world, is dead. The doctrine that human nature was demonic, a doctrine which practically denied any lingering trace of the image of God, is no longer held anywhere. But modern teaching has largely swung to the opposite extreme. Men hear so much about God's need of them that they do not think as they should about their need of Him. People sit listlessly while the preacher tells of the Divine craving, but do not understand the terrible love of God:—

So great that saints dread more
To be forgiven than sinners do to die, and they never will understand it till they cannot so much as lift up their eyes unto heaven—till they feel that it is of the Lord's mercies they are not consumed. As McLeod Campbell has said, this is a doctrine for all. 'The true protection from any limiting distinctions as to the forgiveness which we receive, and which we are to cherish and to manifest, is seeing ourselves in that light of truth in which we thankfully and with the utmost self-abasement cease from the hopeless task of weighing our own unworthiness by putting sins and ignorance into one scale, the ideal of good in the other, in order to raise our hope of mercy by taking from the demerit of our sin, and bless God that, taking the lowest ground, and as being the chief of sinners, we still find all our utmost need met in the forgiveness which the Gospel reveals.' The beginning and the end of Christianity is the death of pride. —W. ROBERTSON NICOLL Ten Minute Sermons, p. 159.

REFERENCES.—III. 22, 23.—J. Vaughan, Sermons (11th Series), p. 13. III. 23.—T. G. Selby, The Imperfect Angel, p. 64. A. Tucker, Preacher's Magazine, vol. xix. p. 323. III. 24.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. viii. No. 451. III. 27.—W. Brock, Midsummer Morning Sermons, p. 1. J. Thain Davidson, Forewarned—Forearmed, p. 19. III. 39.—H. Melville, Penny Pulpit, No. 2216. III. 57.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1812. IV. 22.—Ibid. vol. viii. No. 480. V. 1.—A. P. Stanley, Sermons on Special Occasions, p. 310.

EZEKIEL

EZEKIEL

EZEKIEL is Carlylean. There's a wild, rugged, and abrupt sternness in Ezekiel. He stands midway between the majestic sublimity of Isaiah and the elegiacs of Jeremiah.—DR. JOHN DUNCAN, Colloquia Peripatetica.

EZEKIEL is the wild soothsayer: a genius of the cavern, whose thought is best expressed by a beast-like growling. But listen . . . Isaiah refuses civilization; Ezekiel accepts it, yet transforms it. Nature and humanity blend together in that softened roar which Ezekiel utters.—VICTOR HUGO, William Shakespeare (11).

‘As I was among the captives by the river of Chebar, the heavens were opened, and I saw visions of God.’—EZEKIEL I. 1.

He was instructed, at the very beginning of his work as a Prophet, that the glory of Him who filled the temple was surrounding him in Mesopotamia as it surrounded him when he went up to present the morning or the evening sacrifice at Jerusalem. Such a vision was given him of that glory as he had never beheld in the holy place. He found that the earth—that common, profane, Babylonian earth upon which he dwelt—was filled with it.—F. D. MAURICE.

ONE would not object to be an exile among exiles for some years if thereby he could be prepared for such scenes as Moses, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, John, and others saw. In reading the testimony of these men concerning the opening of their spirits to the spirit-world, we wonder almost as much at the nature of man, which can be brought face to face with such scenes, as at the revelations themselves.—DR. PULSFORD in The Supremacy of Man, pp. 69 f.

‘Many times,’ says Carlyle in his essay on Richter, ‘he exhibits an imagination of a singularity, nay on the whole, of a truth and grandeur, unexampled elsewhere. In his Dreams there is a mystic complexity, a gloom, and amid the dim-gigantic half-ghostly shadows, gleamings of a wizard splendour, which almost recall to us the visions of Ezekiel. By readers who have studied the Dream in the New Year's Eve we shall not be mistaken.’

REFERENCES.—I. 1.—J. E. ROBERTS, Studies in the Lord's Prayer, p. 47. R. G. COLQUHOUN, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 292.

‘And I looked, and, behold, a whirlwind came out of the north.’—EZEKIEL I. 4.

We often wonder how such a creation as that of which we form a part, with so much in it that is dark, contradictory, perplexing, striving, suffering, etc., etc., should have come from God at all. ‘I looked, and behold a whirlwind,’ Ezekiel says—DR. PULSFORD.

THE descent of the yellow, flat-nosed Mongols upon Europe is a historical cyclone which devastated and purified our thirteenth century, and broke, at the two ends of the known world, through two great Chinese walls—that which protected the ancient empire of the Centre, and that which made a barrier of ignorance and superstition round the little world of Christendom. Attila, Genghis, Tamerlane, ought to range in the memory of men with Cæsar, Charlemagne, and Napoleon. They roused whole peoples into action, and stirred the depths of human life, they powerfully affected ethnography, they let loose rivers of blood, and renewed the face of things. The Quakers will not see that there is a law of tempests in history as in nature. The revilers of war are like the revilers of thunder, storms, and volcanoes; they know not what they do.—AMIEL.

It hath seldome or never been seene that the farre Southern People have invaded the Northern, but contrariwise. Whereby it is manifest that the Northern Tract of the World is in nature the more Martiall Region; Be it, in respect of the Stars of that Hemisphere; or of the great continents that are upon the North, whereas the South Part, for ought that is knowne, is almost all Sea; or (which is most apparent) of the cold of the Northern Parts, which is that which, without aid of Discipline, doth make the Bodies hardest and the Courages warmest.—BACON, Of the Vicissitude of Things.

REFERENCE.—I. 4.—J. B. LIGHTFOOT, Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, p. 250.

‘And they had the hands of a man under their wings.’—EZEKIEL I. 8.

‘In such writers,’ says Miss Dora Greenwell, speaking of many devotional authors, ‘we trace but little communion with the joy and sorrow and beauty of this earth “glad, sad, and sweet,” so that we sometimes wonder if they have known any enjoyments, pangs, or conflicts, but such as belong to the life that is in God. To be assured that they had joyed and sorrowed, and loved as men and women, and as such had felt Christ's unspeakable consolations, would be a touch of nature making them our kin. But it seldom comes. St. Thomas à Kempis, for instance, dismisses a whole world of feeling in two lines, “Love no woman in particular, but commend all good women in general to God”. In Madame Guyon and Edwards we long, and long in vain, to see the hand of a man under the wings of the cherubim, and to feel its pressure.’

'They four had the face of a man, and the face of a lion . . . the face of an ox . . . also the face of an eagle.'—EZEKIEL I. 10.

ALL that most truly lives is here by representation. The ox is the emblem of toil and of sacrifice; of patient, suffering, bleeding life. The lion is strong, royal, victorious. The eagle soars upward in spires, rising and falling with no apparent effort; gliding over the highest mountains and lost in the azure distances, apparently in the heaven itself. And above these three highest specimens of forms of animal life man comes, who blends in one, and carries into a higher sphere all those endowments which they possess in some measure in fact, perfectly in the conception of gifted souls. Man alone is capable of sacrifice in its one true form—self-sacrifice; man alone is capable of the only conquests that are noble, of the only ideas which elevate to heaven. The great conceptions of three of the cherubic symbols—the ox, the lion, the eagle—suffering, action, thought, find their perfection in the truly human life and nature which is symbolized by the Man.—ARCHBISHOP ALEXANDER.

'And the four living creatures ran and returned as the appearance of a flash of lightning.'—EZEKIEL I. 14.

'THE oracles of God,' says Miss Greenwell in A Covenant of Life, 'when they speak to us of our deliverance from the power of darkness and our translation into the kingdom of God's dear Son, set before us a state of being in which . . . the human will, like the angelic, attains to such a measure of conformity with the Divine Law, that it follows as the direction of God's spirit in the unforced obedience which, as the Prophet Ezekiel witnesses, runs and returns as the appearance of a flash of lightning. Whatever God tells us to do, He also helps us to do. Our Saviour, who knows whereof we are made, sends us on no vain errands, sets us on no unprofitable tasks.'

'As it were a wheel in the middle of a wheel.'—EZEKIEL I. 16.

THE Rev. H. Davidson, in a letter of sympathy to Thomas Boston, writes: 'Now that His way is in the sea, and His path in the deep waters, and His footsteps are not known, we must believe loving-kindness in all the mysterious passages of Providence; we shall in due time see a wheel in the wheel, and be taught how to decipher the dark characters; we shall, with an agreeable surprise, perceive an all-wise Providence in all its intricate, oblique, and seemingly-contrary motions, to have been a faithful servant to the Divine promise.'

REFERENCES.—I. 16.—J. W. Mills, After-Glow, p. 93. I. 18.—S. Horton, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxviii. 1905, p. 204.

AFTER describing the unfortunate marriage of Hooker, Walton moralizes: 'This choice of Mr. Hooker's—if it were his choice—may be wondered at; but let us consider that the Prophet Ezekiel says, "There is a wheel within a wheel"; a secret, sacred wheel of Providence—most visible in marriages—guided by His hand, that allows not the race to the swift, nor the bread to the wise, nor good wives to good men'.

'As for their rings, they were so high that they were dreadful; and their rings were full of eyes.'—EZEKIEL I. 18.

How beautiful are beautiful eyes! Not from one aspect only, as a picture is; where the light falls rightly on it—the painter's point of view—they vary to every and any aspect. The orb rolls to meet the changing circumstance, and is adjusted to all. But a little inquiry into the mechanism of the eyes will indicate how wondrously they are formed. Science has dispelled many illusions, broken many dreams; but here, in the investigation of the eye, it has added to our marvelling interest. The eye is still like the work of a magician: it is physically Divine. Perhaps of all physical things, the eye is most beautiful, most Divine.—RICHARD JEFFERIES, The Field Play.

'Whithersoever the spirit was to go, they went, thither was their spirit to go; for the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels.'—EZEKIEL I. 20.

COMPARE, besides Ruskin's famous use of this verse in Modern Painters (vol. III. chap. viii.), the remark of Coleridge upon words, in the preface to his Aids to Reflection. 'Wheels of the intellect I admit them to be; but such as Ezekiel beheld in the vision of God, as he sate among the captives by the river of Chebar. Whithersoever the spirit was to go, the wheels went, and thither was their spirit to go; for the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels also.'

REFERENCE.—I. 26.—F. D. Maurice, The Prayer Book and the Lord's Prayer, p. 161.

'As the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about.'—EZEKIEL I. 28.

WE may gather up the significance of the rainbow for Israel, together with the deepest meaning of all its history, if we remember the striking fact that the only two Prophets who allude to it are the two who were least likely to be familiar with it—the two who spent their lives in the sultry plains of Babylonia—Ezekiel and his greater brother, the anonymous Prophet whom we have confused with Isaiah. It is a wonderfully instructive thought that it was in the darkest hour of Hebrew history, when the promise of God seemed to have been tried and found wanting, that this bright pledge of His promise was remembered. We cannot imagine anything happening to an Englishman which could have the utterly desolating influence of the deportation to Babylon. If we suppose that England had been conquered by Russia and that Tennyson had written his poems in Siberia, we shall have a very faint picture of what it was to the Prophets of the captivity to look back to their home on the Hill of Zion. The sense of a triumph in a power opposed to what we should call civilization was far greater with them than it would be with the English exile in Siberia; they were tempted to feel that the hope for the world was gone, as much as it was when the waters of the Deluge closed over the inhabitants of all the world. And see how out of that despair the bow in the cloud seems to gleam on the eyes of both; 'as the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain,' so was the appearance of the glory that dawned on Ezekiel when he was 'among the captives by the river Chebar,' and 'the heavens were opened and he saw visions of God'. The evanescent gleam symbolized the Divine nearness; what was most transient spoke to him of what was eternal.—MISS WEDGWOOD, Message of Israel, pp. 275, 276.

'And when I saw it, I fell upon my face.'—EZEKIEL I. 28.

'MARTINEAU,' said Dr. John Duncan once, 'is a deeply religious man. Once at a meeting of ministers, they were discussing the Ulster Revivals, and the "strikings-down," which most of them derided. Martineau said, "I wonder not, when the reality of Divine things first bursts upon a man, that he should be laid prostrate; the wonder rather is that there should be so little of it".'

REFERENCE.—I. 28.—R. G. Colquhoun, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 292.

'And he said unto me, Son of man.'—EZEKIEL II. 1.

LORD, I find that Ezekiel in his prophecies is styled ninety times and more by his appellation, Son of Man, and surely not once oftener than there was need for. . . . Amongst other revelations it was needful to reveal him to himself, Son of Man, lest seeing many visions might have made him blind with spiritual pride. Lord as thou increasest Thy graces in me, and favours on me, so with them daily increase in my soul the monitors and remembrances of my mortality.—THOMAS FULLER.

REFERENCES.—II. 1.—J. Millar, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xli. 1892, p. 326. S. A. Tipple, Sunday Mornings at Norwood, p. 78. J. Coats Shanks, God Within Us, p. 109. II. 1, 2.—W. W. Battershall, Interpretations of Life and Religion, p. 113. II. 2.—G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 78.

'Thus saith the Lord.'—EZEKIEL II. 4.

As I understand the Prophets, a theological revelation is the alpha and omega of their power. 'Thus saith the Lord' is not only the formula under which they speak, but the keynote of their convictions. It is because they believe, and only because they believe, that they can announce the true will of God, that they hope to be able to elevate the true nature of man. The ceremonialism and formalism which the Prophets assailed were rooted in the oblivion of theology, in the loss of that very revelation of himself by God of which from the earliest times we have a continuous series of records in the Old Testament.—R. H. HUTTON in The Spectator (1886).

'And they, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear . . . thou shalt speak My words unto them.'—EZEKIEL II. 5, 7.

THE visible constitution and course of nature, the moral law written in our hearts, the positive institution of religion, and even any memorial of it . . .

are all witnesses, for the most part unregarded witnesses, in behalf of God to mankind. They inform us of His being and providence, and of the particular dispensation of religion which we are under; and continually remind us of them. And they are equally witnesses of these things, whether we regard them or not. Then after a declaration that Ezekiel should be sent with a Divine message to the children of Israel, it is added, and they, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear, yet shall know that there hath been a Prophet among them.—BUTLER.

THE highest truth the wise man sees he will fearlessly utter, knowing that, let what may come of it, he is thus playing his right part in the world—knowing that if he can effect the change he aims at, well—if not, then well also, though not so well.—HERBERT SPENCER.

THE proper time to speak truth is just so soon as we know it, for it always appears at its own appointed hour, and we have not the power of speaking premature truths.—VINET.

'Whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear.'—EZEKIEL II. 5.

No river would be navigable were its velocity not checked by friction; and the friction increases as the stream proceeds, until the flow is thus made the easy thoroughfare of exchange. One man may be sure of a truth, but before all men can accept it as truth from his ipse dixit, many men must resist and oppose it.—E. B. LYTTON, Caxtoniana (XIII.).

'Be not afraid of their words, nor be dismayed at their looks, though they be a rebellious house.'—EZEKIEL II. 6.

COMPARE the saying of Hobbes that he and terror were born twins.

It is an everlasting duty, valid in our day as in that, the duty of being brave. Valour is still valua. The first duty for a man is still that of subduing Fear. We must get rid of Fear: we cannot act at all till then. . . . A man shall and must be valiant; he must march forward, and quit himself like a man—trusting imperturbably in the appointment and choice of the upper Powers; and on the whole, not fear at all. Now and always, the completeness of his victory over Fear will determine how much of a man he is.—CARLYLE, Heroes, I.

HAZLITT, in defining the true partisan, observes that 'his anxiety for truth and justice leaves him in no fear for himself, and the sincerity of his motives makes him regardless of censure or obloquy. His profession of hearty devotion to freedom was not an ebullition called forth by the sunshine of prosperity, a lure for popularity and public favour; and when these desert it, he still maintains his post with his integrity.'

WHAT have I gained that I no longer immolate a bull to Jove, or to Neptune, or a mouse to Hecate; that I do not tremble as before the Eumenides, or the Catholic Purgatory, or the Calvinistic Judgment-Day —if I quake at opinion, the public opinion, as we call it; or at the threat of assault, or contumely, or bad neighbours, or poverty, or mutilation, or at the rumour of revolution, or of murder? If I quake, what matters it what I quake at?—EMERSON.

SEEK the goode of other Men, but be not in bondage to their Faces and Fancies; for that is but Facilitie or Softnesse; which taketh an honest minde Prisoner.—BACON.

WHEN the master of the horse rides abroad, many dogs in the village bark; but he pursues his journey all the same.—CARLYLE, Latter-day Pamphlets, iv.

REFERENCES.—II. 6.—“Plain Sermons” by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. v. p. 259.

‘Thou shalt speak My words unto them, whether they will hear or whether they will forbear.’—EZEKIEL II. 7.

‘To stir the blood I have no cunning art,’ says Wordsworth. ‘Ach die zärtlichen Herzen! ein Pfüscher vermag sie zu rühren!’ says Goethe. Nor do such authors make it their study to say what the public will like to hear. ‘Ihr sollt was lernen—I meant to teach you something,’ says Goethe again. They deal not in popular falsehoods, but in unpopular truths. They are attracted by topics which the popular writer instinctively avoids, saying, Oh! the public will never attend to that! and indeed the public often receive their gifts but sullenly. . . . To sustain such writers in their arduous course they must have religion . . . Religion alone,—some absorbing contemplation, some spiritual object more necessary than livelihood, more precious than fame—preserves originality and thus feeds literature. It alone can give an author that happy arrogance of Wordsworth.—PROFESSOR J. R. SEELEY.

‘For they are most rebellious.’—EZEKIEL II. 7.

‘WHOEVER,’ said Proudhon, ‘puts his hand upon me, in order to govern me, is a usurper, a tyrant, and I declare myself his enemy.’

REFERENCE.—II. 8-10.—A. Whyte, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 403.

‘And to a roll of a book . . . written within and without: and there was written therein lamentations, and mourning, and woe.’—EZEKIEL II. 9, 10.

‘I AM fully persuaded,’ wrote Samuel Rutherford in 1636, ‘that Scotland shall eat Ezekiel’s book, that is written within and without, lamentations, and mourning, and woe. But the saints shall get a drink of the well that goeth through the streets of the New Jerusalem, to put it down.’

REFERENCE.—II. 9, 10.—G. F. De Teissier, Plain Preaching to Poor People (10th Series), p. 95.

‘And it was written within and without: and there was written therein lamentations, and mourning, and woe.’—EZEKIEL II. 10.

In the fifth chapter of the Apologia Newman uses this verse as follows:—

‘If I looked into a mirror, and did not see my face, I should have the sort of feeling which actually comes upon me when I look into this living busy world, and see no reflection of its Creator. This is, to me, one of those great difficulties of this absolute primary truth, to which I have referred just now. Were it not for this voice, speaking so clearly in my conscience and my heart, I should be an atheist, or a pantheist, or a polytheist when I looked into the world. I am speaking for myself only: and I am far from denying the real force of the arguments in proof of a God, drawn from the general facts of human society and the course of history, but these do not warm me or enlighten me; they do not take away the winter of my desolation, or make the buds unfold and the leaves grow within me, and my moral being rejoice. The sight of the world is nothing else than the Prophet’s scroll, full of “lamentations, and mourning, and woe.”

In Rob Roy Sir Walter Scott uses this of the cathedral churchyard in Glasgow. ‘The broad flat monumental stones are placed so close to each other, that the precincts appear to be flagged with them, and, though roofed only by the heavens, resemble the floor of one of our old English churches, where the pavement is covered with sepulchral inscriptions. The contents of these sad records of mortality, the vain sorrows which they preserve, the stern lesson which they teach of the nothingness of humanity, the extent of ground which they so closely cover, and their uniform and melancholy tenor reminded me of the roll of the Prophet, which was “written within and without, and there was written therein lamentations, and mourning, and woe.”’

THE ASSIMILATION OF DOCTRINE

‘Take this scroll and eat it.’—EZEKIEL III. 1.

I. THE mere swallowing of food is not enough unless it be assimilated and digested; yet it is a necessary condition of digestion. So with our beliefs; we swallow them whole-sale by an act of extrinsic faith based on the word of others; and such faith is like the prop that supports a plant till it strikes root downwards and becomes self-supporting. They are not ours fully save in the measure that we have worked them into the fabric of our life and thought.

II. So too with Divine revelation whose mysteries are obscure, not because God wants to hide truth from us, but because we are not educated sufficiently, either mentally or morally, to apprehend them aright. Its purpose is to enlighten us, not to puzzle us; to improve our mind, not to stultify it. Our intelligence should, so to say, eat its way gradually into the meaning of what at first we hold to be merely by obedient assent. Yet there is ever a Beyond of mystery; for the more we know, the more we wonder. It needs understanding to understand the extent of our ignorance. It is precisely as being beyond us that revelation provokes the growth of our mind. We strain upwards and find the outlook ever widening around us; and from each question answered, a new brood of doubt is born.

III. Let us not then imagine that we have finished our duty by swallowing revelation wholesale in submission to external authority; we swallow that we may digest, and we digest that we may live the eternal life of the mind and heart by an intelligent sympathy with the mind and heart of God.—G. TYRRELL, Oil and Wine, p. 69.

'Behold, I have made thy face strong against their faces.'—EZEKIEL III. 8.

HE who has a faith, we know well, is twice himself. The world, the conventional or temporary order of things, goes down before the weapons of faith, before the energy of those who have a glimpse, or only think they have a glimpse, of the eternal or normal order of things.—PROFESSOR J. R. SEELEY.

'As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead : fear them not.'—EZEKIEL III. 9.

PAIN, danger, difficulty, steady slaving toil, and other highly disagreeable behests of destiny, shall in no wise be shirked by any brightest mortal that will approve himself loyal to his mission in this world ; nay, precisely the higher he is, the deeper will be the disagreeableness, and the detestability to flesh and blood, of the tasks laid on him ; and the heavier too, and more tragic, his penalties if he neglect them.—CARLYLE.

'THE man rises before us,' says Carlyle of Fichte, 'amid contradiction and debate, like a granite mountain amid cloud and wind. Ridicule, of the best that could be commanded, has been already tried against him ; but it could not avail. What was the wit of a thousand wits to him ? The cry of a thousand choughs assaulting that old cliff of granite ; seen from the summit, these, as they winged the midway air, showed scarce so gross as beetles, and their cry was seldom ever audible.

REFERENCES.—III. 12.—W. C. Magee, Growth in Grace, p. 237. G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 80.

'And I went in bitterness, in the heat of my spirit ; but the hand of the Lord was strong upon me.'—EZEKIEL III. 14.

IN the campaign of 1886, Mr. Gladstone wrote as follows in his journal, on the morning of the closing day at Liverpool : 'Worked up the Irish question once more for my last function. Seven or eight hours of processional uproar, and a speech of an hour and forty minutes to fire at six thousand people in Hengler's Circus. Few buildings give so noble a presentation of an audience. Once more my voice held out in a marvellous manner. I went in bitterness, in the heat of my spirit, but the hand of the Lord was strong upon me.'

KING CHARILAUS of Sparta was of a gentle nature, as is proved by the words of his colleague, King Archelaus, who, when some were praising the youth, said, 'How can Charilaus be a good man, if he is not harsh even to wicked men ?'—PLUTARCH.

'THE fire in his soul burnt to the end,' says Froude of Carlyle, 'and sparks flew from it, which fell hot on those about him, not always pleasant, not always hitting the right spot or the right person ; but it was pure fire notwithstanding, fire of genuine and noble passion, of genuine love for all that was good, and genuine indignation at what was mean or base or contemptible.'

REFERENCES.—III. 14.—G. Matheson, Voices of the Spirit, p. 80. III. 15.—W. Matthews, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxiii. 1908, p. 52.

'Son of Man, I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel.'—EZEKIEL III. 17.

UPON a cliff . . . is a clay-built lighthouse-like watch-tower. The watchman (who must be clear-sighted) is paid by a common contribution : his duty is to look forth, in the spring months, from the day-rising till the going-down of the sun ; for this is the season when the villagers who have called in their few milch-goats send them forth to pasture without the oasis. We saw the man standing unquietly in his gallery, at the towerhead, in the flame of the sun ; and turning himself to every part, he watched, under the shadow of his hand, all the fiery waste of sand before him.—DOUGHTY, Arabia Deserta, II. p. 311.

WRITING from the island of Ischia in 1827, Erskine of Linlathen observes : 'La Sentinella is the name of my inn ; and it received its name from its being the post of an outlook who gave notice of the approach of Saracen corsairs, who used to ravage this country some centuries ago, and carry off the inhabitants as slaves. It commands the whole view of the Neapolitan coast.'

PUBLIC life is a situation of power and energy ; he trespasses against his duty who sleeps upon his watch, as well as he that goes over to the enemy.—BURKE, On the Present Discontents.

REFERENCES.—III. 17.—W. J. Kennedy, The English Clergyman and the Present Times, p. 1. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxiv. No. 1431.

'When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die ; and thou givest him not warning . . . the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity ; but his blood will I require at thine hand.'—EZEKIEL III. 18.

I KNOW that the world offended (by Goddes permission) may kill the bodie, but Goddes maiestie offended hath power to punishe bodie and soule for ever. His maiestie is offended, when that his preceptes are contemned, and his threatenings esteemed to be of none effect, and amongst his manifold preceptes geven to his prophetes, and amongst his threatenings, none is more vehement then is that which is pronounced to Ezechiel in these wordes : Sonne of man, I have appointed thee a watchman to the house of Israel, that thou shouldest heare from my mouthe the worde, and that thou maist admonishe them plainlie, when I shall say to the wicked man : O wicked, thou shalt assuredlie die. . . . This precept, I say, with the threatning annexed, together with the rest, that is spoken in the same chapter, not to Ezechiel onlie but to euerie one whom God placeth whatchman over his people and flocke, compelleth me to utter my conscience in this matter, notwithstanding that the whole world should be offended with me for so doing.—JOHN KNOX, from the Preface to the First Blast.

'Yet if thou warn the wicked, and he turn not from his wickedness, nor from his wicked way, he shall die in his iniquity; but thou hast delivered thy soul.'—EZEKIEL III. 19.

COMPARE the close of Baxter's preface to his Call to the Unconverted. 'Reader, I have done with thee when thou hast perused this book; but sin hath not done with thee, even those that thou thoughtest had been forgotten long ago; and Satan hath not done with thee, though he be now out of sight; and God hath not yet done with thee, because thou wilt not be persuaded to have done with the deadly reigning sin. . . . I beseech thee, I charge thee to hear and obey the call of God, and resolvedly to turn, that thou mayest live. But if thou wilt not, even when thou hast no true reason for it, but because thou wilt not, I summon thee to answer it before the Lord, and require thee there to bear me witness that I gave thee warning, and that thou wast not condemned for want of a call to turn and live, but because thou wouldst not believe it and obey it.'

DIVINE APPOINTMENTS

'Go forth into the plain, and I will there talk with thee.'—EZEKIEL III. 22.

THE Bible is full of private conversations, or individual and strictly confidential interviews.

Why not talk with the Prophet in the city? Is the city without Divine messages? Are the countless throngs upon the city streets very far from God? Not necessarily. God speaks as surely in the city as in the desert. By unexpected events, by labour and strife, by the various fortunes of vice, and the amazing struggles of virtue, God speaks to men with distinctness and solemnity. The point is that busy men may hear God in solitude, and solitary men may hear Him in the city. Change of mere position may have moral advantages. In the great temple of the sea we may offer peculiar worship; in the quiet sanctuary of the wilderness we may hear the softest tones of heaven. This should be insisted upon so as to destroy the fallacy that in the absence of any one set of outward circumstances worship is impossible.

In the text there are three points of deep interest: I. The speciality of God's appointments. He appoints places, times, methods. He appoints, in this case, the plain. 'Where two or three are gathered together,' etc.; 'Whosoever My name is recorded,' etc. Where the appointment is special, the obedience should be instantaneous, cordial, punctual.

II. The personality of God's communication: 'I will talk with thee'. We should know more of God if we held closer intercourse with Him. We may go to God directly. Every devout meditation brings us into the Divine presence. Expect this; believe it; realize it. In the sanctuary we are not hearing the voice of man, but of God. In nature we hear the Divine voice. God talks with man in the garden in the cool of the day.

III. The familiarity of God's condescension: 'I will talk with thee'. It is a friend's appointment.

It is not, 'I will lighten and thunder,' or 'I will overpower thee with My strength,' but, 'I will talk with thee,' as a father might talk to his only son. Though the Prophet was at first thrown down, yet the Spirit entered into him, and set him upon his feet.

Application.—(1) God has ever something to say to man. Must have—(a) as a Ruler; (b) as a Father. His word is ever new. (2) In seeking solitude, man should seek God. Solitude without God leads to madness.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. i. p. 235.

REFERENCES.—III. 22.—P. MORRISON, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xl. 1891, p. 70. III. 22, 23.—R. G. COLQUHOUN, ibid. vol. lxx. 1906, p. 292. III. 24.—G. MATHESON, Voices of the Spirit, p. 84. IV. 1.—S. BARING-GOULD, Village Preaching for a Year, vol. ii. p. 236.

'Ye shall know that I am the Lord.'—EZEKIEL VI. 7.

THIS sentence recurs again and again in the prophecies of Ezekiel. It is the thought of his mind, the one which gives all the sublimity and all the practical worth to his discourses—that the knowledge of God is the supreme good of man.—F. D. MAURICE.

SPIRITUAL EXPERIENCES AT HOME

'As I sat in mine house . . . the hand of the Lord God fell there upon me.'—EZEKIEL VIII. 1.

I. In the house Ezekiel has spiritual experiences akin to those he had elsewhere.

Ezekiel could not have felt the hand of the Lord upon him in his house had he not beheld by faith God's gaze fixed in faithful love upon that privileged house. If we are to have rich spiritual experiences at home we must realize the love of God as centred on that home.

Ezekiel also felt the sacredness of home. When home is seen to be a sacred place there need be no limit to our expectation of spiritual blessings there.

Ezekiel knew his responsibility for his home life. A home is a trust and must be given account for at last.

The Prophet was in a state of preparedness to receive blessing at home. Read his history and this will be at once apparent. They who have Ezekiel's preparedness have also his spiritual felicity.

II. In his house Ezekiel saw the Divine Being.

'The hand of the Lord' is his power in exercise. First the Prophet felt the touch of power, then he saw God. Do not presume to despair of His coming to your house, for spiritual despair is spiritual presumption. God is ready to visit your home. Be you ready to receive Him there.

III. God's influence was upon Ezekiel when visitors were in the house.

Ezekiel showed that God's influence rested upon him by the spirit he manifested amid his friends. He was the Lord's servant: as abroad so at home. If God's hand be upon us in our house, those who visit us will perceive it by the spirit we shed forth.

And yet more by our conduct. Can we doubt that Ezekiel's deportment and his actions would show his friends that God's influence crowned him in his home.

IV. Sudden blessing came upon Ezekiel in his house.

Observe how he says, 'the hand of the Lord fell there upon me'. Often spiritual blessings are sudden. Seldom can we foresee God's visitations and benedictions.

Ezekiel had a sudden endowment of Divine power. His personality was in no degree superseded, but it was enhanced.

Ezekiel had a sudden sense of Divine support. The touch of God revived and strengthened him.

V. Ezekiel was qualified for his ministry by spiritual blessing received in his house.

God's hand fell upon the Prophet in his house that he might be the more equipped for the work he had to do among men. The word of the Lord was to be proclaimed. Righteous judgments were to be executed. Without strength received in private such public ministry could never be discharged.

VI. Ezekiel kept a record of the spiritual experiences he realized in his house.

What he experienced is historified for the generations. Spiritual experiences in their homes have been a feature of the diaries of good men in all the Christian years.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, Messages for Home and Life, p. 263.

REFERENCE.—VIII. 3, 4.—R. G. Colquhoun, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxx. 1906, p. 292.

'So I lifted up mine eyes.'—EZEKIEL VIII. 5.

LEIGH HUNT, in describing the keen eyes of Wordsworth, calls them 'fires half-burning, half-smouldering, with a sort of acrid fixture of regard. One might imagine Ezekiel or Isaiah to have had such eyes.'

'And behold this image of jealousy.'—EZEKIEL VIII. 5.

ORCHAN at once turned Nicæa into a Moslem city, as his father had done with the Black Castle on the Thymbres. In Nicæa was still seen and still used for Christian worship the memorable church in which the 318 bishops had met to settle the faith of Christendom for the ages to come. The Church of the Council was turned by Orchan into a mosque; for the mosaic images on its walls was substituted the symbol of Islam.—DEAN CHURCH, Miscellaneous Essays, p. 312.

COMPARE Carlyle's words in a letter to his mother, from Marburg: 'The Landgraf's high old castle, where we loitered a couple of hours, is now a correction-house filled with criminals and soldiers. The chamber of conference between Luther, Zwingli, etc., is used for keeping hay.'

REFERENCES.—VIII. 8, 9.—S. Baring-Gould, Sermon Sketches, p. 61. VIII. 10-12.—G. Matheson, Endeavours After the Christian Life (2nd Series), p. 8.

'Son of man, hast thou seen what the ancients of the house of Israel do in the dark, every man in the chambers of his imagery.'—EZEKIEL VIII. 12.

IN his Reform Speech at Glasgow, in 1858, John Bright observed: 'I have often compared in my own mind, the people of England with the people of ancient Egypt, and the Foreign Office of this country with the temples of the Egyptians. We are told by those who pass up and down the Nile, that on its banks are grand temples with stately statues and massive and lofty columns—statues each one of which would have appeared almost to have exhausted a quarry in its production. You have, further, vast chambers, and gloomy passages; and some innermost recess, some holy of holies, in which, when you arrive at it, you find some loathsome reptile which a nation revered and revered and bowed itself down to worship. In our Foreign Office we have no massive columns: we have no statues; but we have a mystery as profound; and in the innermost recesses of it we find some miserable intrigue, in defence of which your fleets are traversing every ocean, your armies are perishing in every clime, and the precious blood of our country's children is squandered as though it had no price.'

THERE is truth with those who say we want more faith and devout obedience; but if the temple of our life be denied the light of Thought, then, though every man stands, saint-like, with his censor in his hand, he will just repeat 'what the elders of Israel did in the dark'—send up his foolish cloud of incense before 'creeping things and abominable beasts'.—MARTINEAU.

KEEP the imagination sane—that is one of the truest conditions of communion with heaven.—HAWTHORNE.

REFERENCES.—VIII. 12.—A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, etc., p. 1. J. Stalker, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlix. 1896, p. 34. W. Redfern, The Gospel of Redemption, p. 65.

'Thou shalt see greater abominations that they do . . . and behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz.'—EZEKIEL VIII. 13, 14.

Tammuz came next behind,
Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured
The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
In amorous ditties all a summer's day,
While smooth Adonis, from his native rock
Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
Of Tammuz yearly wounded: the love-tale
Infected Sion's daughters with like heat,
Whose wanton passions in the sacred porch
Ezekiel saw, when, by the vision led,
His eye surveyed the dark idolatries
Of alienated Judah.

—MILTON, Paradise Lost (book i.).

IN the second part of Past and Present, after expounding the silent reverence of man for the God he cannot know or name, Carlyle breaks out: 'Thou if thou know not this, what are all rituals, liturgies, mythologies, mass-chantings, turnings of the rotatory calabash? They are as nothing; in a good many respects they are as less. Divorced from this, getting half-divorced from this, they are a thing to fill one with a kind of horror; with a sacred inexpressible pity and fear. The most tragical thing a human eye can look on. It was said to the Prophet, "Behold,

I will show thee worse things than these; women weeping to Thammuz". That was the acme of the Prophet's vision—then as now.'

'Cause them that have charge over the city to draw near, even every man with his destroying weapon in his hand. And, behold, six men came.'—EZEKIEL IX. 1, 2.

'THAT which has made me publish this book,' says Bunyan in his preface to The Life and Death of Mr. Badman, 'is for that wickedness like a flood is like to drown our English world; it begins already to be above the tops of the mountains. . . . Oh that I could mourn for England, and for the sins that are committed therein, even while I see that, without repentance, the men of God's wrath are about to deal with us, each having his slaughtering weapon in his hand.'

'Set a mark upon the foreheads of the men that sigh and cry for all the abominations that be done in the midst thereof.'—EZEKIEL IX. 4.

I think there is not in any one duty more spiritual wisdom required of believers than how to deport themselves with a suitable frame of heart, in reference to the sins of other men. Some are ready to be contented that they should sin, sometimes ready to make sport at their sins; and for the most part it is indifferent to us at what rate men sin in the world, so it go well with us or the Church of Christ. . . . There are times when this is our especial and eminent duty, which God doth highly approve of. Such are they wherein the visible Church is greatly corrupted, and open abominations are found amongst men of all sorts; even as it is at this day. Then doth the Lord declare how much He values the performance of this duty—as He testifies they alone shall be under His especial care in a day of public distress and calamity—a duty wherein it is to be feared that we are most of us very defective.—JOHN OWEN.

In every sphere, a unified life, a faultless honesty, compel, even from the worst of people, some degree of respect. In Paris, an unimpeachable virtue has the success of a large diamond. It is so rare.—BALZAC.

REFERENCES.—IX. 4.—J. H. Jowett, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxviii. 1908, p. 353. IX. 8.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xlviii. No. 2807. IX. 9.—Ibid. vol. iv. No. 223.

'And their whole body, and their backs, and their hands, and their wings, and the wheels, were full of eyes round about, even the wheels that they four had.'—EZEKIEL X. 12.

In chapter XLVII of Alec Forbes, George Macdonald makes a young girl ask an old blind woman whether God might not cure her of her blindness if she asked Him. 'Ay might He, and ay will He,' answered Tibbie, 'I'm only jist bidin' His time. But I'm thinkin' He'll cure me better yet nor He cured that blin' man. He'll jist tak' the body aff o' me a'thegither, and syne I'll see, no wi' een like yours, but wi' my hail speeritual body. Ye min' that verse i' the Prophecees o' Ezakiel: I ken't weel by hert. It says: "And their whole body, and their backs, and their han's, and their wings, and their wheels, were full o' eyes roon about, even the wheels that they four had." Isna that a gran' text? . . . The wheels'll be stopping at my door or lang.'

REFERENCES.—X. 13.—J. Pulsford, Our Deathless Hope, p. 278. X. 14.—T. T. Munger, Character Through Inspiration, p. 73.

'And when the cherubims went, the wheels went by them . . . for the spirit of the living creature was in them.'—EZEKIEL X. 16, 17.

We have more than enough of systems, of machinery, which, whether more or less perfect, will not go of itself. We may have done all that of ourselves we can do, and the moving spirit may yet be wanting. The spirit of the living creature is in the wheels.—DORA GREENWELL.

'Then the glory of the Lord departed from off the threshold of the house.'—EZEKIEL X. 18.

The thought that there are crises in a nation's history, where the voice of an invisible Lord is heard from its inmost sanctuary, pronouncing the awful words, 'Let us depart hence,' comes to us overloaded with symbolism and muffled in its imagery. Yet the imagery is itself full of meaning, forcing us to realize the way in which the civilization of Babylon had already impressed the imagination of the Prophet, and as it were stolen into the background of the distant temple so soon to be laid in ruins. This gorgeous heathen civilization has no attraction for his heart, yet it colours his imagination.—MISS WEDGWOOD, Message of Israel, p. 229.

REFERENCES.—X. 21.—G. Gilfillan, The Dundee Pulpit, 1872, p. 161.

'These are the men that devise iniquity, and that give wicked counsel in the city; which say, This city is the caldron, and we be the flesh.'—EZEKIEL XI. 2, 3.

THE plans of the conspirators did not mature all at once. Ezekiel on the Chebar had time to hear of them, and direct a prophecy against the 'men that devise mischief'. These revolutionary spirits were not unaware of the risks they ran: 'This city is the caldron, and we be the flesh'. With a certain grimness of humour they acknowledge that it will be hot for them, but the strong city will protect them as the pot protects the flesh from the fire. Ezekiel tells them that the only flesh left in the pot will be the dead lying in the streets; the living will be pulled out and judged far away on the borders of Israel.—PROF. A. B. DAVIDSON, The Exile and the Restoration, pp. 31, 32.

REFERENCES.—XI. 5.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. x. No. 591. XI. 16.—Ibid. vol. xxxiv. No. 2001.

'Thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house, which have eyes to see, and see not; they have ears to hear and hear not.'—EZEKIEL XII. 2.

It is as easy to close the eyes of the mind as those of the body; and the former is more frequently done with wilfulness, and yet not attended to, than the latter; the actions of the mind being more quick and transient than those of the senses.—BUTLER.

THE one Enemy we have in this Universe is Stupidity, Darkness of Mind; of which darkness, again there are many sources, every sin a source, and probably self-conceit the chief source. Darkness of mind, in every kind and variety, does to a really tragic extent abound; but of all the kinds of Darkness, surely the Pedant Darkness, which asserts and believes itself to be light, is the most formidable to mankind! For empires or for individuals there is but one class of men to be trembled at; and that is the Stupid Class, the class that cannot see, who alas! are they mainly that will not see.—CARLYLE, Latter-day Pamphlets, III.

REFERENCES.—XII. 27.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xx. No. 1164; see also Twelve Sermons to Young Men, p. 169. A. Maclaren, Expositions of Holy Scripture—Ezekiel, p. 10.

'Woe unto the foolish prophets, that follow their own spirit, and have seen nothing!'—EZEKIEL XIII. 3.

THERE was a man once—a poet. He went wandering through the streets of the city, and he met a disciple. 'Come out with me,' said the poet, 'for a walk in the sand-dunes,' and they went. But ere they had progressed many stages, said the disciple: 'There is nothing here but sand'. 'To what did I invite you?' asked the poet. 'To a walk in the sand dunes.' 'Then do not complain,' said the poet. 'Yet even so your words are untrue. There is Heaven above. Do you not see it? The fault is not Heaven's. Nor the sands.'—MAARTEN MAARTENS.

'O Israel, thy prophets are like the foxes in the deserts.'—EZEKIEL XIII. 4.

THE decisive sign of the elevation of a nation's life is to be sought among those who lead or ought to lead. The test of the health of a people is to be found in the utterances of those who are its spokesmen, and in the action of those whom it accepts or chooses to be its chiefs. We have to look to the magnitude of the issues and the height of the interests which engage its foremost spirits. What are the best men in a country striving for?—JOHN MORLEY.

'Ye have not gone up into the gaps, neither made up the hedge for the house of Israel, to stand in the battle in the day of the Lord.'—EZEKIEL XIII. 5.

RELIGION, whatever destinies may be in store for it, is at least for the present hardly any longer an organic power. It is not that supreme, penetrating, controlling, decisive part of a man's life, which it has been and will be again.—JOHN MORLEY, Compromise, p. 36.

'They have seduced my people, saying, Peace; and there was no peace.'—EZEKIEL XIII. 10.

IF the gods of this lower world will sit on their glittering thrones, indolent as Epicurus' gods, with the living Chaos of Ignorance and Hunger weltering uncared for at their feet, and smooth parasites preaching Peace, peace, when there is no peace, then the dark Chaos, it would seem, will rise.—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. III. book vii. chap. vii.

REFERENCES.—XIII. 10.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Holy-Tide Teaching, p. 84. XIII. 10, 11.—J. Baines, Sermons, p. 201. C. J. Thompson, Penny Pulpit, vol. xiv. No. 675, p. 65. XIII. 10-12.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 810. XIII. 18.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Soul's Exodus and Pilgrim- age, p. 58. J. Thomson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 164.

MAKING THE RIGHTEOUS SAD

'Ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad.'—EZEKIEL XIII. 22.

I. Sadness is not Necessarily from God.—When sadness is God's gift, we do well to accept the unwelcome gift, for who can tell what far-off interest it may yield?

Sadness, however, as our text reminds us, must not always be fathered on God. Sadness often originates in temperament. Do not blame God if you are melancholic; blame your yielding to your temperament. Grace can enable a man to rise above his temperament. The worry of these worrying days frequently issues in sadness. Sadness is wrought, all too often, by our fellow-men. Satan often seeks to ruin us by sadness. Quite as often as by pleasure he seeks to spoil us by grief.

II. Some Impose Sadness Upon the Righteous in God's Name.—What awful things have been done in God's name! Men have stolen the livery of heaven to serve the devil in. Religion and seriousness are essentially allied, but not so religion and sadness. The work of righteousness is not sadness, but peace and assurance. God never discourages the righteous. He is 'the God of all encouragement'. Gloomy, depressing prophets and prophetesses are condemned by the canon of my text.

III. False Teaching Often Makes the Righteous Sad.—Truth sometimes makes God's people sad, but it is not intended to do so. Union with Christ is the antidote to sadness.

A false theology makes the heart of the righteous sad. It is a sure sign that religious teaching is fallacious if it sadden the soul which is set on righteousness.

IV. There is Divine Retribution for Such as Give Sadness to the Righteous.—All who effect this saddening of the saints shall suffer for their deed. This principle has world-wide application. None can afford to ignore it. Masters and mistresses need to watch their ways in this regard. Friends and acquaintances should be alert to prevent this evil. Parents may grieve right-doing children. And how specially pertinent is this admonition to children in relation to their parents.

V. We do a Godly Deed When we Cheer the Righteous.—Do you ask how you can accomplish this grateful ministry? We can hearten the righteous by kindly acts. Our very deportment may accomplish the service of God upon sad souls. There is a Gospel in some men's smile.

VI. Righteousness is the Ultimate Cure of Sadness.—Character is the final secret of gladness. The word 'sad' is often used as synonymous with 'bad'. 'He is a sad scoundrel,' we say. And in such a usage we hint the great truth that in the last issue sadness and badness are identical.

The righteous have a right to gladness. This is especially true in the Christian dispensation. Chrisman righteousness is realized by faith in the risen and crucified Lord.—DINSDALE T. YOUNG, The Enthusiasm of God, p. 16.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 1.—R. W. Hiley, A Year's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 185. XIV. 2, 3.—W. A. Whitworth, The Sanctuary of God, p. 31.

'Son of man, these men have set up their idols in their heart: should I be enquired of at all by them.'—EZEKIEL XIV. 3.

'SIN,' says Baxter (Saints' Rest, chap. viii.), 'obscures that which it destroys not; for it bears such sway, that grace is not in action. It puts out or dims the eye of the soul, and stupefies it, that it can neither see nor feel its own condition. But especially it provokes God to withdraw Himself, His comforts, and the assistance of His spirit. As long as thou dost cherish thy pride, thy love of the world, the desires of the flesh, or any unchristian practice, thou expectest comfort in vain.'

REFERENCES.—XIV. 4.—E. Browne, Some Moral Proofs of the Resurrection, p. 93. XIV. 4, 5.—C. W. Furse, Sermons at Richmond, p. 12. XIV. 6.—H. J. Wilmot-Buxton, Common Life Religion, p. 45.

For every one which setteth up idols in his heart, and cometh to a prophet to enquire of him concerning me; I the Lord will answer him by Myself: and I will set My face against that man.'—EZEKIEL XIV. 7, 8.

It is but vaine to implore His power in a bad cause. Man must have an unpolled soul when he praiseth (at least in that moment he addresseth himself to pray) and absolutely free from all vicious passions; otherwise we ourselves present Him the rods to scourge us withal. In lieu of redressing our fault, we redouble the same by presenting Him with an affection fraught with irreverence, sinne, and hatred, to whom only we should sue for grace and forgiveness. . . . And the state of a man that commixeth devotion unto an excessible life, seemeth in some sort to be more condemnable than that of one that is conformable unto himselfe, and every way dissolute.—MONTAIGNE (FLORIO), Essays, chap. lvi.

REFERENCES.—XIV. 7, 8.—J. Warschauer, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxii. 1902, p. 29. XIV. 8.—Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. ii. p. 120.

Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness.'—EZEKIEL XIV. 14.

'JUSTUS JONAS asked Luther,' it is related in the latter's Table-Talk, 'if these sentences in Scripture did not contradict one another; where God says to Abraham, If I find ten in Sodom, I will not destroy it; and where Ezekiel says, Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job were in it, yet would not I hear, etc.; and where Jeremiah says, Therefore pray not thou for this people. Luther answered: No, they are not against one another; for in Ezekiel it was forbidden them to pray, but it was not so with Abraham. Therefore we must have regard to the word: when God says, thou shalt not pray, then we may well cease.'

REFERENCES.—XIV. 14.—G. A. Denison, Third Sermon on "Lux Mundi," Sermons, 1828-93. XIV. 19, 20.—E. W.

Attwood, Sermons for Clergy and Laity, p. 474. XIV. 20.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxviii. No. 1651. A. G. Mortimer, The Church's Lessons for the Christian Year, part iv. p. 238. XV. 1, 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. iii. No. 125. XV. 22, 23.—J. B. Brown, The Soul's Exodus and Pilgrimage, p. 81. XV. 27.—Ibid. p. 104. XVI. 1, 2.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. vi. No. 323. XVI. 1-3.—Ibid. vol. xli. No. 2438. XVI. 5, 6.—Ibid. vol. viii. No. 468.

'When I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live.'—EZEKIEL XVI. 6.

WEAKNESS can speak and cry when we have not a tongue. And when I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood, I said to thee, Live. The kirk could not speak one word to Christ then; but blood and guiltiness out of measure spake, and drew out of Christ pity, and a word of life and love.—SAMUEL RUCHERFORD.

'And thy renown went forth among the nations for thy beauty: for it was perfect, through My majesty which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord God. But thou didst trust in thy beauty.'—EZEKIEL XVI. 14, 15.

WHEN one is in bed and really ill, one would gladly sacrifice one's complexion or one's bright eyes to regain health and enjoy the sunshine. And besides, a small degree of piety in the heart, a little love of God, is enough to make one speedily renounce such idolatries; for a pretty woman adores herself. When I was a child, I thought nothing equal to beauty; because I said to myself it would have made mamma love me better. Thank God, this childishness has passed away, and the beauty of the soul is the only one I covet.—EUGÉNIE DE GUÉRIN, Journal.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 8.—S. Baring-Gould, Plain Preaching to Poor People (8th Series), p. 89. Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xli. No. 2438. J. M. Neale, Sermons on the Prophets, vol. ii. p. 25. XVI. 9-14.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xiv. No. 813.

'As is the mother, so is the daughter.'—EZEKIEL XVI. 44.

LOOKING at the mother, you might hope that the daughter would become like her, which is a prospective advantage equal to a dowry—the mother too often standing behind the daughter like a malignant prophecy—'Such as I am, she will shortly be.'—GEORGE ELIOT in Middlemarch.

'Behold, this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom, pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness.'—EZEKIEL XVI. 49.

'YEAR after year,' writes Ruskin in the third volume of The Stones of Venice, 'the nation drank with deeper thirst from the fountains of forbidden pleasure, and dug for springs, hitherto unknown, in the dark places of the earth. In the ingenuity of indulgence, in the varieties of vanity, Venice surpassed the cities of Christendom, as of old she had surpassed them in fortitude and devotion; and as once the powers of Europe stood before her judgment-seat, to receive the decisions of her justice, so now the youth of Europe assembled in the halls of her luxury, to learn from her the arts of delight. It is needless as well as painful to trace the steps of her final ruin. That ancient curse was upon her, the curse of the Cities of the Plain,

"pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness". By the inner burning of her own passions, as fatal as the fiery rain of Gomorrah, she was consumed from her place among the nations; and her ashes are choking the channels of the dead, salt sea."

ONE monster there is in the world: the idle man. What is his 'religion'? That Nature is a Phantasm, where cunning beggary or thievery may sometimes find good victual. That God is a lie, and that Man and his life are a lie.—CARLYLE, Past and Present, (part II. chap. xii.).

Quite apart from Christianity, there exists a social virtue, πολιτικὴ ἀρετή, consisting in regard for others, their rights, their likings, their sensibilities; in love of law and order, in appreciation of articles of value, your own and other people's, as things to be preserved in the hands that have them; in being polite and well-dressed; in saying on some occasions much less than you think, on other occasions a great deal more. This virtue the comfortable classes teach to their children; it is their class interest to teach it and learn it and maintain it. Too frequently, on the other hand, the children of the very poor are not taught social virtue. From infancy they are treated roughly and behave rudely. They see no beauty in the established order of things. They would not be so very much worse off if anarchy and civil war were to ensue. The struggle for the necessities of life and for coarse enjoyments leaves no leisure nor aptitude for processes of refinement. They grow up 'a rough lot'; and where no priest instructs them, nor policeman intimidates them, they commit such crime as comes in their way. Girls, they go out upon the streets, for hunger, to begin with, then for evil passion and habit; but the well-fed sons of luxury are their pay-masters. Some sin is born of fulness of bread, other sin of emptiness of stomach. The latter sort of sin the poor commit, and of the two it is the more likely to appear in the police court and earn lodgings in jail. But of the two it is not the more likely to be the more odious in the sight of God.—FATHER RICKABY, Oxford and Cambridge Conferences, II. pp. 7, 8.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 49.—H. Hensley Henson, Christ and the Nation, p. 147. XVI. 54.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. v. No. 264. Elmitt Browne, Some Moral Proofs of the Resurrection, p. 130.

"And I will establish My covenant with thee, . . . that thou mayest remember, and be confounded, and never open thy mouth any more because of thy shame, when I am pacified toward thee for all that thou hast done, saith the Lord."—EZEKIEL XVI. 62, 63.

A MAN shall remembre him of his sinnes. But loke that that remembrance he be to him no delit, by no way, but grete shame and sorroe for his sinnes, and therefore saith Ezechiel; I wot remembre me all the yerres of my lif, in the bitterness of my heart. And God sayeth in the Apocalypse; remembre you fro whens that ye hev fallen, for before the time that ye sinned, ye weren the children of God; but for your sinne ye ben waxen thral and foule; membres of the fende; hate of angels; sclauder of holy chirche, and fode of the false serpent. . . . Suiche manere thoughtes meke a man to have shame of his sinne, and no delit; as God saith, by the Prophet Ezechiel; ye should remembre you of your wages, and they should displese you.—CHAUCER, The Person's Tale.

'My chief burden,' wrote Erskine of Linlathen towards the close of his life, 'is the remembrance of past sins. Although I believe them forgiven, yet they often come between me and the face of my heavenly Father.' In his reminiscences of Erskine, Principal Sharp observes that 'one thing very remarkable during these last years must have struck all who conversed intimately with him—his ever-deepening sense of the evil of sin, and the personal way in which he took this home to himself. Small things done or said years ago would come back upon him, and lie on his conscience, often painfully. Things which few other men would have ever thought of again, and which when told to others would seem trifling or harmless, were grievous to him in remembrance. 'I know that God has forgiven me for these things,' he would say, 'but I cannot forgive myself.'

Let a man but once come really under a sense of God's unchangeable complacency, and he will then soon mourn bitterly enough for his sins, and profitably to himself. 'Thou shalt be loathsome in thine own eyes, when I am pacified with thee for all that thou hast done.'—F. W. NEWMAN, The Soul, p. 78.

REFERENCES.—XVI. 62, 63.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxii. No. 1289. XVII. 3, 5, 8.—G. Body, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xliii. 1893, p. 193. XVII. 4.—W. J. Knorr-Little, Manchester Sermons, p. 22. XVII. 23.—T. De Witt Talmage, Sermons, p. 34.

'And all the trees of the field shall know that I, the Lord have brought down the high tree, have dried up the green tree, and have made the dry tree to flourish: I the Lord have spoken and done it.'—EZEKIEL XVII. 24.

LIGHT is good, and a pleasant thing it is to behold the sun. Yet far dearer than outward peace, far sweeter than inward consolation, is that, the ever-during stay, the solace of the Christian's heart, the imperishable root of which all else that gladdens it is but the bloom and odour; the dry tree that shall flourish when every green tree of delight and of desire fails. It is to the Cross that the heart must turn for that which will reconcile it to all conflicts, all privations.—DORA GREENWELL.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 1, 2.—G. Jackson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. liv. 1898, p. 401.

The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge.—EZEKIEL XVIII. 2.

THERE is no doubt about the sins of the fathers falling upon the generation in the case of an illegitimate child. No book has ever been written, no law has ever been made—there is not one dissentient voice in the chorus of rebuke, not one hand to help, or one lamp to lead the way, when a love-child is cast into the world. There must be thousands of these nameless ocean-tramps cast away on the broad sea of existence; overloaded, until their water-line has vanished, with their cargoes of the world's contempt and their own shame. No port is home to them; no roadstead, but which is too deep for them to use their fragile anchors of hope. They must ride the seas till they sink, and the waters close over them—forgotten, disregarded—but at rest.—E. T. THURSTON in Traffic, p. 29.

You know there is a kind of tree not dreamed of in botany, that lets fall its fruit every day in the year—you know? We call it—with reverence—'our dead fathers' mistakes'. I have had to eat much of that fruit.—G. W. CABLE, The Grandissimes, chap. XXXVII.

THE popular view was that guilt was inherited, that is, that the children are punished for their fathers' sins. The view of Æschylus and of Sophocles also (so far as he touches the problem on his side) was that a tendency towards guilt is inherited, but this tendency does not annihilate man's free will. If, therefore, the children are punished, they are punished for their own sins. . . . The purification of this special doctrine of the popular religion, which was effected in Greece by the poets, was effected among the Jews by the prophets. The phrase, 'visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children' was open to a double interpretation—either that the children were punished judicially for their fathers' sins, or that the children suffered in the course of nature for their fathers' sins. The Jews for a long time interpreted the words of the second commandment in the first sense, just as the Greeks so interpreted the idea of a curse in the home. But Ezekiel, in clearer tones even than the Greek poets, rejected the first interpretation, and freed the notion of moral responsibility from all ties of blood relationship. . . . The same truth had occurred early to the mind of India. In the Ramayana these striking words occur: 'A father, a mother, a son, whether in this world or the next, eats only the fruit of his own works; a father is not recompensed or punished for his son, neither a son for his father. Each of them by his own actions gives birth to good or evil.'—PROF. BUTCHER, Aspects of the Greek Genius, pp. 121, 122.

IN discussing the Irish problem, in Chartism (chap. rv.), Carlyle notes how 'we English pay even now, the bitter smart of long centuries of injustice to our neighbour Ireland. . . . England is guilty towards Ireland; and reaps at last, in full measure, the fruit of fifteen centuries of wrong-doing.' For, as he adds, 'the Irish population must get itself redressed and saved, for the sake of the English if for nothing else. Alas, that it should on both sides, be poor toiling men that pay the smart for unruly Striguls, Henrys, Macdermotts, and O'Donoghues! The strong have eaten sour grapes, and the teeth of the weak are set on edge. "Curses," says the proverb, "are like chickens, they return always home".'

REFERENCE.—XVIII. 2.—E. C. S. Gibson, Messages from the Old Testament, p. 205. M. G. Glazebrook, Prospice, p. 181.

G. Jackson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlviii. 1895, p. 22. P. H. Hall, The Brotherhood of Man, p. 127. S. D. McConnell, A Year's Sermons, p. 273. XVIII. 2-4.—J. M. E. Ross, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lx. 1901, p. 347.

'As I live, saith the Lord God, ye shall not have occasion any more to use this proverb in Israel.'—EZEKIEL XVIII. 3.

THE God who stands in a purely ethical relation to His worshippers is of necessity the one and only God, and the men to whom he stands in that relation are necessarily men of any and every race or people. Further, as such an ethical relation is one which involves inward conditions, it must be a relation of the individual as such to God, and not one in which the individual is lost in the family or nation. Hence the later prophets, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, set themselves against the idea of a collective responsibility for good or evil; and they take their stand on the principle of ethical individualism, that each moral agent must answer for his own doings.—CAIRD, Evolution of Religion, I. pp. 392, 393.

No doubt, they have designs on us for our benefit, in making the life of a civilized people an institution, in which the life of the individual is to a great extent absorbed, in order to preserve and perfect that of the race. But I wish to show at what a sacrifice this advantage is at present obtained, and to suggest that we may possibly so live as to secure all the advantage without suffering any of the disadvantage. What mean ye by saying that the poor ye have always with you, or that the fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge? 'As I live, saith the Lord God, ye shall not have occasion any more to use this proverb in Israel. Behold all souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine: the soul that sinneth, it shall die'.—THOREAU, Walden.

REFERENCE.—XVIII. 3.—E. Tremayne Dunstan, Christ in the Common-Place, p. 57.

SIN AS THE TRANSGRESSION OF LAW

'The soul that sinneth, it shall die.'—EZEKIEL XVIII. 4.

I. SIN is not only an offence against God, a disease or wound of human nature; it is also a transgression of an eternal law of right.

And it is the consciousness of an eternal moral law which man has transgressed which lies at the root of the idea of propitiation. Man is conscious in himself that he has violated the law of justice; he knows that the violation of that law is death. No forensic fiction, borrowed from human law-courts, no interchange of properties between the sinless and the sinful, can satisfy the conscience. That theory which unbelievers ridicule, conscience and revelation alike reject. When I say, in humble faith, with my eye fixed upon the Cross of Jesus, 'I believe in the remission of sins,' I mean by forgiveness more, infinitely more, than the passing over of my sin. I believe that my sin is done away; that, thanks be to God, I am righteous in the sight of God; that He, the All-Holy and the All-Pure, is looking down upon me in love. 'Beloved, now are we the sons of God.'

Reconciliation with God is separation from evil. To be reclaimed from evil is to be made free to approach God. This is Christ's work. In relation to evil, and the bondage of death, it is called Redemption or Deliverance; in relation to God, it is Reconciliation.

II. 'But how should man be just with God?' This is the question, the tormenting question, of the conscience, and it has everywhere been answered by a belief in sacrifice and propitiation.

'The soul that sinneth, it shall die;' and Christ, the Perfect Man, and man in Him, admits the justice of that law. So is the eternal law vindicated; so is the Father once more well pleased as He looks on man in His well-beloved Son; so to men and angels God shows Himself 'just, and the Justifier of him that believeth in Jesus'.

But there is nothing of substitution, or imputed righteousness, in all this. Christ died as our Sponsor, our Representative, the Head of the human race, the Second Adam, the First-born of redeemed humanity that we in heart and will might be one with Him in Death and Resurrection.

III. But if the Sacrifice of Christ be external to us, it will avail us nothing. If it is only a fact in the world's history, but not a fact in the history of our own lives, His Death and Resurrection will for us have been in vain. We must be crucified with Him, buried with Him in Baptism, that we may rise in Him to newness of life. Suffering in His sufferings, that we may also be glorified together. He did not suffer for us, that we, with a few meaningless words about 'faith only,' might live a life of ease, perhaps of sin; but that we, being reconciled to God by the Blood of Christ, might live the life of faith, the life of union with the Son of God.—AUBREY L. MOORE, Some Aspects of Sin, p. 78.

ORIGINAL SIN

'The soul that sinneth, it shall die.'—EZEKIEL XVIII. 4.

I. SIN, in one and that perhaps the most important of its aspects, is conscious disobedience to a law whose authority we recognize as binding us. Such disobedience will weaken, not only the will of the sinner himself, but the will of his descendants when their turn comes to combat the forces of evil. And this weakness and waywardness of the will in its warfare with the passions is what has been called by theologians, though the phrase has no Scriptural authority, original sin. It may perhaps be said that the phrase is not a very happy one; it is likely to mislead the unwary. For sin is essentially a personal, conscious act.

Ezekiel declared to the Jews with no uncertain voice the sublime principle by which the world is judged: All souls are Mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is Mine: the soul that sinneth, it shall die. To God is each soul responsible at last.

II. But the taint of sin is present. Whence comes it? Are we to regard it as a Divine punishment?

Nay; it is the consequence of the unity of mankind. Through the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners. Could we explain it better? Not that we are punished for Adam's sin; there is no such statement in Scripture. No; but we suffer through Adam's sin, inasmuch as we are bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh. We suffer doubly, alike in our bodies and in our souls.

We suffer in our bodies. Is it not obscurely hinted by St. Paul that physical disorder is the offspring of moral disorder? death came through sin, he says. The true significance of pain may be that it is the symbol and the token of sin; the suffering in the world may be the consequence, though not the chastisement, of Adam's transgression.

The infection of sin is with us, for as members of the great human family we have shared in Adam's sin. We have inherited the taint, although we are not responsible for it; it has never been in our power to refuse the inheritance. And so we see that the really practical question for us all is as to the source and the measure of our power of resisting this deadly tendency.

III. Can it be resisted, and how?

Ezekiel urges upon the Hebrews that the pollution of sin is not hopeless. The burden of his exhortation is that the wicked man may turn away from his wickedness and live, that repentance and recovery are within man's power. Here is man; what is his inheritance? The nature of Adam? True; but behind and beyond that he has inherited the image of God. With the tendency to do wrong, man has also received the power to do right. He is not the son of Adam only, but the son of God; and in the power of that Divine inheritance he may overcome.—J. H. BERNARD, Via Domini, p. 103.

DIVINE OWNERSHIP

'Behold, all souls are Mine.'—EZEKIEL XVIII. 4.

At first sight these words express only a general truth. But in a far deeper sense God says it of souls.

I. There are Reasons why God Should Claim a Property in souls more than in any other living thing.

(a) The creation of the soul is spoken of separately from the creation of every other thing. And observe the consequence—the necessary result—the soul of man is the breath of God. Therefore there is a sense in which it is an emanation of the great and eternal Spirit; it is God's.

(b) When the soul by sin became alienated from God, God purchased it back, and, oh, at what a price!—at the price of the blood and death of His own dear son. And may He not on that account say the more, 'All souls are mine'?

(c) The Holy Ghost dwells in a man's soul. 'Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?' And for this purpose: 'As Thou Father art in Me and I in Thee'; 'Thou art one in us, and we are one in Thee' through that indwelling of the Holy Ghost.

So by the very nature of its being, by the time and mode of its creation, by the purchase price paid for its redemption when lost, and by its actually mingling with the Holy Ghost and the great Triune, the soul is God's, and, in a sense that belongs to nothing else in all creation, God says, 'Behold, all souls are mine'.

II. If the Soul be thus Allied to God, what must 'a Soul' be in God's Sight, and what ought it to be in our Sight?—The very name 'soul' should never be used lightly. 'Upon my honour,' 'Upon my word'—they are foolish and useless expressions. No reverent man will ever say 'Upon my soul'.

III. But let us Look at it as regards our Relation to other People's Souls; our Fellow-creatures; those with whom, directly or indirectly, we have to do.—And here observe that God says 'All souls, all souls are Mine'. Not the souls of religious people only; not the souls of the baptized only, but all—those of every nation and every country of the world. 'All souls are Mine.' If 'the soul' is in its very nature and essence an emanation of God, it follows as a necessary consequence every living man and every living woman has a soul. 'All souls are Mine.' Therefore I ought to deal with every fellow-creature with the feeling—'I am dealing with the being of God'. No one can be outside that 'all'. Thou hast said it, Lord, 'all souls are Thine'. That poor creature's soul is Thine. God has said it. We bow to God's election; too deep for man to fathom. We can only prostrate ourselves before Him and say: 'Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?' This is a truth, and the infinity of the one may well balance and outweigh the mystery of the other. 'All souls are Mine.'

'Behold, all souls are Mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is Mine; the soul that sinneth, it shall die.'—EZEKIEL XVIII. 4.

THE doctrine of heritable guilt, with its mechanical consequences, has done for our moral nature what the doctrine of demoniac possession has done in barbarous times and still does among barbarous tribes for disease. Out of that black cloud came the lightning which struck the compass of humanity. Conscience, which from the dawn of moral being had pointed to the poles of right and wrong only as the great current of will flowed through the soul, was demagnetized, paralysed, and knew no fixed meridian, but stayed where the priest or council placed it. There is nothing to be done but to polarize the needle over again.—O. W. HOLMES, The Poet at the Breafast Table, x.

'He that hath walked in My statutes.'—EZEKIEL XVIII. 9.

THE way to salvation a man must walk in: that is the point. The history of the discovery and levelling of the way is good in its place, but does not help us to walk in it.—FICHTE.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 4.—B. J. Snell, The Cross and the Dice-Box, p. 165. W. H. Hutchings, Sermon-Sketches (2nd Series), p. 289. C. Silvester Horne, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xlv. 1893, p. 262. W. Boyd Carpenter, Ibid. vol. II. 1897, p. 289. Henry Alford, Sermons on Christian Doctrine, p. 28. T. Sadler, Sunday Thoughts, p. 225. J. Tulloch Sundays at Balmoral, p. 148. 'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. vii. pp. 153, 163. C. J. Thompson, Penny Pulpit, vol. xiv. No. 838, p. 381.

THE SINS OF THE FATHERS AND THE CHILDREN

(Trinity)

'The soul that sinneth, it shall die. The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son.'—EZEKIEL XVIII. 20.

I. THE murmuring Jews said, 'The father's soul sinneth and the son's soul shall die'. God's Prophet declares that death is the portion of the sinner himself, of him and not another. 'The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son: the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him.' Here was a law of the plainest and simplest justice.

II. Here then God's present justice was fully established and it was at the same time shown that we have no right to make any single words of His an excuse for darkening His whole character, which is declared to us in the length and breadth of His revelation. But the second commandment still remains: and we may naturally ask whether the doctrine of Ezekiel contradicts or sets it aside. Most surely not: both truths work into each other. God's curse upon idolatry falls upon the idolater's children as well as on himself. This is a plain matter of fact. Evil does go on breeding itself afresh from father to son. But, though there is this terrible mark to show how closely we are joined to each other for good or evil, the law stands everlastingly true that each man has to answer for his own sin.

III. Too often we go blindly through life, with nothing more than a dim sense that there is anything wrong about us at all, except that we cannot get everything we wish. And when we do partly awake to our misdoings, we are most willing to lay the guilt of them upon our fathers; we think how much of our character has come from them. If it is true, what a terrible warning it is to us not to act so that those who come after us may be able to say such things of us! for it is most true that we by our doings or our not-doings may make it harder for them to return to heaven and God. But yet we are not mere slaves to what our fathers have laid upon us. We may still turn from all our sins that they and we have committed, and then we shall surely live: we shall not die, for God Himself hath spoken it. Nay, it is He that is striving to win us back to our true inheritance as His children, His heirs, united to Him still more closely than to our parents, made partakers of His righteousness.—F. J. A. HORT, Village Sermons (2nd Series), p. 186.

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 20.—J. H. Jellett, The Elder Son, p. 103. S. G. MacLennan, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lxxi. 1907, p. 148.

'If the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed, and keep all My statutes, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall surely live, he shall not die. All his transgressions that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him: in his righteousness that he hath done he shall live.'—EZEKIEL XVIII. 21, 22.

THE place which was taken, when Ezekiel wrote, by the customary habits, traditions, and principles of Hebrew religion is taken to-day by the characteristic teaching of modern science. The old words of the Covenant, of God's punishment of men to the third and fourth generation, have given place to the new words of heredity and environment, but the principle remains the same. Science has been teaching us wonderfully, beautifully, terribly, with what a subtlety, a closeness of tie, we are bound by our brains and bodies to the ancestors from whom we sprang, the conditions from which we sprang, the progeny we leave behind us. And we accept the truth. But is it the last and only word? Is man nothing but the product of his circumstances, the creature of environment and forefathers? If it be so, then before long we may come to that feeling of despair which lay upon the breasts of these exiles of Jerusalem. We must balance that truth which Ezekiel recovered for his contemporaries—the truth that man's nature, though it is invested in the influences of blood and surroundings, yet has within it a personal self, higher than, apart from, that nature. I ask you to consider the basis which Ezekiel is teaching in reference to our lives as members of a community and as personal beings.

I. First of all, there is a message to us as members of a community. Sometimes the Hebrew took joy in the thought that he was bound, with his fathers and his children, in the bonds of the Covenant of the Will of God; and sometimes we take joy in the thought that we are bound together by these subtle and intricate ties to the nature which surrounds us, and to our fellow-beings in the long distance of the past and of the future. But when the Hebrew realized God's punishment in the wasting of Jerusalem he was filled with a chill despair, and when we, with all this wonderful teaching of science, turn, let us say, to the poor parts of our crowded cities, do we not find there that this teaching is somewhat grim? The one inevitable, indispensable factor of social reform is the individual freedom and responsibility of the man. Even when you change his circumstances it will be hollow unless you have changed the man's will so that he co-operates with the change of his circumstances. And every scheme of charity which belittles this factor of the man's individual freedom and power and responsibility is a real danger.

II. Secondly, the Prophet's message is to the personal life. There were men who heard Ezekiel speak who felt the burden upon them of the load, not of their fathers' sin, but of their own. It may be that among those to whom I speak to-day there are some who are conscious of that same difficulty of remorse. You can think of some mistake you made which has spoiled your life. You remember the liberty you have lost and squandered, you feel that your chance is gone, and that you are tied up in the doom of your destiny; or perhaps there are others who have not gone so far, but when there comes to them the prompting of some better impulse they meet it with some reply, expressed or unexpressed, in terms such as these: 'It is no good; it is too late. My nature is made; I cannot change. These heights are for others; I cannot attain them. Like Sir Lancelot, the quest is not for me. I am what my life has made me, and it is too late to change.' So when these better impulses come they are avoided until they gradually die out. In all this there is truth which cannot be gainsaid; but it is not the whole truth. There remains the hidden self, the inner man, and it is free. It has always the power of rising from its past and going forth to a new future. You say it is impossible. With man, perhaps, it is impossible; with God all things are possible.

REFERENCE.—XVIII. 21, 22, 23.—Archbishop Lang, Church Times, vol. lii. 1904, p. 529. XVIII. 23, 32.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxx. No. 1795.

'When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness that he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive.'—EZEKIEL XVIII. 27.

THE main matter which terrifies and torments most that are troubled in mind, is the enormity of their offences, the intolerable burthen of their sins, God's heavy wrath and displeasure so deeply apprehended, that they account themselves reprobates, quite forsaken of God, already damned, past all hope of grace, incapable of mercy, slaves of sin, and their offences so great that they cannot be forgiven. But these men must know there is no sin so heinous which is not pardonable in itself, no crime so great but by God's mercy it may be forgiven. 'At what time soever a sinner shall repent him of his sins from the bottom of his heart, I will blot out all his wickedness out of My remembrance, saith the Lord.'—BURTON'S Anatomy of Melancholy.

THE familiar words, 'when the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive,' are the theme of a great part of this wonderful book. Other Prophets have more of poetical beauty, a deeper sense of Divine things, a tenderer feeling of the mercies of God to His people; none teach so simply this great moral lesson, to us the first of all lessons. On the eve of the captivity, and in the midst of it, when the hour of mercy is past, and no image is too loathsome to describe the iniquities of Israel, still the Prophet does not forget that the Lord will not destroy the righteous with the wicked. — JOWETT, St. Paul's Epistles, II pp. 149, 150.

REFERENCE.—XVIII. 27.—R. D. B. Rawnaley, Village Sermons (1st Series), p. 68.

'O house of Israel, are not My ways equal.'—EZEKIEL XVIII. 29.

THIS was the text chosen by R. W. Dale for his first sermon, which was preached in the spring of 1845, in a room at Providence Cottage, Lower Clatford, Andover. 'The sermon,' says Dr. Dale's biographer, 'was a defence of Calvinism, coupled, however, with an assertion of universal redemption.'

REFERENCES.—XVIII. 30.—Bishop J. Percival, Sermons at Rugby, p. 138. XVIII. 30, 31.—N. D. Hillis, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lvii. 1900, p. 328. XVIII. 30, 32.—G. Body, ibid. vol. lxi. 1902, pp. 129, 152. XVIII. 31.—'Plain Sermons' by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, vol. viii. p. 193.

'I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God: wherefore turn yourselves and live ye.'—EZEKIEL XVIII. 32.

THE command itself 'Turn' hath love engraved on it, the Lord's so earnest seeking of it, His large offers to gain this.—FRASER OF BREA, Memoirs, p. 84.

DEVOURERS AND ENDEAVOURERS

'It devoured men.'—EZEKIEL XIX. 3.

It was a beast, and yet it devoured men—men that were intended in the Divine purpose and love to be sons of God. It was no ordinary quality of men that this beast learned to devour; the message is delivered to 'the princes of Israel'. 'What is thy mother?' A woman—degraded, bestialized. 'A lioness . . . and she brought up one of her whelps; it became a young lion, and it learned'—a word to be specially noted—'to catch the prey; it devoured men.' The whole lamentation is allegorical. Never omit the ideal from your criticism. We may unduly exalt the ideal or parabolical, or we may unduly repress it, and, shutting it out of our purview, we may starve our highest faculties and get nothing out of the Bible but letters, syllables, written and printed in iron and in ink.

I. 'It devoured men.' That is an allegorical lion, a beast that lived long ago, a beast that is dead. There you mistake the whole case. This ravenous lion is not only a lion now, but the beast is alive in every one of us.

There are two classes in the world at this moment—Endeavourers and Devourers. There they are, and you can follow which band you please—endeavourers, devourers—and you cannot belong to the betwixt-and-between party. Perhaps you would not like to belong to the endeavourers, because that name may have to your perverted taste somewhat of cant and insatiation about it, and you want to see how the idea goes on before you join it, and you will join it most lovingly when it does not need you. There are many persons waiting to applaud me as soon as I become a very great man. Then they are my friends, they always were my friends; they had not said much about it perhaps, but they always had a warm side to me, and if ever I became a millionaire twice over and were the prime favourite of the throne, why, of course they knew me.

II. What remark occurs to you when thinking about the devourers? A very commonplace remark, but only commonplace because it is profoundly true. The devourer always takes the easy course. That is why I condemn him. God never takes easy courses. Jesus never took an easy course. That is one of the reasons why I from a merely literary point of view delight in the conception of the Jesus of the New Testament. From the very first He would do hard work; He said He would save the world. There are some propositions that glorify themselves by their very boldness. Audacity may be an element and a seal of subdued and holy ambition.

We have in the first instance a devourer of men; in the second instance we have a Saviour of men. Which are we going to follow? which will really do us good? which will talk to us upon the greatest subjects? Let us listen to the conversation of both, and determine by the tone of the conversation which is the devourer and which is the endeavourer or saviour.—JOSEPH PARKER, City Temple Pulpit, vol. iii. p. 214.

REFERENCES.—XX. 2.—J. Baldwin Brown, The Souls of Exoduses and Pilgrimages, pp. 1 and 154. XX. 6.—G. Davidson, Christian World Pulpit, vol. lii. 1897, p. 72.

'Their heart went after their idols.'—EZEKIEL XX. 16.

HERE enters the fatal circumstance of Idolatry, that, in the era of the Prophets, no man's mind is any longer honestly filled with his Idol or Symbol. Before the Prophet can arise who, seeing through it, knows it to be mere wood, many men must have begun dimly to doubt that it was little more. Condemnable Idolatry is insincere idolatry. . . . It is equivalent to what we call Formalism, and Worship of Formulas, in these days of ours. No more immoral act can be done by a human creature; for it is the beginning of all immorality, or rather it is the impossibility henceforth of any morality whatsoever; the innermost moral soul is paralyzed thereby, cast into fatal magnetic sleep!—CARLYLE, Heroes, iv.

'And that which cometh into your mind shall not be at all, that ye say, We will be as the heathen.'—EZEKIEL XX. 32.

WHOSO would be a man must be a nonconformist.—EMERSON on Self-Reliance.

WE have been, in spite of momentary declensions, on a flood-tide of high profits and a roaring trade, and there is nothing like a roaring trade for engendering latitudinarians.—MORLEY, Compromise, pp. 34, 35.

REFERENCES.—XX. 32.—H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons (2nd Series), p. 275. XX. 32, 38.—C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 184. XX.—34-38.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xxxi. No. 1840.

'And I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, and there will I plead with you face to face; like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I plead with you, saith the Lord God.'—EZEKIEL XX. 35, 36.

It is good for any man to be alone with nature and himself, or with a friend who knows when silence is more sociable than talk.

In the wilderness alone,
There where nature worships God.

It is well to be in places where man is little and God is great—where what he sees all around him has the same look as it had a thousand years ago, and will have the same, in all likelihood, when he has been a thousand years in his grave. It abates and rectifies a man, if he is worth the process. It is not favourable to religious feeling to hear only of the actions and interference of man, and to behold nothing but what human ingenuity has completed. There is an image of God's greatness impressed upon the outward face of nature fitted to make us all pious, and to breathe into our hearts a purifying and salutary fear. In cities everything is man, and man alone. He seems to move and govern all, and be the Providence of cities . . . all is human policy, human foresight, human power; nothing reminds us of invisible dominion and concealed omnipotence—it is all earth and no heaven. One cure of this is prayer and the solitary place. As the body, harassed with the noxious air of cities, seeks relief in the freedom and the purity of the fields and hills, so the mind, wearied by commerce with man, resumes its vigour in solitude, and repairs its dignity.—SYDNEY SMITH.

REFERENCES.—XX. 38.—Henry Alford, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. ii. p. 120. XX. 41.—Spurgeon, Sermons, vol. xii. No. 688.

'And ye shall loath yourselves in your own sight for all your evils that ye have committed.'—EZEKIEL XX. 43.

SORROW for loss brought in her train sorrow for wrong—a sister more solemn still, and with a deeper blessing in the voice of her loving farewell. It is a great mistake to suppose that sorrow is a part of repentance. It is far too good a grace to come so easily. A man may repent, that is, think better of it and change his way, and be very much of a Pharisee—I do not say a hypocrite—for a long time after: it needs a sinit to be sorrowful. Yet repentance is generally the road to this sorrow.—GEORGE MACDONALD, David Elginbrod, part II. chap. xxiii.

REFERENCE.—XX. 44.—C. Kingsley, Sermons on National Subjects, p. 463.

'Ah Lord God! they say of me, Doth he not speak parables?'—EZEKIEL XX. 49.

THE inferior nature (in Jewish belief) of all such forms of inspiration is curiously illustrated by the complaint of Ezekiel, so difficult for one with Christian associations to appreciate, 'Ah Lord, they say of me, Doth he not speak parables?' as though this were a reproach. It is difficult for those who have been brought up with Christian associations to accept a scale which relegates to a lower level the method of the Parables; yet a distrust of metaphor in dealing with spiritual realities is a feeling justified by all but its highest exercise, and even there exhibited at times as a concession to human weakness and infirmity.—MISS WEDGWOOD.

REFERENCES.—XX. 49.—Hugh Black, University Sermons, p. 99. J. Fraser, Parochial and Other Sermons, p. 239. W. C. Magee, The Gospel and the Age, p. 139. H. Montagu Butler, Harrow School Sermons, p. 377. Thomas Chalmers, Sermons Preached in the Tron Church, Glasgow, p. 55. E. W. Attwood, Sermons for Clergy and Laity, p. 14.

EZEKIEL XXI. 9, 10.

THE roaring of lions, the howling of wolves, the raging of the stormy sea, and the destructive sword, are portions of eternity too great for the eye of reason.—BLAKE.

REFERENCE.—XXI. 9, 10.—R. A. Suckling, Sermons Plain and Practical, p. 215.

'Thus saith the Lord God; Remove the diadem, and take off the crown: . . . I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him.'—EZEKIEL XXI. 26, 27.

AFTER quoting these words, John Owen adds: 'One dissolution shall come upon the neck of another, until it all issue in Jesus Christ. "I will overturn it," saith God. "But men will set it up again." "I will overturn it again," saith God, "perfectly overturn it." All men's endeavours shall but turn things from one destructive issue to another, till "all issue in one whose right it is".'

